Hearts to borrow and hearts to lend,
And hearts to take and keep to the end,— 80
O little sails, make haste!

But thou, vast outbound ship of souls,
What harbor town for thee?
What shapes, when thy arriving tolls,
Shall crowd the banks to see?
Shall all the happy shipmates then Stand singing brotherly?

Or shall a haggard ruthless few Warp her over and bring her to,
 While the many broken souls of men 90
 Fester down in the slaver's pen,
 And nothing to say or do?

THE MENAGERIE

THANK God my brain is not inclined to cut
 Such capers every day! I'm just about Mellow, but then—There goes the tent-flap shut Rain's in the wind I thought so every snout
 Was twitching when the keeper turned me out

That screaming parrot makes my blood run cold
 Gabriel's trump! the big bull elephant Squeals 'Rain!' to the parched herd The monkeys scold,
 And jabber that it's rain water they want (It makes me sick to see a monkey pant) 10

I'll foot it home, to try and make believe I'm sober After this I stick to beer,
 And drop the circus when the sane folks leave
 A man's a fool to look at things too near
 They look back, and begin to cut up queer

Beasts do, at any rate, especially Wild devils caged They have the coolest way
 Of being something else than what you see
 You pass a sleek young zebra nosing hay, 19
 A nylghau looking bored and distingué,—

And think you've seen a donkey and a bird
 Not on your life! Just glance back, if you dare
 The zebra chews, the nylghau hasn't stirred,
 But something's happened, Heaven knows what or where
 To freeze your scalp and pompadour your hair

I'm not precisely an æolian lute
 Hung in the wandering winds of sentiment,
 But drown me if the ugliest, meanest brute
 Grunting and fretting in that sultry tent Didn't just floor me with embarrassment!

'Twas like a thunder-clap from out the clear,— 31
 One minute they were circus beasts, some grand,
 Some ugly, some amusing, and some queer.
 Rival attractions to the hobo band,
 The flying jenny, and the peanut stand.

Next minute they were old hearth-mates of mine!
 Lost people, eyeing me with such a stare!
 Patient, satiric, devilish, divine,
 A gaze of hopeless envy, squalid care, Hatred, and thwarted love, and dim despair

Within my blood my ancient kindred spoke,— 41
 Grotesque and monstrous voices, heard afar
 Down ocean caves when behemoth awoke, Or through fern forests roared the plesiosaur
 Locked with the giant-bat in ghastly war

And suddenly, as in a flash of light,
 I saw great Nature working out her plan, Through all her shapes from mastodon to mite
 Forever groping, testing, passing on
 To find at last the shape and soul of Man 50

Till in the fullness of accomplished time, Comes brother Forepaugh,<sup>1</sup> upon business bent,
 Tracks her through frozen and through torrid clime,
 And shows us, neatly labeled in a tent,
 The stages of her huge experiment,

Blabbing aloud her shy and reticent hours,
 Dragging to light her blinking, slothful moods,
 Publishing fretful seasons when her powers
 Worked wild and sullen in her solitudes, Or when her mordant laughter shook the woods 60

Here, round about me, were her vagrant
 births;
 Sick dreams she had, fierce projects she essayed,
 Her qualms, her fiery prides, her crazy mirths,

<sup>1</sup> A famous circus owner

The troublings of her spirit as she strayed, Cringed, gloated, mocked, was lordly, was afraid,

On that long road she went to seek mankind,
Here were the darkling coverts that she beat
To find the Hider she was sent to find,
Here the distracted footprints of her feet Whereby her soul's Desire she came to greet 70

But why should they, her botch-work, turn about
And stare disdain at me, her finished job?
Why was the place one vast suspended shout
Of laughter? Why did all the daylight throb
With soundless guffaw and dumb-stricken sob?

Helpless I stood among those awful cages;
The beasts were walking loose, and I was bagged!
I, I, last product of the toiling ages,
Goal of heroic feet that never lagged,—
A little man in trousers, slightly jagged 80

Deliver me from such another jury!
The Judgment Day will be a picnic to't Their satire was more dreadful than their fury,
And worst of all was just a kind of brute
Disgust, and giving up, and sinking mute

Survival of the fittest, adaptation,
And all their other evolution terms,
Seem to omit one small consideration,
To wit, that tumblebugs and angleworms Have souls there's soul in everything that squirms 90

And souls are restless, plagued, impatient things,
All dream and unaccountable desire;
Crawling, but pestered with the thought of
wings,
Spreading through every inch of earth's old mire
Mystical hanker after something higher

Wishes are horses, as I understand
I guess a wistful polyp that has strokes
Of feeling faint to gallivant on land
Will come to be a scandal to his folks;

Legs he will sprout, in spite of threats and jokes 100

And at the core of every life that crawls,
Or runs or flies or swims or vegetates—Churning the mammoth's heart-blood, in the galls
Of shark and tiger planting gorgeous hates,
Lighting the love of eagles for their mates;

Yes, in the dim brain of the jellied fish
That is and is not living—moved and stirred
From the beginning a mysterious wish,
A vision, a command, a fatal Word
The name of Man was uttered, and they heard 110

Upward along the æons of old war
They sought him wing and shank-bone, claw and bill
Were fashioned and rejected, wide and far They roamed the twilight jungles of their will,
But still they sought him, and desired him still

Man they desired, but mind you, Perfect Man,
The radiant and the loving, yet to be!
I hardly wonder, when they came to scan
The upshot of their strenuosity,
They gazed with mixed emotions upon me.

Well, my advice to you is, Face the creatures, 121
Or spot them sideways with your weather eye,
Just to keep tab on their expansive features,
It isn't pleasant when you're stepping high
To catch a giraffe smiling on the sly

If nature made you graceful, don't get gay
Back-to before the hippopotamus,
If meek and godly, find some place to play
Besides right where three mad hyenas fuss:
You may hear language that we won't discuss 130

If you're a sweet thing in a flower-bed hat,
Or her best fellow with your tie tucked in,
Don't squander love's bright springtime girding at
An old chimpanzee with an Irish chin.
There may be hidden meaning in his grin.

HENRY ADAMS

1838-1918

FROM THE EDUCATION OF HENRY ADAMS

UNDER the shadow of Boston State House, turning its back on the house of John Hancock, the little passage called Hancock Avenue runs, or ran, from Beacon Street, skirting the State House grounds, to Mount Vernon Street, on the summit of Beacon Hill, and there, in the third house below Mount Vernon Place, February 16, 1838, a child was born, and christened later by his uncle, the minister of the First Church after the tenets of Boston Unitarianism, as Henry Brooks Adams

Had he been born in Jerusalem under the shadow of the Temple and circumcised in the Synagogue by his uncle the high priest, under the name of Israel Cohen, he would scarcely have been more distinctly branded, and not much more heavily handicapped in the races of the coming century, in running for such stakes as the century was to offer, but, on the other hand, the ordinary traveler, who does not enter the field of racing, finds advantage in being, so to speak, ticketed through life, with the safeguards of an old, established traffic. Safeguards are often irksome, but sometimes convenient, and if one needs them at all, one is apt to need them badly. A hundred years earlier, such safeguards as his would have secured any young man's success, and although in 1838 their value was not very great compared with what they would have had in 1738, yet the mere accident of starting a twentieth-century career from a nest of associations so colonial—so troglodytic—as the First Church, the Boston State House, Beacon Hill, John Hancock and John Adams, Mount Vernon Street and Quincy, all crowding on ten pounds of unconscious babyhood, was so queer as to offer a subject of curious speculation to the baby long after he had witnessed the solution. What could become of such a child of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when he should wake up to find himself required to play the game of the twentieth? Had he been consulted, would he have cared to play the game at all, holding such cards as he held, and suspecting that the game was to be one of which neither he nor any one else back to the beginning of time knew the rules or the risks or the stakes? He was not consulted and was not responsible, but had he been taken into the confidence of his parents, he would certainly have told them to change nothing as far as concerned him. He would have been astounded by his own luck. Probably no child, born in the year, held better cards than he. Whether life was an honest game of chance, or whether the cards were marked and forced, he could not refuse to play his excellent hand. He could never make the usual plea of irresponsibility. He accepted the situation as though he had been a party to it, and under the same circumstances would do it again, the more readily for knowing the exact values. To his life as a whole he was a consenting, contracting party and partner from the moment he was born to the moment he died. Only with that understanding—as a consciously assenting member in full partnership with the society of his age—had his education an interest to himself or to others.

As it happened, he never got to the point of playing the game at all, he lost himself in the study of it, watching the errors of the players, but this is the only interest in the story, which otherwise has no moral and little incident. A story of education—seventy years of it—the practical value remains to the end in doubt, like other values about which men have disputed since the birth of Cain and Abel, but the practical value of the universe has never been stated in dollars. Although every one cannot be a Gargantua-Napoleon-Bismarck and walk off with the great bells of Notre Dame, every one must bear his own universe, and most persons are moderately interested in learning how their neighbors have managed to carry theirs.

This problem of education, started in 1838, went on for three years, while the baby grew, like other babies, unconsciouslv.

as a vegetable, the outside world working as it never had worked before, to get his new universe ready for him. Often in old age he puzzled over the question whether, on the doctrine of chances, he was at liberty to accept himself or his world as an accident. No such accident had ever happened before in human experience. For him, alone, the old universe was thrown into the ash-heap and a new one created. He and his eighteenth-century, troglodytic Boston were suddenly cut apart—separated forever—in act if not in sentiment, by the opening of the Boston and Albany Railroad, the appearance of the first Cunard steamers in the bay, and the telegraphic messages which carried from Baltimore to Washington the news that Henry Clay and James K. Polk were nominated for the Presidency. This was in May, 1844, he was six years old, his new world was ready for use, and only fragments of the old met his eyes.

Of all this that was being done to complicate his education, he knew only the color of yellow. He first found himself sitting on a yellow kitchen floor in strong sunlight. He was three years old when he took this earliest step in education, a lesson of color. The second followed soon, a lesson of taste. On December 3, 1841, he developed scarlet fever. For several days he was as good as dead, reviving only under the careful nursing of his family. When he began to recover strength, about January 1, 1842, his hunger must have been stronger than any other pleasure or pain, for while in after life he retained not the faintest recollection of his illness, he remembered quite clearly his aunt entering the sick-room bearing in her hand a saucer with a baked apple.

The order of impressions retained by memory might naturally be that of color and taste, although one would rather suppose that the sense of pain would be first to educate. In fact, the third recollection of the child was that of discomfort. The moment he could be removed, he was bundled up in blankets and carried from the little house in Hancock Avenue to a larger one which his parents were to occupy for the rest of their lives in the neighboring Mount Vernon Street. The season was midwinter, January 10, 1842, and he never forgot his acute distress for want of air under his blankets, or the noises of moving furniture.

As a means of variation from a normal type, sickness in childhood ought to have a certain value not to be classed under any fitness or unfitness of natural selection, and especially scarlet fever affected boys seriously, both physically and in character, though they might through life puzzle themselves to decide whether it had fitted or unfitted them for success; but this fever of Henry Adams took greater and greater importance in his eyes, from the point of view of education, the longer he lived. At first, the effect was physical. He fell behind his brothers two or three inches in height, and proportionally in bone and weight. His character and processes of mind seemed to share in this fining-down process of scale. He was not good in a fight, and his nerves were more delicate than boys' nerves ought to be. He exaggerated these weaknesses as he grew older. The habit of doubt, of distrusting his own judgment and of totally rejecting the judgment of the world, the tendency to regard every question as open, the hesitation to act except as a choice of evils, the shirking of responsibility, the love of line, form, quality, the horror of ennui, the passion for companionship and the antipathy to society—all these are well-known qualities of New England character in no way peculiar to individuals but in this instance they seemed to be stimulated by the fever, and Henry Adams could never make up his mind whether, on the whole, the change of character was morbid or healthy, good or bad for his purpose. His brothers were the type, he was the variation.

As far as the boy knew, the sickness did not affect him at all, and he grew up in excellent health, bodily and mental, taking life as it was given, accepting its local standards without a difficulty, and enjoying much of it as keenly as any other boy of his age. He seemed to himself quite normal, and his companions seemed always to think him so. Whatever was peculiar about him was education, not character, and came to him, directly and indirectly, as the result of that eighteenth-century inheritance which he took with his name.

The atmosphere of education in which he lived was colonial, revolutionary, almost Cromwellian, as though he were steeped, from his greatest grandmother's birth, in the odor of political crime. Resistance to something was the law of New England nature, the boy looked out on the world with the instinct of resistance, for numberless generations his predecessors had viewed the world chiefly as a thing to be reformed, filled with evil forces to be abolished, and they saw no reason to suppose that they had wholly succeeded in the abolition, the duty was unchanged. That duty implied not only resistance to evil, but hatred of it. Boys naturally look on all force as an enemy, and generally find it so, but the New Englander, whether boy or man, in his long struggle with a stingy or hostile universe, had learned also to love the pleasure of hating, his joys were few.

Politics, as a practice, whatever its professions, had always been the systematic organization of hatreds, and Massachusetts politics had been as harsh as the climate. The chief charm of New England was harshness of contrasts and extremes of sensibility—a cold that froze the blood, and a heat that boiled it—so that the pleasure of hating—one's self if no better victim offered—was not its rarest amusement, but the charm was a true and natural child of the soil, not a cultivated weed of the ancients. The violence of the contrast was real and made the strongest motive of education. The double exterior nature gave life its relative values. Winter and summer, cold and heat, town and country, force and freedom, marked two modes of life and thought, balanced like lobes of the brain. Town was winter confinement, school, rule, discipline; straight, gloomy streets, piled with six feet of snow in the middle, frosts that made the snow sing under wheels or runners, thaws when the streets became dangerous to cross, society of uncles, aunts, and cousins who expected children to behave themselves, and who were not always gratified, above all else, winter represented the desire to escape and go free. Town was restraint, law, unity. Country, only seven miles away, was liberty, diversity, outlawry, the endless delight of mere sense impressions given by nature for nothing, and breathed by boys without knowing it.

Boys are wild animals, rich in the treasures of sense, but the New England boy had a wider range of emotions than boys of more equable climates. He felt his nature crudely, as it was meant. To the boy Henry Adams, summer was drunken. Among senses, smell was the strongest—smell of hot pine-woods and sweet-fern in the scorching summer noon, of new-mown hay, of ploughed earth, of box hedges, of peaches, lilacs, syringas, of stables, barns, cow-yards, of salt water and low tide on the marshes, nothing came amiss. Next to smell came taste, and the children knew the taste of everything they saw or touched, from pennyroyal and flagroot to the shell of a pignut and the letters of a spelling-book—the taste of A-B, AB, suddenly revived on the boy's tongue sixty years afterwards. Light, line, and color as sensual pleasures, came later and were as crude as the rest. The New England light is glare, and the atmosphere harshens color. The boy was a full man before he ever knew what was meant by atmosphere, his idea of pleasure in light was the blaze of a New England sun. His idea of color was a peony, with the dew of early morning on its petals. The intense blue of the sea, as he saw it a mile or two away, from the Quincy hills, the cumuli in a June afternoon sky, the strong reds and greens and purples of colored prints and children's picture-books, as the American colors then ran, these were ideals. The opposites or antipathies were the cold grays of November evenings, and the thick, muddy thaws of Boston winter. With such standards, the Bostonian could not but develop a double nature. Life was a double thing. After a January blizzard, the boy who could look with pleasure into the violent snow-glare of the cold white sunshine, with its intense light and shade, scarcely knew what was meant by tone. He could reach it only by education.

Winter and summer, then, were two hostile lives, and bred two separate natures. Winter was always the effort to live, summer was tropical license. Whether the children rolled in the grass, or waded in the brook, or swam in the salt ocean, or sailed in the bay, or fished for smelts in the creeks, or netted minnows in the salt-marshes, or took to the pine-woods and the granite quarries, or chased muskrats and hunted snapping-turtles in the swamps, or mushroomed on the autumn hills, summer and country were always sensual living, while winter was always compulsory learning. Summer was the multiplicity of nature, winter was school.

The bearing of the two seasons on the education of Henry Adams was no fancy, it was the most decisive force he ever knew, it ran through life, and made the division between its perplexing, warring, irreconcilable problems, irreducible opposites, with growing emphasis to the last year of study. From earliest childhood the boy was accustomed to feel that, for him, life was double. Winter and summer, town and country, law and liberty, were hostile, and the man who pretended they were not, was in his eyes a schoolmaster—that is, a man employed to tell lies to little boys. Though Quincy was but two hours' walk from Beacon Hill, it belonged in a different world. For two hundred years, every Adams, from father to son, had lived within sight of State Street, and sometimes had lived in it, yet none had ever taken kindly to the town, or been taken kindly by it. The boy inherited his double nature. He knew as yet nothing about his great-grandfather, who had died a dozen years before his own birth; he took for granted that any great-grandfather of his must have always been good, and his enemies wicked, but he divined his great-grandfather's character from his own. Never for a moment did he connect the two ideas of Boston and John Adams, they were separate and antagonistic, the idea of John Adams went with Quincy. He knew his grandfather John Quincy Adams only as an old man of seventy-five or eighty who was friendly and gentle with him, but except that he heard his grandfather always called 'the President,' and his grandmother 'the Madam,' he had no reason to suppose that his Adams grandfather differed in character from his Brooks grandfather who was equally kind and benevolent. He liked the Adams side best, but for no other reason than that it reminded him of the country, the summer, and the absence of restraint. Yet he felt also that Quincy was in a way inferior to Boston, and that socially Boston looked down on Quincy. The reason was clear enough even to a five-year old child: Quincy had no Boston style. Little enough style had either, a simpler manner of life and thought could hardly exist, short of cave-dwelling. The flint-and-steel with which his grandfather Adams used to light his own fires in the early morning was still on the mantelpiece of his study. The idea of a livery or even a dress for servants, or of an evening toilette, was next to blasphemy. Bathrooms, water-supplies, lighting, heating, and the whole array of domestic comforts, were unknown at Quincy. Boston had already a bathroom, a water-supply, a furnace, and gas. The superiority of Boston was evident, but a child liked it no better for that.

The magnificence of his grandfather Brooks's house in Pearl Street or South Street has long ago disappeared, but perhaps his country house at Medford may still remain to show what impressed the mind of a boy in 1845 with the idea of city splendor. The President's place at Quincy was the larger and older and far the more interesting of the two, but a boy felt at once its inferiority in fashion. It showed plainly enough its want of wealth. It smacked of colonial age, but not of Boston style or plush curtains. To the end of his life he never quite overcame the prejudice thus drawn in with his childish breath. He never could compel himself to care for nineteenth-century style. He was never able to adopt it, any more than his father or grandfather or great-grandfather had done. Not that he felt it as particularly hostile, for he reconciled himself to much that was worse, but because, for some remote reason, he was born an eighteenth-century child. The old house at Quincy was eighteenth century. What style it had was in its Queen Anne mahogany panels and its Louis Seize chairs and sofas. The panels belonged to an old colonial Vassall who built the house, the furniture had been brought back from Paris in 1789 or 1801 or 1817, along with porcelain and books and much else of old diplomatic remnants, and neither of the two eighteenth-century styles—neither English Queen Anne nor French Louis Seize—was comfortable for a boy, or for any one else. The dark mahogany had been painted white to suit daily life in winter gloom. Nothing seemed to favor, for a child's objects, the older forms. On the contrary, most boys, as well as grown-up people, preferred the new, with good reason, and the child felt himself distinctly at a disadvantage for the taste.

Nor had personal preference any share in his bias. The Brooks grandfather was as amiable and as sympathetic as the Adams grandfather. Both were born in 1767, and both died in 1848. Both were kind to children, and both belonged rather to the eighteenth than to the nineteenth centuries. The child knew no difference between them except that one was associated with winter and the other with summer, one with Boston, the other with Quincy. Even with Medford, the association was hardly easier. Once as a very young boy he was taken to pass a few days with his grandfather Brooks under charge of his aunt, but became so violently homesick that within twenty-four hours he was brought back in disgrace. Yet he could not remember ever being seriously homesick again.

The attachment to Quincy was not altogether sentimental or wholly sympathetic. Quincy was not a bed of thornless roses. Even there the curse of Cain set its mark. There as elsewhere a cruel universe combined to crush a child. As though three or four vigorous brothers and sisters, with the best will, were not enough to crush any child, every one else conspired towards an education which he hated. From cradle to grave this problem of running order through chaos, direction through space, discipline through freedom, unity through multiplicity, has always been, and must always be, the task of education, as it is the moral of religion, philosophy, science, art, politics, and economy, but a boy's will is his life, and he dies when it is broken, as the colt dies in harness, taking a new nature in becoming tame. Rarely has the boy felt kindly towards his tamers. Between him and his master has always been war. Henry Adams never knew a boy of his generation to like a master, and the task of remaining on friendly terms with one's own family, in such a relation, was never easy.

All the more singular it seemed afterwards to him that his first serious contact with the President should have been a struggle of will, in which the old man almost necessarily defeated the boy, but instead of leaving, as usual in such defeats, a lifelong sting, left rather an impression of as fair treatment as could be expected from a natural enemy. The boy met seldom with such restraint. He could not have been much more than six years old at the time—seven at the utmost—and his mother had taken him to Quincy for a long stay with the President during the summer. What became of the rest of the family he quite forgot, but he distinctly remembered standing at the house door one summer morning in a passionate outburst of rebellion against going to school. Naturally his mother was the immediate victim of his rage, that is what mothers are for, and boys also, but in this case the boy had his mother at unfair disadvantage, for she was a guest, and had no means of enforcing obedience. Henry showed a certain tactical ability by refusing to start, and he met all efforts at compulsion by successful, though too vehement protest. He was in fair way to win, and was holding his own, with sufficient energy, at the bottom of the long staircase which led up to the door of the President's library, when the door opened, and the old man slowly came down. Putting on his hat, he took the boy's hand without a word, and walked with him, paralyzed by awe, up the road to the town. After the first moments of consternation at this interference in a domestic dispute, the boy reflected that an old gentleman close on eighty would never trouble himself to walk near a mile on a hot summer morning over a shadeless road to take a boy to school, and that it would be strange if a lad imbued with the passion of freedom could not find a corner to dodge around, somewhere before reaching the school door. Then and always, the boy insisted that this reasoning justified his apparent submission, but the old man did not stop, and the boy saw all his strategical points turned, one after another, until he found himself seated inside the school, and obviously the centre of curious if not malevolent criticism. Not till then did the President release his hand and depart.

The point was that this act, contrary to the inalienable rights of boys, and nullifying the social compact, ought to have made him dislike his grandfather for life. He could not recall that it had this effect even for a moment. With a certain maturity of mind, the child must have recognized that the President, though a tool of tyranny, had done his disreputable work with a certain intelligence. He had shown no temper, no irritation, no personal feeling, and had made no display of force. Above all, he had held his tongue. During their long walk he had said nothing, he had uttered no syllable of revolting cant about the duty of obedience and the wickedness of resistance to law, he had shown no concern in the matter, hardly even a consciousness of the boy's existence. Probably his mind at that moment was actually troubling itself little about his grandson's iniquities, and much about the iniquities of President Polk, but the boy could scarcely at that age feel the whole satisfaction of thinking that President Polk was to be the vicarious victim of his own sins, and he gave his grandfather credit for intelligent silence. For this forbearance he felt instinctive respect. He admitted force as a form of right, he admitted even temper, under protest, but the seeds of a moral education would at that moment have fallen on the stoniest soil in Quincy, which is, as every one knows, the stoniest glacial and tidal drift known in any Puritan land.

Neither party to this momentary disagreement can have felt rancor, for during these three or four summers the old President's relations with the boy were friendly and almost intimate. Whether his older brothers and sisters were still more favored he failed to remember, but he was himself admitted to a sort of familiarity which, when in his turn he had reached old age, rather shocked him, for it must have sometimes tried the President's patience. He hung about the library, handled the books, deranged the papers, ransacked the drawers, searched the old purses and pocket-books for foreign coins, drew the sword-cane, snapped the travelling-pistols, upset everything in the corners, and penetrated the President's dressing-closet where a row of tumblers, inverted on the shelf, covered caterpillars which were supposed to become moths or butterflies, but never did. The Madam bore with fortitude the loss of the tumblers which her husband purloined for these hatches, but she made protest when he carried off her best cut-glass bowls to plant with acorns or peachstones that he might see the roots grow, but which, she said, he commonly forgot like the caterpillars.

At that time the President rode the hobby of tree-culture, and some fine old trees should still remain to witness it, unless they have been improved off the ground, but his was a restless mind, and although he took his hobbies seriously and would have been annoyed had his grandchild asked whether he was bored like an English duke, he probably cared more for the processes than for the results, so that his grandson was saddened by the sight and smell of peaches and pears, the best of their kind, which he brought up from the garden to rot on his shelves for seed. With the inherited virtues of his Puritan ancestors, the little boy Henry conscientiously brought up to him in his study the finest peaches he found in the garden, and ate only the less perfect. Naturally he ate more by way of compensation, but the act showed that he bore no grudge. As for his grandfather, it is even possible that he may have felt a certain self-reproach for his temporary rôle of school-master—seeing that his own career did not offer proof of the worldly advantages of docile obedience—for there still exists somewhere a little volume of critically edited Nursery Rhymes with the boy's name in full written in the President's trembling hand on the fly-leaf. Of course there was also the Bible, given to each child at birth, with the proper inscription in the President's hand on the fly-leaf, while their grandfather Brooks supplied the silver mugs.

So many Bibles and silver mugs had to be supplied, that a new house, or cottage, was built to hold them. It was 'on the hill,' five minutes' walk above 'the old house,' with a far view eastward over Quincy Bay, and northward over Boston. Till his twelfth year, the child passed his summers there, and his pleasures of childhood mostly centered in it. Of education he had as yet little to complain. Country schools were not very serious. Nothing stuck to the mind except home impressions, and the sharpest were those of kindred children, but as influences that warped a mind, none compared with the mere effect of the back of the President's bald head, as he sat in his pew on Sundays, in line with that of President Quincy, who, though some ten years younger, seemed to children about the same age. Before railways entered the New England town, every parish church showed half-a-dozen of these leading citizens, with gray hair, who sat on the main aisle in the best pews, and had sat there, or in some equivalent dignity, since the time of St. Augustine, if not since the glacial epoch. It was unusual for boys to sit behind a President grandfather, and to read over his head the tablet in memory of a President great-grandfather, who had 'pledged his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor' to secure the independence of his country and so forth, but boys naturally supposed, without much reasoning, that other boys had the equivalent of President grandfathers, and that churches would always go on, with the bald-headed leading citizens on the main aisle, and Presidents or their equivalents on the walls. The Irish gardener once said to the child 'You'll be thinkin' you'll be President too!' The casualty of the remark made so strong an impression on his mind that he never forgot it. He could not remember ever to have thought on the subject, to him, that there should be a doubt of his being President was a new idea. What had been would continue to be. He doubted neither about Presidents nor about Churches, and no one suggested at that time a doubt whether a system of society which had lasted since Adam would outlast one Adams more.

The Madam was a little more remote than the President, but more decorative. She stayed much in her own room with the Dutch tiles, looking out on her garden with the box walks, and seemed a fragile creature to a boy who sometimes brought her a note or a message, and took distinct pleasure in looking at her delicate face under what seemed to him very becoming caps. He liked her refined figure, her gentle voice and manner, her vague effect of not belonging there, but to Washington or to Europe, like her furniture, and writing-desk with little glass doors above and little eighteenth-century volumes in old binding, labelled Peregrine Pickle or Tom Jones or Hannah More. Try as she might, the Madam could never be Bostonian, and it was her cross in life, but to the boy it was her charm. Even at that age, he felt drawn to it. The Madam's life had been in truth far from Boston. She was born in London in 1775, daughter of Joshua Johnson, an American merchant, brother of Governor Thomas Johnson of Maryland, and Catherine Nuth, of an English family in London. Driven from England by the Revolutionary War, Joshua Johnson took his family to Nantes, where they remained till the peace. The girl Louisa Catherine was nearly ten years old when brought back to London, and her sense of nationality must have been confused, but the influence of the Johnsons and the services of Joshua obtained for him from President Washington the appointment of Consul in London on the organization of the Government in 1790. In 1794 President Washington appointed John Quincy Adams Minister to The Hague. He was twenty-seven years old when he returned to London, and found the Consul's house a very agreeable haunt. Louisa was then twenty

At that time, and long afterwards, the Consul's house, far more than the Minister's, was the centre of contact for travelling Americans, either official or other. The Legation was a shifting point, between 1785 and 1815, but the Consulate, far down in the City, near the Tower, was convenient and inviting, so inviting that it proved fatal to young Adams. Louisa was charming, like a Romney portrait, but among her many charms that of being a New England woman was not one. The defect was serious. Her future mother-in-law, Abigail, a famous New England woman whose authority over her turbulent husband, the second President, was hardly so great as that which she exercised over her son, the sixth to be, was troubled by the fear that Louisa might not be made of stuff stern enough, or brought up in conditions severe enough, to suit a New England climate, or to make an efficient wife for her paragon son, and Abigail was right on that point, as on most others where sound judgment was involved, but sound judgment is sometimes a source of weakness rather than of force, and John Quincy already had reason to think that his mother held sound judgments on the subject of daughters-in-law which human nature, since the fall of Eve, made Adams helpless to realize. Being three thousand miles away from his mother, and equally far in love, he married Louisa in London, July 26, 1797, and took her to Berlin to be the head of the United States Legation. During three or four exciting years, the young bride lived in Berlin, whether she was happy or not, whether she was content or not, whether she was socially successful or not, her descendants did not surely know, but in any case she could by no chance have become educated there for a life in Quincy or Boston. In 1801 the overthrow of the Federalist Party drove her and her husband to America, and she became at last a member of the Quincy household, but by that time her children needed all her attention, and she remained there with occasional winters in Boston and Washington, till 1809. Her husband was made Senator in 1803, and in 1809 was appointed Minister to Russia. She went with him to St Petersburg, taking her baby, Charles Francis, born in 1807, but broken-hearted at having to leave her two older boys behind. The life at St Petersburg was hardly gay for her, they were far too poor to shine in that extravagant society, but she survived it, though her little girl baby did not, and in the winter of 1814-15, alone with the boy of seven years old, crossed Europe from St Petersburg to Paris, in her travelling-carriage, passing through the armies, and reaching Paris in the Cent Jours after Napoleon's return from Elba. Her husband next went to England as Minister, and she was for two years at the Court of the Regent. In 1817 her husband came home to be Secretary of State, and she lived for eight years in F Street, doing her work of entertainer for President Monroe's administration. Next she lived four miserable years in the White House. When that chapter was closed in 1829, she had earned the right to be tired and delicate, but she still had fifteen years to serve as wife of a Member of the House, after her husband went back to Congress in 1833. Then it was that the little Henry, her grandson, first remembered her, from 1843 to 1848, sitting in her panelled room, at breakfast, with her heavy silver teapot and sugar-bowl and cream-jug, which still exist somewhere as an heirloom of the modern safety-vault. By that time she was seventy years old or more, and thoroughly weary of being beaten about a stormy world. To the boy she seemed singularly peaceful, a vision of silver gray, presiding over her old President and her Queen Anne mahogany, an exotic, like her Sèvres china, an object of deference to every one, and of great affection to her son Charles, but hardly more Bostonian than she had been fifty years before, on her wedding-day, in the shadow of the Tower of London.

Such a figure was even less fitted than that of her old husband, the President, to impress on a boy's mind, the standards of the coming century. She was Louis Seize, like the furniture. The boy knew nothing of her interior life, which had been, as the venerable Abigail, long since at peace, foresaw, one of severe stress and little pure satisfaction. He never dreamed that from her might come some of those doubts and self-questionings, those hesitations, those rebellions against law and discipline, which marked more than one of her descendants, but he might even then have felt some vague instinctive suspicion that he was to inherit from her the seeds of the primal sin, the fall from grace, the curse of Abel, that he was not of pure New England stock, but half exotic. As a child of Quincy he was not a true Bostonian, but even as a child of Quincy he inherited a quarter taint of Maryland blood. Charles Francis, half Marylander by birth, had hardly seen Boston till he was ten years old, when his parents left him there at school in 1817, and he never forgot the experience. He was to be nearly as old as his mother had been in 1845, before he quite accepted Boston, or Boston quite accepted him.

A boy who began his education in these surroundings, with physical strength inferior to that of his brothers, and with a certain delicacy of mind and bone, ought rightly to have felt at home in the eighteenth century and should, in proper self-respect, have rebelled against the standards of the nineteenth. The atmosphere of his first ten years must have been very like that of his grandfather at the same age, from 1767 till 1776, barring the battle of Bunker Hill, and even as late as 1846, the battle of Bunker Hill remained actual. The tone of Boston society was colonial. The true Bostonian always knelt in self-abasement before the majesty of English standards, far from concealing it as a weakness, he was proud of it as his strength. The eighteenth-century ruled society long after 1850. Perhaps the boy began to shake it off rather earlier than most of his mates.

Indeed this prehistoric stage of education ended rather abruptly with his tenth year. One winter morning he was conscious of a certain confusion in the house in Mount Vernon Street, and gathered, from such words as he could catch, that the President, who happened to be then staying there, on his way to Washington, had fallen and hurt himself. Then he heard the word paralysis.

After that day he came to associate the word with the figure of his grandfather, in a tall-backed, invalid armchair, on one side of the spare bedroom fireplace, and one of his old friends, Dr Parkman or P P F Degrand, on the other side, both dozing

The end of this first, or ancestral and Revolutionary, chapter came on February 21, 1848—and the month of February brought life and death as a family habit—when the eighteenth century, as an actual and living companion, vanished. If the scene on the floor of the House, when the old President fell, struck the still simple-minded American public with a sensation unusually dramatic, its effect on a ten-year-old boy, whose boy-life was fading away with the life of his grandfather, could not be slight. One had to pay for Revolutionary patriots, grandfathers and grandmothers, Presidents, diplomats, Queen Anne mahogany and Louis Seize chairs, as well as for Stuart portraits. Such things warp young life. Americans commonly believed that they ruined it, and perhaps the practical common-sense of the American mind judged right. Many a boy might be ruined by much less than the emotions of the funeral service in the Quincy church, with its surroundings of national respect and family pride. By another dramatic chance it happened that the clergyman of the parish, Dr Lunt, was an unusual pulpit orator, the ideal of a somewhat austere intellectual type, such as the school of Buckminster and Channing inherited from the old Congregational clergy. His extraordinarily refined appearance, his dignity of manner, his deeply cadenced voice, his remarkable English and his fine appreciation, gave to the funeral service a character that left an overwhelming impression on the boy's mind. He was to see many great functions—funerals and festivals—in after-life, till his only thought was to see no more, but he never again witnessed anything nearly so impressive to him as the last services at Quincy over the body of one President and the ashes of another.

The effect of the Quincy service was deepened by the official ceremony which afterwards took place in Faneuil Hall, when the boy was taken to hear his uncle, Edward Everett, deliver a Eulogy. Like all Mr Everett's orations, it was an admirable piece of oratory, such as only an admirable orator and scholar could create; too good for a ten-year-old boy to appreciate at its value, but already the boy knew that the dead President could not be in it, and had even learned why he would have been out of place there, for knowledge was beginning to come fast. The shadow of the War of 1812 still hung over State Street, the shadow of the Civil War to come had already begun to darken Faneuil Hall. No rhetoric could have reconciled Mr Everett's audience to his subject. How could he say there, to an assemblage of Bostonians in the heart of mercantile Boston, that the only distinctive mark of all the Adamses, since old Sam Adams's father a hundred and fifty years before, had been their inherited quarrel with State Street, which had again and again broken out into riot, bloodshed, personal feuds, foreign and civil war, wholesale banishments and confiscations, until the history of Florence was hardly more turbulent than that of Boston? How could he whisper the word Hartford Convention before the men who had made it? What would have been said had he suggested the chance of Secession and Civil War?

Thus already, at ten years old, the boy found himself standing face to face with a dilemma that might have puzzled an early Christian. What was he?—where was he going? Even then he felt that something was wrong, but he concluded that it must be Boston. Quincy had always been right, for Quincy represented a moral principle—the principle of resistance to Boston. His Adams ancestors must have been right, since they were always hostile to State Street. If State Street was wrong, Quincy must be right! Turn the dilemma as he pleased, he still came back on the eighteenth century and the law of Resistance, of Truth, of Duty, and of Freedom. He was a ten-year-old priest and politician. He could under no circumstances have guessed what the next fifty years had in store, and no one could teach him, but sometimes, in his old age, he wondered—and could never decide—whether the most clear and certain knowledge would have helped him. Supposing he had seen a New York stock-list of 1900, and had studied the statistics of railways, telegraphs, coal, and steel—would he have quitted his eighteenth-century, his ancestral prejudices, his abstract ideals, his semiclerical training, and the rest, in order to perform an expiatory pilgrimage to State Street, and ask for the fatted calf of his grandfather Brooks and a clerkship in the Suffolk Bank?

Sixty years afterwards he was still unable to make up his mind. Each course had its advantages, but the material advantages, looking back, seemed to lie wholly in State Street.

THE DYNAMO AND THE VIRGIN (1900)

UNTIL the Great Exposition of 1900 closed its doors in November, Adams haunted it, aching to absorb knowledge, and helpless to find it. He would have liked to know how much of it could have been grasped by the best-informed man in the world. While he was thus meditating chaos, Langley came by, and showed it to him. At Langley's behest, the Exhibition dropped its superfluous rags and stripped itself to the skin, for Langley knew what to study, and why, and how, while Adams might as well have stood outside in the night, staring at the Milky Way. Yet Langley said nothing new, and taught nothing that one might not have learned from Lord Bacon, three hundred years before, but though one should have known the Advancement of Science as well as one knew the Comedy of Errors, the literary knowledge counted for nothing until some teacher should show how to apply it. Bacon took a vast deal of trouble in teaching King James I and his subjects, American or other, towards the year 1620, that true science was the development or economy of forces; yet an elderly American in 1900 knew neither the formula nor the forces, or even so much as to say to himself that his historical business in the Exposition concerned only the economies or developments of force since 1893, when he began the study at Chicago.

Nothing in education is so astonishing as the amount of ignorance it accumulates in the form of inert facts. Adams had looked at most of the accumulations of art in the storehouses called Art Museums, yet he did not know how to look at the art exhibits of 1900. He had studied Karl Marx and his doctrines of history with profound attention, yet he could not apply them at Paris Langley, with the ease of a great master of experiment, threw out of the field every exhibit that did not reveal a new application of force, and naturally threw out, to begin with, almost the whole art exhibit. Equally, he ignored almost the whole industrial exhibit. He led his pupil directly to the forces. His chief interest was in new motors to make his airship feasible, and he taught Adams the astonishing complexities of the Daimler motor, and of the automobile, which, since 1893, had become a nightmare at a hundred kilometres an hour, almost as destructive as the electric tram which was only ten years older, and threatening to become as terrible as the locomotive steam-engine itself, which was almost exactly Adams's own age.

Then he showed his scholar the great hall of dynamos, and explained how little he knew about electricity or force of any kind, even of his own special sun, which spouted heat in inconceivable volume, but which, as far as he knew, might spout less or more, at any time, for all the certainty he felt in it. To him, the dynamo itself was but an ingenious channel for conveying somewhere the heat latent in a few tons of poor coal hidden in a dirty engine-house carefully kept out of sight, but to Adams the dynamo became a symbol of infinity. As he grew accustomed to the great gallery of machines, he began to feel the forty-foot dynamos as a moral force, much as the early Christians felt the Cross. The planet itself seemed less impressive, in its old-fashioned, deliberate, annual or daily revolution, than this huge wheel, revolving within arm's-length at some vertiginous speed, and barely murmuring—scarcely humming an audible warning to stand a hair's-breadth further for respect of power—while it would not wake the baby lying close against its frame. Before the end, one began to pray to it, inherited instinct taught the natural expression of man before silent and infinite force. Among the thousand symbols of ultimate energy, the dynamo was not so human as some, but it was the most expressive.

Yet the dynamo, next to the steam-engine, was the most familiar of exhibits. For Adams's objects its value lay chiefly in its occult mechanism. Between the dynamo in the gallery of machines and the engine-house outside, the break of continuity amounted to abysmal fracture for a historian's objects. No more relation could he discover between the steam and the electric current than between the Cross and the cathedral. The forces were interchangeable if not reversible, but he could see only an absolute fiat in electricity as in faith. Langley could not help him. Indeed, Langley seemed to be worried by the same trouble, for he constantly repeated that the new forces were anarchical, and especially that he was not responsible for the new rays, that were little short of parricidal in their wicked spirit towards science. His own rays, with which he had doubled the solar spectrum, were altogether harmless and beneficent, but Radium denied its God—or, what was to Langley the same thing, denied the truths of his Science. The force was wholly new.

A historian who asked only to learn enough to be as futile as Langley or Kelvin, made rapid progress under this teaching, and mixed himself up in the tangle of ideas until he achieved a sort of Paradise of ignorance vastly consoling to his fatigued senses. He wrapped himself in vibrations and rays which were new, and he would have hugged Marconi and Branly had he met them, as he hugged the dynamo, while he lost his arithmetic in trying to figure out the equation between the discoveries and the economies of force. The economies, like the discoveries, were absolute, super-sensual, occult, incapable of expression in horse-power. What mathematical equivalent could he suggest as the value of a Branly coherer? Frozen air, or the electric furnace, had some scale of measurement, no doubt, if somebody could invent a thermometer adequate to the purpose, but X-rays had played no part whatever in man's consciousness, and the atom itself had figured only as a fiction of thought. In these seven years man had translated himself into a new universe which had no common scale of measurement with the old. He had entered a supersensual world, in which he could measure nothing except by chance collisions of movements imperceptible to his senses, perhaps even imperceptible to his instruments, but perceptible to each other, and so to some known ray at the end of the scale. Langley seemed prepared for anything, even for an indeterminable number of universes interfused—physics stark mad in metaphysics.

Historians undertake to arrange sequences,—called stories, or histories—assuming in silence a relation of cause and effect. These assumptions, hidden in the depths of dusty libraries, have been astounding, but commonly unconscious and childlike, so much so, that if any captious critic were to drag them to light, historians would probably reply, with one voice, that they had never supposed themselves required to know what they were talking about. Adams, for one, had toiled in vain to find out what he meant. He had even published a dozen volumes of American history for no other purpose than to satisfy himself whether, by the severest process of stating, with the least possible comment, such facts as seemed sure, in such order as seemed rigorously consequent, he could fix for a familiar moment a necessary sequence of human movement. The result had satisfied him as little as at Harvard College. Where he saw sequence, other men saw something quite different, and no one saw the same unit of measure. He cared little about his experiments and less about his statesmen, who seemed to him quite as ignorant as himself and, as a rule, no more honest, but he insisted on a relation of sequence, and if he could not reach it by one method, he would try as many methods as science knew. Satisfied that the sequence of men led to nothing and that the sequence of their society could lead no further, while the mere sequence of time was artificial, and the sequence of thought was chaos, he turned at last to the sequence of force, and thus it happened that, after ten years' pursuit, he found himself lying in the Gallery of Machines at the Great Exposition of 1900, his historical neck broken by the sudden irruption of forces totally new.

Since no one else showed much concern, an elderly person without other cares had no need to betray alarm. The year 1900 was not the first to upset schoolmasters. Copernicus and Galileo had broken many professorial necks about 1600, Columbus had stood the world on its head towards 1500, but the nearest approach to the revolution of 1900 was that of 310, when Constantine set up the Cross. The rays that Langley disowned, as well as those which he fathered, were occult, supersensual, irrational, they were a revelation of mysterious energy like that of the Cross, they were what, in terms of mediæval science, were called immediate modes of the divine substance.

The historian was thus reduced to his last resources. Clearly if he was bound to reduce all these forces to a common value, this common value could have no measure but that of their attraction on his own mind. He must treat them as they had been felt; as convertible, reversible, interchangeable attractions on thought. He made up his mind to venture it, he would risk translating rays into faith. Such a reversible process would vastly amuse a chemist, but the chemist could not deny that he, or some of his fellow physicists, could feel the force of both. When Adams was a boy in Boston, the best chemist in the place had probably never heard of Venus except by way of scandal, or of the Virgin except as idolatry, neither had he heard of dynamos or automobiles or radium, yet his mind was ready to feel the force of all, though the rays were unborn and the women were dead.

Here opened another totally new education, which promised to be by far the most hazardous of all. The knife-edge along which he must crawl, like Sir Lancelot in the twelfth century, divided two kingdoms of force which had nothing in common but attraction. They were as different as a magnet is from gravitation, supposing one knew what a magnet was, or gravitation, or love. The force of the Virgin was still felt at Lourdes, and seemed to be as potent as X-rays, but in America neither Venus nor Virgin ever had value as force—at most as sentiment. No American had ever been truly afraid of either.

This problem in dynamics gravely perplexed an American historian. The Woman had once been supreme, in France she still seemed potent, not merely as a sentiment, but as a force. Why was she unknown in America? For evidently America was ashamed of her, and she was ashamed herself, otherwise they would not have strewn fig-leaves so profusely all over her. When she was a true force, she was ignorant of fig-leaves, but the monthly-magazine-made American female had not a feature that would have been recognized by Adam. The trait was notorious, and often humorous, but any one brought up among Puritans knew that sex was sin. In any previous age, sex was strength. Neither art nor beauty was needed. Every one, even among Puritans, knew that neither Diana of the Ephesians nor any of the Oriental goddesses was worshipped for her beauty. She was goddess because of her force, she was the animated dynamo, she was reproduction—the greatest and most mysterious of all energies, all she needed was to be fecund. Singularly enough, not one of Adams's many schools of education had ever drawn his attention to the opening lines of Lucretius, though they were perhaps the finest in all Latin Literature, where the poet invoked Venus exactly as Dante invoked the Virgin —

'Quæ quoniam rerum naturam sola gubernas' <sup>1</sup>

The Venus of Epicurean philosophy survived in the Virgin of the Schools:

'Donna, sei tanto grande, e tanto vali,
Che qual vuol grazia, e a te non ricorre,
Sua disianza vuol volar senz' ali.' <sup>2</sup>

All this was to American thought as though it had never existed. The true American knew something of the facts, but nothing of the feelings, he read the letter, but he never felt the law. Before this historical chasm, a mind like that of Adams felt itself helpless, he turned from the Virgin to the Dynamo as though he were a Branly coherer. On one side, at the Louvre and at Chartres, as he knew by the record of work actually done and still before his eyes, was the highest energy ever known to man, the creator of four-fifths of his noblest art, exercising vastly more attraction over the human mind than all the steam-engines and dynamos ever dreamed of; and yet this energy was unknown to the American mind. An American Virgin would never dare command, an American Venus would never dare exist.

That whoso would have grace, and seeks not thee,
Would have his wish fly upward without wings.'

The question, which to any plain American of the nineteenth century seemed as remote as it did to Adams, drew him almost violently to study, once it was posed, and on this point Langley's were as useless as though they were Herbert Spencers or dynamos. The idea survived only as art. There one turned as naturally as though the artist were himself a woman. Adams began to ponder, asking himself whether he knew of any American artist who had ever insisted on the power of sex, as every classic had always done, but he could think only of Walt Whitman, Bret Harte, as far as the magazines would let him venture, and one or two painters, for the flesh-tones. All the rest had used sex for sentiment, never for force, to them, Eve was a tender flower, and Herodias an unfeminine horror. American art, like the American language and American education, was as far as possible sexless. Society regarded this victory over sex as its greatest triumph, and the historian readily admitted it, since the moral issue, for the moment, did not concern one who was studying the relations of unmoral force. He cared nothing for the sex of the dynamo until he could measure its energy.

Vaguely seeking a clue, he wandered through the art exhibit, and, in his stroll, stopped almost every day before Saint-Gaudens's General Sherman, which had been given the central post of honor. Saint-Gaudens himself was in Paris, putting on the work his usual interminable last touches, and listening to the usual contradictory suggestions of brother sculptors. Of all the American artists who gave to American art whatever life it breathed in the seventies, Saint-Gaudens was perhaps the most sympathetic, but certainly the most inarticulate. General Grant or Don Cameron had scarcely less instinct of rhetoric than he. All the others—the Hunts, Richardson, John La Farge, Stanford White—were exuberant, only Saint-Gaudens could never discuss or dilate on an emotion, or suggest artistic arguments for giving to his work the forms that he felt. He never laid down the law, or affected the despot, or became brutalized like Whistler by the brutalities of his world. He required no incense, he was no egoist, his simplicity of thought was excessive, he could not imitate, or give any form but his own to the creations of his hand. No one felt more strongly than he the strength of other men, but the idea that they could affect him never stirred an image in his mind.

This summer his health was poor and his spirits were low. For such a temper, Adams was not the best companion, since his own gaiety was not folle, but he risked going now and then to the studio on Mont Parnasse to draw him out for a stroll in the Bois de Boulogne, or dinner as pleased his moods, and in return Saint-Gaudens sometimes let Adams go about in his company.

Once Saint-Gaudens took him down to Amiens, with a party of Frenchmen, to see the cathedral. Not until they found themselves actually studying the sculpture of the western portal, did it dawn on Adams's mind that, for his purposes, Saint-Gaudens on that spot had more interest to him than the cathedral itself. Great men before great monuments express great truths, provided they are not taken too solemnly. Adams never tired of quoting the supreme phrase of his idol Gibbon, before the Gothic cathedrals: 'I darted a contemptuous look on the stately monuments of superstition.' Even in the footnotes of his history, Gibbon had never inserted a bit of humor more human than this, and one would have paid largely for a photograph of the fat little historian, on the background of Notre Dame of Amiens, trying to persuade his readers—perhaps himself—that he was darting a contemptuous look on the stately monument, for which he felt in fact the respect which every man of his vast study and active mind always feels before objects worthy of it, but besides the humor, one felt also the relation Gibbon ignored the Virgin, because in 1789 religious monuments were out of fashion. In 1900 his remark sounded fresh and simple as the green fields to ears that had heard a hundred years of other remarks, mostly no more fresh and certainly less simple. Without malice, one might find it more instructive than a whole lecture of Ruskin. One sees what one brings, and at that moment Gibbon brought the French Revolution. Ruskin brought reaction against the Revolution. Saint-Gaudens had passed beyond all. He liked the stately monuments much more than he liked Gibbon or Ruskin, he loved their dignity, their unity, their scale, their lines, their lights and shadows, their decorative sculpture, but he was even less conscious than they of the force that created it all—the Virgin, the Woman—by whose genius ‘the stately monuments of superstition’ were built, through which she was expressed. He would have seen more meaning in Isis with the cow’s horns, at Edfoo, who expressed the same thought. The art remained, but the energy was lost even upon the artist.

Yet in mind and person Saint-Gaudens was a survival of the 1500, he bore the stamp of the Renaissance, and should have carried an image of the Virgin round his neck, or stuck in his hat, like Louis XI. In mere time he was a lost soul that had strayed by chance into the twentieth century, and forgotten where it came from. He writhed and cursed at his ignorance, much as Adams did at his own, but in the opposite sense. Saint-Gaudens was a child of Benvenuto Cellini, smothered in an American cradle. Adams was a quintessence of Boston, devoured by curiosity to think like Benvenuto. Saint-Gaudens’s art was starved from birth, and Adams’s instinct was blighted from babyhood. Each had but half of a nature, and when they came together before the Virgin of Amiens they ought both to have felt in her the force that made them one, but it was not so. To Adams she became more than ever a channel of force, to Saint-Gaudens she remained as before a channel of taste.

For a symbol of power, Saint-Gaudens instinctively preferred the horse, as was plain in his horse and Victory of the Sherman monument. Doubtless Sherman also felt it so. The attitude was so American that, for at least forty years, Adams had never realized that any other could be in sound taste. How many years had he taken to admit a notion of what Michaelangelo and Rubens were driving at? He could not say, but he knew that only since 1895 had he begun to feel the Virgin or Venus as force, and not everywhere even so. At Chartres—perhaps at Lourdes—possibly at Cnidos if one could still find there the divinely naked Aphrodite of Praxiteles—but otherwise one must look for force to the goddesses of Indian mythology. The idea died out long ago in the German and English stock. Saint-Gaudens at Amiens was hardly less sensitive to the force of the female energy than Matthew Arnold at the Grande Chartreuse. Neither of them felt goddesses as power—only as reflected emotion, human expression, beauty, purity, taste, scarcely even as sympathy. They felt a railway train as power, yet they, and all other artists, constantly complained that the power embodied in a railway train could never be embodied in art. All the steam in the world could not, like the Virgin, build Chartres.

Yet in mechanics, whatever the mechanicians might think, both energies acted as interchangeable forces on man, and by action on man all known force may be measured. Indeed, few men of science measured force in any other way. After once admitting that a straight line was the shortest distance between two points, no serious mathematician cared to deny anything that suited his convenience, and rejected no symbol, unproved or unproveable, that helped him to accomplish work. The symbol was force, as a compass-needle or a triangle was force, as the mechanist might prove by losing it, and nothing could be gained by ignoring their value. Symbol or energy, the Virgin had acted as the greatest force the Western world ever felt, and had drawn man’s activities to herself more strongly than any other power, natural or super-natural, had ever done, the historian’s business was to follow the track of the energy, to find where it came from and where it went to, its complex source and shifting channels, its values, equivalents, conversions. It could scarcely be more complex than radium, it could hardly be deflected, diverted, polarized, absorbed more perplexingly than other radiant matter. Adams knew nothing about any of them, but as a mathematical problem of influence on human progress, though all were occult, all reacted on his mind, and he rather inclined to think the Virgin easiest to handle.

The pursuit turned out to be long and tortuous, leading at last into the vast forests of scholastic science. From Zeno to Descartes, hand in hand with Thomas Aquinas, Montaigne, and Pascal, one stumbled as stupidly as though one were still a German student of 1860. Only with the instinct of despair could one force one’s self into this old thicket of ignorance after having been repulsed at a score of entrances more promising and more popular. Thus far, no path had led anywhere, unless perhaps to an exceedingly modest living. Forty-five years of study had proved to be quite futile for the pursuit of power, one controlled no more force in 1900 than in 1850, although the amount of force controlled by society had enormously increased. The secret of education still hid itself somewhere behind ignorance, and one fumbled over it as feebly as ever. In such labyrinths, the staff is a force almost more necessary than the legs, the pen becomes a sort of blind-man's dog, to keep him from falling into the gutters. The pen works for itself, and acts like a hand, modelling the plastic material over and over again to the form that suits it best. The form is never arbitrary, but is a sort of growth like crystallization, as any artist knows too well, for often the pencil or pen runs into sidepaths and shapelessness, loses its relations, stops or is bogged. Then it has to return on its trail, and recover, if it can, its line of force. The result of a year's work depends more on what is struck out than on what is left in, on the sequence of the main lines of thought, than on their play or variety. Compelled once more to lean heavily on this support, Adams covered more thousands of pages with figures as formal as though they were algebra, laboriously striking out, altering, burning, experimenting, until the year had expired, the Exposition had long been closed, and winter drawing to its end, before he sailed from Cherbourg, on January 19, 1901, for home.

A MUNICIPAL REPORT

*The cities are full of pride, Challenging each to each—
This from her mountainside,
That from her burthened beach*

R. KIPLING.

Fancy a novel about Chicago or Buffalo, let us say, or Nashville, Tennessee! There are just three big cities in the United States that are 'story cities'—New York, of course, New Orleans, and, best of the lot, San Francisco

FRANK NORRIS

EAST is East, and West is San Francisco, according to Californians. Californians are a race of people, they are not merely inhabitants of a State. They are the Southerners of the West. Now, Chicagoans are no less loyal to their city, but when you ask them why, they stammer and speak of lake fish and the new Odd Fellows Building. But Californians go into detail.

Of course they have, in the climate, an argument that is good for half an hour while you are thinking of your coal bills and heavy underwear. But as soon as they come to mistake your silence for conviction, madness comes upon them, and they picture the city of the Golden Gate as the Bagdad of the New World. So far, as a matter of opinion, no refutation is necessary. But, dear cousins all (from Adam and Eve descended), it is a rash one who will lay his finger on the map and say 'In this town there can be no romance—what could happen here?' Yes, it is a bold and a rash deed to challenge in one sentence history, romance, and Rand and McNally.

Nashville—A city, port of delivery, and the capital of the State of Tennessee, is on the Cumberland River and on the N C & ST L. and the L & N railroads. This city is regarded as the most important educational centre in the South.

I stepped off the train at 8 P. M. Having searched the thesaurus in vain for adjectives, I must, as a substitution, hie me to comparison in the form of a recipe.

Take of London fog 30 parts, malaria 10 parts; gas leaks 20 parts, dewdrops gathered in a brick yard at sunrise 25 parts, odor of honeysuckle 15 parts. Mix.

The mixture will give you an approximate conception of a Nashville drizzle It is not so fragrant as a moth-ball nor as thick as pea-soup, but 'tis enough—'twill serve

I went to a hotel in a tumbrel It required strong self-suppression for me to keep from climbing to the top of it and giving an imitation of Sidney Carton The vehicle was drawn by beasts of a bygone era and driven by something dark and emancipated

I was sleepy and tired, so when I got to the hotel I hurriedly paid it the fifty cents it demanded (with approximate lagniappe, I assure you) I knew its habits, and I did not want to hear it prate about its old 'marster' or anything that happened 'befo' de wah'

The hotel was one of the kind described as 'renovated' That means $30,000 worth of new marble pillars, tiling, electric lights and brass cuspidors in the lobby, and a new L & N time table and a lithograph of Lookout Mountain in each one of the great rooms above The management was without reproach, the attention full of exquisite Southern courtesy, the service as slow as the progress of a snail and as good-humored as Rip Van Winkle The food was worth traveling a thousand miles for. There is no other hotel in the world where you can get such chicken livers en brochette

At dinner I asked a Negro waiter if there was anything doing in town He pondered gravely for a minute, and then replied 'Well, boss, I don't really reckon there's anything at all doin' after sundown'

Sundown had been accomplished, it had been drowned in the drizzle long before So that spectacle was denied me But I went forth upon the streets in the drizzle to see what might be there

It is built on undulating grounds, and the streets are lighted by electricity at a cost of $32,470 per annum

As I left the hotel there was a race riot Down upon me charged a company of freedmen, or Arabs, or Zulus, armed with—no, I saw with relief that they were not rifles, but whips And I saw dimly a caravan of black, clumsy vehicles, and at the reassuring shouts, 'Kyar you anywhere in the town, boss, fuh fifty cents,' I reasoned that I was merely a 'fare' instead of a victim

I walked through long streets, all leading uphill I wondered how those streets ever came down again. Perhaps they didn't until they were 'graded.' On a few of the 'main streets' I saw lights in stores here and there, saw street cars go by conveying worthy burghers hither and yon, saw people pass engaged in the art of conversation, and heard a burst of semi-lively laughter issuing from a soda-water and ice-cream parlor The streets other than 'main' seemed to have enticed upon their borders houses consecrated to peace and domesticity. In many of them lights shone behind discreetly drawn window shades, in a few pianos tinkled orderly and irreproachable music. There was, indeed, little 'doing' I wished I had come before sundown. So I returned to my hotel

In November, 1864, the Confederate General Hood advanced against Nashville, where he shut up a National force under General Thomas. The latter then sallied forth and defeated the Confederates in a terrible conflict.

All my life I have heard of, admired, and witnessed the fine marksmanship of the South in its peaceful conflicts in the tobacco-chewing regions But in my hotel a surprise awaited me There were twelve bright, new, imposing, capacious brass cuspidors in the great lobby, tall enough to be called urns and so wide-mouthed that the crack pitcher of a lady baseball team should have been able to throw a ball into one of them at five paces distant. But, although a terrible battle had raged and was still raging, the enemy had not suffered. Bright, new, imposing, capacious, untouched, they stood But, shades of Jefferson Brick! the tile floor—the beautiful tile floor! I could not avoid thinking of the battle of Nashville, and trying to draw, as is my foolish habit, some deductions about hereditary marksmanship.

Here I first saw Major (by misplaced courtesy) Wentworth Caswell. I knew him for a type the moment my eyes suffered from the sight of him. A rat has no geographical habitat My old friend, A. Tennyson, said, as he so well said almost everything.

*Prophet, curse me the blabbing lip,
And curse me the British vermin, the rat.*

Let us regard the word 'British' as interchangeable ad lib. A rat is a rat

This man was hunting about the hotel lobby like a starved dog that had forgotten where he had buried a bone. He had a face of great acreage, red, pulpy, and with a kind of sleepy massiveness like that of Buddha. He possessed one single virtue—he was very smoothly shaven. The mark of the beast is not indelible upon a man until he goes about with a stubble. I think that if he had not used his razor that day I would have repulsed his advances, and the criminal calendar of the world would have been spared the addition of one murder.

I happened to be standing within five feet of a cuspidor when Major Caswell opened fire upon it. I had been observant enough to perceive that the attacking force was using Gatlings instead of squirrel rifles, so I side-stepped so promptly that the major seized the opportunity to apologize to a noncombatant. He had the blabbing lip. In four minutes he had become my friend and had dragged me to the bar.

I desire to interpolate here that I am a Southerner. But I am not one by profession or trade. I eschew the string tie, the slouch hat, the Prince Albert, the number of bales of cotton destroyed by Sherman, and plug chewing. When the orchestra plays Dixie I do not cheer. I slide a little lower on the leather-cornered seat and, well, order another Wurzburger and wish that Longstreet had—but what's the use?

Major Caswell banged the bar with his fist, and the first gun at Fort Sumter re-echoed. When he fired the last one at Appomattox I began to hope. But then he began on family trees, and demonstrated that Adam was only a third cousin of a collateral branch of the Caswell family. Genealogy disposed of, he took up, to my distaste, his private family matters. He spoke of his wife, traced her descent back to Eve, and profanely denied any possible rumor that she may have had relations in the land of Nod.

By this time I began to suspect that he was trying to obscure by noise the fact that he had ordered the drinks, on the chance that I would be bewildered into paying for them. But when they were down he crashed a silver dollar loudly upon the bar. Then, of course, another serving was obligatory.

And when I had paid for that I took leave of him brusquely; for I wanted no more of him. But before I had obtained my release he had prated loudly of an income that his wife received, and showed a handful of silver money.

When I got my key at the desk the clerk said to me courteously: 'If that man Caswell has annoyed you, and if you would like to make a complaint, we will have him ejected. He is a nuisance, a loafer, and without any known means of support, although he seems to have some money most of the time. But we don't seem to be able to hit upon any means of throwing him out legally.'

'Why, no,' said I, after some reflection, 'I don't see my way clear to making a complaint. But I would like to place myself on record as asserting that I do not care for his company. Your town,' I continued, 'seems to be a quiet one. What manner of entertainment, adventure, or excitement have you to offer to the stranger within your gates?'

'Well, sir,' said the clerk, 'there will be a show here next Thursday. It is—I'll look it up and have the announcement sent up to your room with the ice water. Good night.'

After I went up to my room I looked out the window. It was only about ten o'clock, but I looked upon a silent town. The drizzle continued, spangled with dim lights, as far apart as currants in a cake sold at the Ladies' Exchange.

'A quiet place,' I said to myself, as my first shoe struck the ceiling of the occupant of the room beneath mine. 'Nothing of the life here that gives color and variety to the cities in the East and West. Just a good, ordinary, humdrum, business town.'

Nashville occupies a foremost place among the manufacturing centres of the country. It is the fifth boot and shoe market in the United States, the largest candy and cracker manufacturing city in the South, and does an enormous wholesale drygoods, grocery, and drug business.

I must tell you how I came to be in Nashville, and I assure you the digression brings as much tedium to me as it does to you. I was traveling elsewhere on my own business, but I had a commission from a Northern literary magazine to stop over there and establish a personal connection between the publication and one of its contributors, Azalea Adair

Adair (there was no clue to the personality except the handwriting) had sent in some essays (lost art!) and poems that had made the editors swear approvingly over their one o'clock luncheon. So they had commissioned me to round up said Adair and corner by contract his or her output at two cents a word before some other publisher offered her ten or twenty

At nine o'clock the next morning, after my chicken livers en brochette (try them if you can find that hotel), I strayed out into the drizzle, which was still on for an unlimited run. At the first corner I came upon Uncle Cæsar. He was a stalwart Negro, older than the pyramids, with gray wool and a face that reminded me of Brutus, and a second afterwards of the late King Cettuwayo. He wore the most remarkable coat that I ever had seen or expect to see. It reached to his ankles and had once been a Confederate gray in colors. But rain and sun and age had so variegated it that Joseph's coat, beside it, would have faded to a pale monochrome. I must linger with that coat, for it has to do with the story—the story that is so long in coming, because you can hardly expect anything to happen in Nashville

Once it must have been the military coat of an officer. The cape of it had vanished, but all adown its front it had been frogged and tasseled magnificently. But now the frogs and tassels were gone. In their stead had been patiently stitched (I surmised by some surviving 'black mammy') new frogs made of cunningly twisted common hempen twine. The twine was frayed and disheveled. It must have been added to the coat as a substitute for vanished splendors, with tasteless but painstaking devotion, for it followed faithfully the curves of the long-missing frogs. And, to complete the comedy and pathos of the garment, all its buttons were gone save one. The second button from the top alone remained. The coat was fastened by other twine strings tied through the buttonholes and other holes rudely pierced in the opposite side. There was never such a weird garment so fantastically bedecked and of so many mottled hues. The lone button was the size of a half-dollar, made of yellow horn and sewed on with coarse twine.

This Negro stood by a carriage so old that Ham himself might have started a hack line with it after he left the ark with the two animals hitched to it. As I approached he threw open the door, drew out a feather duster, waved it without using it, and said in deep, rumbling tones

'Step right in, suh, ain't a speck of dust in it—jus' got back from a funeral, suh'

I inferred that on such gala occasions carriages were given an extra cleaning. I looked up and down the street and perceived that there was little choice among the vehicles for hire that lined the curb. I looked in my memorandum book for the address of Azalea Adair

'I want to go to 861 Jessamine Street,' I said, and was about to step into the hack

But for an instant the thick, long, gorilla-like arm of the old Negro barred me. On his massive and saturnine face a look of sudden suspicion and enmity flashed for a moment. Then, with quickly returning conviction, he asked blandishingly 'What are you gwine there for, boss?'

'What is that to you?' I asked, a little sharply

'Nothin', suh, jus' nothin'. Only it's a lonesome kind of part of town and few folks ever has business out there. Step right in. The seats is clean—jes' got back from a funeral, suh'

A mile and a half it must have been to our journey's end. I could hear nothing but the fearful rattle of the ancient hack over the uneven brick paving, I could smell nothing but the drizzle, now further flavored with coal smoke and something like a mixture of tar and oleander blossoms. All I could see through the streaming windows were two rows of dim houses.

The city has an area of 10 square miles, 181 miles of streets, of which 137 miles are paved, a system of waterworks that cost $2,000,000, with 77 miles of mains

861 Jessamine Street was a decayed mansion. Thirty yards back from the street it stood, outmerged in a splendid grove of trees and untrimmed shrubbery. A row of box bushes overflowed and almost hid the paling fence from sight, the gate was kept closed by a rope noose that encircled the gatepost and the first paling of the gate. But when you got inside you saw that 861 was a shell, a shadow, a ghost of former grandeur and excellence. But in the story, I have not yet got inside.

When the hack had ceased from rattling and the weary quadrupeds came to a rest I handed my jehu his fifty cents with an additional quarter, feeling a glow of conscious generosity, as I did so. He refused it.

'It's two dollars, suh,' he said.

'How's that?' I asked. 'I plainly heard you call out at the hotel "Fifty cents to any part of the town".'

'It's two dollars, suh,' he repeated obstinately. 'It's a long ways from the hotel.'

'It is within the city limits and well within them,' I argued. 'Don't think that you have picked up a greenhorn Yankee. Do you see those hills over there?' I went on, pointing toward the east (I could not see them, myself, for the drizzle), 'well, I was born and raised on their other side. You old fool nigger, can't you tell people from other people when you see 'em?'

The grim face of King Cettuwayo softened. 'Is you from the South, suh? I reckon it was them shoes of yourn fooled me. They is somethin' sharp in the toes for a Southern gen'l'man to wear.'

'Then the charge is fifty cents, I suppose?' said I inexorably.

His former expression, a mingling of cupidity and hostility, returned, remained ten seconds, and vanished.

'Boss,' he said, 'fifty cents is right, but I needs two dollars, suh, I'm obleeged to have two dollars. I ain't demandin' it now, suh, after I knows whar you's from, I'm jus' sayin' that I has to have two dollars to-night, and business is mighty po'.'

Peace and confidence settled upon his heavy features. He had been luckier than he had hoped. Instead of having picked up a greenhorn, ignorant of rates, he had come upon an inheritance.

'You confounded old rascal,' I said, reaching down to my pocket, 'you ought to be turned over to the police.'

For the first time I saw him smile. He knew, he knew, HE KNEW.

I gave him two one-dollar bills. As I handed them over I noticed that one of them had seen parlous times. Its upper right-hand corner was missing, and it had been torn through in the middle, but joined again. A strip of blue tissue paper, pasted over the split, preserved its negotiability.

Enough of the African bandit for the present. I left him happy, lifted the rope and opened the creaky gate.

The house, as I said, was a shell. A paint brush had not touched it in twenty years. I could not see why a strong wind should not have bowled it over like a house of cards until I looked again at the trees that hugged it close—the trees that saw the battle of Nashville and still drew their protecting branches around it against storm and enemy and cold.

Azalea Adair, fifty years old, white-haired, a descendant of the cavaliers, as thin and frail as the house she lived in, robed in the cheapest and cleanest dress I ever saw, with an air as simple as a queen's, received me.

The reception room seemed a mile square, because there was nothing in it except some rows of books, on unpainted white-pine bookshelves, a cracked marble-top table, a rag rug, a hairless horsehair sofa and two or three chairs. Yes, there was a picture on the wall, a colored crayon drawing of a cluster of pansies. I looked around for the portrait of Andrew Jackson and the pinecone hanging basket but they were not there.

Azalea Adair and I had conversation, a little of which will be repeated to you. She was a product of the old South, gently nurtured in the sheltered life. Her learning was not broad, but was deep and of splendid originality in its somewhat narrow scope. She had been educated at home, and her knowledge of the world was derived from inference and by inspiration. Of such is the precious, small group of essayists made. While she talked to me I kept brushing my fingers, trying, unconsciously, to rid them guiltily of the absent dust from the half-calf backs of Lamb, Chaucer, Hazlitt, Marcus Aurelius, Montaigne and Hood. She was exquisite, she was a valuable discovery. Nearly everybody nowadays knows too much—oh, so much too much—of real life.

I could perceive clearly that Azalea Adair was very poor. A house and a dress she had, not much else, I fancied. So, divided between my duty to the magazine and my loyalty to the poets and essayists who fought Thomas in the valley of the Cumberland, I listened to her voice, which was like a harpsichord's, and found that I could not speak of contracts. In the presence of the nine Muses and the three Graces one hesitated to lower the topic to two cents. There would have to be another colloquy after I had regained my commercialism. But I spoke of my mission, and three o'clock of the next afternoon was set for the discussion of the business proposition.

'Your town,' I said, as I began to make ready to depart (which is the time for smooth generalities), 'seems to be a quiet, sedate place. A home town, I should say, where few things out of the ordinary ever happen.'

It carries on an extensive trade in stoves and hollow ware with the West and South, and its flouring mills have a daily capacity of more than 2,000 barrels.

Azalea Adair seemed to reflect.

'I have never thought of it that way,' she said, with a kind of sincere intensity that seemed to belong to her. 'Isn't it in the still, quiet places that things do happen? I fancy that when God began to create the earth on the first Monday morning one could have leaned out one's window and heard the drops of mud splashing from His trowel as He built up the everlasting hills. What did the noisiest project in the world—I mean the building of the tower of Babel—result in finally? A page and a half of Esperanto in the North American Review.'

'Of course,' said I platonically, 'human nature is the same everywhere, but there is more color—er—more drama and movement and—er—romance in some cities than in others.'

'On the surface,' said Azalea Adair. 'I have traveled many times around the world in a golden airship wafted on two wings—print and dreams. I have seen (on one of my imaginary tours) the Sultan of Turkey bowstringing with his own hands one of his wives who had uncovered her face in public. I have seen a man in Nashville tear up his theatre tickets because his wife was going out with her face covered—with rice powder. In San Francisco's Chinatown I saw the slave girl Sing Yee dipped slowly, inch by inch, in boiling almond oil to make her swear she would never see her American lover again. She gave in when the boiling oil had reached three inches above her knee. At a euchre party in East Nashville the other night I saw Kitty Morgan cut dead by seven of her schoolmates and lifelong friends because she had married a house painter. The boiling oil was sizzling as high as her heart, but I wish you could have seen the fine little smile that she carried from table to table. Oh, yes, it is a humdrum town. Just a few miles of red brick houses and mud and stores and lumber yards.'

Some one knocked hollowly at the back of the house. Azalea Adair breathed a soft apology and went to investigate the sound. She came back in three minutes with brightened eyes, a faint flush on her cheeks, and ten years lifted from her shoulders.

'You must have a cup of tea before you go,' she said, 'and a sugar cake.'

She reached and shook a little iron bell. In shuffled a small Negro girl about twelve, barefoot, not very tidy, glowering at me with thumb in mouth and bulging eyes.

Azalea Adair opened a tiny, worn purse and drew out a dollar bill, a dollar bill with the upper right-hand corner missing, torn in two pieces and pasted together again with a strip of blue tissue paper. It was one of the bills I had given the piratical Negro—there was no doubt of it.

'Go up to Mr. Baker's store on the corner, Impy,' she said, handing the girl the dollar bill, 'and get a quarter of a pound of tea—the kind he always sends me—and ten cents worth of sugar cakes. Now, hurry. The supply of tea in the house happens to be exhausted,' she explained to me.

Impy left by the back way. Before the scrape of her hard, bare feet had died away on the back porch, a wild shriek—I was sure it was hers—filled the hollow house. Then the deep, gruff tones of an angry man's voice mingled with the girl's further squeals and unintelligible words.

Azalea Adair rose without surprise or emotion and disappeared. For two minutes I heard the hoarse rumble of the man's voice, then something like an oath and a slight scuffle, and she returned calmly to her chair.

'This is a roomy house,' she said, 'and I have a tenant for part of it I am sorry to have to rescind my invitation to tea It was impossible to get the kind I always use at the store Perhaps to-morrow Mr. Baker will be able to supply me'

I was sure that Impy had not had time to leave the house I inquired concerning street-car lines and took my leave After I was well on my way I remembered that I had not learned Azalea Adair's name But to-morrow would do

That same day I started in on the course of iniquity that this uneventful city forced upon me I was in the town only two days, but in that time I managed to lie shamelessly by telegraph, and to be an accomplice—after the fact, if that is the correct legal term—to a murder

As I rounded the corner nearest my hotel the Afrite coachman of the polychromatic, nonpareil coat seized me, swung open the dungeony door of his peripatetic sarcophagus, fluted his feather duster and began his ritual 'Step right in, boss Carriage is clean—jus' got back from a funeral Fifty cents to any—'

And then he knew me and grinned broadly ' 'Scuse me, boss, you is de gen'l'-man what rid out with me dis mawnin' Thank you kindly, suh'

'I am going out to 861 again to-morrow afternoon at three,' said I, 'and if you will be here, I'll let you drive me So you know Miss Adair?' I concluded, thinking of my dollar bill

'I belonged to her father, Judge Adair, suh,' he replied

'I judge that she is pretty poor,' I said 'She hasn't much money to speak of, has she?'

For an instant I looked again at the fierce countenance of King Cettiwayo, and then he changed back to an extortionate old Negro hack driver

'She ain't gwine to starve, suh,' he said slowly 'She has reso'ces, suh, she has reso'ces'

'I shall pay you fifty cents for the trip,' said I

'Dat is puffedckly correct, suh,' he answered humbly 'I jus' had to have dat two dollars dis mawnin', boss'

I went to the hotel and led by electricity I wired the magazine 'A Adair holds out for eight cents a word.'

The answer that came back was. 'Give it to her quick, you duffer'

Just before dinner 'Major' Wentworth Caswell bore down upon me with the greetings of a long-lost friend I have seen few men whom I have so instantaneously hated, and of whom it was so difficult to be rid I was standing at the bar when he invaded me, therefore I could not wave the white ribbon in his face I would have paid gladly for the drinks, hoping, thereby, to escape another, but he was one of those despicable, roaring, advertising bibbers who must have brass bands and fireworks attend upon every cent that they waste in their follies

With an air of producing millions he drew two one-dollar bills from a pocket and dashed one of them upon the bar I looked once more at the dollar bill with the upper right-hand corner missing, torn through the middle, and patched with a strip of blue tissue paper It was my dollar bill again It could have been no other

I went up to my room The drizzle and the monotony of a dreary, eventless Southern town had made me tired and listless I remember that just before I went to bed I mentally disposed of the mysterious dollar bill (which might have formed the clew to a tremendously fine detective story of San Francisco) by saying to myself sleepily 'Seems as if a lot of people here own stock in the Hack-Driver's Trust Pays dividends promptly, too Wonder if—' Then I fell asleep

King Cettiwayo was at his post the next day, and rattled my bones over the stones out to 861 He was to wait and rattle me back again when I was ready

Azalea Adair looked paler and cleaner and frailer than she had looked on the day before After she had signed the contract at eight cents per word she grew still paler and began to slip out of her chair Without much trouble I managed to get her up on the antediluvian horsehair sofa and then I ran out to the sidewalk and yelled to the coffee-colored Pirate to bring a doctor With a wisdom that I had not suspected in him, he abandoned his team and struck off up the street afoot, realizing the value of speed In ten minutes he returned with a grave, gray-haired and capable man of medicine In a few words (worth much less than eight cents each) I explained to him

my presence in the hollow house of mystery He bowed with stately understanding, and turned to the old Negro

'Uncle Cæsar,' he said calmly, 'run up to my house and ask Miss Lucy to give you a cream pitcher full of fresh milk and half a tumbler of port wine And hurry back Don't drive—run I want you to get back sometime this week'

It occurred to me that Dr Merriman also felt a distrust as to the speeding powers of the land-pirate's steeds After Uncle Cæsar was gone, lumberingly, but swiftly, up the street, the doctor looked me over with great politeness and as much careful calculation until he had decided that I might do

'It is only a case of insufficient nutrition,' he said 'In other words, the result of poverty, pride, and starvation Mrs Caswell has many devoted friends who would be glad to aid her, but she will accept nothing except from that old Negro, Uncle Cæsar, who was once owned by her family'

'Mrs Caswell' said I, in surprise And then I looked at the contract and saw that she had signed it 'Azalea Adair Caswell'

'I thought she was Miss Adair,' I said

'Married to a drunken, worthless loafer, sir,' said the doctor 'It is said that he robs her even of the small sums that her old servant contributes toward her support'

When the milk and wine had been brought the doctor soon revived Azalea Adair She sat up and talked of the beauty of the autumn leaves that were then in season, and their height of color She referred lightly to her fainting seizure as the outcome of an old palpitation of the heart Impy fanned her as she lay on the sofa The doctor was due elsewhere, and I followed him to the door I told him that it was within my power and intentions to make a reasonable advance of money to Azalea Adair on future contributions to the magazine, and he seemed pleased

'By the way,' he said, 'perhaps you would like to know that you have had royalty for a coachman Old Cæsar's grandfather was a king in Congo Cæsar himself has royal ways, as you may have observed.'

As the doctor was moving off I heard Uncle Cæsar's voice inside 'Did he git bofe of dem two dollars from you, Mis' Zalea?'

'Yes, Cæsar,' I heard Azalea Adair answer weakly.

And then I went in and concluded business negotiations with our contributor I assumed the responsibility of advancing fifty dollars, putting it as a necessary formality in binding our bargain And then Uncle Cæsar drove me back to the hotel.

Here ends all of the story as far as I can testify as a witness The rest must be only bare statements of facts.

At about six o'clock I went out for a stroll Uncle Cæsar was at his corner He threw open the door of his carriage, flourished his duster, and began his depressing formula 'Step right in, suh Fifty cents to anywhere in the city—hack's puffickly clean, suh—jus' got back from a funeral—'

And then he recognized me I think his eyesight was getting bad His coat had taken on a few more faded shades of color, the twine strings were more frayed and ragged, the last remaining button—the button of yellow horn—was gone A motley descendant of kungs was Uncle Cæsar!

About two hours later I saw an excited crowd besieging the front of a drug store In a desert where nothing happens this was manna, so I edged my way inside On an extemporized couch of empty boxes and chairs was stretched the mortal corporeality of Major Wentworth Caswell A doctor was testing him for the immortal ingredient. His decision was that it was conspicuous by its absence

The erstwhile Major had been found dead on a dark street and brought by curious and ennuied citizens to the drug store The late human being had been engaged in terrific battle—the details showed that Loafer and reprobate though he had been, he had been also a warrior But he had lost His hands were yet clinched so tightly that his fingers would not be opened The gentle citizens who had known him stood about and searched their vocabularies to find some good words, if it were possible, to speak of him One kind-looking man said, after much thought 'When "Cas" was about fo'teen he was one of the best spellers in school'

While I stood there the fingers of the right hand of 'the man that was,' which hung down the side of a white pine box, relaxed, and dropped something at my feet. I covered it with one foot quietly, and a little later on I picked it up and pocketed it.

I reasoned that in his last struggle his hand must have seized that object unwittingly and held it in a death grip.

At the hotel that night the main topic of conversation, with the possible exceptions of politics and prohibition, was the demise of Major Caswell. I heard one man say to a group of listeners

'In my opinion, gentlemen, Caswell was murdered by some of these no-account niggers for his money. He had fifty dollars this afternoon which he showed to several gentlemen in the hotel. When he was found the money was not on his person.'

I left the city the next morning at nine, and as the train was crossing the bridge over the Cumberland River I took out of my pocket a yellow horn overcoat button the size of a fifty-cent piece, with frayed ends of coarse twine hanging from it, and cast it out of the window into the slow, muddy waters below.

THE ART OF FICTION

I SHOULD not have affixed so comprehensive a title to these few remarks, necessarily wanting in any completeness upon a subject the full consideration of which would carry us far, did I not seem to discover a pretext for my temerity in the interesting pamphlet lately published under this name by Mr. Walter Besant. Mr. Besant's lecture at the Royal Institution—the original form of his pamphlet—appears to indicate that many persons are interested in the art of fiction, and are not indifferent to such remarks, as those who practise it may attempt to make about it. I am therefore anxious not to lose the benefit of this favourable association, and to edge in a few words under cover of the attention which Mr. Besant is sure to have excited. There is something very encouraging in his having put into form certain of his ideas on the mystery of story-telling.

It is a proof of life and curiosity—curiosity on the part of the brotherhood of novelists as well as on the part of their readers. Only a short time ago it might have been supposed that the English novel was not what the French call discutable. It had no air of having a theory, a conviction, a consciousness of itself behind it—of being the expression of an artistic faith, the result of choice and comparison. I do not say it was necessarily the worse for that: it would take much more courage than I possess to intimate that the form of the novel as Dickens and Thackeray (for instance) saw it had any taint of incompleteness. It was, however, naïf (if I may help myself out with another French word), and evidently if it be destined to suffer in any way for having lost its naïvete it has now an idea of making sure of the corresponding advantages. During the period I have alluded to there was a comfortable, good-humoured feeling abroad that a novel is a novel, as a pudding is a pudding, and that our only business with it could be to swallow it. But within a year or two, for some reason or other, there have been signs of returning animation—the era of discussion would appear to have been to a certain extent opened. Art lives upon discussion, upon experiment, upon curiosity, upon variety of attempt, upon the exchange of views and the comparison of standpoints, and there is a presumption that those times when no one has anything particular to say about it, and has no reason to give for practice or preference, though they may be times of honour, are not times of development—are times, possibly even, a little of dulness. The successful application of any art is a delightful spectacle, but the theory too is interesting, and though there is a great deal of the latter without the former I suspect there has never been a genuine success that has not had a latent core of conviction. Discussion, suggestion, formulation, these things are fertilising when they are frank and sincere. Mr. Besant has set an excellent example in saying what he thinks, for his part, about the way in which fiction should be written, as well as about the way in which it should be published, for his view of the 'art,' carried on into an appendix, covers that too. Other labourers in the same field will doubtless take up the argument, they will give it the light of their experience, and the effect will surely be to make our interest in the novel a little more what it had for some time threatened to fail to be—a serious, active, inquiring interest, under protection of which this delightful study may, in moments of confidence, venture to say a little more what it thinks of itself.

It must take itself seriously for the public to take it so. The old superstition about fiction being 'wicked' has doubtless died out in England, but the spirit of it lingers in a certain oblique regard directed toward any story which does not more or less admit that it is only a joke. Even the most jocular novel feels in some degree the weight of the proscription that was formerly directed against literary levity: the jocularity does not always succeed in passing for orthodoxy. It is still expected, though perhaps people are ashamed to say it, that a production which is after all only a 'make-believe' (for what else is a 'story'?) shall be in some degree apologetic—shall renounce the pretension of attempting really to represent life. This, of course, any sensible, wide-awake story declines to do, for it quickly perceives that the tolerance granted to it on such a condition is only an attempt to stifle it disguised in the form of generosity. The old evangelical hostility to the novel, which was as explicit as it was narrow, and which regarded it as little less favourable to our immortal part than a stage-play, was in reality far less insulting. The only reason for the existence of a novel is that it does attempt to represent life. When it relinquishes this attempt, the same attempt that we see on the canvas of the painter, it will have arrived at a very strange pass. It is not expected of the picture that it will make itself humble in order to be forgiven, and the analogy between the art of the painter and the art of the novelist is, so far as I am able to see, complete. Their inspiration is the same, their process (allowing for the different quality of the vehicle) is the same, their success is the same. They may learn from each other, they may explain and sustain each other. Their cause is the same, and the honour of one is the honour of another. The Mahometans think a picture an unholy thing, but it is a long time since any Christian did, and it is therefore the more odd that in the Christian mind the traces (dis-simulated though they may be) of a suspicion of the sister art should linger to this day. The only effectual way to lay it to rest is to emphasise the analogy to which I just alluded—to insist on the fact that as the picture is reality, so the novel is history. That is the only general description (which does it justice) that we may give of the novel. But history also is allowed to represent life, it is not, any more than painting, expected to apologise. The subject-matter of fiction is stored up likewise in documents and records, and if it will not give itself away, as they say in California, it must speak with assurance, with the tone of the historian. Certain accomplished novelists have a habit of giving themselves away which must often bring tears to the eyes of people who take their fiction seriously. I was lately struck, in reading over many pages of Anthony Trollope, with his want of discretion in this particular. In a digression, a parenthesis or an aside, he concedes to the reader that he and this trusting friend are only 'making believe.' He admits that the events he narrates have not really happened, and that he can give his narrative any turn the reader may like best. Such a betrayal of a sacred office seems to me, I confess, a terrible crime, it is what I mean by the attitude of apology, and it shocks me every whit as much in Trollope as it would have shocked me in Gibbon or Macaulay. It implies that the novelist is less occupied in looking for the truth (the truth, of course I mean, that he assumes, the premises that we must grant him, whatever they may be), than the historian, and in doing so it deprives him at a stroke of all his standing-room. To represent and illustrate the past, the actions of men, is the task of either writer, and the only difference that I can see is, in proportion as he succeeds, to the honour of the novelist, consisting as it does in his having more difficulty in collecting his evidence, which is so far from being purely literary. It seems to me to give him a great character, the fact that he has at once so much in common with the philosopher and the painter, this double analogy is a magnificent heritage.

It is of all this evidently that Mr. Besant is full when he insists upon the fact that fiction is one of the fine arts, deserving in its turn of all the honours and emoluments that have hitherto been reserved for the successful profession of music, poetry, painting, architecture. It is impossible to insist too much on so important a truth, and the place that Mr. Besant demands for the work of the novelist may be represented, a trifle less abstractly, by saying that he demands not only that it shall be reputed artistic, but that it shall be reputed very artistic indeed. It is excellent that he should have struck this note, for his doing so indicates that there was need of it, that his proposition may be to many people a novelty. One rubs one's eyes at the thought, but the rest of Mr. Besant's essay confirms the revelation. I suspect in truth that it would be possible to confirm it still further, and that one would not be far wrong in saying that in addition to the people to whom it has never occurred that a novel ought to be artistic, there are a great many others who, if this principle were urged upon them, would be filled with an undefinable mistrust. They would find it difficult to explain their repugnance, but it would operate strongly to put them on their guard. 'Art,' in our Protestant communities, where so many things have got so strangely twisted about, is supposed in certain circles to have some vaguely injurious effect upon those who make it an important consideration, who let it weigh in the balance. It is assumed to be opposed in some mysterious manner to morality, to amusement, to instruction. When it is embodied in the work of the painter (the sculptor is another affair!) you know what it is: it stands there before you, in the honesty of pink and green and a gilt frame, you can see the worst of it at a glance, and you can be on your guard. But when it is introduced into literature it becomes more insidious—there is danger of its hurting you before you know it. Literature should be either instructive or amusing, and there is in many minds an impression that these artistic preoccupations, the search for form, contribute to neither end, interfere indeed with both. They are too frivolous to be edifying, and too serious to be diverting, and they are moreover priggish and paradoxical and superfluous. That, I think, represents the manner in which the latent thought of many people who read novels as an exercise in skipping would explain itself if it were to become articulate. They would argue, of course, that a novel ought to be 'good,' but they would interpret this term in a fashion of their own, which indeed would vary considerably from one critic to another. One would say that being good means representing virtuous and aspiring characters, placed in prominent positions, another would say that it depends on a 'happy ending,' on a distribution at the last of prizes, pensions, husbands, wives, babies, millions, appended paragraphs, and cheerful remarks. Another still would say that it means being full of incident and movement, so that we shall wish to jump ahead, to see who was the mysterious stranger, and if the stolen will was ever found, and shall not be distracted from this pleasure by any tiresome analysis or 'description.' But they would all agree that the 'artistic' idea would spoil some of their fun. One would hold it accountable for all the description, another would see it revealed in the absence of sympathy. Its hostility to a happy ending would be evident, and it might even in some cases render any ending at all impossible. The 'ending' of a novel is, for many persons, like that of a good dinner, a course of desert and ices, and the artist in fiction is regarded as a sort of meddlesome doctor who forbids agreeable aftertastes. It is therefore true that this conception of Mr. Besant's of the novel as a superior form encounters not only a negative but a positive indifference. It matters little that as a work of art it should really be as little or as much of its essence to supply happy endings, sympathetic characters, and an objective tone, as if it were a work of mechanics: the association of ideas, however incongruous, might easily be too much for it if an eloquent voice were not sometimes raised to call attention to the fact that it is at once as free and as serious a branch of literature as any other.

Certainly this might sometimes be doubted in presence of the enormous number of works of fiction that appeal to the credulity of our generation, for it might easily seem that there could be no great character in a commodity so quickly and easily produced. It must be admitted that good novels are much compromised by bad ones, and that the field at large suffers discredit from overcrowding. I think, however, that this injury is only superficial, and that the superabundance of written fiction proves nothing against the principle itself. It has been vulgarised, like all other kinds of literature, like everything else to-day, and it has proved more than some kinds accessible to vulgarisation. But there is as much difference as there ever was between a good novel and a bad one. the bad is swept with all the daubed canvases and spoiled marble into some unvisited limbo, or infinite rubbish-yard beneath the back-windows of the world, and the good subsists and emits its light and stimulates our desire for perfection. As I shall take the liberty of making but a single criticism of Mr. Besant, whose tone is so full of the love of his art, I may as well have done with it at once. He seems to me to mistake in attempting to say so definitely beforehand what sort of an affair the good novel will be. To indicate the danger of such an error as that has been the purpose of these few pages, to suggest that certain traditions on the subject, applied a priori, have already had much to answer for, and that the good health of an art which undertakes so immediately to reproduce life must demand that it be perfectly free. It lives upon exercise, and the very meaning of exercise is freedom. The only obligation to which in advance we may hold a novel, without incurring the accusation of being arbitrary, is that it be interesting. That general responsibility rests upon it, but it is the only one I can think of. The ways in which it is at liberty to accomplish this result (of interesting us) strike me as innumerable, and such as can only suffer from being marked out or fenced in by prescription. They are as various as the temperament of man, and they are successful in proportion as they reveal a particular mind, different from others. A novel is in its broadest definition a personal, a direct impression of life: that, to begin with, constitutes its value, which is greater or less according to the intensity of the impression. But there will be no intensity at all, and therefore no value, unless there is freedom to feel and say. The tracing of a line to be followed, of a tone to be taken, of a form to be filled out, is a limitation of that freedom and a suppression of the very thing that we are most curious about. The form, it seems to me, is to be appreciated after the fact:

then the author's choice has been made, his standard has been indicated, then we can follow lines and directions and compare tones and resemblances. Then in a word we can enjoy one of the most charming of pleasures, we can estimate quality, we can apply the test of execution. The execution belongs to the author alone, it is what is most personal to him, and we measure him by that. The advantage, the luxury, as well as the torment and responsibility of the novelist, is that there is no limit to what he may attempt as an executant—no limit to his possible experiments, efforts, discoveries, successes. Here it is especially that he works, step by step, like his brother of the brush, of whom we may always say that he has painted his picture in a manner best known to himself. His manner is his secret, not necessarily a jealous one. He cannot disclose it as a general thing if he would, he would be at a loss to teach it to others. I say this with a due recollection of having insisted on the community of method of the artist who paints a picture and the artist who writes a novel. The painter is able to teach the rudiments of his practice, and it is possible, from the study of good work (granted the aptitude), both to learn how to paint and to learn how to write. Yet it remains true, without injury to the rapprochement, that the literary artist would be obliged to say to his pupil much more than the other, 'Ah, well, you must do it as you can.' It is a question of degree, a matter of delicacy. If there are exact sciences, there are also exact arts, and the grammar of painting is so much more definite that it makes the difference.

I ought to add, however, that if Mr. Besant says at the beginning of his essay that the 'laws of fiction may be laid down and taught with as much precision and exactness as the laws of harmony, perspective, and proportion,' he mitigates what might appear to be an extravagance by applying his remark to 'general' laws, and by expressing most of these rules in a manner with which it would certainly be unaccommodating to disagree. That the novelist must write from his experience, that his 'characters must be real and such as might be met with in actual life,' that 'a young lady brought up in a quiet country village should avoid descriptions of garrison life,' and 'a writer whose friends and personal experiences belong to the lower middle-class should carefully avoid introducing his characters into society', that one should enter one's notes in a common-place book, that one's figures should be clear in outline, that making them clear by some trick of speech or of carriage is a bad method, and 'describing them at length' is a worse one, that English Fiction should have a 'conscious moral purpose', that 'it is almost impossible to estimate too highly the value of careful workmanship—that is, of style', that 'the most important point of all is the story,' that 'the story is everything'. these are principles with most of which it is surely impossible not to sympathise. That remark about the lower middle-class writer and his knowing his place is perhaps rather chilling, but for the rest I should find it difficult to dissent from any one of these recommendations. At the same time, I should find it difficult positively to assent to them, with the exception, perhaps, of the injunction as to entering one's notes in a common-place book. They scarcely seem to me to have the quality that Mr Besant attributes to the rules of the novelist—the 'precision and exactness' of 'the laws of harmony, perspective, and proportion'. They are suggestive, they are even inspiring, but they are not exact, though they are doubtless as much so as the case admits of which is a proof of that liberty of interpretation for which I just contended. For the value of these different injunctions—so beautiful and so vague—is wholly in the meaning one attaches to them. The characters, the situation, which strike one as real will be those that touch and interest one most, but the measure of reality is very difficult to fix. The reality of Don Quixote or of Mr Micawber is a very delicate shade, it is a reality so coloured by the author's vision that, vivid as it may be, one would hesitate to propose it as a model one would expose one's self to some very embarrassing questions on the part of a pupil. It goes without saying that you will not write a good novel unless you possess the sense of reality, but it will be difficult to give you a recipe for calling that sense into being. Humanity is immense, and reality has a myriad forms, the most one can affirm is that some of the flowers of fiction have the odour of it, and others have not, as for telling you in advance how your nosegay should be composed, that is another affair. It is equally excellent and inconclusive to say that one must write from experience, to our supposititious aspirant such a declaration might savour of mockery. What kind of experience is intended, and where does it begin and end? Experience is never limited, and it is never complete, it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spiderweb of the finest silken threads suspended in the chamber of consciousness, and catching every air-borne particle in its tissue. It is the very atmosphere of the mind, and when the mind is imaginative—much more when it happens to be that of a man of genius—it takes to itself the faintest hints of life, it converts the very pulses of the air into revelations. The young lady living in a village has only to be a damsel upon whom nothing is lost to make it quite unfair (as it seems to me) to declare to her that she shall have nothing to say about the military. Greater miracles have been seen than that, imagination assisting, she should speak the truth about some of these gentlemen. I remember an English novelist, a woman of genius, telling me that she was much commended for the impression she had managed to give in one of her tales of the nature and way of life of the French Protestant youth. She had been asked where she learned so much about this recondite being, she had been congratulated on her peculiar opportunities. These opportunities consisted in her having once, in Paris, as she ascended a staircase, passed an open door where, in the household of a pasteur, some of the young Protestants were seated at table round a finished meal. The glimpse made a picture, it lasted only a moment, but that moment was experience. She had got her direct personal impression, and she turned out her type. She knew what youth was, and what Protestantism, she also had the advantage of having seen what it was to be French, so that she converted these ideas into a concrete image and produced a reality. Above all, however, she was blessed with the faculty which when you give it an inch takes an ell, and which for the artist is a much greater source of strength than any accident of residence or of place in the social scale. The power to guess the unseen from the seen, to trace the implication of things, to judge the whole piece by the pattern, the condition of feeling life in general so completely that you are well on your way to knowing any particular corner of it—this cluster of gifts may almost be said to constitute experience, and they occur in country and in town, and in the most differing stages of education. If experience consists of impressions, it may be said that impressions are experience, just as (have we not seen it?) they are the very air we breathe. Therefore, if I should certainly say to a novice, 'Write from experience and experience only,' I should feel that this was rather a tantalising monition if I were not careful immediately to add, 'Try to be one of the people on whom nothing is lost!'

I am far from intending by this to minimise the importance of exactness—of truth of detail. One can speak best from one's own taste, and I may therefore venture to say that the air of reality (solidity of specification) seems to me to be the supreme virtue of a novel—the merit on which all its other merits (including that conscious moral purpose of which Mr. Besant speaks) helplessly and submissively depend. If it be not there they are all as nothing, and if these be there, they owe their effect to the success with which the author has produced the illusion of life. The cultivation of this success, the study of this exquisite process, form, to my taste, the beginning and the end of the art of the novelist. They are his inspiration, his despair, his reward, his torment, his delight. It is here in very truth that he competes with life, it is here that he competes with his brother the painter in his attempt to render the look of things, the look that conveys their meaning, to catch the colour, the relief, the expression, the surface, the substance of the human spectacle. It is in regard to this that Mr. Besant is well inspired when he bids him take notes. He cannot possibly take too many, he cannot possibly take enough. All life solicits him, and to 'render' the simplest surface, to produce the most momentary illusion, is a very complicated business. His case would be easier, and the rule would be more exact, if Mr. Besant had been able to tell him what notes to take. But this, I fear, he can never learn in any manual, it is the business of his life. He has to take a great many in order to select a few, he has to work them up as he can, and even the guides and philosophers who might have most to say to him must leave him alone when it comes to the application of precepts, as we leave the painter in communion with his palette. That his characters 'must be clear in outline,' as Mr. Besant says—he feels that down to his boots, but how he shall make them so is a secret between his good angel and himself. It would be absurdly simple if he could be taught that a great deal of 'description' would make them so, or that on the contrary the absence of description and the cultivation of dialogue, or the absence of dialogue and the multiplication of 'incident,' would rescue him from his difficulties. Nothing, for instance, is more possible than that he be of a turn of mind for which this odd, literal opposition of description and dialogue, incident and description, has little meaning and light. People often talk of these things as if they had a kind of internecine distinctness, instead of melting into each other at every breath, and being intimately associated parts of one general effort of expression. I cannot imagine composition existing in a series of blocks, nor conceive, in any novel worth discussing at all, of a passage of description that is not in its intention narrative, a passage of dialogue that is not in its intention descriptive, a touch of truth of any sort that does not partake of the nature of incident, or an incident that derives its interest from any other source than the general and only source of the success of a work of art—that of being illustrative. A novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like any other organism, and in proportion as it lives will it be found, I think, that in each of the parts there is something of each of the other parts. The critic who over the close texture of a finished work shall pretend to trace a geography of items will mark some frontiers as artificial, I fear, as any that have been known to history. There is an old-fashioned distinction between the novel of character and the novel of incident which must have cost many a smile to the intending fabulist who was keen about his work. It appears to me as little to the point as the equally celebrated distinction between the novel and the romance—to answer as little to any reality. There are bad novels and good novels, as there are bad pictures and good pictures, but that is the only distinction in which I see any meaning, and I can as little imagine speaking of a novel of character as I can imagine speaking of a picture of character. When one says picture one says of character, when one says novel one says of incident, and the terms may be transposed at will. What is character but the determination of incident? What is incident but the illustration of character? What is either a picture or a novel that is not of character? What else do we seek in it and find in it? It is an incident for a woman to stand up with her hand resting on a table and look out at you in a certain way, or if it be not an incident I think it will be hard to say what it is. At the same time it is an expression of character. If you say you don't see it (character in that —allons donc!), this is exactly what the artist who has reasons of his own for thinking he does see it undertakes to show you. When a young man makes up his mind that he has not faith enough after all to enter the church as he intended, that is an incident, though you may not hurry to the end of the chapter to see whether perhaps he doesn't change once more. I do not say that these are extraordinary or startling incidents. I do not pretend to estimate the degree of interest proceeding from them, for this will depend upon the skill of the painter. It sounds almost puerile to say that some incidents are intrinsically much more important than others, and I need not take this precaution after having professed my sympathy for the major ones in remarking that the only classification of the novel that I can understand is into that which has life and that which has it not.

The novel and the romance, the novel of incident and that of character—these clumsy separations appear to me to have been made by critics and readers for their own convenience, and to help them out of some of their occasional queer predicaments, but to have little reality or interest for the producer, from whose point of view it is of course that we are attempting to consider the art of fiction. The case is the same with another shadowy category which Mr. Besant apparently is disposed to set up—that of the 'modern English novel'; unless indeed it be that in this matter he has fallen into an accidental confusion of standpoints. It is not quite clear whether he intends the remarks in which he alludes to it to be didactic or historical. It is as difficult to suppose a person intending to write a modern English as to suppose him writing an ancient English novel—that is a label which begs the question. One writes the novel, one paints the picture, of one's language and of one's time, and calling it modern English will not, alas! make the difficult task any easier. No more, unfortunately, will calling this or that work of one's fellow-artist a romance—unless it be, of course, simply for the pleasantness of the thing, as for instance when Hawthorne gave this heading to his story of Blithedale. The French, who have brought the theory of fiction to remarkable completeness, have but one name for the novel, and have not attempted smaller things in it, that I can see, for that I can think of no obligation to which the 'romancer' would not be held equally with the novelist, the standard of execution is equally high for each. Of course it is of execution that we are talking—that being the only point of a novel that is open to contention. This is perhaps too often lost sight of, only to produce interminable confusions and cross-purposes. We must grant the artist his subject, his idea, his donnée; our criticism is applied only to what he makes of it. Naturally I do not mean that we are bound to like it or find it interesting in case we do not; our course is perfectly simple—to let it alone. We may believe that of a certain idea even the most sincere novelist can make nothing at all, and the event may perfectly justify our belief, but the failure will have been a failure to execute, and it is in the execution that the fatal weakness is recorded. If we pretend to respect the artist at all, we must allow him his freedom of choice, in the face, in particular cases, of innumerable presumptions that the choice will not fructify. Art derives a considerable part of its beneficial exercise from flying in the face of presumptions, and some of the most interesting experiments of which it is capable are hidden in the bosom of common things. Gustave Flaubert has written a story about the devotion of a servant-girl to a parrot, and the production, highly finished as it is, cannot on the whole be called a success. We are perfectly free to find it flat, but I think it might have been interesting, and I, for my part, am extremely glad he should have written it, it is a contribution to our knowledge of what can be done—or what cannot. Ivan Turgénieff has written a tale about a deaf and dumb serf and a lap-dog, and the thing is touching, loving, a little masterpiece. He struck the note of life where Gustave Flaubert missed it—he flew in the face of a presumption and achieved a victory.

Nothing, of course, will ever take the place of the good old fashion of 'liking' a work of art or not liking it: the most improved criticism will not abolish that primitive, that ultimate test. I mention this to guard myself from the accusation of intimating that the idea, the subject, of a novel or a picture, does not matter. It matters, to my sense, in the highest degree, and if I might put up a prayer it would be that artists should select none but the richest. Some, as I have already hastened to admit, are much more remunerative than others, and it would be a world happily arranged in which persons intending to treat them should be exempt from confusions and mistakes. This fortunate condition will arrive only, I fear, on the same day that critics become purged from error. Meanwhile, I repeat, we do not judge the artist with fairness unless we say to him, 'Oh, I grant you your starting-point, because if I did not I should seem to prescribe to you, and heaven forbid I should take that responsibility. If I pretend to tell you what you must not take, you will call upon me to tell you then what you must take, in which case I shall be prettily caught. Moreover, it isn't till I have accepted your data that I can begin to measure you. I have the standard, the pitch, I have no right to tamper with your flute and then criticise your music. Of course I may not care for your idea at all, I may think it silly, or stale, or unclean, in which case I wash my hands of you altogether. I may content myself with believing that you will not have succeeded in being interesting, but I shall, of course, not attempt to demonstrate it, and you will be as indifferent to me as I am to you. I needn't remind you that there are all sorts of tastes who can know it better? Some people, for excellent reasons, don't like to read about carpenters, others, for reasons even better, don't like to read about courtesans. Many object to Americans. Others (I believe they are mainly editors and publishers) won't look at Italians. Some readers don't like quiet subjects, others don't like bustling ones. Some enjoy a complete illusion, others the consciousness of large concessions. They choose their novels accordingly, and if they don't care about your idea they won't, a fortiori, care about your treatment.'

So that it comes back very quickly, as I have said, to the liking in spite of M. Zola, who reasons less powerfully than he represents, and who will not reconcile himself to this absoluteness of taste, thinking that there are certain things that people ought to like, and that they can be made to like. I am quite at a loss to imagine anything (at any rate in this matter of fiction) that people ought to like or to dislike. Selection will be sure to take care of itself, for it has a constant motive behind it. That motive is simply experience. As people feel life, so they will feel the art that is most closely related to it. This closeness of relation is what we should never forget in talking of the effort of the novel. Many people speak of it as a factitious, artificial form, a product of ingenuity, the business of which is to alter and arrange the things that surround us, to translate them into conventional, traditional moulds. This, however, is a view of the matter which carries us but a very short way, condemns the art to an eternal repetition of a few familiar clichés, cuts short its development, and leads us straight up to a dead wall. Catching the very note and trick, the strange irregular rhythm of life, that is the attempt whose strenuous force keeps Fiction upon her feet. In proportion as in what she offers us we see life without rearrangement do we feel that we are touching the truth, in proportion as we see it with rearrangement do we feel that we are being put off with a substitute, a compromise and convention. It is not uncommon to hear an extraordinary assurance of remark in regard to this matter of rearranging, which is often spoken of as if it were the last word of art. Mr. Besant seems to me in danger of falling into the great error with his rather unguarded talk about 'selection.' Art is essentially selection, but it is a selection whose main care is to be typical, to be inclusive. For many people art means rose-coloured window-panes, and selection means picking a bouquet for Mrs. Grundy. They will tell you glibly that artistic considerations have nothing to do with the disagreeable, with the ugly, they will rattle off shallow commonplaces about the province of art and the limits of art till you are moved to some wonder in return as to the province and the limits of ignorance. It appears to me that no one can ever have made a seriously artistic attempt without becoming conscious of an immense increase—a kind of revelation—of freedom. One perceives in that case—by the light of a heavenly ray—that the province of art is all life, all feeling, all observation, all vision. As Mr. Besant so justly intimates, it is all experience. That is a sufficient answer to those who maintain that it must not touch the sad things of life, who stick into its divine unconscious bosom little prohibitory inscriptions on the end of sticks such as we see in public gardens—‘It is forbidden to walk on the grass, it is forbidden to touch the flowers, it is not allowed to introduce dogs or to remain after dark, it is requested to keep to the right.’ The young aspirant in the line of fiction whom we continue to imagine will do nothing without taste, for in that case his freedom would be of little use to him, but the first advantage of his taste will be to reveal to him the absurdity of the little sticks and tickets. If he have taste, I must add, of course he will have ingenuity, and my disrespectful reference to that quality just now was not meant to imply that it is useless in fiction. But it is only a secondary aid, the first is a capacity for receiving straight impressions.

Mr. Besant has some remarks on the question of ‘the story’ which I shall not attempt to criticise, though they seem to me to contain a singular ambiguity, because I do not think I understand them. I cannot see what is meant by talking as if there were a part of a novel which is the story and part of it which for mystical reasons is not—unless indeed the distinction be made in a sense in which it is difficult to suppose that any one should attempt to convey anything. ‘The story,’ if it represents anything, represents the subject, the idea, the donnée of the novel, and there is surely no ‘school’—Mr. Besant speaks of a school—which urges that a novel should be all treatment and no subject. There must assuredly be something to treat, every school is intimately conscious of that. This sense of the story being the idea, the starting-point, of the novel, is the only one that I see in which it can be spoken of as something different from its organic whole, and since in proportion as the work is successful the idea permeates and penetrates it, informs and animates it, so that every word and every punctuation-point contribute directly to the expression, in that proportion do we lose our sense of the story being a blade which may be drawn more or less out of its sheath. The story and the novel, the idea and the form, are the needle and thread, and I never heard of a guild of tailors who recommended the use of the thread without the needle, or the needle without the thread. Mr. Besant is not the only critic who may be observed to have spoken as if there were certain things in life which constitute stories, and certain others which do not. I find the same odd implication in an entertaining article in the Pall Mall Gazette, devoted, as it happens, to Mr. Besant’s lecture. ‘The story is the thing!’ says this graceful writer, as if with a tone of opposition to some other idea. I should think it was, as every painter who, as the time for ‘sending in’ his picture looms in the distance, finds himself still in quest of a subject—as every belated artist not fixed about his theme will heartily agree. There are some subjects which speak to us and others which do not, but he would be a clever man who should undertake to give a rule—an index expurgatorius—by which the story and the no-story should be known apart. It is impossible (to me at least) to imagine any such rule which shall not be altogether arbitrary. The writer in the Pall Mall opposes the delightful (as I suppose) novel of Margot la Balafree to certain tales in which ‘Bostonian nymphs’ appear to have ‘rejected English dukes for psychological reasons.’ I am not acquainted with the romance just designated, and can scarcely forgive the Pall Mall critic for not mentioning the name of the author, but the title appears to refer to a lady who may have received a scar in some heroic adventure. I am inconsolable at not being acquainted with this episode, but am utterly at a loss to see why it is a story when the rejection (or acceptance) of a duke is not, and why a reason, psychological or other, is not a subject when a cicatrix is. They are all particles of the multitudinous life with which the novel deals, and surely no dogma which pretends to make it lawful to touch the one and unlawful to touch the other will stand for a moment on its feet. It is the special picture that must stand or fall, according as it seems to possess truth or to lack it. Mr. Besant does not, to my sense, light up the subject by intimating that a story must, under penalty of not being a story, consist of 'adventures'. Why of adventures more than of green spectacles? He mentions a category of impossible things, and among them he places 'fiction without adventure'. Why without adventure, more than without matrimony, or celibacy, or parturition, or cholera, or hydropathy, or Jansenism? This seems to me to bring the novel back to the hapless little rôle of being an artificial, ingenious thing—bring it down from its large, free character of an immense and exquisite correspondence with life. And what is adventure, when it comes to that, and by what sign is the listening pupil to recognise it? It is an adventure—an immense one—for me to write this little article, and for a Bostonian nymph to reject an English duke is an adventure only less stirring, I should say, than for an English duke to be rejected by a Bostonian nymph. I see dramas within dramas in that, and innumerable points of view. A psychological reason is, to my imagination, an object adorably pictorial, to catch the tint of its complexion—I feel as if that idea might inspire one to Titianesque efforts. There are few things more exciting to me, in short, than a psychological reason, and yet, I protest, the novel seems to me the most magnificent form of art. I have just been reading, at the same time, the delightful story of Treasure Island, by Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson and, in a manner less consecutive, the last tale from M. Edmond de Goncourt, which is entitled Chérie. One of these works treats of murders, mysteries, islands of dreadful renown, hairbreadth escapes, miraculous coincidences and buried doubloons. The other treats of a little French girl who lived in a fine house in Paris, and died of wounded sensibility because no one would marry her. I call Treasure Island delightful, because it appears to me to have succeeded wonderfully in what it attempts, and I venture to bestow no epithet upon Chérie, which strikes me as having failed deplorably in what it attempts—that is in tracing the development of the moral consciousness of a child. But one of these productions strikes me as exactly as much of a novel as the other, and as having a 'story' quite as much. The moral consciousness of a child is as much a part of life as the islands of the Spanish Main, and the one sort of geography seems to me to have those 'surprises' of which Mr. Besant speaks quite as much as the other. For myself (since it comes back in the last resort, as I say, to the preference of the individual), the picture of the child's experience has the advantage that I can at successive steps (an immense luxury, near to the 'sensual pleasure' of which Mr. Besant's critic in the Pall Mall speaks) say Yes or No, as it may be, to what the artist puts before me. I have been a child in fact, but I have been on a quest for a buried treasure only in supposition, and it is a simple accident that with M. de Goncourt I should have for the most part to say No. With George Eliot, when she painted that country with a far other intelligence, I always said Yes.

The most interesting part of Mr. Besant's lecture is unfortunately the briefest passage—his very cursory allusion to the 'conscious moral purpose' of the novel. Here again it is not very clear whether he be recording a fact or laying down a principle, it is a great pity that in the latter case he should not have developed his idea. This branch of the subject is of immense importance, and Mr. Besant's few words point to considerations of the widest reach, not to be lightly disposed of. He will have treated the art of fiction but superficially who is not prepared to go every inch of the way that these considerations will carry him. It is for this reason that at the beginning of these remarks I was careful to notify the reader that my reflections on so large a theme have no pretension to be exhaustive. Like Mr. Besant, I have left the question of the morality of the novel till the last, and at the last I find I have used up my space. It is a question surrounded with difficulties, as witness the very first that meets us, in the form of a definite question, on the threshold. Vagueness, in such a discussion, is fatal, and what is the meaning of your morality and your conscious moral purpose? Will you not define your terms and explain how (a novel being a picture) a picture can be either moral or immoral? You wish to paint a moral picture or carve a moral statue will you not tell us how you would set about it? We are discussing the Art of Fiction, questions of art are questions (in the widest sense) of execution, questions of morality are quite another affair, and will you not let us see how it is that you find it so easy to mix them up? These things are so clear to Mr Besant that he has deduced from them a law which he sees embodied in English Fiction, and which is 'a truly admirable thing and a great cause for congratulation' It is a great cause for congratulation indeed when such thorny problems become as smooth as silk I may add that in so far as Mr Besant perceives that in point of fact English Fiction has addressed itself preponderantly to these delicate questions he will appear to many people to have made a vain discovery They will have been positively struck, on the contrary, with the moral timidity of the usual English novelist, with his (or with her) aversion to face the difficulties with which on every side the treatment of reality bristles He is apt to be extremely shy (whereas the picture that Mr Besant draws is a picture of boldness), and the sign of his work, for the most part, is a cautious silence on certain subjects In the English novel (by which of course I mean the American as well), more than in any other, there is a traditional difference between that which people know and that which they agree to admit that they know, that which they see and that which they speak of, that which they feel to a part of life and that which they allow to enter into literature There is the great difference, in short, between what they talk of in conversation and what they talk of in print The essence of moral energy is to survey the whole field, and I should directly reverse Mr Besant's remark and say not that the English novel has a purpose, but that it has a diffidence To what degree a purpose in a work of art is a source of corruption I shall not attempt to inquire, the one that seems to me least dangerous is the purpose of making a perfect work As for our novel, I may say lastly on this score that as we find it in England to-day it strikes me as addressed in a large degree to 'young people,' and that thus in itself constitutes a presumption that it will be rather shy There are certain things which it is generally agreed not to discuss, not even to mention, before young people That is very well, but the absence of discussion is not a symptom of the moral passion The purpose of the English novel — 'a truly admirable thing, and a great cause for congratulation' — strikes me therefore as rather negative

There is one point at which the moral sense and the artistic sense lie very near together, that is in the light of the very obvious truth that the deepest quality of a work of art will always be the quality of the mind of the producer In proportion as that intelligence is fine will the novel, the picture, the statue partake of the substance of beauty and truth To be constituted of such elements is, to my vision, to have purpose enough No good novel will ever proceed from a superficial mind, that seems to me an axiom which, for the artist in fiction, will cover all needful moral ground if the youthful aspirant take it to heart it will illuminate for him many of the mysteries of 'purpose' There are many other useful things that might be said to him, but I have come to the end of my article, and can only touch them as I pass The critic in the Pall Mall Gazette, whom I have already quoted, draws attention to the danger, in speaking of the art of fiction, of generalising The danger that he has in mind is rather, I imagine, that of particularising, for there are some comprehensive remarks which, in addition to those embodied in Mr Besant's suggestive lecture, might without fear of misleading him be addressed to the ingenuous student I should remind him first of the magnificence of the form that is open to him, which offers to sight so few restrictions and such innumerable opportunities The other arts, in comparison, appear confined and hampered, the various conditions under which they are exercised are so rigid and definite But the only condition that I can think of attaching to the composition of the novel is, as I have already said, that it be sincere This freedom is a splendid privilege, and the first lesson of the young novelist is to learn to be worthy of it 'Enjoy it as it deserves,' I should say to him, 'take possession of it, explore it to its utmost extent, publish it, rejoice in it All life belongs to you, and do not listen either to those who would shut you up into corners of it and tell you that it is only here and there that art inhabits, or to those who would persuade you that this heavenly messenger wings her way outside of life altogether, breathing a superfine air, and turning away her head from the truth of things. There is no impression of life, no manner of seeing it and feeling it, to which the plan of the novelist may not offer a place, you have only to remember that talents so dissimilar as those of Alexandre Dumas and Jane Austen, Charles Dickens and Gustave Flaubert have worked in this field with equal glory. Do not think too much about optimism and pessimism, try and catch the colour of life itself. In France to-day we see a prodigious effort (that of Emile Zola, to whose solid and serious work no explorer of the capacity of the novel can allude without respect), we see an extraordinary effort, vitiated by a spirit of pessimism on a narrow basis. M. Zola is magnificent, but he strikes an English reader as ignorant, he has an air of working in the dark, if he had as much light as energy, his results would be of the highest value. As for the aberrations of a shallow optimism, the ground (of English fiction especially) is strewn with their brittle particles as with broken glass. If you must indulge in conclusions, let them have the taste of a wide knowledge. Remember that your first duty is to be as complete as possible—to make as perfect a work. Be generous and delicate and pursue the prize.

CRAPY CORNELIA

THREE times within a quarter of an hour—shifting the while his posture on his chair of contemplation—had he looked at his watch as for its final sharp hint that he should decide, that he should get up. His seat was one of a group fairly sequestered, unoccupied save for his own presence, and from where he lingered he looked off at a stretch of lawn freshened by recent April showers and on which sundry small children were at play. The trees, the shrubs, the plants, every stem and twig just ruffled as by the first touch of the light finger of the relenting year, struck him as standing still in the blest hope of more of the same caress, the quarter about him held its breath after the fashion of the child who waits with the rigour of an open mouth and shut eyes for the promised sensible effect of his having been good. So, in the windless, sun-warmed air of the beautiful afternoon, the Park of the winter's end had struck White-Mason as waiting, even New York, under such an impression, was 'good,' good enough—for him, its very sounds were faint, were almost sweet, as they reached him from so seemingly far beyond the wooded horizon that formed the remoter limit of his large shallow glade. The tones of the frolic infants ceased to be nondescript and harsh—were in fact almost as fresh and decent as the frilled and puckered and ribboned garb of the little girls, which had always a way, in those parts, of so portentously flaunting the daughters of the strange native—that is of the overwhelmingly alien—populace at him.

Not that these things in particular were his matter of meditation now, he had wanted, at the end of his walk, to sit apart a little and think—and had been doing that for twenty minutes, even though as yet to no break in the charm of procrastination. But he had looked without seeing and listened without hearing all that had been positive for him was that he hadn't failed vaguely to feel. He had felt in the first place, and he continued to feel—yes, at forty-eight quite as much as at any point of the supposed reign of younger intensities—the great spirit of the air, the fine sense of the season, the supreme appeal of Nature, he might have said, to his time of life, quite as if she, easy, indulgent, indifferent, cynical Power, were offering him the last chance it would rest with his wit or his blood to embrace. Then with that he had been entertaining, to the point and with the prolonged consequence of accepted immobilization, the certitude that if he did call on Mrs. Worthingham and find her at home he couldn't in justice to himself not put to her the question that had lapsed the other time, the last time, through the irritating and persistent, even if accidental, presence of others. What friends she had—the people who so stupidly, so wantonly stuck! If they should, he and she, come to an understanding, that would presumably have to include certain members of her singularly ill-composed circle, in whom it was incredible to him that he should ever take an interest. This defeat, to do himself justice—he had bent rather predominantly on that, you see, ideal justice to her, with her possible conception of what it should consist of, being another and quite a different matter—he had had the fact of the Sunday afternoon to thank for, she didn't 'keep' that day for him, since they hadn't, up to now, quite begun to cultivate the appointment or assignation founded on explicit sacrifices. He might at any rate look to find this pleasant practical Wednesday—10 should he indeed, at his actual rate, stay it before it ebbed—more liberally and intendingly given him

The sound he at last most wittingly distinguished in his nook was the single deep note of half-past five borne to him from some high-perched public clock. He finally got up with the sense that the time from then on ought at least to be felt as sacred to him. At this juncture it was—while he stood 20 there shaking his garments, settling his hat, his necktie, his shirt-cuffs, fixing the high polish of his fine shoes as if for some reflection in it of his straight and spare and grizzled, his refined and trimmed and dressed, his altogether distinguished person, that of a gentleman abundantly settled, but of a bachelor markedly nervous—at this crisis it was, doubtless, that he at once most measured and least resented his predicament. If 30 he should go he would almost to a certainty find her, and if he should find her he would almost to a certainty come to the point. He wouldn't put it off again—there was that high consideration for him of justice at least to himself. He had never yet denied himself anything so apparently fraught with possibilities as the idea of proposing to Mrs. Worthingham—never yet, in other words,
 40 denied himself anything he had so distinctly wanted to do, and the results of that wisdom had remained for him precisely the precious parts of experience. Counting only the offers of his honourable hand, these had been on three remembered occasions at least the consequence of an impulse as sharp and a self-respect as reasoned, a self-respect that hadn't in the least suffered, moreover, from the failure of each appeal. He had been met 50 in the three cases—the only one she at all compared with his present case—by the frank confession that he didn't somehow, charming as he was, cause himself to be superstitiously believed in, and the lapse of life, afterward, had cleared up many doubts.

It wouldn't have done, he eventually, he lucidly saw, each time he had been refused, and the candour of his nature was such that he could live to think of these very passages as a proof of how right he had been—right, that is, to have put himself forward always, by the happiest instinct, only in impossible conditions. He had the happy consciousness of having exposed the important ques-
 10 tion to the crucial test, and of having escaped, by that persistent logic, a grave mistake. What better proof of his escape than the fact that he was now free to renew the all-interesting inquiry, and should be exactly, about to do so in different and better conditions? The conditions were better by as much more—as much more of his career and character, of his situation, his reputation he could even have called it, of 20 his knowledge of life, of his somewhat extended means, of his possibly augmented charm, of his certainly improved mind and temper—as was involved in the actual impending settlement. Once he had got into motion, once he had crossed the Park and passed out of it, entering, with very little space to traverse, one of the short new streets that abutted on its east side, his step became that of a man young enough to find confidence, quite to find felicity, in the 30 sense, in almost any sense, of action. He could still enjoy almost anything, absolutely an unpleasant thing, in default of a better, that might still remind him he wasn't so old. The standing newness of everything about him would, it was true, have weakened this cheer by too much presuming on it, Mrs. Worthingham's house, before which he stopped, had that gloss of new money, that glare of a piece fresh from the mint and ringing for the first time on 40 any counter, which seems to claim for it, in any transaction, something more than the 'face' value.

This could but be yet more the case for the impression of the observer introduced and committed. On our friend's part I mean, after his admission and while still in the hall, the sense of the general shining 50 immediacy, of the still unhushed clamour of the shock, was perhaps stronger than he had ever known it. That broke out from every corner as the high pitch of interest, and with a candour that—no, certainly—he had never seen equalled, every particular expensive object shrieking at him in its artless pride that it had just 'come home' He met the whole vision with something of the grimace produced on persons without goggles by the passage from a shelter to a blinding light, and if he had—by a perfectly possible chance—been 'snap-shotted' on the spot, would have struck you as showing for his first tribute to the temple of Mrs Worthingham's charming presence a scowl almost of anguish He wasn't constitutionally, it may at once be explained for him, a goggled person, and he was condemned, in New York, to this frequent violence of transition—having to reckon with it whenever he went out, as who should say, from himself The high pitch of interest, to his taste, was the pitch of history, the pitch of acquired and earned suggestion, the pitch of association, in a word, so that he lived by preference, incontestably, if not in a rich gloom, which would have been beyond his means and spirits, at least amid objects and images that confessed to the tone of time

He had ever felt that an indispensable presence—with a need of it moreover that interfered at no point with his gentle habit, not to say his subtle art, of drawing out what was left him of his youth, of thinly and thriftily spreading the rest of that choicest jam-pot of the cupboard of consciousness over the remainder of a slice of life still possibly thick enough to bear it, or in other words of moving the melancholy limits, the significant signs, constantly a little further on, very much as property-marks or staked boundaries are sometimes stealthily shifted at night He positively cherished in fact, as against the too inveterate gesture of distressfully guarding his eyeballs—so many New York aspects seemed to keep him at it—an ideal of adjusted appreciation, of courageous curiosity, of fairly letting the world about him, a world of constant breathless renewals and merciless substitutions, make its flaring assault on its own inordinate terms Newness was value in the piece—for the acquirer, or at least sometimes might be, even though the act of 'blowing' hard, the act marking a heated freshness of arrival, or other form of irruption, could never minister to the peace of those already and long on the field; and this if only because maturer tone was after all most appreciable and most consoling

when one staggered back to it, wounded, bleeding, blinded, from the riot of the raw—or, to put the whole experience more prettily, no doubt, from excesses of light

II

If he went in, however, with something of his more or less inevitable scowl, there were really, at the moment, two rather valid reasons for screened observation, the first of these being that the whole place seemed to reflect as never before the lustre of Mrs Worthingham's own polished and prosperous little person—to smile, it struck him, with her smile, to twinkle not only with the gleam of her lovely teeth, but with that of all her rings and brooches and bangles and other gewgaws, to curl and spasmodically cluster as in emulation of her charming complicated yellow tresses, to surround the most animated of pink-and-white, of ruffled and ribboned, of frilled and festooned Dresden china shepherdesses with exactly the right system of rococo curves and convolutions and other flourishes, a perfect bower of painted and gilded and moulded concerts The second ground of this immediate impression of scenic extravagance, almost as if the curtain rose for him to the first act of some small and expensively mounted comic opera, was that she hadn't, after all, awaited him in fond singleness, but had again just a trifle inconsiderately exposed him to the drawback of having to reckon, for whatever design he might amiably entertain, with the presence of a third and quite superfluous person, a small black insignificant but none the less oppressive stranger It was odd how, on the instant, the little lady engaged with her did affect him as comparatively black—very much as if that had absolutely, in such a medium, to be the graceless appearance of any item not positively of some fresh shade of a light colour or of some pretty pretension to a charming twist Any witness of their meeting, his hostess should surely have felt, would have been a false note in the whole rosy glow, but what note so false as that of the dingy little presence that she might actually, by a refinement of her perhaps always too visible study of effect, have provided as a positive contrast or foil? whose name and intervention, moreover, she appeared to be no more moved to mention and account for than she might have been to 'present'—whether as stretched at her feet or erect upon disciplined haunches—some shaggy old domesticated terrier or poodle

Extraordinarily, after he had been in the room five minutes—a space of time during which his fellow-visitor had neither budged nor uttered a sound—he had made Mrs Worthingham out as all at once perfectly pleased to see him, completely aware of what he had most in mind, and singularly serene in face of his sense of their impediment. It was as if for all the world she didn't take it for one, the immobility, to say nothing of the seeming equanimity, of their tactless companion, at whom meanwhile indeed our friend himself, after his first ruffled perception, no more adventured a look than if advised by his constitutional kindness that to notice her in any degree would perforce be ungraciously to glower. He talked after a fashion with the woman as to whose power to please and amuse and serve him, as to whose really quite organised and indicated fitness for lighting up his autumn afternoon of life his conviction had lately strained itself so clear, but he was all the while carrying on an intenser exchange with his own spirit and trying to read into the charming creature's behaviour, as he could only call it, some confirmation of his theory that she also had her inward flutter and anxiously counted on him. He found support, happily for the conviction just named, in the idea, at no moment as yet really repugnant to him, the idea bound up in fact with the finer essence of her appeal, that she had her own vision too of her quality and her price, and that the last appearance she would have liked to bristle with was that of being forewarned and eager.

He had, if he came to think of it, scarce definitely warned her, and he probably wouldn't have taken to her so consciously in the first instance without an appreciative sense that, as she was a little person of twenty superficial graces, so she was also a little person with her secret pride. She might just have planted her mangy lion—not to say her muzzled house-dog—there in his path as a symbol that she wasn't cheap and easy, which would be a thing he couldn't possibly wish his future wife to have shown herself in advance, even if to him alone. That she could make him put himself such questions was precisely part of the attaching play of her iridescent surface, the shimmering interfusion of her various aspects, that of her youth with her independence—her pecuniary perhaps in particular, that of her vivacity with her beauty, that of her facility above all with her odd novelty, the high modernity, as people appeared to have come to call it, that made her so much more 'knowing' in some directions than even he, man of the world as he certainly was, could pretend to be, though all on a basis of the most unconscious and instinctive and luxurious assumption. She was 'up' to everything, aware of everything—if one counted from a short enough time back (from week before last, say, and as if quantities of history had burst upon the world within the fortnight), she was likewise surprised at nothing, and in that direction one might reckon as far ahead as the rest of her lifetime, or at any rate as the rest of his, which was all that would concern him. It was as if the suitability of the future to her personal and rather pampered tastes was what she most took for granted, so that he could see her, for all her Dresden-china shoes and her flutter of wondrous befrilled contemporary skirts, skip by the side of the coming age as over the floor of a ball-room, keeping step with its monstrous stride and prepared for every figure of the dance.

Her outlook took form to him suddenly as a great square sunny window that hung in assured fashion over the immensity of life. There rose toward it as from a vast swarming plaza a high tide of emotion and sound, yet it was at the same time as if even while he looked her light gemmed hand, flashing on him in addition to those other things the perfect polish of the prettiest pink finger-nails in the world, had touched a spring, the most ingenious of recent devices for instant ease, which dropped half across the scene a soft-coloured mechanical blind, a fluttered, fringed awning of charmingly toned silk, such as would make a bath of cool shade for the favoured friend leaning with her there—that is for the happy couple itself—on the balcony. The great view would be the prospect and privilege of the very state he coveted—since didn't he covet it?—the state of being so securely at her side, while the wash of privacy, as one might count it, the broad fine brush dipped into clear umber and passed, full and wet, straight across the strong scheme of colour, would represent the security itself, all the uplifted inner elegance, the condition, so ideal, of being shut out from nothing and yet of having, so gaily and breezily aloft, none of the burden or worry of anything. Thus, as I say, for our friend, the place itself, while his vivid impression lasted, portentously opened and spread, and what was before him took, to his vision, though indeed at so other a crisis, the form of the 'glimmering square' of the poet, yet, for a still more remarkable fact, with an incongruous object usurping at a given instant the privilege of the frame and seeming, even as he looked, to block the view

The incongruous object was a woman's head, crowned with a little sparsely feathered black hat, an ornament quite unlike those the women mostly noticed by White-Mason were now 'wearing,' and that grew and grew, that came nearer and nearer, while it met his eyes, after the manner of images in the kinematograph. It had presently loomed so large that he saw nothing else—not only among the things at a considerable distance, the things Mrs Worthingham would eventually, yet unmistakably, introduce him to, but among those of this lady's various attributes and appurtenances as to which he had been in the very act of cultivating his consciousness. It was in the course of another minute the most extraordinary thing in the world everything had altered, dropped, darkened, disappeared, his imagination had spread its wings only to feel them flop all grotesquely at its sides as he recognised in his hostess's quiet companion, the oppressive alien who hadn't indeed interfered with his fanciful flight, though she had prevented his immediate declaration and brought about the thud, not to say the felt violent shock, of his fall to earth, the perfectly plain identity of Cornelia Rasch. It was she who had remained there at attention, it was she their companion hadn't introduced, it was she he had forborne to face with his fear of incivility. He stared at her—everything else went

'Why it has been you all this time?'

Miss Rasch fairly turned pale. 'I was waiting to see if you'd know me'

'Ah, my dear Cornelia'—he came straight out with it—'rather!'

'Well, it isn't,' she returned with a quick change to red now, 'from having taken much time to look at me!'

She smiled, she even laughed, but he could see how she had felt his unconsciousness, poor thing, the acquaintance, quite the friend of his youth, as she had been, the associate of his childhood, of his early manhood, of his middle age in fact, up to a few years back, not more than ten at the most; the associate too of so many of his associates and of almost all of his relations, those of the other time, those who had mainly gone for ever, the person in short whose noted disappearance, though it might have seemed final, had been only of recent seasons. She was present again now, all unexpectedly—he had heard of her having at last, left alone after successive deaths and with scant resources, sought economic salvation in Europe, the promised land of American thrift—she was present as thus almost ancient and this oddly unassertive little rotund figure whom one seemed no more obliged to address than if she had been a black satin ottoman 'treated' with buttons and gimp, a class of object as to which the policy of blindness was imperative. He felt the need of some explanatory plea, and before he could think had uttered one at Mrs Worthingham's expense 'Why, you see we weren't introduced—'

'No—but I didn't suppose I should have to be named to you'

'Well, my dear woman, you haven't—do me that justice!' He could at least make this point 'I felt all the while—!' However, it would have taken him long to say what he had been feeling, and he was aware now of the pretty projected light of Mrs Worthingham's wonder. She looked as if, out for a walk with her, he had put her to the inconvenience of his stopping to speak to a strange woman in the street.

'I never supposed you knew her!'—it was to him his hostess excused herself

This made Miss Rasch spring up, distinctly flushed, distinctly strange to behold, but not vulgarly nettled—Cornelia was incapable of that, only rather funnily bristling and laughing, only showing that this was all she had waited for, only saying just the right thing, the thing she could make so clearly a jest 'Of course if you had you'd have presented him'

Mrs. Worthingham looked while answering at White-Mason 'I didn't want you to go—which you see you do as soon as he speaks to you But I never dreamed—!'

'That there was anything between us? Ah, there are no end of things!' He, on his side, though addressing the younger and prettier woman, looked at his fellow-guest, to whom he even continued 'When did you get back? May I come and see you the very first time?'

Cornelia gasped and wriggled—she practically giggled, she had lost every atom of her little old, her little young, though always unaccountable prettiness, which used to peep so, on the bare chance of a shot, from behind indefensible features, that it almost made watching her a form of sport. He had heard vaguely of her, it came back to him (for there had been no letters, their later acquaintance, thank goodness, hadn't involved that) as experimenting, for economy, and then as settling, to the same rather dismal end, somewhere in England, at one of those intensely English places, St Leonards, Cheltenham, Bognor, Dawlish—which, awfully, was it?—and she now affected him for all the world as some small squirming, exclaiming, genteelly conversing old maid of a type vaguely associated with the three-volume novels he used to feed on (besides his so often encountering it in 'real life,') during a far-away stay of his own at Brighton Odder than any element of his ex-gossip's identity itself, however, was the fact that she somehow, with it all, rejoiced his sight. Indeed the supreme oddity was that the manner of her reply to his request for leave to call should have absolutely charmed his attention. She didn't look at him, she only, from under her frumpy, crapy, curiously exotic hat, and with her good little near-sighted insinuating glare, expressed to Mrs Worthingham, while she answered him, wonderful arch things, the overdone things of a shy woman. 'Yes, you may call—but only when this dear lovely lady has done with you!' The moment after which she had gone.

III

Forty minutes later he was taking his way back from the queer miscarriage of his adventure, taking it, with no conscious positive felicity, through the very spaces that had witnessed shortly before the considerable serenity of his assurance. He had said to himself then, or had as good as said it, that, since he might do perfectly as he liked, it couldn't fail for him that he must soon retrace those steps, humming, to all intents, the first bars of a wedding-march, so beautifully had it cleared up that he was 'going to like' letting Mrs Worthingham accept him. He was to have hummed no wedding-march, as it seemed to be turning out—he had none, up to now, to hum, and yet, extraordinarily, it wasn't in the least because she had refused him. Why then hadn't he liked as much as he had intended to like it putting the pleasant act, the act of not refusing him, in her power? Could it all have come from the awkward minute of his failure to decide sharply, on Cornelia's departure, whether or no he would attend her to the door? He hadn't decided at all—what the deuce had been in him?—but had danced to and fro in the room, thinking better of each impulse and then thinking worse. He had hesitated like an ass erect on absurd hind legs between two bundles of hay, the upshot of which must have been his giving the falsest impression. In what way that was to be for an instant considered had their common past committed him to crapy Cornelia? He repudiated with a whack on the gravel any ghost of an obligation.

What he could get rid of with scantier success, unfortunately, was the peculiar sharpness of his sense that, though mystified by his visible flurry—and yet not mystified enough for a sympathetic question either—his hostess had been, on the whole, even more frankly diverted which was precisely an example of that newest, freshest, finest freedom in her, the air and the candour of assuming, not 'heartlessly,' not viciously, not even very consciously, but with a bright pampered confidence which would probably end by affecting one's nerves as the most impertinent stroke in the world, that every blest thing coming up for her in any connection was somehow matter for her general recreation. There she was again with the innocent egotism, the gilded and overflowing anarchism, really, of her doubtless quite unwitting but none the less rabid modern note Her grace of ease was perfect, but it was all grace of ease, not a single shred of it grace of uncertainty or of difficulty—which meant, when you came to see, that, for its happy working, not a grain of provision was left by it to mere manners This was clearly going to be the music of the future—that if people were but rich enough and furnished enough and fed enough, exercised and sanitated and manufactured and generally advised and advertised and made ‘knowing’ enough, avertis enough, as the term appeared to be nowadays in Paris, all they had to do for civility was to take the amused ironic view of those who might be less initiated In his time, when he was young or even when he was only but a little less middle-aged, the best manners had been the best kindness, and the best kindness had mostly been some art of not insisting on one’s luxurious differences, of concealing rather, for common humanity, if not for common decency, a part at least of the intensity or the ferocity with which one might be ‘in the know’

Oh, the ‘know’—Mrs Worthingham was in it, all instinctively, inevitably, and as a matter of course, up to her eyes, which didn’t, however, the least little bit prevent her being as ignorant as a fish of everything that really and intimately and fundamentally concerned him, poor dear old White-Mason She didn’t, in the first place, so much as know who he was—by which he meant know who and what it was to be a White-Mason, even a poor and a dear and old one, ‘anyway’ That indeed—he did her perfect justice—was of the very essence of the newness and freshness and beautiful, brave, social irresponsibility by which she had originally dazzled him just exactly that circumstance of her having no instinct for any old quality or quantity or identity, a single historic or social value, as he might say, of the New York of his already almost legendary past, and that additional one of his, on his side, having, so far as this went, cultivated blankness, cultivated positive prudence, as to her own personal background—the vagueness, at the best, with which all honest gentlefolk, the New Yorkers of his approved stock and conservative generation, were content, as for the most part they were indubitably wise, to surround the origins and antecedents and queer unimaginable early influences of persons swimming into their ken from those parts of the country that quite necessarily and naturally figured to their view as ‘God-forsaken’ and generally impossible

The few scattered surviving representatives of a society once ‘good’—rari nantes in gurgite vasto<sup>1</sup>—were liable, at the past things had come to, to meet, and even amid old shades once sacred, or what was left of such, every form of social impossibility, and, more irresistibly still, to find these apparitions often carry themselves (often at least in the case of the women) with a wondrous wild gallantry, equally imperturbable and inimitable, the sort of thing that reached its maximum in Mrs Worthingham Beyond that who ever wanted to look up their annals, to reconstruct their steps and stages, to dot their i’s in fine, or to ‘go behind’ anything that was theirs? One wouldn’t do that for the world—a rudimentary discretion forbade it, and yet this check from elementary undiscussable taste quite consorted with a due respect for them, or at any rate with a due respect for oneself in connection with them, as was just exemplified in what would be his own, what would be poor dear old White-Mason’s, insurmountable aversion to having, on any pretext, the doubtless very queer spectre of the late Mr Worthingham presented to him No question had he asked, or would he ever ask, should his life—that is should the success of his courtship—even intimately depend on it, either about that obscure agent of his mistress’s actual affluence or about the happy head-spring itself, and the apparently copious tributaries, of the golden stream

From all which marked anomalies, at any rate, what was the moral to draw? He dropped into a Park chair again with that question, he lost himself in the wonder of why he had come away with his homage so very much unpaid Yet it didn’t seem at all, actually, as if he could say or conclude, as if he could do anything but keep on worrying—just in conformity with his being a person who, whether or no familiar with the need to make his conduct square with his conscience and his taste, was never wholly exempt from that of making his taste and his conscience square with his conduct. To this latter occupation he further abandoned himself, and it didn't release him from his second brooding session till the sweet spring sunset had begun to gather and he had more or less cleared up, in the deepening dusk, the effective relation between the various parts of his ridiculously agitating experience. There were vital facts he seemed thus to catch, to seize, with a nervous hand, and the twilight helping, by their vaguely whisked tails, unquiet truths that swarmed out after the fashion of creatures bold only at eventide, creatures that hovered and circled, that verily brushed his nose, in spite of their shyness. Yes, he had practically just sat on with his 'mistress'—heaven save the mark!—as if not to come to the point, as if it had absolutely come up that there would be something rather vulgar and awful in doing so. The whole stretch of his stay after Cornelia's withdrawal had been consumed by his almost ostentatiously treating himself to the opportunity of which he was to make nothing. It was as if he had sat and watched himself—that came back to him. Shall I now or sha'n't I? Will I now or won't I? 'Say within the next three minutes, say by a quarter past six, or by twenty minutes past, at the furthest—always if nothing more comes up to prevent'

What had already come up to prevent was, in the strangest and drollest, or at least in the most preposterous, way in the world, that not Cornelia's presence, but her very absence, with its distraction of his thoughts, the thoughts that lumbered after her, had made the difference, and without his being the least able to tell why and how. He put it to himself after a fashion by the image that, this distraction once created, his working round to his hostess again, his reverting to the matter of his errand, began suddenly to represent a return from so far. That was simply all—or rather a little less than all, for something else had contributed. 'I never dreamed you knew her,' and 'I never dreamed you did,' were inevitably what had been exchanged between them—supplemented by Mrs. Worthingham's mere scrap of an explanation. 'Oh yes—to the small extent you see. Two years ago in Switzerland when I was at a high place for an "aftercure," during twenty days of incessant rain, she was the only person in an hotel full of roaring, gorging, smoking Germans with whom I could have a word of talk. She and I were the only speakers of English, and were thrown together like castaways on a desert island and in a raging storm. She was ill besides, and she had no maid, and mine looked after her, and she was very grateful—writing to me later on and saying she should certainly come to see me if she ever returned to New York. She has returned, you see—and there she was, poor little creature!" Such was Mrs. Worthingham's tribute—to which even his asking her if Miss Rasch had ever happened to speak of him caused her practically to add nothing. Visibly she had never thought again of any one Miss Rasch had spoken of or anything Miss Rasch had said, right as she was, naturally, about her being a little clever queer creature. This was perfectly true, and yet it was probably—by being all she could dream of about her—what had paralysed his proper gallantry. Its effect had been not in what it simply stated, but in what, under his secretly disintegrating criticism, it almost luridly symbolised.

He had quitted his seat in the Louis Quinze drawing-room without having, as he would have described it, done anything but give the lady of the scene a superior chance not to betray a defeated hope—not, that is, to fail of the famous 'pride' mostly supposed to prop even the most infatuated women at such junctures, by which chance, to do her justice, she had thoroughly seemed to profit. But he finally rose from his later station with a feeling of better success. He had by a happy turn of his hand got hold of the most precious, the least obscure of the fitting, circling things that brushed his ears. What he wanted—as justifying for him a little further consideration—was there before him from the moment he could put it that Mrs. Worthingham had no data. He almost hugged that word—it suddenly came to mean so much to him. No data, he felt, for a conception of the sort of thing the New York of 'his time' had been in his personal life—the New York so unexpectedly, so vividly and, as he might say, so perversely called back to all his senses by its identity with that of poor Cornelia's time since even she had had a time, small show as it was likely to make now, and his time and hers had been the same. Cornelia figured to him while he walked away as, by contrast and opposition, a massive little bundle of data, his impatience to go to see her sharpened as he thought of this so certainly should he find out that wherever he might touch her, with a gentle though firm pressure, he would, as the fond visitor of old houses taps and fingers a disfeatured, overpapered wall with the conviction of a wainscot-edge beneath, recognise some small extrusion of history.

IV

There would have been a wonder for us meanwhile in his continued use, as it were, of his happy formula—brought out to Cornelia Rasch within ten minutes, or perhaps only within twenty, of his having settled into the quite comfortable chair that, two days later, she indicated to him by her fire-side. He had arrived at her address through the fortunate chance of his having noticed her card, as he went out, deposited, in the good old New York fashion, on one of the rococo tables of Mrs Worthingham's hall. His eye had been caught by the pencilled indication that was to affect him, the next instant, as fairly placed there for his sake. This had really been his luck, for he shouldn't have liked to write to Mrs Worthingham for guidance—that he felt, though too impatient just now to analyse the reluctance. There was nobody else he could have approached for a clue, and with this reflection he was already aware of how it testified to their rare little position, his and Cornelia's—position as conscious, ironic, pathetic survivors together of a dead and buried society—that there would have been, in all the town, under such stress, not a member of their old circle left to turn to Mrs Worthingham had practically, even if accidentally, helped him to knowledge, the last nail in the coffin of the poor dear extinct past had been planted for him by his having thus to reach his antique contemporary through perforation of the newest newness. The note of this particular recognition was in fact the more prescribed to him that the ground of Cornelia's return to a scene swept so bare of the associational charm was certainly inconspicuous. What had she then come back for?—he had asked himself that, with the effect of deciding that it probably would have been, a little, to 'look after' her remnant of property. Perhaps she had come to save what little might still remain of that shrivelled interest, perhaps she had been, by those who took care of it for her, further swindled and despoiled, so that she wished to get at the facts. Perhaps on the other hand—it was a more cheerful chance—her investments, decently administered, were making larger returns, so that the rigorous thrift of Bognor could be finally relaxed.

He had little to learn about the attraction of Europe, and rather expected that in the event of his union with Mrs Worthingham he should find himself pleading for it with the competence of one more in the 'know' about Paris and Rome, about Venice and Florence, than even she could be. He could have lived on in his New York, that is in the sentimental, the spiritual, the more or less romantic visitation of it, but had it been positive for him that he could live on in hers?—unless indeed the possibility of this had been just (like the famous vertige de l'abîme, like the solicitation of danger, or otherwise of the dreadful) the very hinge of his whole dream. However that might be, his curiosity was occupied rather with the conceivable hinge of poor Cornelia's: it was perhaps thinkable that even Mrs Worthingham's New York, once it should have become possible again at all, might have put forth to this lone exile a plea that wouldn't be in the chords of Bognor. For himself, after all, too, the attraction had been much more of the Europe over which one might move at one's ease, and which therefore could but cost, and cost much, right and left, than of the Europe adapted to scrimping. He saw himself on the whole scrimping with more zest even in Mrs Worthingham's New York than under the inspiration of Bognor. Apart from which it was yet again odd, not to say perceptibly pleasing to him, to note where the emphasis of his interest fell in this fumble of fancy over such felt oppositions as the new, the latest, the luridest power of money and the ancient reserves and moderations and mediocrities. These last struck him as showing by contrast the old brown surface and tone as of velvet rubbed and worn, shabby, and even a bit dingy, but all soft and subtle and still velvety—which meant still dignified, whereas the angular facts of current finance were as harsh and metallic and bewildering as some stacked 'exhibit' of ugly patented inventions, things his mediaeval mind forbade his taking in. He had for instance the sense of knowing the pleasant little old Rasch fortune—pleasant as far as it went, blurred memories and impressions of what it had been and what it hadn't, of how it had grown and how languished and how melted, they came back to him and put on such vividness that he could almost have figured himself testify for them before a bland and encouraging Board. The idea of taking the field in any manner on the subject of Mrs Worthingham's resources would have affected him on the other hand as an odious ordeal, some glare of embarrassment and exposure in a circle of hard unhelpful attention, of converging, derisive, unsuggestive eyes

In Cornelia's small and quite cynically modern flat—the house had a grotesque name, 'The Gainsborough,' but at least wasn't an awful boarding-house, as he had feared, and she could receive him quite honourably, which was so much to the good—he would have been ready to use at once to her the greatest freedom of friendly allusion 'Have you still your old "family interest" in those two houses in Seventh Avenue?—one of which was next to a corner grocery, don't you know? and was occupied as to its lower part by a candy-shop where the proportion of the stock of suspectedly stale popcorn to that of rarer and stickier joys betrayed perhaps a modest capital on the part of your father's, your grandfather's, or whoever's tenant, but out of which I nevertheless remember once to have come as out of a bath of sweets, with my very garments, and even the separate hairs of my head, glued together The other of the pair, a tobacconist's, further down, had before it a wonderful huge Indian who thrust out wooden cigars at an indifferent world—you could buy candy cigars too, at the popcorn shop, and I greatly preferred them to the wooden, I remember well how I used to gape in fascination at the Indian and wonder if the last of the Mohicans was like him, besides admiring so the resources of a family whose "property" was in such forms I haven't been round there lately—we must go round together, but don't tell me the forms have utterly perished' It was after that fashion he might easily have been moved, and with almost no transition, to break out to Cornelia—quite as if taking up some old talk, some old community of gossip, just where they had left it, even with the consciousness perhaps of overdoing a little, of putting at its maximum, for the present harmony, recovery, recapture (what should he call it?) the pitch and quantity of what the past had held for them

He didn't in fact, no doubt, dart straight off to Seventh Avenue, there being too many other old things and much nearer and long subsequent, the point was only that for everything they spoke of after he had fairly begun to lean back and stretch his legs, and after she had let him, above all, light the first of a succession of cigarettes—for everything they spoke of he positively cultivated extravagance and excess, piling up the crackling twigs as on the very altar of memory, and that by the end of half an hour she had lent herself, all gallantly, to their game. It was the game of feeding the beautiful iridescent flame, ruddy and green and gold, blue and pink and amber and silver, with anything they could pick up, anything that would burn and flicker. Thick-strown with such gleanings the occasion seemed indeed, in spite of the truth that they perhaps wouldn't have proved, under cross-examination, to have rubbed shoulders in the other life so very hard. Casual contacts, qualified communities enough, there had doubtless been, but not particular 'passages,' nothing that counted, as he might think of it, for their 'very own' together, for nobody's else at all. These shades of historic exactitude didn't signify, the more and the less that there had been made perfect terms—and just by his being there and by her rejoicing in it—with their present need to have had all their past could be made to appear to have given them. It was to this tune they proceeded, the least little bit as if they knowingly pretended—he giving her the example and setting her the pace of it, and she, poor dear, after a first inevitable shyness, an uncertainty of wonder, a breathlessness of courage, falling into step and going whatever length he would completely fall in—not in the first half-hour, not even in the three or four others that his visit, even whenever he consulted his watch, still made nothing of—she yet understood enough as soon as she understood that, if their finer economy hadn't so beautifully served, he might have been conveying this, that, and the other incoherent and easy thing by the comparatively clumsy method of sound and statement 'No, I never made love to you, it would in fact have been absurd, and I don't care—though I almost know, in the sense of almost remembering!—who did and who didn't, but you were always about, and so was I, and, little as you may yourself care who I did it to, I dare say you remember (in the sense of having known of it!) any old appearances that told. But we can't afford at this time of day not to help each other to have had—well, everything there was, since there's no more of it now, nor any way of coming by it except so, and therefore let us make together, let us make over and recreate, our lost world, for which we have after all and at the worst such a lot of material. You were in particular my poor dear sisters' friend—they thought you the funniest little brown thing possible, so isn't that again to the good? You were mine only to the extent that you were so much in and out of the house—as how much, if we come to that, wasn't one in and out, south of Thirtieth Street and north of Washington Square, in those days, those spacious, sociable, Arcadian days, that we flattered ourselves we filled with the modern fever, but that were so different from any of these arrangements of pretended hourly Time that dash themselves forever to pieces as from the fiftieth floors of sky-scrapers.'

This was the kind of thing that was in the air, whether he said it or not, and that could hang there even with such quite other things as more crudely came out, came in spite of its being perhaps calculated to strike us that these last would have been rather and most the unspoken and the indirect. They were Cornelia's contribution, and as soon as she had begun to talk of Mrs Worthingham—he didn't begin it!—they had taken their place bravely in the centre of the circle. There they made, the while, their considerable little figure, but all within the ring formed by fifty other allusions, fitful but really intenser interruptions that hovered and wavered and came and went, joining hands at moments and whirling round as in chorus, only then again to dash at the slightly huddled centre with a free twitch or peck or push or other taken liberty, after the fashion of irregular frolic motions in a country dance or a Christmas game.

'You're so in love with her and want to marry her!'—she said it all sympathetically and yearningly, poor crazy Cornelia, as if it were to be quite taken for granted that she knew all about it. And then when he had asked how she knew—why she took so informed a tone about it, all on the wonder of her seeming so much more 'in' it just at that hour than he himself quite felt he could figure for 'Ah, how but from the dear lovely thing herself? Don't you suppose she knows it?'

'Oh, she absolutely "knows" it, does she?'—he fairly heard himself ask that, and with the oddest sense at once of sharply wanting the certitude and yet of seeing the question, of hearing himself say the words, through several thicknesses of some wrong medium. He came back to it from a distance, as he would have had to come back (this was again vivid to him) should he have got round again to his ripe intention three days before—after his now present but then absent friend, that is, had left him planted before his now absent but then present one for the purpose 'Do you mean she—at all confidently!—expects?' he went on, not much minding if it couldn't but sound foolish, the time being given it for him meanwhile by the sigh, the wondering gasp, all charged with the unutterable, that the tone of his appeal set in motion. He saw his companion look at him, but it might have been with the eyes of thirty years ago, when—very likely!—he had put her some such question about some girl long since dead. Dimly at first, then more distinctly, didn't it surge back on him for the very strangeness that there had been some such passage as this between them—yes, about Mary Cardew!—in the autumn of '68?

'Why, don't you realise your situation?' Miss Rasch struck him as quite beautifully wailing—above all to such an effect of deep interest, that is, on her own part and in him.

'My situation?'—he echoed, he considered, but reminded afresh, by the note of the detached, the far-projected in it, of what he had last remembered of his sentient state on his once taking ether at the dentist's.

'Yours and hers—the situation of her adoring you I suppose you at least know it,' Cornelia smiled

Yes, it was like the other time and yet it wasn't She was like—poor Cornelia was—everything that used to be, that somehow was most definite to him Still he could quite reply 'Do you call it—her adoring me—my situation?'

'Well, it's a part of yours, surely—if you're in love with her'

'Am I, ridiculous old person! in love with her?' White-Mason asked

'I may be a ridiculous old person,' Cornelia returned—and, for that matter, of course I am! But she's young and lovely and rich and clever so what could be more natural?'

'Oh, I was applying that opprobrious epithet—!' He didn't finish, though he meant he had applied it to himself He had got up from his seat, he turned about and, taking in, as his eyes also roamed, several objects in the room, serene and sturdy, not a bit cheap-looking, little old New York objects of '68, he made, with an inner art, as if to recognise them—made so, that is, for himself, had quite the sense for the moment of asking them, of imploring them, to recognise him, to be for him things of his own past Which they truly were, he could have the next instant cried out, for it meant that if three or four of them, small sallow carte-de-visite photographs, faithfully framed but spectrally faded, hadn't in every particular, frames and balloon skirts and false 'property' balustrades of unimaginable terraces and all, the tone of time, the secret for warding and easing off the perpetual imminent ache of one's protective scowl, one would verily but have to let the scowl stiffen, or to take up seriously the question of blue goggles, during what might remain of life

V

What he actually took up from a little old Twelfth-Street table that piously preserved the plain mahogany circle, with never a curl nor a crook nor a hint of a brazen flourish, what he paused there a moment for commerce with, his back presented to crapy Cornelia, who sat taking that view of him, during this opportunity, very protrusively and frankly and fondly, was one of the wasted mementos just mentioned, over which he both uttered and suppressed a small comprehensive cry. He stood there another minute to look at it, and when he turned about still kept it in his hand, only holding it now a little behind him 'You must have come back to stay—with all your beautiful things What else does it mean?'

'"Beautiful?"' his old friend commented with her brow all wrinkled and her lips thrust out in expressive dispraise They might at that rate have been scarce more beautiful than she herself 'Oh, don't talk so—after Mrs Worthingham's! They're wonderful, if you will such things, such things! But one's own poor relics and odds and ends are one's own at least, and one has—yes—come back to them They're all I have in the world to come back to They were stored, and what I was paying—' Miss Rasch woefully added

He had possession of the small old picture, he hovered there, he put his eyes again to it intently, then again held it a little behind him as if it might have been snatched away or the very feel of it, pressed against him, was good to his palm 'Mrs Worthingham's things? You think them beautiful?'

Cornelia did now, if ever, show an odd face 'Why certainly prodigious, or whatever Isn't that conceded?'

'No doubt every horror, at the pass we've come to, is conceded That's just what I complain of'

'Do you complain?'—she drew it out as for surprise she couldn't have imagined such a thing

'To me her things are awful They're the newest of the new'

'Ah, but the old forms!'

'Those are the most blatant I mean the swaggering reproductions'

'Oh but,' she pleaded, 'we can't all be really old'

'No, we can't, Cornelia But you can—!' said White-Mason with the frankest appreciation.

She looked up at him from where she sat as he could imagine her looking up at the curate at Bognor 'Thank you, sir! If that's all you want—!'

'It is,' he said, 'all I want—or almost.'

'Then no wonder such a creature as that,' she lightly moralised, 'won't suit you!'

He bent upon her, for all the weight of his question, his smoothest stare. 'You hold she certainly won't suit me?'

'Why, what can I tell about it? Haven't you by this time found out?'

'No, but I think I'm finding ' With which he began again to explore

Miss Rasch immensely wondered 'You mean you don't expect to come to an understanding with her?' And then as even to this straight challenge he made at first no answer 'Do you mean you give it up?'

He waited some instants more, but not meeting her eyes—only looking again about the room 'What do you think of my chance?'

'Oh,' his companion cried, 'what has what I think to do with it? How can I think anything but that she must like you?'

'Yes—of course But how much?'

'Then don't you really know?' Cornelia asked

He kept up his walk, oddly preoccupied and still not looking at her 'Do you, my dear?'

She waited a little 'If you haven't really put it to her I don't suppose she knows '

This at last arrested him again 'My dear Cornelia, she doesn't know—I'

He had paused as for the desperate tone, or at least the large emphasis of it, so that he took him up 'The more reason then to help her to find it out '

'I mean,' he explained, 'that she doesn't know anything '

'Anything?'

'Anything else, I mean—even if she does know that '

Cornelia considered of it 'But what else need she—in particular—know? Isn't that the principal thing?'

'Well'—and he resumed his circuit—'she doesn't know anything that we know But nothing,' he re-emphasised—'nothing whatever!'

'Well, can't she do without that?'

'Evidently she can—and evidently she does, beautifully But the question is whether I can!'

He had paused once more with his point—but she glared, poor Cornelia, with her wonder 'Surely if you know for yourself—I'

'Ah, it doesn't seem enough for me to know for myself! One wants a woman,' he argued—but still, in his prolonged tour, quite without his scowl—'to know for one, to know with one. That's what you do now,' he candidly put to her.

It made her again gape. 'Do you mean you want to marry me?'

He was so full of what he did mean, however, that he failed even to notice it 'She doesn't in the least know, for instance, how old I am '

'That's because you're so young!'

'Ah, there you are!'—and he turned off afresh and as if almost in disgust It left her visibly perplexed—though even the perplexed Cornelia was still the exceedingly pointed, but he had come to her aid after another turn 'Remember, please, that I'm pretty well as old as you '

She had all her point at least, while she bridled and blinked, for thus 'You're exactly a year and ten months older '

It checked him there for delight 'You remember my birthday?'

She twinkled indeed like some far-off light of home 'I remember every one's It's a little way I've always had—and that I've never lost '

He looked at her accomplishment, across the room, as at some striking, some charming phenomenon 'Well, that's the sort of thing I want!' All the ripe candour of his eyes confirmed it

What could she do therefore, she seemed to ask him, but repeat her question of a moment before?—which indeed presently she made up her mind to 'Do you want to marry me?'

It had this time better success—if the term may be felt in any degree to apply. All his candour, or more of it at least, was in his slow, mild, kind, considering head-shake. 'No, Cornelia—not to marry you '

His discrimination was a wonder, but since she was clearly treating him now as if everything about him was, so she could as exquisitely meet it 'Not at least,' she convulsively smiled, 'until you've honourably tried Mrs Worthingham. Don't you really mean to?' she gallantly insisted.

He waited again a little, then he brought out 'I'll tell you presently.' He came back, and as by still another mere glance over the room, to what seemed to him so much nearer. 'That table was old Twelfth-Street?'

'Everything here was '

'Oh, the pure blessings! With you, ah, with you, I haven't to wear a green shade' And he had retained meanwhile his small photograph, which he again showed himself 'Didn't we talk of Mary Cardew?'

'Why, do you remember it?' she marvelled to extravagance

'You make me You connect me with it You connect it with me' He liked to display to her this excellent use she thus had, the service she rendered 'There are so many connections—there will be so many I feel how, with you, they must all come up again for me in fact you're bringing them out already, just while I look at you, as fast as ever you can The fact that you knew every one—' he went on, yet as if there were more in that too than he could quite trust himself about

'Yes, I knew every one,' said Cornelia Rasch, but this time with perfect simplicity 'I knew, I imagine, more than you do—or more than you did'

It kept him there, it made him wonder with his eyes on her 'Things about them—our people'

'Our people Ours only now.'

Ah, such an interest as he felt in this—taking from her while, so far from scowling, he almost gaped, all it might mean! 'Ours indeed—and it's awfully good they are, or that we're still here for them! Nobody else is—nobody but you not a cat!'

'Well, I am a cat!' Cornelia grinned

'Do you mean you can tell me things—?' It was too beautiful to believe

'About what really was?' she artfully considered, holding him immensely now 'Well, unless they've come to you with time, unless you've learned—or found out'

'Oh,' he reassuringly cried—reassuringly, it most seemed, for himself—'nothing has come to me with time, everything has gone from me How can I find out now! What creature has an idea—?'

She threw up her hands with the shrug of old days—the sharp little shrug his sisters used to imitate and that she hadn't had to go to Europe for The only thing was that he blessed her for bringing it back. 'Ah, the ideas of people now—!'

'Yes, their ideas are certainly not about us' But he ruefully faced it 'We've none the less, however, to live with them'

'With their ideas—?' Cornelia questioned

'With them—these modern wonders, such as they are!' Then he went on. 'It must have been to help me you've come back'

She said nothing for an instant about that, only nodding instead at his photograph 'What has become of yours? I mean of her'

This time it made him turn pale 'You remember I have one?'

She kept her eyes on him 'In a "pork-pie" hat, with her hair in a long net That was so "smart" then, especially with one's skirt looped up, over one's hooped magenta petticoat, in little festoons, and a row of very big onyx beads over one's braided velvet sack—braided quite plain and very broad, don't you know?'

He smiled for her extraordinary possession of these things—she was as prompt as if she had had them before her 'Oh, rather—"don't I know?"' You wore brown velvet, and, on those remarkably small hands, funny gauntlets—like mine'

'Oh, do you remember? But like yours?' she wondered

'I mean like hers in my photograph' But he came back to the present picture 'This is better, however, for really showing her lovely head'

'Mary's head was a perfection!' Cornelia testified

'Yes—it was better than her heart'

'Ah, don't say that!' she pleaded 'You weren't fair'

'Don't you think I was fair?' It interested him immensely—and the more that he indeed mightn't have been, which he seemed somehow almost to hope

'She didn't think so—to the very end'

'She didn't?'—ah the right things Cornelia said to him! But before she could answer he was studying again closely the small faded face. 'No, she doesn't, she doesn't Oh, her charming sad eyes and the way they say that, across the years, straight into mine! But I don't know, I don't know!' White-Mason quite comfortably sighed

His companion appeared to appreciate this effect 'That's just the way you used to flirt with her, poor thing. Wouldn't you like to have it?' she asked.

'This—for my very own?' He looked up delighted 'I really may'

'Well, if you'll give me yours. We'll exchange'

'That's a charming idea We'll exchange But you must come and get it at my rooms—where you'll see my things'

For a little she made no answer—as if for some feeling Then she said 'You asked me just now why I've come back'

He stared as for the connection, after which with a smile 'Not to do that—?'

She waited briefly again, but with a queer little look 'I can do those things now, and—yes!—that's in a manner why I came,' she then said, 'because I knew of a sudden one day—knew as never before—that I was old'

'I see I see' He quite understood—she had notes that so struck him 'And how did you like it?' 20

She hesitated—she decided 'Well, if I liked it, it was on the principle perhaps on which some people like high game'

'High game—that's good!' he laughed. 'Ah, my dear, we're "high"'

She shook her head 'No, not you—yet I at any rate didn't want any more adventures,' Cornelia said

He showed their small relic again with assurance 'You wanted us Then here we are Oh how we can talk!—with all those things you know! You are an invention And you'll see there are things I know I shall turn up here—well, daily' 30

She took it in, but only after a moment answered 'There was something you said just now you'd tell me Don't you mean to try—?'

'Mrs Worthingham?' He drew from within his coat his pocket-book and carefully found a place in it for Mary Cardew's carte-de-visite, folding it together with deliberation over which he put it back Finally he spoke 'No—I've decided I can't—I don't want to' 40

Cornelia marvelled—or looked as if she did 'Not for all she has?'

'Yes—I know all she has But I also know all she hasn't And, as I told you, she herself doesn't—hasn't a glimmer of a suspicion of it, and never will have' 50

Cornelia magnanimously thought 'No—but she knows other things'

He shook his head as at the portentous heap of them 'Too many—too many And other indeed—so other! Do you know,' he went on, 'that it's as if you—by turning up for me—had brought that home to me'

'For you,' she candidly considered 'But what—since you can't marry me!—can you do with me?'

Well, he seemed to have it all. 'Everything I can live with you—just this way'

To illustrate which he dropped into the other chair by her fire, where, leaning back, he gazed at the flame 'I can't give you up It's very curious It has come over me as it did over you when you renounced Bognor. That's it—I know it at last, and I see one can like it I'm "high" You needn't deny it That's my taste I'm old' And in spite of the considerable glow there of her little household altar he said it without the scowl 1910

THE SENSE OF NEWPORT<sup>1</sup>

NEWPORT, on my finding myself back there, threatened me sharply, quite at first, with that predicament at which I have glanced in another connection or two—the felt condition of having known it too well and loved it too much for description or definition What was one to say about it except that one had been so affected, so distraught, and that discriminations and reasons were buried under the dust of use? There was a chance indeed that the breath of the long years (of the interval of absence, I mean) would have blown away this dust—and that, precisely, was what one was eager to see. To go out, to look about, to recover the sense, was accordingly to put the question, without delay, to the proof—and with the happy consequence, I think, of an escape from a grave discomfiture. The charm was there again, unmistakably, the little old strange, very simple charm—to be expressed, as a fine proposition, or to be given up, but the answer came in the fact that to have walked about for half an hour was to have felt the question clear away. It cleared away so conveniently, so blissfully, in the light of the benign little truth, that nothing had been less possible, even in the early, ingenuous, infatuated days, than to describe or define Newport. It had clearly had nothing about it to describe or define, so that one's fondness had fairly rested on this sweet oddity in it. One had only to look back to recognise that it had never condescended to give a scrap of reasoned account of itself (as a favourite of fortune and the haunt of the raffiné), it had simply lain there like a little bare, white, open hand, with slightly-parted fingers, for the observer with a presumed sense for hands to take or to leave. The observer with a real sense never failed to pay this image the tribute of quite tenderly grasping the hand, and even of raising it, delicately, to his lips, having no less, at the same time, the instinct of not shaking it too hard, and that above all of never putting it to any rough work.

Such had been from the first, under a chastened light and in a purple sea, the dainty isle of Aquidneck, which might have avoided the weak mistake of giving up its pretty native name and of becoming thereby as good as nameless—with an existence as Rhode Island practically monopolised by the State and a Newport identity borrowed at the best and applicable but to a corner. Does not this vagueness of condition, however, fitly symbolise the small virtual promontory, of which, superficially, nothing could be predicated but its sky and its sea and its sunsets? One views it as placed there, by some refinement in the scheme of nature, just as a touchstone of taste—with a beautiful little sense to be read into it by a few persons, and nothing at all to be made of it, as to its essence, by most others. I come back, for its essence, to that figure of the little white hand, with the gracefully-spread fingers and the fine grain of skin, even the dimples at the joints and the shell-like delicacy of the pink nails—all the charms in short that a little white hand may have. I see all the applications of the image—I see a special truth in each. It is the back of the hand, rising to the swell of the wrist, that is exposed—which is the way, I think, the true lover takes and admires it. He makes out in it, bending over it—or he used to in the old days—innumerable shy and subtle beauties, almost requiring, for justice, a magnifying-glass, and he winces at the sight of certain other obtruded ways of dealing with it. The touchstone of taste was indeed to operate, for the critical, the tender spirit, from the moment the pink palm was turned up on the chance of what might be 'in' it. For nine persons out of ten, among its visitors, its purchasers of sites and builders of (in the old parlance) cottages, there had never been anything in it at all—except of course an opportunity, an opportunity for escaping the summer heat of other places, for bathing, for boating, for riding and driving, and for many sorts of more or less expensive riot. The pink palm being empty, in other words, to their vision, they had begun, from far back, to put things into it, things of their own, and of all sorts, and of many ugly, and of more and more expensive, sorts, to fill it substantially, that is, with gold, the gold that they have ended by heaping up there to an amount so oddly out of proportion to the scale of nature and of space.

This process, one was immediately to perceive with that renewal of impression, this process of injection and elaboration, of creating the palpable pile, had been going on for years to such a tune that the face of nature was now as much obliterated as possible, and the original shy sweetness as much as possible bedizened and bedevilled all of which, moreover, might also at present be taken as having led, in turn, to the most unexpected climax, a matter of which I shall presently speak. The original shy sweetness, however, that range of effect which I have referred to as practically too latent and too modest for notation, had meanwhile had its votaries, the fond pedestrian minority, for whom the little white hand (to return for an instant to my figure, with which, as you see, I am charmed) had always been so full of treasures of its own as to discredit, from the point of view of taste, any attempt, from without, to stuff it fuller. Such attempts had, in the nature of the case, and from far back, been condemned to show for violations, violations of taste and discretion, to begin with—violations, more intimately, as the whole business became brisker, of a thousand delicate secret places, dear to the disinterested rambler, small, mild ‘points’ and promontories, far away little lonely, sandy coves, rock-set, lily-sheeted ponds, almost hidden, and shallow Arcadian summer-haunted valleys, with the sea just over some stony shoulder a whole world that called out to the long afternoons of youth, a world with its scale so measured and intended and happy, its detail so finished and pencilled and stippled (certainly for American detail!) that there comes back to me, across the many years, no better analogy for it than that of some fine foreground in an old ‘line’ engraving. There remained always a sense, of course, in which the superimpositions, the multiplied excrescences, were a tribute to the value of the place, where no such liberty was ever taken save exactly because (as even the most blundering builder would have claimed) it was all so beautiful, so solitary and so ‘sympathetic.’ And that indeed has been, thanks to the ‘pilers-on’ of gold, the fortune, the history of its beauty that it now bristles with the villas and palaces into which the cottages have all turned, and that these monuments of pecuniary power rise thick and close, precisely, in order that their occupants may constantly remark to each other, from the windows to the ‘grounds,’ and from house to house, that it is beautiful, it is solitary and sympathetic. The thing has been done, it is impossible not to perceive, with the best faith in the world—though not altogether with the best light, which is always so different a matter, and it is with the general consequence only, at the end of the story, that I find myself to-day concerned.

So much concerned I found myself, I profess, after I had taken in this fact of a very distinct general consequence, that the whole interest of the vision was quickened by it, and that when, in particular, on one of the last days of June, among the densely-arrayed villas, I had followed the beautiful ‘ocean drive’ to its uttermost reach and back without meeting either another vehicle or a single rider, let alone a single pedestrian, I recognised matter for the intellectual thrill that attests a social revolution foreseen and completed. The term I use may appear extravagant, but it was a fact, none the less, that I seemed to take full in my face, on this occasion, the cold stir of air produced when the whirligig of time has made one of its liveliest turns. It is always going, the whirligig, but its effect is so to blow up the dust that we must wait for it to stop a moment, as it now and then does with a pant of triumph, in order to see what it has been at. I saw, beyond all doubt, on the spot—and there came in, exactly, the thrill; I could remember far back enough to have seen it begin to blow all the artless buyers and builders and blunderers into their places, leaving them there for half a century or so of fond security, and then to see it, of a sudden, blow them quite out again, as with the happy consciousness of some new amusing use for them, some other game still to play with them. Thus acquaintance, as it practically had been, with the whole rounding of the circle (even though much of it from a distance), was tantamount to the sense of having sat out the drama, the social, the local, that of a real American period, from the rise to the fall of the curtain—always assuming that truth of the reached catastrophe or dénouement. How this climax or solution had been arrived at—that, clearly, for the spectator, would have been worth taking note of, but what he made of it I shall not glance at till I have shown him as first of all, on the spot, quite modestly giving in to mere primary beguilement. It had been certain in advance that he would find the whole picture overpainted, and the question could only be, at the best, of how much of the ancient surface would here and there glimmer through. The ancient surface had been the concern, as I have hinted, of the small fond minority, the comparatively few people for whom the lurking shy charm, all there, but all to be felt rather than published, did in fact constitute a surface. The question, as soon as one arrived, was of whether some ghost of that were recoverable.

There was always, to begin with, the Old Town—we used, before we had become

Old ourselves, to speak of it that way, in the manner of an allusion to Nuremberg or to Carcassonne, since it had been leading its little historic life for centuries (as we implied) before 'cottages' and house-agents were dreamed of. It was not that we had great illusions about it or great pretensions for it, we only thought it, without interference, very 'good of its kind,' and we had as to its being of that kind no doubt whatever. Would it still be of that kind, and what had the kind itself been?—these questions made one's heart beat faster as one went forth in search of it. Distinctly, if it had been of a kind it would still be of it, for the kind wouldn't at the worst or at the best (one scarce knew how to put it) have been worth changing so that the question for the restored absentee, who so palpitated with the sense of it, all hung, absolutely, on the validity of the past. One might well hold one's breath if the past, with the dear little blue distances in it, were in danger now of being given away. One might well pause before the possible indication that a cherished impression of youth had been but a figment of the mind. Fortunately, however, at Newport, and especially where the antiquities cluster, distances are short, and the note of reassurance awaited me almost round the first corner. One had been a hundred times right—for how was one to think of it all, as one went on, if one didn't think of it as Old? There played before one's eyes again, in fine, in that unmistakable silvery shimmer, a particular property of the local air, the exquisite law of the relative—the application of which, on the spot, is required to make even such places as Viterbo and Bagdad not seem new. One may sometimes be tired of the word, but anything that has succeeded in living long enough to become conscious of its note, is capable on occasion of making that note effectively sound. It will sound, we gather, if we listen for it, and the small silver whistle of the past, with its charming quaver of weak gayety, quite played the tune I asked of it up and down the tiny, sunny, empty Newport vistas, perspectives coming to a stop like the very short walks of very old ladies. What indeed but little very old ladies did they resemble, the little very old streets? with the same suggestion of present timidity and frugality of life, the same implication in their few folds of drab, of mourning, of muslin still mysteriously starched, the implication of no adventure at any time, however far back, that mightn't have been suitable to a lady.

The whole low promontory, in its wider and remoter measurements, is a region of jutting, tide-troubled 'points,' but we had admired the Old Town too for the emphasis of its peculiar point, the Point, a quarter distinguished, we considered, by a really refined interest. Here would have been my misadventure, if I was to have any—that of missing, on the grey page of to-day, the suggestive passages I remembered, but I was to find, to my satisfaction, that there was still no more mistaking their pleasant sense than there had ever been a quiet, mild water-side sense, not that of the bold, bluff outer sea, but one in which shores and strands and small coast things played the greater part, with overhanging back verandas, with little private wooden piers, with painted boat-houses and boats laid up, with still-water bathing (the very words, with their old, slightly prim discrimination, as of ladies and children jumping up and down, reach me across the years), with a wide-curving Bay and dim landward distances that melted into a mysterious, rich, superior, but quite disconnected and not at all permittedly patronising Providence. There were stories, anciently, for the Point—so prescribed a feature of it that one made them up, freely and handsomely, when they were not otherwise to be come by, though one was never quite sure if they ought most to apply to the rather blankly and grimly Colonial houses, fadedly drab at their richest and mainly, as the legend ran, appurtenant to that Quaker race whom Massachusetts and Connecticut had prehistorically cast forth and the great Roger Williams had handsomely welcomed, or to the other habitations, the felicitous cottages, with their galleries on the Bay and towards the sunset, their pleasure-boats at their little wharves, and the supposition, that clung to them, of their harbouring the less fashionable of the outer Great, but also the more cultivated and the more artistic. Everything was there still, as I say, and quite as much as anything the prolonged echo of that ingenuous old-time distinction. It was a marvel, no doubt, that the handful of light elements I have named should add up to any total deserving the name of picture, and if I must produce an explanation I seek it with a certain confidence in the sense of the secret enjoyed by that air for bathing or, as one figures, for dipping, the objects it deals with. It takes them uninteresting, but feels immediately what submersion can do for them, tips them in, keeps them down, holds them under, just for the proper length of time after which they come up, as I say, irradiating vague silver—the reflection of which I have perhaps here been trying to catch even to extravagance.

I did nothing, at any rate, all an autumn morning, but discover again how 'good' everything had been—positively better than one had ventured to suppose in one's care to make the allowance for one's young simplicity. Some things indeed, clearly, had been better than one knew, and now seemed to surpass any fair probability else why, for instance, should I have been quite awe-struck by the ancient State House that overlooks the ancient Parade?—an edifice ample, majestic, archaic, of the finest proportions and full of a certain public Dutch dignity, having brave, broad, high windows, in especial, the distinctness of whose innumerable square white-framed panes is the recall of some street view of Haarlem or Leyden. Here was the charming impression of a treasure of antiquity to the vague image of which, through the years, one hadn't done justice—any more than one had done it, positively, to three or four of the other old-time ornaments of the Parade (which, with its wide, cobbly, sleepy space, of those years, in the shadow of the State House, must have been much more of a Van der Heyden, or somebody of that sort, than one could have dreamed). There was a treasure of modernity to reckon with, in the form of one of the Commodores Perry (they are somehow much multiplied at Newport, and quite monumentally ubiquitous) engaged in his great naval act, but this was swept away in the general flood of justice to be done. I continued to do it all over the place, and I remember doing it next at a certain ample old-time house which used to unite with the still prettier and archaic Vernon, near it, to form an honourable pair. In this mild town-corner, where it was so indicated that the grass should be growing between the primitive paving-stones, and where indeed I honestly think it mainly is, amid whatever remains of them, ancient peace had appeared formerly to reign—though attended by the ghost of ancient war, inasmuch as these had indubitably been the haunts of our auxiliary French officers during the Revolution, and no self-respecting legend could fail to report that it was in the Vernon house Washington would have visited Rochambeau. There had hung about this structure, which is, architecturally speaking, all 'rusticated' and indefinable decency, the implication of an inward charm that refined even on its outward, and this was the tantalising message its clean, serious windows, never yet debased, struck me as still giving. But it was still (something told me) a question of not putting, anywhere, too many presumptions to the touch, so that my hand quitted the knocker when I was on the point of a tentative tap, and I fell back on the neighbour and mate, as to which there was un forgotten acquaintance to teach me certainty. Here, alas, cold change was installed, the place had become a public office—none of the 'artistic' super-civilised, no raffiné of them all, among the passing fanciers or collectors, having, strangely enough, marked it for his own. This mental appropriation it is, or it was a few months ago, really impossible not to make, at sight of its delightful hall and almost 'grand' staircase, its charming recessed, cup-boarded, window-seated parlours, of its general panelled amplitude and dignity the due taster of such things putting himself straight into possession on the spot, and, though wondering at the indifference and neglect, breathing thanks for the absence of positive ravage. For me there were special ghosts on the staircase, known voices in the brown old rooms—presences that one would have liked, however, to call a little to account. 'People don't do those things', people didn't let so clear a case—clear for sound curiosity—go like that, they didn't, somehow, even if they were only ghosts. But I thought too, as I turned away, of all the others of the foolish, or at least of the responsible, those who for so long have swarmed in the modern quarter and who make profession of the finer sense.

This impression had been disturbing, but it had served its purpose in reconstituting, with a touch, a link—in laying down again it had served its purpose in reconstituting, every inch of the train of association with the human, the social, personal Newport of what I may call the middle years. To go farther afield, to measure the length of the little old Avenue and tread again the little old cliff-walk, to hang over, from above, the little old white crescent of the principal bathing-sands, with the big pond, behind them, set in its stone-walled featureless fields, to do these things and many others, every one of them thus accompanied by the admission that all that had been had been little, was to feel dead and buried generations push off even the transparency of their shroud and get into motion for the peopling of a scene that a present posterity has outgrown. The company of the middle years, the so considerably prolonged formative, tentative, imaginative Newport time, hadn't outgrown it—this catastrophe was still to come, as it constitutes, precisely, the striking dramatic dénouement I have already referred to. American society—so far as that free mixture was to have arrived at cohesion—had for half a century taken its whole relation with the place seriously (which was by intention very gayly), it long remained, for its happiness, quite at one with this most favoured resort of its comparative innocence. In the attesting presence of all the constant elements, of natural conditions that have, after all, persisted more than changed, a hundred far-away passages of the extinct life and joy, and of the comparative innocence, came back to me with an inevitable grace. A glamour as of the flushed ends of beautiful old summers, making a quite rich medium, a red sunset haze, as it were, for a processional throng of charioteers and riders, fortunate folk, fortunate above all in their untouched good faith, adjourning from the pleasures of the day to those of the evening—this benignity in particular overspread the picture, hanging it there as the Newport aspect that most lived again. Those good people all could make discoveries within the frame itself—beginning of course to push it out, in all directions, so as sufficiently to enlarge it, as they fondly fancied, even for the experience of a sophisticated world. They danced and they drove and they rode, they dined and wined and dressed and flirted and yachted and polo'd and Casino'd, responding to the subtlest inventions of their age, on the old lawns and verandas I saw them gather, on the old shining sands I saw them gallop, past the low headlands I saw their white sails verily flash, and through the dusky old shrubberies came the light and sound of their feasts

10 It had all been in truth a history—for the imagination that could take it so, and when once that kindly stage was offered them it was a wonder how many figures and faces, how many names and voices, images and embodiments of youth mainly, and often of Beauty, and of felicity and fortune almost always, or of what then passed for such, pushed, under my eyes, in blurred gayety, to the front. Hadn't it been above all, in its 20 good faith, the Age of Beauties—the blessed age when it was so easy to be, 'on the Avenue,' a Beauty, and when it was so easy, not less, not to doubt of the unsurpassability of such as appeared there? It was through the fact that the whole scheme and opportunity satisfied them, the fact that the place was, as I say, good enough for them—it was through this that, with ingenuities and audacities and refinements of their own (some 30 of the more primitive of which are still touching to think of) they extended the boundaries of civilisation, and fairly taught themselves to believe they were doing it in the interest of nature. Beautiful the time when the Ocean Drive had been hailed at once as a triumph of civilisation and as a proof of the possible appeal of Scenery even to the dissipated. It was spoken of as of almost boundless extent—as one of the wonders
40 of the world, as indeed it does turn often, in the gloaming, to purple and gold, and as the small sea-coves then gleam on its edge like barbaric gems on a mantle. Yet if it was a question of waving the wand and of breathing again, till it stirred, on the quaintness of the old manners—I refer to those of the fifties, sixties, seventies, and don't exclude those of the eighties—it was most touching of all to go back to dimmest days, 50 days, such as now appear antediluvian, when ocean-drives, engineered by landscape artists and literally macadamized all the way, were still in the lap of time, when there was only an afternoon for the Fort, and another for the Beach, and another for the 'Boathouse'—inconceivable innocence!—and even the shortness of the Avenue seemed very long, and even its narrowness very wide, and even its shabbiness very promising for the future, and when, in fine, chariots and cavaliers took their course, across country, to Bateman's, by inelegant precarious tracts and returned, through the darkling void, with a sense of adventure and fatigue That, I can't but think, was the pure Newport time, the most perfectly guarded by a sense of margin and of mystery

It was the time of settled possession, and yet furthest removed from these blank days in which margin has been consumed and the palaces, on the sites but the other day beyond price, stare silently seaward, monuments to the blase state of their absent proprietors Purer still, however, I remind myself, was that stretch of years which I have reasons for thinking sacred, when the custom of seeking hibernation on the spot partly prevailed, when the local winter inherited something of the best social grace (as it liked at least to think) of the splendid summer, and when the strange sight might be seen of a considerable company of Americans, not gathered at a mere rest-cure, who confessed brazenly to not being in business Do I grossly exaggerate in saying that this company, candidly, quite excitedly self-conscious, as all companies not commercial, in America, may be pleasantly noted as being, formed, for the time of its persistence, an almost unprecedented small body—unprecedented in American conditions, a collection of the detached, the slightly disenchanted and casually disqualified, and yet of the resigned and contented, of the socially orthodox a handful of mild, oh delightfully mild, cosmopolites, united by three common circumstances, that of their having for the most part more or less lived in Europe, that of their sacrificing openly to the ivory idol whose name is leisure, and that, not least, of a formed critical habit These things had been felt as making them excrescences on the American surface, where nobody ever criticised, especially after the grand tour, and where the great black ebony god of business was the only one recognised So I see them, at all events, in fond memory, lasting as long as they could and finding no successors, and they are most embalmed for me, I confess, in that scented, somewhat tattered, but faintly spiced, wrapper of their various 'European' antecedents. I see them move about in the light of these, and I understand how it was thus that made them ask what would have become of them, and where in the world, the hard American world, they could have hibernated, how they could even, in the Season, have bowed their economic heads and lurked, if it hadn't been for Newport I think of that question as, in their reduced establishments, over their winter whist, under their private theatricals, and pending, constantly, their loan and their return of the Revue des Deux-Mondes, their main conversational note. I find myself in fact tenderly evoking them as special instances of the great—or perhaps I have a right only to say of the small—American complication, the state of one's having been so pierced, betimes, by the sharp outland dart as to be able ever afterwards but to move about, vaguely and helplessly, with the shaft still in one's side

Their nostalgia, however exquisite, was, I none the less gather, sterile, for they appear to have left no seed They must have died, some of them, in order to 'go back'—to go back, that is, to Paris If I make, at all events, too much of them, it is for their propriety as a delicate subjective value matching with the intrinsic Newport delicacy. They must have felt that they, obviously, notably, notoriously, did match—the proof of which was in the fact that to them alone, of the customary thousands, was the beauty of the good walk, over the lovely little land, revealed The customary thousands here, as throughout the United States, never set foot to earth—yet this had happened so, of old, to be the particular corner of their earth that made that adventure most possible At Newport, as the phrase was, in autumnal, in vernal hibernation, you could walk—failing which, in fact, you failed of impressions the most consolatory, and it is mainly to the far ends of the low, densely shrubbed and perfectly finished little headlands that I see our friends ramble as if to stretch fond arms across the sea There used to be distant places beyond Bateman's, or better still on the opposite isle of Conanicut, now blighted with ugly uses, where nursing a nostalgia on the sun-warmed rocks was almost as good as having none at all. So it was not only not our friends who had overloaded and overcrowded, but it was they at last, I infer, who gave way before that grossness. How should they have wished to leave seed only to be trampled by the white elephants?

The white elephants, as one may best call them, all cry and no wool, all house and no garden, make now, for three or four miles, a barely interrupted chain, and I dare say I think of them best, and of the distressful, inevitable waste they represent, as I recall the impression of a divine little drive, roundabout them and pretty well everywhere, taken, for renewal of acquaintance, while November was still mild. I sought another renewal, as I have intimated, in the vacant splendour of June, but the interesting evidence then only refined on that already gathered. The place itself, as man—and often, no doubt, alas, as woman, with her love of the immediate and contiguous—had taken it over, was more than ever, to the fancy, like some dim, simplified ghost of a small Greek island, where the clear walls of some pillared portico or pavilion, perched afar, looked like those of temples of the gods, and where Nature, deprived of that ease in merely massing herself on which ‘American scenery,’ as we lump it together, is too apt to depend for its effect, might have shown a piping shepherd on any hillside or attached a mythic image to any point of rocks. What an idea, originally, to have seen this miniature spot of earth, where the sea-nymphs on the curved sands, at the worst, might have chanted back to the shepherds, as a mere breeding-ground for white elephants! They look queer and conscious and lumpish—some of them, as with an air of the brandished proboscis, really grotesque—while their averted owners, roused from a witless dream, wonder what in the world is to be done with them. The answer to which, I think, can only be that there is absolutely nothing to be done, nothing but to let them stand there always, vast and blank, for reminder to those concerned of the prohibited degrees of witlessness, and of the peculiarly awkward vengeance of affronted proportion and discretion.

FROM THE WINGS OF THE DOVE

Sir Luke Strett

WHAT it really came to, on the morrow this first time—the time Kate went with her—was that the great man had, a little, to excuse himself, had, by a rare accident—for he kept his consulting-hours in general rigorously free—but ten minutes to give her, ten mere minutes which he yet placed at her service in a manner that she admired still more than she could meet it so crystal-clean the great empty cup of attention that he set between them on the table. He was presently to jump into his carriage, but he promptly made the point that he must see her again, see her within a day or two, and he named for her at once another hour—easing her off beautifully too even then in respect to her possibly failing of justice to her errand. The minutes affected her in fact as ebbing more swiftly than her little army of items could muster, and they would probably have gone without her doing much more than secure another hearing, hadn’t it been for her sense, at the last, that she had gained above all an impression. The impression—all the sharp growth of the final few moments—was neither more nor less than that she might make, of a sudden, in quite another world, another straight friend, and a friend who would moreover be, wonderfully, the most appointed, the most thoroughly adjusted of the whole collection, inasmuch as he would somehow wear the character scientifically, ponderably, proveably—not just loosely and sociably. Literally, furthermore, it wouldn’t really depend on herself, Sir Luke Strett’s friendship, in the least perhaps what made her most stammer and pant was its thus queerly coming over her that she might find she had interested him even beyond her intention, find she was in fact launched in some current that would lose itself in the sea of science. At the same time that she struggled, however, she also surrendered, there was a moment at which she almost dropped the form of stating, of explaining, and threw herself, without violence, only with a supreme pointless quaver that had turned the next instant to an intensity of interrogative stillness, upon his general good will. His large settled face, though firm, was not, as she had thought at first, hard, he looked, in the oddest manner, to her fancy, half like a general and half like a bishop, and she was soon sure that, within some such handsome range, what it would show her would be what was good, what was best for her. She had established, in other words, in this time-saving way, a relation with it, and the relation was the special trophy that, for the hour, she bore off. It was like an absolute possession, a new resource altogether, something done up in the softest silk and tucked away under the arm of memory. She hadn't had it when she went in, and she had it when she came out, she had it there under her cloak, but dissimulated, invisibly carried, when smiling, smiling, she again faced Kate Croy.

THESE puttings-off of the mask had finally quite become the form taken by their moments together, moments indeed not increasingly frequent and not prolonged, thanks to the consciousness of fatigue on Milly's side whenever, as she herself expressed it, she got out of harness. They flourished their masks, the independent pair, as they might have flourished Spanish fans, they smiled and sighed on removing them, but the gesture, the smiles, the sighs, strangely enough, might have been suspected the greatest reality in the business. Strangely enough, we say, for the volume of effusion in general would have been found by either on measurement to be scarce proportional to the paraphernalia of relief. It was when they called each other's attention to their ceasing to pretend, it was then that what they were keeping back was most in the air. There was a difference, no doubt, and mainly to Kate's advantage. Milly didn't quite see what her friend could keep back, was possessed of, in fine, that would be so subject to retention, whereas it was comparatively plain sailing for Kate that poor Milly had a treasure to hide. This was not the treasure of a shy, an abject affection—concealment, on that head, belonging to quite another phase of such states, it was much rather a principle of pride relatively bold and hard, a principle that played up like a fine steel spring at the lightest pressure of too near a footfall. Thus insuperably guarded was the truth about the girl's own conception of her validity, thus was a wondering pitying sister condemned wistfully to look at her from the far side of the moat she had dug round her tower. Certain aspects of the connexion of these young women show for us, such is the twilight that gathers about them, in the likeness of some dim scene in a Maeterlinck play, we have positively the image, in the delicate dusk, of the figures so associated and yet so opposed, so mutually watchful, that of the angular pale princess, ostrich-plumed, black-robed, hung about with amulets, reminders, relics, mainly seated, mainly still, and that of the upright restless slow-circling lady of her court who exchanges with her, across the black water streaked with evening gleams, fitful questions and answers. The upright lady, with thick dark braids down her back, drawing over the grass a more embroidered train, makes the whole circuit, and makes it again, and the broken talk, brief and sparingly allusive, seems more to cover than to free their sense. This is because, when it fairly comes to not having others to consider, they meet in an air that appears rather anxiously to wait for their words. Such an impression as that was in fact grave, and might be tragic, so that, plainly enough, systematically at last, they settled to a care of what they said.

FROM THE GOLDEN BOWL

The Pagoda Arrangement

It wasn't till many days had passed that the Princess began to accept the idea of having done, a little, something she was not always doing, or indeed that of having listened to any inward voice that spoke in a new tone. Yet these instinctive postponements of reflexion were the fruit, positively, of recognitions and perceptions already active, of the sense above all that she had made at a particular hour, made by the mere touch of her hand, a difference in the situation so long present to her as practically unattackable. This situation had been occupying for months and months the very centre of the garden of her life, but it had reared itself there like some strange tall tower of ivory, or perhaps rather some wonderful beautiful but outlandish pagoda, a structure plated with hard bright porcelain, coloured and figured and adorned at the overhanging eaves with silver bells that tinkled ever so charmingly when stirred by chance airs. She had walked round and round it—that was what she felt, she had carried on her existence in the space left her for circulation, a space that sometimes seemed ample and sometimes narrow looking up all the while at the fair structure that spread itself so amply and rose so high, but never quite making out as yet where she might have entered had she wished. She hadn't wished till now—such was the odd case, and what was doubtless equally odd besides was that though her raised eyes seemed to distinguish places that must serve from within, and especially far aloft, as apertures and outlooks, no door appeared to give access from her convenient garden level. The great decorated surface had remained consistently impenetrable and inscrutable. At present however, to her considering mind, it was as if she had ceased merely to circle and to scan the elevation, ceased so vaguely, so quite helplessly to stare and wonder she had caught herself distinctly in the act of pausing, then in that of lingering, and finally in that of stepping unprecedently near. The thing might have been, by the distance at which it kept her, a Mahometan mosque, with which no base heretic could take a liberty; there so hung about it the vision of putting off one's shoes to enter and even verily of one's paying with one's life if found there as an interloper. She hadn't certainly arrived at the conception of paying with her life for anything she might do, but it was nevertheless quite as if she had sounded with a tap or two one of the rare porcelain plates. She had knocked in short—though she could scarce have said whether for admission or for what, she had applied her hand to a cool smooth spot and had waited to see what would happen. Something had happened, it was as if a sound, at her touch, after a little, had come back to her from within, a sound sufficiently suggesting that her approach had been noted.

THE OTHER TWO

I

WAYTHORN, on the drawing-room hearth, waited for his wife to come down to dinner.

It was their first night under his own roof, and he was surprised at his thrill of boyish agitation. He was not so old, to be sure—his glass gave him little more than the five-and-thirty years to which his wife confessed—but he had fancied himself already in the temperate zone, yet here he was listening for her step with a tender sense of all it symbolised, with some old trail of verse about the garlanded nuptial door-posts floating through his enjoyment of the pleasant room and the good dinner just beyond it.

They had been hastily recalled from their honeymoon by the illness of Lily Haskett, the child of Mrs. Waythorn's first marriage. The little girl, at Waythorn's desire, had been transferred to his house on the day of her mother's wedding, and the doctor, on their arrival, broke the news that she was ill with typhoid, but declared that all the symptoms were favourable. Lily could show twelve years of unblemished health, and the case promised to be a light one. The nurse spoke as reassuringly, and after a moment of alarm Mrs. Waythorn had adjusted herself to the situation. She was very fond of Lily—her affection for the child had perhaps been her decisive charm in Waythorn's eyes—but she had the perfectly balanced nerves which her little girl had inherited, and no woman ever wasted less tissue in unproductive worry. Waythorn was therefore quite prepared to see her come in presently, a little late because of a last look at Lily, but as serene and well-appointed as if her good-night kiss had been laid on the brow of health. Her composure was restful to him, it acted as ballast to his somewhat unstable sensibilities. As he pictured her bending over the child's bed he thought how soothing her presence must be in illness: her very step would prognosticate recovery.

His own life had been a gray one, from temperament rather than circumstance, and he had been drawn to her by the unperturbed gaiety which kept her fresh and elastic at an age when most women's activities are growing either slack or febrile. He knew what was said about her, for, popular as she was, there had always been a faint undercurrent of detraction. When she had appeared in New York, nine or ten years earlier, as the pretty Mrs. Haskett whom Gus Varick had unearthed somewhere—was it in Pittsburgh or Utica?—society, while promptly accepting her, had reserved the right to cast a doubt on its own indiscriminate Enquiry, however, established her undoubted connection with a socially reigning family, and explained her recent divorce as the natural result of a runaway match at seventeen, and as nothing was known of Mr. Haskett it was easy to believe the worst of him.

Alice Haskett's remarriage with Gus Varick was a passport to the set whose recognition she coveted, and for a few years the Varicks were the most popular couple in town. Unfortunately the alliance was brief and stormy, and this time the husband had his champions. Still, even Varick's staunchest supporters admitted that he was not meant for matrimony, and Mrs. Varick's grievances were of a nature to bear the inspection of the New York courts. A New York divorce is in itself a diploma of virtue, and in the semi-widowhood of this second separation Mrs. Varick took on an air of sanctity, and was allowed to confide her wrongs to some of the most scrupulous ears in town. But when it was known that she was to marry Waythorn there was a momentary reaction. Her best friends would have preferred to see her remain in the rôle of the injured wife, which was as becoming to her as craze to a rosy complexion. True, a decent time had elapsed, and it was not even suggested that Waythorn had supplanted his predecessor. People shook their heads over him, however, and one grudging friend, to whom he affirmed that he took the step with his eyes open, replied oracularly: 'Yes—and with your ears shut.'

Waythorn could afford to smile at these innuendoes. In the Wall Street phrase, he had 'discounted' them. He knew that society has not yet adapted itself to the consequences of divorce, and that till the adaptation takes place every woman who uses the freedom the law accords her must be her own social justification. Waythorn had an amused confidence in his wife's ability to justify herself. His expectations were fulfilled, and before the wedding took place Alice Varick's group had rallied openly to her support. She took it all imperturbably. She had a way of surmounting obstacles without seeming to be aware of them, and Waythorn looked back with wonder at the trivialities over which he had worn his nerves thin. He had the sense of having found refuge in a richer, warmer nature than his own, and his satisfaction, at the moment, was humourously summed up in the thought that his wife, when she had done all she could for Lily, would not be ashamed to come down and enjoy a good dinner.

The anticipation of such enjoyment was not, however, the sentiment expressed by Mrs. Waythorn's charming face when she presently joined him. Though she had put on her most engaging teagown she had neglected to assume the smile that went with it, and Waythorn thought he had never seen her look so nearly worried.

'What is it?' he asked. 'Is anything wrong with Lily?'

'No, I've just been in and she's still sleeping,' Mrs. Waythorn hesitated. 'But something tiresome has happened.'

He had taken her two hands, and now perceived that he was crushing a paper between them.

'This letter?'

'Yes—Mr. Haskett has written—I mean his lawyer has written.'

Waythorn felt himself flush uncomfortably. He dropped his wife's hands.

'What about?'

'About seeing Lily. You know the courts—'

'Yes, yes,' he interrupted nervously.

Nothing was known about Haskett in New York. He was vaguely supposed to have remained in the outer darkness from which his wife had been rescued, and Waythorn was one of the few who were aware that he had given up his business in Utica and followed her to New York in order to be near his little girl. In the days of his wooing, Waythorn had often met Lily on the doorstep, rosy and smiling, on her way 'to see papa.'

'I am so sorry,' Mrs. Waythorn murmured

He roused himself 'What does he want?'

'He wants to see her. You know she goes to him once a week.'

'Well—he doesn't expect her to go to him now, does he?'

'No—he has heard of her illness, but he expects to come here.'

Mrs. Waythorn reddened under his gaze. They looked away from each other.

'I'm afraid he has the right. You'll see . . .' She made a proffer of the letter.

Waythorn moved away with a gesture of refusal. He stood staring about the softly lighted room, which a moment before had seemed so full of bridal intimacy.

'I'm so sorry,' she repeated. 'If Lily could have been moved—'

'That's out of the question,' he returned impatiently.

'I suppose so.'

Her lip was beginning to tremble, and he felt himself a brute.

'He must come, of course,' he said. 'When is—his day?'

'I'm afraid—to-morrow.'

'Very well. Send a note in the morning.'

The butler entered to announce dinner.

Waythorn turned to his wife. 'Come—you must be tired. It's beastly, but try to forget about it,' he said, drawing her hand through his arm.

'You're so good, dear. I'll try,' she whispered back.

Her face cleared at once, and as she looked at him across the flowers, between the rosy candle-shades, he saw her lips waver back into a smile.

'How pretty everything is!' she sighed luxuriously.

He turned to the butler. 'The champagne at once, please. Mrs. Waythorn is tired.'

In a moment or two their eyes met above the sparkling glasses. Her own were quite clear and untroubled. He saw that she had obeyed his injunction and forgotten.

II

Waythorn, the next morning, went down town earlier than usual. Haskett was not likely to come till the afternoon, but the instinct of flight drove him forth. He meant to stay away all day—he had thoughts of dining at his club. As his door closed behind him he reflected that before he opened it again it would have admitted another man who had as much right to enter it as himself, and the thought filled him with a physical repugnance.

He caught the 'elevated' at the employes' hour, and found himself crushed between two layers of pendulous humanity. At Eighth Street the man facing him wriggled out, and another took his place. Waythorn glanced up and saw that it was Gus Varick. The men were so close together that it was impossible to ignore the smile of recognition on Varick's handsome overblown face. And after all—why not? They had always been on good terms, and Varick had been divorced before Waythorn's attentions to his wife began. The two exchanged a word on the perennial grievance of the congested trains, and when a seat at their side was miraculously left empty the instinct of self-preservation made Waythorn slip into it after Varick.

The latter drew the stout man's breath of relief. 'Lord—I was beginning to feel like a pressed flower.' He leaned back, looking unconcernedly at Waythorn. 'Sorry to hear that Sellers is knocked out again.'

'Sellers?' echoed Waythorn, starting at his partner's name.

Varick looked surprised. 'You didn't know he was laid up with the gout?'

'No, I've been away—I only got back last night.' Waythorn felt himself reddening in anticipation of the other's smile.

'Ah—yes, to be sure. And Sellers's attack came on two days ago. I'm afraid he's pretty bad. Very awkward for me, as it happens, because he was just putting through a rather important thing for me.'

'Ah?' Waythorn wondered vaguely since when Varick had been dealing in 'important things.' Hitherto he had dabbled only in the shallow pools of speculation, with which Waythorn's office did not usually concern itself

It occurred to him that Varick might be talking at random, to relieve the strain of their propinquity. That strain was becoming momentarily more apparent to Waythorn, and when, at Cortlandt Street, he caught sight of an acquaintance and had a sudden vision of the picture he and Varick must present to an initiated eye, he jumped up with a muttered excuse

'I hope you'll find Sellers better,' said Varick civilly, and he stammered back 'If I can be of any use to you—' and let the departing crowd sweep him to the platform

At his office he heard that Sellers was in fact ill with the gout, and would probably not be able to leave the house for some weeks

'I'm sorry it should have happened so, Mr Waythorn,' the senior clerk said with affable significance 'Mr Sellers was very much upset at the idea of giving you such a lot of extra work just now'

'Oh, that's no matter,' said Waythorn hastily. He secretly welcomed the pressure of additional business, and was glad to think that, when the day's work was over, he would have to call at his partner's on the way home

He was late for luncheon, and turned in at the nearest restaurant instead of going to his club. The place was full, and the waiter hurried him to the back of the room to capture the only vacant table. In the cloud of cigar-smoke Waythorn did not at once distinguish his neighbours, but presently, looking about him, he saw Varick seated a few feet off. This time, luckily, they were too far apart for conversation, and Varick, who faced another way, had probably not even seen him, but there was an irony in their renewed nearness.

Varick was said to be fond of good living, and as Waythorn sat despatching his hurried luncheon he looked across half enviously at the other's leisurely degustation of his meal. When Waythorn first saw him he had been helping himself with critical deliberation to a bit of Camembert at the ideal point of liquefaction, and now, the cheese removed, he was just pouring his café double from its little two-storied earthen pot. He poured slowly, his ruddy profile bent above the task, and one beringed white hand steadying the lid of the coffee-pot, then he stretched his other hand to the decanter of cognac at his elbow, filled a liqueur-glass, took a tentative sip, and poured the brandy into his coffee-cup.

Waythorn watched him in a kind of fascination. What was he thinking of—only of the flavour of the coffee and the liqueur? Had the morning's meeting left no more trace in his thoughts than on his face? Had his wife so completely passed out of his life that even this odd encounter with her present husband, within a week after her remarriage, was no more than an incident in his day? And as Waythorn mused, another idea struck him. Had Haskett ever met Varick as Varick and he had just met? The recollection of Haskett perturbed him, and he rose and left the restaurant, taking a circuitous way out to escape the placid irony of Varick's nod.

It was after seven when Waythorn reached home. He thought the footman who opened the door looked at him oddly.

'How is Miss Lily?' he asked in haste.

'Doing very well, sir. A gentleman—'

'Tell Barlow to put off dinner for half an hour,' Waythorn cut him off, hurrying upstairs.

He went straight to his room and dressed without seeing his wife. When he reached the drawing-room she was there, fresh and radiant. Lily's day had been good, the doctor was not coming back that evening.

At dinner Waythorn told her of Sellers' illness and of the resulting complications. She listened sympathetically, adjuring him not to let himself be overworked, and asking vague feminine questions about the routine of the office. Then she gave him the chronicle of Lily's day, quoted the nurse and doctor, and told him who had called to inquire. He had never seen her more serene and unruffled. It struck him, with a curious pang, that she was very happy in being with him, so happy that she found a childish pleasure in rehearsing the trivial incidents of her day.

After dinner they went to the library, and the servant put the coffee and liqueurs on a low table before her and left the room. She looked singularly soft and girlish in her rosy pale dress, against the dark leather of one of his bachelor armchairs. A day earlier the contrast would have charmed him.

He turned away now, choosing a cigar with affected deliberation.

'Did Haskett come?' he asked, with his back to her

'Oh, yes—he came'

'You didn't see him, of course?'

She hesitated a moment 'I let the nurse see him'

That was all There was nothing more to ask He swung round toward her, applying a match to his cigar Well, the thing was over for a week, at any rate He would try not to think of it She looked up at him, a trifle rosier than usual, with a smile in her eyes

'Ready for your coffee, dear?'

He leaned against the mantelpiece, watching her as she lifted the coffee-pot The lamplight struck a gleam from her bracelets and tipped her soft hair with brightness How light and slender she was, and how each gesture flowed into the next! She seemed a creature all compact of harmonies As the thought of Haskett receded, Waythorn felt himself yielding again to the joy of possession They were his, those white hands with their flitting motions, his the light haze of hair, the lips and eyes

She set down the coffee-pot, and reaching for the decanter of cognac, measured off a liqueur-glass and poured it into his cup

Waythorn uttered a sudden exclamation.

'What is the matter?' she said, startled

'Nothing, only—I don't take cognac in my coffee'

'Oh, how stupid of me,' she cried

Their eyes met, and she blushed a sudden agonised red

III

Ten days later, Mr Sellers, still house-bound, asked Waythorn to call on his way down town

The senior partner, with his swaddled foot propped up by the fire, greeted his associate with an air of embarrassment

'I'm sorry, my dear fellow, I've got to ask you to do an awkward thing for me.'

Waythorn waited, and the other went on, after a pause apparently given to the arrangement of his phrases 'The fact is, when I was knocked out I had just gone into a rather complicated piece of business for—Gus Varick'

'Well?' said Waythorn, with an attempt to put him at his ease

'Well—it's this way Varick came to me the day before my attack. He had evidently had an inside tip from somebody, and had made about a hundred thousand He came to me for advice, and I suggested his going in with Vanderlyn'

'Oh, the deuce!' Waythorn exclaimed

He saw in a flash what had happened The investment was an alluring one, but required negotiation He listened quietly while Sellers put the case before him, and, the statement ended, he said 'You think I ought to see Varick?'

'I'm afraid I can't as yet The doctor is obdurate And this thing can't wait I hate to ask you, but no one else in the office knows the ins and outs of it'

Waythorn stood silent He did not care a farthing for the success of Varick's venture, but the honour of the office was to be considered, and he could hardly refuse to oblige his partner

'Very well,' he said, 'I'll do it'

That afternoon, apprised by telephone, Varick called at the office Waythorn, waiting in his private room, wondered what the others thought of it The newspapers, at the time of Mrs Waythorn's marriage, had acquainted their readers with every detail of her previous matrimonial ventures, and Waythorn could fancy the clerks smiling behind Varick's back as he was ushered in

Varick bore himself admirably He was easy without being undignified, and Waythorn was conscious of cutting a much less impressive figure Varick had no experience of business, and the talk prolonged itself for nearly an hour while Waythorn set forth with scrupulous precision the details of the proposed transaction

'I'm awfully obliged to you,' Varick said as he rose. 'The fact is I'm not used to having much money to look after, and I don't want to make an ass of myself—' He smiled, and Waythorn could not help noticing that there was something pleasant about his smile 'It feels uncommonly queer to have enough cash to pay one's bills I'd have sold my soul for it a few years ago!'

Waythorn winced at the allusion He had heard it rumoured that a lack of funds had been one of the determining causes of the Varick separation, but it did not occur to him that Varick's words were intentional. It seemed more likely that the desire to keep clear of embarrassing topics had fatally drawn him into one. Waythorn did not wish to be outdone in civility.

'We'll do the best we can for you,' he said. 'I think this is a good thing you're in.'

'Oh, I'm sure it's immense. It's awfully good of you—' Varick broke off, embarrassed. 'I suppose the thing's settled now—but if—'

'If anything happens before Sellers is about, I'll see you again,' said Waythorn quietly. He was glad, in the end, to appear the more self-possessed of the two.

The course of Lily's illness ran smooth, and as the days passed Waythorn grew used to the idea of Haskett's weekly visit. The first time the day came round, he stayed out late, and questioned his wife as to the visit on his return. She replied at once that Haskett had merely seen the nurse downstairs, as the doctor did not wish any one in the child's sick-room till after the crisis.

The following week Waythorn was again conscious of the recurrence of the day, but had forgotten it by the time he came home to dinner. The crisis of the disease came a few days later, with a rapid decline of fever, and the little girl was pronounced out of danger. In the rejoicing which ensued the thought of Haskett passed out of Waythorn's mind, and one afternoon, letting himself into the house with a latch-key, he went straight to his library without noticing a shabby hat and umbrella in the hall.

In the library he found a small effaced-looking man with a thinnish gray beard sitting on the edge of a chair. The stranger might have been a piano-tuner, or one of those mysteriously efficient persons who are summoned in emergencies to adjust some detail of the domestic machinery. He blinked at Waythorn through a pair of gold-rimmed spectacles and said mildly, 'Mr Waythorn, I presume? I am Lily's father.'

Waythorn flushed. 'Oh—' he stammered uncomfortably. He broke off, disliking to appear rude. Inwardly he was trying to adjust the actual Haskett to the image of him projected by his wife's reminiscences. Waythorn had been allowed to infer that Alice's first husband was a brute.

'I am sorry to intrude,' said Haskett, with his over-the-counter politeness.

'Don't mention it,' returned Waythorn, collecting himself. 'I suppose the nurse has been told?'

'I presume so. I can wait,' said Haskett. He had a resigned way of speaking, as though life had worn down his natural powers of resistance.

Waythorn stood on the threshold, nervously pulling off his gloves.

'I'm sorry you've been detained. I will send for the nurse,' he said, and as he opened the door he added with an effort: 'I'm glad we can give you a good report of Lily.' He winced as the we slipped out, but Haskett seemed not to notice it.

'Thank you, Mr Waythorn. It's been an anxious time for me.'

'Ah, well, that's past. Soon she'll be able to go to you.' Waythorn nodded and passed out.

In his own room he flung himself down with a groan. He hated the womanish sensibility which made him suffer so acutely from the grotesque chances of life. He had known when he married that his wife's former husbands were both living, and that amid the multiplied contacts of modern existence there were a thousand chances to one that he would run against one or the other, yet he found himself as much disturbed by his brief encounter with Haskett as though the law had not obligingly removed all difficulties in the way of their meeting.

Waythorn sprang up and began to pace the room nervously. He had not suffered half as much from his two meetings with Varick. It was Haskett's presence in his own house that made the situation so intolerable. He stood still, hearing steps in the passage.

'This way, please,' he heard the nurse say. Haskett was being taken upstairs, then, not a corner of the house but was open to him. Waythorn dropped into another chair, staring vaguely ahead of him. On his dressing-table stood a photograph of Alice, taken when he had first known her. She was Alice Varick then—how fine and exquisite he had thought her! Those were Varick's pearls about her neck. At Waythorn's instance they had been returned before her marriage. Had Haskett ever given her any trinkets—and what had become of them, Waythorn wondered? He realised suddenly that he knew very little of Haskett's past or present situation, but from the man's appearance and manner of speech he could reconstruct with curious precision the surroundings of Alice's first marriage. And it startled him to think that she had, in the background of her life, a phase of existence so different from anything with which he had connected her. Varick, whatever his faults, was a gentleman, in the conventional, traditional sense of the term the sense which at that moment seemed, oddly enough, to have most meaning to Waythorn. He and Varick had the same social habits, spoke the same language, understood the same allusions. But this other man . . . it was grotesquely uppermost in Waythorn's mind that Haskett had worn a made-up tie attached with an elastic. Why should that ridiculous detail symbolise the whole man? Waythorn was exasperated by his own paltriness, but the fact of the tie expanded, forced itself on him, became as it were the key to Alice's past. He could see her, as Mrs Haskett, sitting in a 'front parlour' furnished in plush, with a pianola, and a copy of Ben Hur on the centre-table. He could see her going to the theatre with Haskett—or perhaps even to a 'Church Sociable'—she in a 'picture hat' and Haskett in a black frock-coat, a little creased, with the made-up tie on an elastic. On the way home they would stop and look at the illuminated shop-windows, lingering over the photographs of New York actresses. On Sunday afternoons Haskett would take her for a walk, pushing Lily ahead of them in a white enamelled perambulator, and Waythorn had a vision of the people they would stop and talk to. He could fancy how pretty Alice must have looked, in a dress adroitly constructed from the hints of a New York fashion-paper, and how she must have looked down on the other women chafing at her life, and secretly feeling that she belonged in a bigger place.

For the moment his foremost thought was one of wonder at the way in which she had shed the phase of existence which her marriage with Haskett implied. It was as if her whole aspect, every gesture, every inflection, every allusion, were a studied negation of that period of her life. If she had denied being married to Haskett she could hardly have stood more convicted of duplicity than in this obliteration of the self which had been his wife.

Waythorn started up, checking himself in the analysis of her motives. What right had he to create a fantastic effigy of her and then pass judgment on it? She had spoken vaguely of her first marriage as unhappy, had hinted, with becoming reticence, that Haskett had wrought havoc among her young illusions. . . . It was a pity for Waythorn's peace of mind that Haskett's very inoffensiveness shed a new light on the nature of those illusions. A man would rather think that his wife has been brutalised by her first husband than that the process has been reversed.

IV

'Mr Waythorn, I don't like that French governess of Lily's.'

Haskett, subdued and apologetic, stood before Waythorn in the library, revolving his shabby hat in his hand.

Waythorn, surprised in his armchair over the evening paper, stared back perplexedly at his visitor.

'You'll excuse my asking to see you,' Haskett continued. 'But this is my last visit, and I thought if I could have a word with you it would be a better way than writing to Mrs Waythorn's lawyer.'

Waythorn rose uneasily. He did not like the French governess either, but that was irrelevant.

'I am not so sure of that,' he returned stiffly, 'but since you wish it I will give your message to—my wife.' He always hesitated over the possessive pronoun in addressing Haskett.

The latter sighed. 'I don't know as that will help much. She didn't like it when I spoke to her.'

Waythorn turned red. 'When did you see her?' he asked.

'Not since the first day I came to see Lily—right after she was taken sick. I remarked to her then that I didn't like the governess.'

Waythorn made no answer. He remembered distinctly that, after that first visit, he had asked his wife if she had seen Haskett. She had lied to him then, but she had respected his wishes since, and the incident cast a curious light on her character. He was sure she would not have seen Haskett that first day if she had divined that Waythorn would object, and the fact that she did not divine it was almost as disagreeable to the latter as the discovery that she had lied to him.

'I don't like the woman,' Haskett was repeating with mild persistency 'She ain't straight, Mr. Waythorn—she'll teach the child to be underhand. I've noticed a change in Lily—she's too anxious to please—and she don't always tell the truth. She used to be the straightest child, Mr. Waythorn—' He broke off, his voice a little thick 'Not but what I want her to have a stylish education,' he ended.

Waythorn was touched 'I'm sorry, Mr. Haskett, but frankly, I don't quite see what I can do.'

Haskett hesitated. Then he laid his hat on the table, and advanced to the hearth-rug, on which Waythorn was standing. There was nothing aggressive in his manner, but he had the solemnity of a timid man resolved on a decisive measure.

'There's just one thing you can do, Mr. Waythorn,' he said 'You can remind Mrs. Waythorn that, by the decree of the courts, I am entitled to have a voice in Lily's bringing up.' He paused, and went on more deprecatingly. 'I'm not the kind to talk about enforcing my rights, Mr. Waythorn. I don't know as I think a man is entitled to rights he hasn't known how to hold on to, but this business of the child is different. I've never let go there—and I never mean to.'

The scene left Waythorn deeply shaken. Shamefacedly, in indirect ways, he had been finding out about Haskett, and all that he had learned was favourable. The little man, in order to be near his daughter, had sold out his share in a profitable business in Utica, and accepted a modest clerkship in a New York manufacturing house. He boarded in a shabby street and had few acquaintances. His passion for Lily filled his life. Waythorn felt that this exploration of Haskett was like groping about with a dark-lantern in his wife's past, but he saw now that there were recesses his lantern had not explored. He had never enquired into the exact circumstances of his wife's first matrimonial rupture. On the surface all had been fair. It was she who had obtained the divorce, and the court had given her the child. But Waythorn knew how many ambiguities such a verdict might cover. The mere fact that Haskett retained a right over his daughter implied an unsuspected compromise. Waythorn was an idealist. He always refused to recognise unpleasant contingencies till he found himself confronted with them, and then he saw them followed by a spectral train of consequences. His next days were thus haunted, and he determined to try to lay the ghosts by conjuring them up in his wife's presence.

When he repeated Haskett's request a flame of anger passed over her face, but she subdued it instantly and spoke with a slight quiver of outraged motherhood.

'It is very ungentlemanly of him,' she said.

The word grated on Waythorn. 'That is neither here nor there. It's a bare question of rights.'

She murmured 'It's not as if he could ever be a help to Lily—'

Waythorn flushed. This was even less to his taste. 'The question is,' he repeated, 'what authority has he over her?'

She looked downward, twisting herself a little in her seat. 'I am willing to see him—I thought you objected,' she faltered.

In a flash he understood that she knew the extent of Haskett's claims. Perhaps it was not the first time she had resisted them.

'My objecting has nothing to do with it,' he said coldly, 'if Haskett has a right to be consulted you must consult him.'

She burst into tears, and he saw that she expected him to regard her as a victim.

Haskett did not abuse his rights. Waythorn had felt miserably sure that he would not. But the governess was dismissed, and from time to time the little man demanded an interview with Alice. After the first outburst she accepted the situation with her usual adaptability. Haskett had once reminded Waythorn of the piano-tuner, and Mrs. Waythorn, after a month or two, appeared to class him with that domestic familiar. Waythorn could not but respect the father's tenacity. At first he had tried to cultivate the suspicion that Haskett might be 'up to' something, that he had an object in securing a foothold in the house. But in his heart Waythorn was sure of Haskett's single-mindedness, he even guessed in the latter a mild contempt for such advantages as his relation with the Waythorns might offer. Haskett's sincerity of purpose made him invulnerable, and his successor had to accept him as a lien on the property.

Mr Sellers was sent to Europe to recover from his gout, and Varick's affairs hung on Waythorn's hands. The negotiations were prolonged and complicated, they necessitated frequent conferences between the two men, and the interests of the firm forbade Waythorn's suggesting that his client should transfer his business to another office.

Varick appeared well in the transaction. In moments of relaxation his coarse streak appeared, and Waythorn dreaded his geniality, but in the office he was concise and clear-headed, with a flattering deference to Waythorn's judgment. Their business relations being so affably established, it would have been absurd for the two men to ignore each other in society. The first time they met in a drawing-room, Varick took up their intercourse in the same easy key, and his hostess's grateful glance obliged Waythorn to respond to it. After that they ran across each other frequently, and one evening at a ball Waythorn, wandering through the remoter rooms, came upon Varick seated beside his wife. She coloured a little, and faltered in what she was saying, but Varick nodded to Waythorn without rising, and the latter strolled on.

In the carriage, on the way home, he broke out nervously. 'I didn't know you spoke to Varick.'

Her voice trembled a little. 'It's the first time—he happened to be standing near me, I didn't know what to do. It's so awkward, meeting everywhere—and he said you had been very kind about some business.'

'That's different,' said Waythorn.

She paused a moment. 'I'll do just as you wish,' she returned pliantly. 'I thought it would be less awkward to speak to him when we meet.'

Her pliancy was beginning to sicken him. Had she really no will of her own—no theory about her relation to these men? She had accepted Haskett—did she mean to accept Varick? It was 'less awkward,' as she had said, and her instinct was to evade difficulties or to circumvent them. With sudden vividness Waythorn saw how the instinct had developed. She was 'as easy as an old shoe'—a shoe that too many feet had worn. Her elasticity was the result of tension in too many different directions. Alice Haskett—Alice Varick—Alice Waythorn—she had been each in turn, and had left hanging to each name a little of her privacy, a little of her personality, a little of the inmost self where the unknown god abides.

'Yes—it's better to speak to Varick,' said Waythorn wearily.

The winter wore on, and society took advantage of the Waythorns' acceptance of Varick. Harassed hostesses were grateful to them for bridging over a social difficulty, and Mrs Waythorn was held up as a miracle of good taste. Some experimental spirits could not resist the diversion of throwing Varick and his former wife together, and there were those who thought he found a zest in the propinquity. But Mrs Waythorn's conduct remained irreproachable. She neither avoided Varick nor sought him out. Even Waythorn could not but admit that she had discovered the solution of the newest social problem.

He had married her without giving much thought to that problem. He had fancied that a woman can shed her past like a man. But now he saw that Alice was bound to hers both by the circumstances which forced her into continued relation with it, and by the traces it had left on her nature. With grim irony Waythorn compared himself to a member of a syndicate. He held so many shares in his wife's personality and his predecessors were his partners in the business. If there had been any element of passion in the transaction he would have felt less deteriorated by it. The fact that Alice took her change of husbands like a change of weather reduced the situation to mediocrity. He could have forgiven her for blunders, for excesses, for resisting Haskett, for yielding to Varick, for anything but her acquiescence and her tact. She reminded him of a juggler tossing knives; but the knives were blunt and she knew they would never cut her.

And then, gradually, habit formed a protecting surface for his sensibilities. If he paid for each day's comfort with the small change of his illusions, he grew daily to value the comfort more and set less store upon the coin. He had drifted into a dulling propinquity with Haskett and Varick and he took refuge in the cheap revenge of satirising the situation. He even began to reckon up the advantages which accrued from it, to ask himself if it were not better to own a third of a wife who knew how to make a man happy than a whole one who had lacked opportunity to acquire the art. For it was an art, and made up, like all others, of concessions, eliminations and embellishments, of lights judiciously thrown and shadows skilfully softened. His wife knew exactly how to manage the lights, and he knew exactly to what training she owed her skill. He even tried to trace the source of his obligations, to discriminate between the influences which had combined to produce his domestic happiness: he perceived that Haskett's commonness had made Alice worship good breeding, while Varick's liberal construction of the marriage bond had taught her to value the conjugal virtues, so that he was directly indebted to his predecessors for the devotion which made his life easy if not inspiring.

From this phase he passed into that of complete acceptance. He ceased to satirise himself because time dulled the irony of the situation and the joke lost its humour with its sting. Even the sight of Haskett's hat on the hall table had ceased to touch the springs of epigram. The hat was often seen there now, for it had been decided that it was better for Lily's father to visit her than for the little girl to go to his boarding-house. Waythorn, having acquiesced in this arrangement, had been surprised to find how little difference it made. Haskett was never obtrusive, and the few visitors who met him on the stairs were unaware of his identity. Waythorn did not know how often he saw Alice, but with himself Haskett was seldom in contact.

One afternoon, however, he learned on entering that Lily's father was waiting to see him. In the library he found Haskett occupying a chair in his usual provisional way. Waythorn always felt grateful to him for not leaning back.

'I hope you'll excuse me, Mr. Waythorn,' he said rising. 'I wanted to see Mrs. Way-thorn about Lily, and your man asked me to wait here till she came in.'

'Of course,' said Waythorn, remembering that a sudden leak had that morning given over the drawing-room to the plumbers.

He opened his cigar-case and held it out to his visitor, and Haskett's acceptance seemed to mark a fresh stage in their intercourse. The spring evening was chilly, and Waythorn invited his guest to draw up his chair to the fire. He meant to find an excuse to leave Haskett in a moment, but he was tired and cold, and after all the little man no longer jarred on him.

The two were enclosed in the intimacy of their blended cigar-smoke when the door opened and Varick walked into the room. Waythorn rose abruptly. It was the first time that Varick had come to the house, and the surprise of seeing him, combined with the singular inopportune-ness of his arrival, gave a new edge to Waythorn's blunted sensibilities. He stared at his visitor without speaking.

Varick seemed too preoccupied to notice his host's embarrassment.

'My dear fellow,' he exclaimed in his most expansive tone, 'I must apologise for tumbling in on you in this way, but I was too late to catch you down town, and so I thought—'

He stopped short, catching sight of Haskett, and his sanguine colour deepened to a flush which spread vividly under his scant blond hair. But in a moment he recovered himself and nodded slightly. Haskett returned the bow in silence, and Waythorn was still groping for speech when the footman came in carrying a tea-table.

The intrusion offered a welcome vent to Waythorn's nerves. 'What the deuce are you bringing this here for?' he said sharply.

'I beg your pardon, sir, but the plumbers are still in the drawing-room, and Mrs. Waythorn said she would have tea in the library.' The footman's perfectly respectful tone implied a reflection on Waythorn's reasonableness.

'Oh, very well,' said the latter resignedly, and the footman proceeded to open the folding tea-table and set out its complicated appointments. While this interminable process continued the three men stood motionless, watching it with a fascinated stare, till Waythorn, to break the silence, said to Varick 'Won't you have a cigar?'

He held out the case he had just tendered to Haskett, and Varick helped himself with a smile. Waythorn looked about for a match, and finding none, proffered a light from his own cigar. Haskett, in the background, held his ground mildly, examining his cigar-tip now and then, and stepping forward at the right moment to knock its ashes into the fire.

The footman at last withdrew, and Varick immediately began 'If I could just say half a word to you about this business—'

'Certainly,' stammered Waythorn, 'in the dining-room—'

But as he placed his hand on the door it opened from without, and his wife appeared on the threshold.

She came in fresh and smiling, in her street dress and hat, shedding a fragrance from the boa which she loosened in advancing.

'Shall we have tea in here, dear?' she began, and then she caught sight of Varick. Her smile deepened, veiling a slight tremor of surprise.

'Why, how do you do?' she said with a distinct note of pleasure.

As she shook hands with Varick she saw Haskett standing behind him. Her smile faded for a moment, but she recalled it quickly, with a scarcely perceptible side-glance at Waythorn.

'How do you do, Mr. Haskett?' she said, and shook hands with him a shade less cordially.

The three men stood awkwardly before her, till Varick, always the most self-possessed, dashed into an explanatory phrase.

'We—I had to see Waythorn a moment on business,' he stammered, brick-red from chin to nose.

Haskett stepped forward with his air of mild obstinacy. 'I am sorry to intrude, but you appointed five o'clock—' he directed his resigned glance to the time-piece on the mantel.

She swept aside their embarrassment with a charming gesture of hospitality.

'I'm so sorry—I'm always late, but the afternoon was so lovely.' She stood drawing off her gloves, propitiatory and graceful, diffusing about her a sense of ease and familiarity in which the situation lost its grotesqueness. 'But before talking business,' she added brightly, 'I'm sure every one wants a cup of tea.'

She dropped into her low chair by the tea-table, and the two visitors, as if drawn by her smile, advanced to receive the cups she held out.

She glanced about for Waythorn, and he took the third cup with a laugh.

OF all Matthew Arnold's books I sometimes think that not the least precious is the slender posthumous volume published by his daughter in 1902. It was long his habit to carry in his pocket a narrow diary in which he jotted down engagements for the day, mingled with short quotations from the books he was reading to serve as amulets, so to speak, against the importunities of business. The quotations for a selection of years printed by Mrs. Wodehouse from these Notebooks form what might be called the critic's breviary. Here, if anywhere, we seem to feel the very beating of the critic's heart, and to catch the inner voice of recollection and duty, corresponding to the poet's 'gleam,' which he followed so devoutly in his life. I do not know to what absorbing interest in what might be called the problem of æsthetic psychology,—which is indeed no more than a late-born offspring of the romantic heresy of art for art's sake. For this old-fashioned note I offer no apology, I am utterly convinced that literature divorced from life is an empty pursuit, and that an honest search for the meaning of life must lead to the simple faith of theism.' More, Selected Essays (N. Y., 1935), xli-xlii.

work in English to liken it unless it be the notebooks containing quotations from Marcus Aurelius and Epictetus written down by the author of the Characteristics with his comments, which Dr Rand edited in 1900 as the Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury.

Nor is it mere chance that Matthew Arnold and Shaftesbury should have left for posthumous publication these private memoranda, which with all their differences of form and substance are in their final impression upon the mind so curiously alike; for the two men themselves, in their outlook on life and in their relation to their respective ages, had much in common, and there is perhaps no better way to reach a dispassionate understanding of the virtue and limitations of criticism than by comparing Arnold with his great forerunner of the early eighteenth century. Both men were essentially critical in their mental habit, and both magnified the critic's office. 'I take upon me,' said Shaftesbury, 'absolutely to condemn the fashionable and prevailing custom of inveighing against critics as the common enemies, the pests and incendiaries of the commonwealth of Wit and Letters. I assert, on the contrary, that they are the props and pillars of this building, and that without the encouragement and propagation of such a race, we should remain as Gothic architects as ever.' And the purpose of Shaftesbury in upholding the function of criticism was much the same as Arnold's, he too was offended by the Gothic and barbarous self-complacency of his contemporaries—the Philistines, as he might have called them. As Arnold protested that the work of the English romantic revival was doomed 'to prove hardly more lasting than the productions of far less splendid epochs', that Byron was 'empty of matter,' Shelley 'incoherent,' and Wordsworth 'wanting in completeness and variety,' just because they lacked critical background, so his predecessor censured the literature of his day. 'An English author would be all genius,' says Shaftesbury. 'He would reap the fruits of art, but without study, pains, or application. He thinks it necessary, indeed (lest his learning should be called in question), to show the world that he errs knowingly against the rules of art.'

Against this presumption of genius on the one hand and the self-complacency of Philistinism on the other, both critics took up the same weapons—the barbs of ridicule and irony. With Shaftesbury this method was an avowed creed. His essays are no more than sermons on two texts: that of Horace, 'Ridiculum acri Fortius et melius magnas plerumque secat res—a jest often decides weighty matters better and more forcibly than can asperity'; and the saying of Gorgias Leontinus, which he misinterprets and expands for his own purpose, 'That humour was the only test of gravity; and gravity of humour. For a subject which would not bear raillery was suspicious, and a jest which would not bear a serious examination was certainly false wit.' With this touchstone of truth he proceeds to test the one-sided enthusiasm of his day, the smirking conceits, the pedantic pretensions, and the narrow dogmas whether of science or religion. 'There is a great difference,' he says, 'between seeking how to raise a laugh from everything, and seeking in everything what justly may be laughed at. For nothing is ridiculous except what is deformed, nor is anything proof against raillery except what is handsome and just.' The comic spirit is thus a kind of purgation of taste, and a way of return to nature. How deliberately Matthew Arnold used this weapon of ridicule in the service of sweet reasonableness, which is only his modern phrase, a little sentimentalised, for eighteenth-century nature, how magisterially he raised the laugh against his enemies, the bishops and the great austere toilers of the press and the mighty men of political Philistia, no one needs be told who has enjoyed the elaborate irony of Culture and Anarchy or of Friendship's Garland.

Sweet reasonableness, or 'sweetness and light,' to use the phrase as Arnold took it from Swift's Battle of the Books, is, I have suggested, little more than the modern turn for the deist's nature and reason; how nearly the two ideals approach each other you may see by comparing the 'good-breeding,' which is the aim of Shaftesbury's philosophy, with the 'culture' which is the end of Arnold's criticism. 'To philosophise,' said the former, 'in a just signification, is but to carry good-breeding a step higher. For the accomplishment of breeding is, to learn whatever is decent in company or beautiful in arts, and the sum of philosophy is, to learn what is just in society and beautiful in Nature and the order of the world ' I have wondered sometimes whether Matthew Arnold had these words in mind when he formulated his definition of culture, whether his famous command is really but another echo from the ancient quarrel of the deists. The whole scope of the essay on Sweetness and Light is, he avows, 'to recommend culture as the great help out of our present difficulties, culture being a pursuit of our total perfection by means of getting to know, on all the matters which most concern us, the best which has been thought and said in the world [Shaftesbury, too, like Arnold, is insistent on the exemplaria Græca], and through this knowledge, turning a stream of fresh and free thought upon our stock notions and habits '

There is, I trust, something more than a pedantic curiosity in such a parallel, which might yet be much prolonged, between the author of Culture and Anarchy and the author of the Characteristics. It proves, if proof be necessary, more clearly than would any amount of direct exposition, that Matthew Arnold's method of criticism was not an isolated product of the nineteenth century, but that he belongs to one of the great families of human intelligence, which begins with Cicero, the father of them all, and passes through Erasmus and Boileau and Shaftesbury and Sainte-Beuve. These are the exemplars—not complete individually, I need not say—of what may be called the critical spirit: discriminators between the false and the true, the deformed and the normal, preachers of harmony and proportion and order, prophets of the religion of taste. If they deal much with the criticism of literature, this is because in literature more manifestly than anywhere else life displays its infinitely varied motives and results, and their practice is always to render literature itself more consciously a criticism of life. The past is the field out of which they draw their examples of what is in conformity with nature and of what departs from that norm. In that field they balance and weigh and measure, they are by intellect hesitators, but at heart very much in earnest.

These critics are sometimes contrasted to their detriment with the so-called creative writers, yet they themselves stood each among the first writers of his day, and it is not plain that, for instance, Tennyson, in any true estimation, added more to the intellectual life of the world than Matthew Arnold, or Lucretius than Cicero, though their method and aim may have been different. The more significant comparison at least is not with the so-called creative writers, but with the great fulminators of new creeds—between Matthew Arnold and the Carlyles and Ruskins and Huxleys of his day, between Shaftesbury and, let us say, Rousseau, Boileau and Descartes, Erasmus and Luther, Cicero and St Paul. Such a contrast might seem at first to lie as much in efficiency as in quality. In the very nature of things the man who seizes on one deep-reaching idea, whether newly found or rediscovered, and with single-hearted fervour forces it upon the world, might appear to have the advantage in power over the man of critical temper, who weighs and refines, who is for ever checking the enthusiasm of the living by the authority of the dead, and whose doctrine, even though in the end he may assert it with sovereign contempt of doubters, is still the command to follow the well-tried path of common-sense. Better the half-truth that makes for action and jostles the world out of its ruts, men cry, than such a timid search for the whole truth as paralyses the will, and may after all prove only an exchange of depth for breadth. That might appear to be the plain lesson of history, yet I am not so sure. Is there not a possibility that in our estimate of these powers we are a little betrayed by the tumult of the times, just as we are prone in other things to mistake bustle for movement? The critical spirit, as it has been exercised, may have its limitations and may justly be open to censure, but I doubt if its true reproach will turn out in the end to be a lack of efficiency in comparison with the more assertive force of the reformers. I am inclined to believe, for instance, that the balancing spirit of Erasmus is really more at work among us to-day than that of the dogmatic and reforming Luther, that Cicero's philosophy, though they would gape to hear it said, is really more in the hearts of the men you will meet in the street than is the theology of St Paul. This may be in part because the representatives of the critical spirit, by their very lack of warping originality and by their endeavour to separate the true from the false, the complete from the one-sided, stand with the great conservative forces of human nature, having their fame certified by the things that endure amid all the betrayals of time and fashion

I know the deductions that must be made from that kind of fame. Cicero, it will be said, when in his De Finibus he brought together the various experiences of antiquity in regard to the meaning and values of life, weighing the claims of Stoic and Epicurean and the others, may have stood for something more comprehensive and balanced than did St. Paul with his new dogma of justification by faith. Yet St. Paul's theory of justification by faith, though it may be losing for us its cogent veracity, was the immediate driving force of history and a power that remade the world, while Cicero's nice discussions remained a luxury of the learned few. In one sense that is indisputably true, and yet, imprudent as it may sound, I question whether it is the whole truth. When I consider the part played by Stoic and Epicurean philosophies in the Renaissance and the transcendent influence of Cicero's dissertations upon the men of that day, when I consider that the impulse of Deism in the eighteenth century, as seen in Shaftesbury and his successors, was at bottom little more than a revival of this same Stoicism, as it had been subdued to the emotions by Cicero and mixed with Epicureanism, that Shaftesbury was, in fact, despite his worship of Epictetus, almost a pure Ciceronian, and when I consider that out of Deism sprang the dominant religion and social philosophy of our present world—when I consider these and many other facts, I question whether Cicero, while he certainly represents what is more enduring, has not been also, actually and personally, as dynamic an influence in civilisation as St. Paul, though the noise, no doubt, and the tumult have been around the latter.

We are still too near Matthew Arnold's day to determine the resultant of all the forces then at work, yet it would not be very rash even now to assert that his critical essays will be found in the end a broader and more lasting, as they are a saner, influence than the exaggerated æstheticism of Ruskin or the shrill prophesying of Carlyle or the scientific dogmatism of Huxley. No, if there is any deduction to be made to the value of criticism, it is not on the side of efficiency. It is well to remember Matthew Arnold's own words. 'Violent indignation with the past,' he says, 'abstract systems of renovation applied wholesale, a new doctrine drawn up in black and white for elaborating down to the very smallest details a rational society for the future—these are the ways of Jacobinism. . . Culture [it is his word here for criticism] is always assigning to system-makers and systems a smaller share in the bent of human destiny than their friends like.'

Perhaps it is a secret inkling of this vanity of the critic in its widest bearing, besides a natural antagonism of temper, that leads so many to carp against him and his trade. The inveterate hostility of 'creative' writers to criticism is well known, and has been neatly summed up by E. S. Dallas in The Gay Science:

'Ben Jonson spoke of critics as tinkers, who make more faults than they mend, Samuel Butler, as the fierce inquisitors of wit, and as butchers who have no right to sit on a jury, Sir Richard Steele, as of all mortals the silliest, Swift, as dogs, rats, wasps, or, at best, drones of the learned world, Shenstone, as asses, which by gnawing vines first taught the advantage of pruning them, Burns, as cut-throat bandits in the path of fame, Walter Scott, humorously reflecting the general sentiment, as caterpillars.'

The droll thing about it is that every one of these critics of criticism was so ready to act himself as butcher or ass or caterpillar. It is a common trick of the guild. For a modern instance, turn to Mr. Horace Traubel, the short-sleeved Boswell of Walt Whitman, and you will find pages of conversation recorded in which the seer of Camden belabours the professors of criticism and in almost the same breath exercises the art upon his brother poets with delightful frankness and at times rare penetration. But this ancient feud of the gentlemen of the pen is a special form, due in part to special causes, of the hostility that so often manifests itself against the critical spirit in general. The man of system and the man of unhesitating action are likely to feel something like contempt for the mind that balances and waits. The imperial Mommsen felt this contempt, and showed it, in his treatment of Cicero, it is rife even yet in the current tone of condescension towards Erasmus as compared with Luther, to which Matthew Arnold replied by calling Luther 'a Philistine of genius', Warburton showed it in his sneers at Shaftesbury as the man of taste, and Cardinal Newman has, with splendid politeness, echoed them, Matthew Arnold was equally feared and despised in his own lifetime, and it is an odd fact that you will to-day scarcely pick up a piece of third-rate criticism (in which there is likely to be anything at work rather than the critical spirit), but you will come upon some gratuitous flung against him. Most bitter of all was Henry Sidgwick's arraignment of 'The Prophet of Culture' in Macmillan's Magazine for August, 1867. There if anywhere the critical spirit was stabbed with its own weapon. You will recall the image of the pouncet-box

'Mr Arnold may say that he does not discourage action, but only asks for delay, in order that we may act with sufficient knowledge. This is the eternal excuse of indolence—insufficient knowledge.

One cannot think on this subject without recalling the great man who recommended to philosophy a position very similar to that now claimed for culture. I wish to give Mr Arnold the full benefit of his resemblance to Plato. But when we look closer at the two positions, the dissimilarity comes out: they have a very different effect on our feelings and imagination; and I confess I feel more sympathy with the melancholy philosopher looking out with hopeless placidity "from beneath the shelter of some wall" than with a cheerful modern liberal, tempered by renouncement, shuddering aloof from the rank exhalations of vulgar enthusiasm, and holding up the pouncet-box of culture betwixt the wind and his nobility.'

Such an onslaught on our prophet of culture as a languid and shrinking dilettante was fair enough in the heat of controversy and was at least justified by its own art, if not by certain affectations of its victim's style; but I protest against accepting it as essentially true. Any one might perceive that Matthew Arnold had beneath the irony and suavity of his manner a temper of determined seriousness, that, like the bride of Giacomone di Todi in his sonnet, his Muse might be young, gay, and radiant outside; but had

'a hidden ground
Of thought and of austerity within.'

It would be interesting in this respect to continue the comparison of Arnold and Shaftesbury, and to show how near together they stood in their attitude towards nature and society and in their religion, and how profound was their own enthusiasm beneath their hostility to the sham or undisciplined enthusiasms of the day. Lord Shaftesbury might say that we have 'in the main a witty and good-humoured religion,' as Matthew Arnold might ridicule the sourness of the Nonconformists and the bleakness of the reformers in whose assemblies any child of nature, if he shall stray thither, is smitten with lamentation and mourning and woe, but there was solemnity enough, however we may rate their insight, in their own search for the God that sits concealed at the centre. Shaftesbury's creed became the formula of the deists: 'Still ardent in its pursuit,' the soul, he says, 'rests not here, nor satisfies itself with the beauty of a part, but, extending further its communicative bounty, seeks the good of all, and affects the interest and prosperity of the whole. True to its native world and higher country, 'tis here it seeks order and perfection, wishing the best, and hoping still to find a just and wise administration. And since all hope of this were vain and idle if no universal mind presided, since without such a supreme intelligence and providential care the distracted universe must be condemned to suffer infinite calamities, 'tis here the generous mind labours to discover that healing cause by which the interest of the whole is securely established, the beauty of things and the universal order happily sustained.'

Matthew Arnold condensed that rhetoric into a phrase. 'The stream of tendency, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness.' But the strongest evidence of their austerity of purpose is seen in those private notebooks which led me to couple their names together in this study of the spirit of criticism. This is not the time to deal at length with that sober and anxious self-examination of the noble Lord, as Shaftesbury's enemies in the Church were so fond of calling him. It is one of the important documents to show how completely Deism was a revival of pagan morality. It is, in brief, no more than a translation of the great maxims of antiquity into modern purposes—the inner record of a man seeking character in the two elements of attention (προσοχή) and the harmony of life (veræ numerosque modosque vite), and of a man who thought that this pursuit must be maintained unrelentingly. Of the two books it may seem strange that Matthew Arnold's, which consists merely of brief quotations without comment, should really open to us more intimately the author's heart than does the direct self-questioning of Shaftesbury's. Yet a book more filled with sad sincerity, a more perfect confession of a life's purpose, will scarcely be found than these memoranda. 'I am glad to find,' he wrote once in a letter to his sister, 'that in the past year I have at least accomplished more than usual in the way of reading the books which at the beginning of the year I had put down to be read. The importance of reading, not slight stuff to get through the time, but the best that has been written, forces itself upon me more and more every year I live.' Now the Notebooks not only preserve some of these annual lists of books to be read, but show, in quintessential phrase, just what the books actually read meant to him. Some of the quotations are repeated a number of times, and if frequency of repetition can be taken as a criterion the maxim closest to Arnold's heart was the sentence, from what source I do not know: 'Semper aliquid certi proponendum est—always some certain end must be kept in view.' It is but an expansion of the same idea that he expresses in the words set down more than once from some French author: 'A working life, a succession of labours which fill and moralise the days' and in the beloved command of the Imitation. 'Cum multa legeris et cognoveris, ad unum semper oportet redire principium—when you have read and learned many things, it is necessary always to return to one principle.' That principle he sets down in aphorisms and exhortations from a hundred diverse sources—nowhere, perhaps, more succinctly than in the broken phrases of the stoic Lucan

'servare modum, finemque tenere
Naturamque sequi—
Nec sibi, sed toti gentium se credere mundo—
In commune bonus'

'(To preserve measure, to hold fast to the end, and follow nature—To believe oneself born not for oneself alone but for all the world—good for the community of mankind)'

He might well have applied to his own pursuit of culture the eulogy he quotes concerning another: 'Study, which for most men is only a frivolous amusement and often dangerous, was for Dom Rivet a serious occupation consecrated by religion.'

It was not a mere dilettante of sweetness and light who day by day laid such maxims as these upon his breast; it was not one who held up the pouncet-box of culture betwixt the wind and his nobility. Matthew Arnold, if any man in his generation, was by temperament a stoic for whom duty and submission and reverence made up the large part of life, and there is something of what we call the irony of fate in the thought that he who made σπουδαιότης, high seriousness, the test of great literature, should have suffered the reproach of levity. Yet, after all, fate is never quite blind in these things, and if criticism has thus drawn upon itself the censure of men like Sidgwick we may feel assured that in some way it has failed of the deeper truth. Those reproaches may in part be due to prejudice and revenge and the inevitable contrast of temperaments, they may err in ascribing to the critic a want of efficiency, as they may be wantonly perverse in denouncing him for frivolity, but they have a meaning and they cannot be overlooked. Now the future is often a strange revealer of secret things, and there is no surer way to detect the weak side of a leader than by studying the career of his disciples, or even of his successors.

You are familiar with the story of the concluding chapter of Pater's Renaissance—how it was withdrawn from the second edition of that book because the author 'conceived it might possibly mislead some of those young men into whose hands it might fall', and how it was restored, with some slight changes, to the later editions where it now stands. And you know the moral of that essay: that life is but an uncertain interval before the universal judgment of death, a brief illusion of stability in the eternal flux, and that 'our one chance lies in expanding that interval, in getting as many pulsations as possible into the given time'. And 'of this wisdom,' he concludes, 'the poetic passion, the desire of beauty, the love of art for art's sake, has most, for art comes to you professing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments' sake.' That philosophy of the Oxonian Epicurus and its scandal in a very un-Epicurean land are familiar enough, but perhaps we do not always stop to think how plausibly this doctrine of crowning our moments with the highest sensations of art flows from Matthew Arnold's definition of criticism as the disinterested endeavour 'to know the best that is known and thought in the world, irrespectively of practice, politics, and everything of the kind.'

The next step from Pater's Epicureanism, and so by a further remove from Arnold's criticism, brings us to one whose name, unfortunately, must always be mentioned with regret, but who is more significant in the development of English letters than is sometimes allowed. At the time when Paterism, as a recent writer has said, was 'tripping indelicately along the Oxford High and by the banks of the Cherwell,' a young votary of the Muses from Dublin came upon the scene, and began to push the doctrine of Pater as far beyond what the master intended as Pater had gone beyond Matthew Arnold. This is the young man who 'would occasionally be seen walking the streets carrying a lily or a sunflower in his hand, at which he would gaze intently and admiringly.' He had fashioned himself deliberately to pose as the head of a new sect of 'aesthetes,' as they styled themselves, who expanded Arnold's excluded tribe of Philistines to embrace all the sober citizens of the world. The fate of Oscar Wilde is still like a fresh wound in the public memory. What I wish to call to your mind is the direct connection (strengthened no doubt by influences from across the Channel) between Pater's philosophy of the sensation-crowded moment and such a poem as that in which Wilde attempted to concentrate all the passionate moments of the past in his gloating revery upon The Sphinx. He was himself not unaware of the treachery of the path he had chosen, the sonnet which he prefixed to his book of poems is sincere with the pathos of conscious insincerity, and is a memorable comment on one of the tragic ambitions of a century

'To drift with every passion till my soul Is a stringed lute on which all winds can play,
Is it for this that I have given away
Mine ancient wisdom, and austere control?

Surely there was a time I might have trod
The sunlit heights, and from life's dissonance
Struck one clear chord to reach the ears of God
Is that time dead? lo! with a little rod
I did but touch the honey of romance—
And must I lose a soul's inheritance?

The answer to the poet's query he was himself to write in The Ballad of Reading Gaol

'Silently we went round and round,
And through each hollow mind
The Memory of dreadful things Rushed like a dreadful wind,
And Horror stalked before each man,
And Terror crept behind.'

This Memory of dreadful things is the too logical end, step by step, of the philosophy of the sensation-crowded moment, the concealed suspicion of it in Matthew Arnold's definition of criticism was the justification, if any there be, of the contempt hurled upon him by some of his contemporaries.

It is necessary to repeat that such a derivation from Matthew Arnold is essentially unfair because it leaves out of view the real purpose and heart of the man. If we could not read his great moral energy in his Essays, as I trust we all of us can, and if we did not know the profound influence of his critical philosophy upon the better life of our age, we could still dispel our doubts by looking into the Notebooks, in which memory is not turned to dreadful things for the soul's disgrace, but is the guide and impulse to strong resolution and beautiful forbearance. Yet withal it remains true that the Epicureanism of Pater and the hedonism of Oscar Wilde were able to connect themselves in a disquieting way with one side of Matthew Arnold's gospel of culture, and it behooves us who come upon the heels of this movement and who believe that the critical spirit is still to be one of the powers making in the world for right enjoyment, it behooves us to examine the first definition of culture or criticism—the words had about the same meaning as Arnold used them—and see whether something was not there forgotten. The fault lay not in any intrinsic want of efficiency in the critical spirit, nor in any want of moral earnestness in Matthew Arnold or Shaftesbury that we have seen. But these men were lacking in another direction: they missed a philosophy which could bind together their moral and their æsthetic sense, a positive principle besides the negative force of ridicule and irony, and, missing this, they left criticism more easily subject to a one-sided and dangerous development.

To the nature of that omission, to the porro unum necessarium, we may be directed, I think, by the critical theory of the one who carried the practice, in other respects, to its lowest degradation. In Oscar Wilde's dialogue on The Critic as Artist, one of the most extraordinary mixtures ever compounded of truth flaunting in the robes of error and error assuming the gravity of truth, you will remember that the advocate of criticism at the height of his argument proclaims the true man of culture to be him who has learned 'the best that is known and thought in the world' (he uses Matthew Arnold's words), and who thus, as Matthew Arnold neglected to add, 'bears within himself the dreams, and ideas, and feelings of myriad generations.' The addition is important, how important, or at least how large, may be seen in the really splendid, if somewhat morbid, passage in which the idea is developed. Let me quote at some length be no mood with which one cannot sympathise, no dead mode of life that one cannot make alive. Is this impossible? I think not. By revealing to us the absolute mechanism of all action, and so freeing us from the self-imposed and trammelling burden of moral responsibility, the scientific principle of Heredity has become, as it were, the warrant for the contemplative life. It has shown us that we are never less free than when we try to act. It has hemmed us round with the nets of the hunter, and written upon the wall the prophecy of our doom. We may not watch it, for it is within us. We may not see it, save in a mirror that mirrors the soul. It is Nemesis without her mask. It is the last of the Fates, and the most terrible. It is the only one of the Gods whose real name we know.

'And yet, while in the sphere of practical and external life it has robbed energy of its freedom and activity of its choice, in the subjective sphere, where the soul is at work, it comes to us, this terrible shadow, with many gifts in its hands, gifts of strange temperaments and subtle susceptibilities, gifts of wild ardours and chill moods of indifference, complex multiform gifts of thoughts that are at variance with each other, and passions that war against themselves. And so, it is not our own life that we live, but the lives of the dead, and the soul that dwells within us is no single spiritual entity, making us personal and individual, created for our service, and entering into us for our joy. It can help us to leave the age in which we were born, and to pass into other ages, and find ourselves not exiled from their air. It can teach us how to escape from our experience, and to realise the experiences of those who are greater than we are. The pain of Leopardi crying out against life becomes our pain. Theocritus blows on his pipe, and we laugh with the lips of nymph and shepherd. In the wolfskin of Pierre Vidal we flee before the hounds, and in the armour of Lancelot we ride from the bower of the Queen. We have whispered the secret of our love beneath the cowl of Abelard, and in the stained raiment of Villon have put our shame into song. We can see the dawn through Shelley's eyes, and when

'To know anything about oneself, one must know all about others. There must we wander with Endymion the Moon grows amorous of our youth. Ours is the anguish of Alys, and ours the weak rage and noble sorrows of the Dane. Do you think that it is the imagination that enables us to live these countless lives? Yes it is the imagination, and the imagination is the result of heredity. It is simply concentrated race-experience.'

Now, this theory of race-experience, as Oscar Wilde formulated it, lends itself, no doubt, to an easy fallacy. I am aware of the rebuke administered to one who was by the range of his knowledge and by his historic sense much more justified in such a presumption than was Oscar Wilde. 'Is it not the strangest illusion,' exclaimed the biographer of Renan, 'to believe that the mere reading of the Acts of the martyrs is sufficient to give us their soul, to transfer to us in its real intensity the ardour which ravished them amidst their tortures?' Those who have lost all the energy of living and acting may, if they choose, shut themselves up in this kingdom of shadows, that is their affair. But that they should proclaim theirs as the true life, is not to be conceded to them.' Séailles was right. These men, whether it be a paradox-monger like Oscar Wilde or a great scholar like Renan, should have laid to heart the favourite maxim of Matthew Arnold, semper aliquid certi proponendum est: true culture has always before its eyes a definite end and is for self-discipline, not for reverie. Nor am I unaware that the theory as expressed by Oscar Wilde is mixed up with his own personal taint of decadence. One thing at least is certain: that the way of the true critical spirit is not to free us, as he boasts, from 'the self-imposed and trammelling burden of moral responsibility.' His avowal in the same dialogue that the sole aim of art is to produce the 'beautiful sterile emotions' so hateful to the world, his shameless vaunt that 'there is nothing sane about the worship of beauty,' his whole philosophy of the ego as above the laws of society, cannot be severed from the memory of dreadful things in which his own song ended: such a philosophy is in fact a denial of the validity of that very race-experience out of which he attempts to derive it. In this respect again he should have remembered the maxim of Matthew Arnold: 'A working life, a succession of labours that fill and moralise the days.' The aim of culture is not to merge the present in a sterile dream of the past, but to hold the past as a living force in the present. In omitting these aspects of criticism Pater and, to a greater extent, Oscar Wilde fell into extravagance far more deleterious to culture than was any omission or incompleteness on the part of Matthew Arnold.

Nevertheless, with all its false emphasis and its admixture of personal error, that positive and emotional reassumption of the past, that association of the contemplative life (the βίος θεωρητικός) with the rapture of memory, contains the hint of a great truth which must be grasped and properly exercised if criticism is to confirm itself against such hostility as has hitherto kept it on the defensive. I would not say even that the mysticism, out of which Oscar Wilde's critical theory really springs, though expressed in the modish language of scientific evolution, is essentially perverse. For in a very true sense the past of mankind, by the larger race-memory and particularly by that form of it which we call literature, abides as a living reality in our present. We suffer not our individual destiny alone but the fates of humanity also. We are born into an inheritance of great emotions—into the unconquerable hopes and defeated fears of an immeasurable past, the tragedies and the comedies of love, the ardent aspirations of faith, the baffled questionings of evil, the huge laughter at facts, the deep-welling passion of peace. Without that common inheritance how inconceivably poor and shallow would be this life of the world and our life in it! These recorded emotions are, indeed, not for us what they were in actuality, nor by sitting at our own ease with memory can we enter into the exact emotions of the martyr at the stake and the hero in his triumph. These things are now transmuted into something the same and different, something less and greater. The intensity of the actual moment they cannot possess, but on the other hand with this loss of separate reality they are associated with life as a whole, and in that unity of experience obtain what they lacked before, a significance and design. They bear in a way the same relation to practical life as that life bore to the ideal world out of which it arose and into which it is continually passing. And thus this larger memory, in its transmuting and unifying power, may not unmeaningly be regarded as the purpose of activity, and literature may not too presumptuously be cherished as the final end of existence. Some such mystery as this was hinted in the Greek and Gnostic doctrine of the logos, the Word, and in the Hindu name for the creator as vâcas pati, Lord of the Word. And if such a theory sounds too absurdly metaphysical for the ears of prudent common-sense, consider that Homer, no philosopher of empty phrases surely, meant nothing very different when he judged of actions by their fame in future story. To him the warring of armies for ten long years and the desolation of Troy were for no other purpose than that the inner life of the race might be enriched by memory.

'Thus the gods fated, and such ruin wove
That song might flourish for posterity'

And in this theory of memory criticism has an important office. We are beginning to hear a good deal these days about the French metaphysician, M. Henri Bergson, of whom Prof. William James has avowed himself a willing disciple, and whose disquisitions on Matière et mémoire and L'Évolution créatrice are perhaps more talked of than any other recent books of philosophy. I do not pretend to pronounce on the full scope of his theories, but his conception of the function of memory is rich with applications to the matter we have in hand. Our consciousness, that is to say our very self, is not, he says, a thing born new with each moment, not a niens momentanea, but an uninterrupted stream of activity, and what we now feel is directly bound up with what we have felt before. Nor is this consciousness, on the other hand, a mere heaping together indiscriminately of perceptions and emotions, but it is an active faculty, or, I should prefer to say, the servant of some active faculty, that depresses this particular experience into the background and centres attention upon that other experience, thus by a process of criticism secreting the present, so to speak, out of the past. Such a philosophy finds a new and profound truth in the saying of Pascal: 'La mémoire est nécessaire à toutes les opérations de l'esprit—memory is necessary to all the operations of the mind'

This notion of the active memory is, I am told by those who should know, mixed up in Bergson with a questionable metaphysic, yet in itself alone it should seem to be nothing more than the laborious expression of a very simple fact. We have all of us met now and then in our daily intercourse a man whose conversation impressed us immediately as possessing a certain ripeness of wisdom, a certain pertinency and depth of meaning. If we wished to characterise such a man in a single word, we should perhaps say that he was essentially educated. We feel that he has within him some central force which enables him to choose consistently amidst the innumerable conflicting impulses and attractions and dissipations of life, that he moves forward, not at haphazard, but by the direction of some principle of conduct, and that he can be depended upon for counsel and comfort. Well, if you stop to analyse this quality of mind, which we will call education, you will discover in every case, I believe, that the determining trait is just the force of a critical memory. I do not mean by this the mere faculty of recalling the emotions and events and spectacles which have come to a man with the years, for such undisciplined reminiscence may be but a shabby wisdom to the man himself, as it may be the very contrary of joy to his hearer. I mean rather the faculty of selection as well as of retention, the weighing of cause and effect, the constant and active assumption of the past in the present, by which the events of life are no longer regarded as isolated and fortuitous moments, but are merged into a unity of experience. Those in whom this faculty rules are commonly the possessors of practical wisdom, but there are others, a few, who by its virtue are raised into another kind of wisdom. With these men the selective, reconciling memory is associated, more or less consciously, with the Platonic reminiscence in such a manner that not only are the past and present of passing time made one but our ephemeral life is fitted into that great ring of eternity which Henry Vaughan saw as in a dream. So it is that to them the things which others behold as sudden unrelated facts are made shadows and types of the everlasting ideas, and with the accumulation of knowledge they grow ripe in vision,

'Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.'

And as our private memory is not a merely passive retention of sensations, so in literature the critical spirit is at work as a conscious energy of selection. The function of criticism, as thus understood, is far removed from the surrender to luxurious revery which the impressionists believed it to be, nor is the good critic, as Anatole France said, he who recounts the adventures of his soul amid masterpieces, he is rather one who has before him always the aliquid certi, the definite aim of a Matthew Arnold. He does not, like Oscar Wilde, seek by losing the present in the past to throw off 'the self-imposed and trammeling burden of moral responsibility', he is rather one whose life is 'a succession of labours that fill and moralise the days'—not in the narrow didactic sense, it need scarcely be said, but in so far as his task is a continual weighing of values. But the critical spirit is also something deeper than Matthew Arnold perceived, or, at least, clearly expressed. The error of criticism in his hands, as in the hands of his predecessors, was that in the exercise of judgment it used the past too much as a dead storehouse of precepts for schoolmastering the present, it was not sufficiently aware of the relation of this faculty of judgment to the indwelling and ever-acting memory of things. Here is the one touch of insight needed, I think, to raise criticism, while not forgetting its special duty of discrimination and judgment, to a more independent and self-respecting genre. In its conscious creation of the field of the present out of the past it takes an honoured, if not equal, place by the side of those impulses, more commonly recognised as creative, which are continually adding new material for its selective energy. 'Valuing is creating,' said Nietzsche, 'to value is the treasure and jewel among all things valued.' The critical spirit is thus akin to that force of design or final cause in the Aristotelian sense, which we are beginning once more to divine as the guiding principle, itself unchanged, at work within the evolutionary changes of nature, and in so far as it becomes aware of this high office it introduces into our intellectual life an element outside of alteration and growth and decay, a principle to which time is the minister and not the master.

Literary criticism is, indeed, in this sense only the specific exercise of a faculty which works in many directions. All scholars, whether they deal with history or sociology or philosophy or language or, in the narrower use of the word, literature, are servants of the critical spirit, in so far as they transmit and interpret and mould the sum of experience from man to man and from generation to generation. Might not one even say that at a certain point criticism becomes almost identical with education, and that by this standard we may judge the value of any study as an instrument of education, and may estimate the merit of any special presentation of that study? It is at least, in the existing chaos of pedagogical theories, a question worthy of consideration.

JUSTIFICATION OF ART

It is no longer the fashion among philosophers to decry art. Either its influence seems to them too slight to excite alarm, or their systems are too lax to subject anything to censure which has the least glamour or ideality about it. Tired, perhaps, of daily resolving the conflict between science and religion, they prefer to assume silently a harmony between morals and art. Moral harmonies, however, are not given, they have to be made. The curse of superstition is that it justifies and protracts their absence by proclaiming their invisible presence. Of course a rational religion could not conflict with a rational science, and similarly an art that was wholly admirable would necessarily play into the hand of progress. But as the real difficulty in the former case lies in saying what religion and what science would be truly rational, so here the problem is how far extant art is a benefit to mankind, and how far, perhaps, a vice or a burden.

That art is prima facie and in itself a good cannot be doubted. It is a spontaneous activity, and that settles the question. Yet the function of ethics is precisely to revise prima facie judgements of this kind and to fix the ultimate resultant of all given interests, in so far as they can be combined. In the actual disarray of human life and desire, wisdom consists in knowing what goods to sacrifice and what simples to pour into the supreme mixture. The extent to which æsthetic values are allowed to colour the resultant or highest good is a point of great theoretic importance, not only for art but for general philosophy. If art is excluded altogether or given only a trivial rôle, perhaps as a necessary relaxation, we feel at once that a philosophy so judging human arts is ascetic or post-rational. It pretends to guide life from above and from without, it has discredited human nature and mortal interests, and has thereby undermined itself, since it is at best but a partial expression of that humanity which it strives to transcend. If, on the contrary, art is prized as something supreme and irresponsible, if the poetic and mystic glow which it may bring seems its own complete justification, then philosophy is evidently still pre-rational or, rather, non-existent, for the beasts that listened to Orpheus belong to this school.

To be bewitched is not to be saved, though all the magicians and æsthetes in the world should pronounce it to be so. Intoxication is a sad business, at least for a philosopher, for you must either drown yourself altogether, or else when sober again you will feel somewhat fooled by yesterday's joys and somewhat lost in to-day's vacancy. The man who would emancipate art from discipline and reason is trying to elude rationality, not merely in art, but in all existence. He is vexed at conditions of excellence that make him conscious of his own incompetence and failure. Rather than consider his function, he proclaims his self-sufficiency. A way foolishness has of revenging itself is to excommunicate the world.

If a practice can point to its innocence, it can absolve itself from concern for a world with which it does not interfere, it has justified itself to those who love it, though it may not yet have recommended itself to those who do not. Now art, more than any other considerable pursuit, more even than speculation, is abstract and inconsequential. Born of suspended attention, it ends in itself. It encourages sensuous abstraction, and nothing concerns it less than to influence the world. Nor does it really do so in a notable degree. Social changes do not reach artistic expression until after their momentum is acquired and their other collateral effects are fully predetermined. Scarcely is a school of art established, giving expression to prevailing sentiment, when this sentiment changes and makes that style seem empty and ridiculous. The expression has little or no power to maintain the movement it registers, as a waterfall has little or no power to bring more water down. Currents may indeed cut deep channels, but they cannot feed their own springs—at least not until the whole revolution of nature is taken into account.

In the individual, also, art registers passions without stimulating them, on the contrary, in stopping to depict them it steals away their life, and whatever interest and delight it transfers to their expression it subtracts from their vital energy. This appears unmistakably in erotic and in religious art. Though the artist's avowed purpose here be to arouse a practical impulse, he fails in so far as he is an artist in truth, for he then will seek to move the given passions only through beauty, but beauty is a rival object of passion in itself. Lascivious and pious works, when beauty has touched them, cease to give out what is wilful and disquieting in their subject and become altogether intellectual and sublime. There is a high breathlessness about beauty that cancels lust and superstition. The artist, in taking the latter for his theme, renders them innocent and interesting, because he looks at them from above, composes their attitudes and surroundings harmoniously, and makes them food for the mind. Accordingly it is only in a refined and secondary stage that active passions like to amuse themselves with their æsthetic expression. Unmitigated lustiness and raw fanaticism will snarl at pictures. Representations begin to interest when crude passions recede, and feel the need of conciliating liberal interests and adding some intellectual charm to their dumb attractions. Thus art, while by its subject it may betray the preoccupations among which it springs up, embodies a new and quite innocent interest.

This interest is more than innocent, it is liberal. Art has met, on the whole, with more success than science or morals. Beauty gives men the best hint of ultimate good which their experience as yet can offer, and the most lauded geniuses have been poets, as if people felt that those seers, rather than men of action or thought, had lived ideally and known what was worth knowing. That such should be the case, if the fact be admitted, would indeed prove the rudimentary state of human civilization. The truly comprehensive life should be the statesman's, for whom perception and theory might be expressed and rewarded in action. The ideal dignity of art is therefore merely symbolic and vicarious. As some people study character in novels, and travel by reading tales of adventure, because real life is not yet so interesting to them as fiction, or because they find it cheaper to make their experiments in their dreams, so art in general is a rehearsal of rational living, and recasts in idea a world which we have no present means of recasting in reality. Yet this rehearsal reveals the glories of a possible performance better than do the miserable experiments until now executed on the reality.

When we consider the present distracted state of government and religion, there is much relief in turning from them to almost any art, where what is good is altogether and finally good, and what is bad is at least not treacherous. When we consider further the senseless rivalries, the vanities, the ignominy that reign in the 'practical' world, how doubly blessed it becomes to find a sphere where limitation is an excellence, where diversity is a beauty, and where every man's ambition is consistent with every other man's and even favourable to it! It is indeed so in art, for we must not import into its blameless labours the bickerings and jealousies of criticism. Critics quarrel with other critics, and that is a part of philosophy. With an artist no sane man quarrels, any more than with the colour of a child's eyes. As nature, being full of seeds, rises into all sorts of crystallizations, each having its own ideal and potential life, each a nucleus of order and a habitation for the absolute self, so art, though in a medium poorer than pregnant matter, and incapable of intrinsic life, generates a semblance of all conceivable beings. What nature does with existence, art does with appearance, and while the achievement leaves us, unhappily, much where we were before in all our efficacious relations, it entirely renews our vision and breeds a fresh world in fancy, where all form has the same inner justification that all life has in the real world. As no insect is without its rights and every cripple has his dream of happiness, so no artistic fact, no child of imagination, is without its small birthright of beauty. In this freer element, competition does not exist and everything is Olympian. Hungry generations do not tread down the ideal but only its spokesmen or embodiments, that have cast in their lot with other material things. Art supplies constantly to contemplation what nature seldom affords in concrete experience—the union of life and peace.

SOCIETY AND SOLITUDE

O solitudo, sola beatitudo,<sup>1</sup> Saint Bernard said, but might he not have said just as well, O societas, sola felicitas?<sup>2</sup> Just as truly, I think, because when a man says that the only happiness is this or that, he is like a lover saying that Mary Jane is the one woman in the world. She may be truly the one woman for him, though even that is not probable, but he cannot mean to assert that she is the only woman living, nor to deny that each of the others might be the one woman for somebody. Now, when a Hegelian philosopher, contradicting Saint Bernard, says that society is his be-all and end-all, that he himself is nothing but an invisible point at which relations cross, and that if you removed from him his connection with Hegel, with his university, his church, his wife, and his publishers, there would be nothing left, or at best a name and a peg to hang a gown on, far be it from me to revise his own analysis of his nature, society may be the only felicity and the only reality for him. But that cannot annul the judgement of Saint Bernard. He had a great mind and a great heart, and he knew society well, at least, he accepted the verdict which antiquity had passed on society, after a very long, brilliant, and hearty experience of it, and he knew the religious life and solitude as well, and I can't help thinking that he, too, must have been right in his self-knowledge, and that solitude must have been the only happiness for him.

1 'O Solitude, sole felicity!'

Nevertheless, the matter is not limited to this confronting of divers honest judgements, or confessions of moral experience. The natures expressed in these judgements have a long history, and are on different levels, the one may be derived from the other. Thus it is evident that the beatific solitude of Saint Bernard was filled with a kind of society, he devoted it to communion with the Trinity, or to composing fervent compliments to the Virgin Mary. It was only the society to be found in inns and hovels, in castles, sacristies, and refectories, that he thought it happiness to avoid. That the wilderness to which hermits flee must be peopled by their fancy, could have been foreseen by any observer of human nature. Tormenting demons or ministering angels must needs appear, because man is rooted in society and his instincts are addressed to it, for the first nine months, or even years, of his existence he is a parasite, and scarcely are these parental bonds a little relaxed, when he instinctively forms other ties, that turn him into a husband and father, and keep him such all his days. If ever he finds happiness in solitude, it can only be by lavishing on objects of his imagination the attentions which his social functions require that he should lavish on something. Without exercising these faculties somehow his nature would be paralysed, there would be no fuel to feed a spiritual flame. All Saint Bernard could mean, then, is that happiness lies in this substitution of an ideal for a natural society, in converse with thoughts rather than with things. Such a substitution is normal, and a mark of moral vigour, we must not be misled into comparing it with a love of dolls or of lap-dogs.

Dolls are not impersonal, and lap-dogs are not ideas: they are only less rebellious specimens of the genus thing, they are more portable idols. To substitute the society of ideas for that of things is simply to live in the mind, it is to survey the world of existences in its truth and beauty rather than in its personal perspectives, or with practical urgency. It is the sole path to happiness for the intellectual man, because the intellectual man cannot be satisfied with a world of perpetual change, defeat, and imperfection. It is the path trodden by ancient philosophers and modern saints or poets, not, of course, by modern writers on philosophy (except Spinoza), because these have not been philosophers in the vital sense, they have practised no spiritual discipline, suffered no change of heart, but lived on exactly like other professors, and exerted themselves to prove the existence of a God favourable to their own desires, instead of searching for the God that happens to exist. Certainly this path, in its beginnings, is arduous, and leaves the natural man somewhat spare and haggard, he seems to himself to have fasted for forty days and forty nights, and the world regards his way of living afterwards as rather ghostly and poor. But he usually congratulates himself upon it in the end, and of those who persevere some become saints and some poets and some philosophers.

Yet why, we may ask, should happiness be found exclusively in this ideal society where none intrudes? If the intellectual man cannot lay up his treasures in a world of change, the natural man can perfectly well satisfy his instincts within it, and why shouldn't the two live amicably together in a house of two stories? I can see no essential reason, but historically natural society long ago proved a moral failure. It could not harmonize nor decently satisfy even the instincts on which it rests. Hence the philosophers have felt bound not only to build themselves a superstructure but to quit the ground floor—materially, if possible, by leading a monastic life, religiously in any case by not expecting to find much except weeping and wailing in this vale of tears. We may tax this despair with being premature, and call such a flight into an imaginary world a desperate expedient, at any time the attempts of the natural man to live

his comic life happily may be renewed, and may succeed Solitude peopled with ideas might still remain to employ the mind, but it would not be the only beatitude

Yet the insecurity of natural society runs deeper, for natural society itself is an expedient and a sort of refuge of despair. It, too, in its inception, seemed a sacrifice and a constraint. The primitive soul hates order and the happiness founded on order. The barbarous soul hates justice and peace. The belly is always rebelling against the members. The belly was once all in all, it was a single cell floating deliciously in a warm liquid, it had no outer organs, it thought it didn't need them. It vegetated in peace, no noises, no alarms, no lusts, no nonsense. Ah, veritably solitude was blessedness then! But it was a specious solitude and a precarious blessedness, resting on ignorance. The warm liquid might cool, or might dry up, it might breed all sorts of enemies, presently heaven might crack and the cell be cleft in two. Happy the hooded microbe that put forth feelers in time, and awoke to its social or unsocial environment! I am not sure that, beneath the love of ideal society, there was not in Saint Bernard a lingering love of primeval peace, of seminal slumber, that he did not yearn for the cell biological as well as for the cell monastic. Life, mere living, is a profound ideal, pregnant with the memory of a possible happiness, the happiness of protoplasm, and the advocate of moral society must not reckon without his host. He has a rebellious material in hand, his every atom is instinct with a life of its own which it may reassert, upsetting his calculations and destroying his organic systems. Only the physical failure of solitude drove the spirit at first into society, as the moral failure of society may drive it later into solitude again. If any one said, then, that happiness lies only in society, his maxim would be no less sincere and solid than Saint Bernard's, but it would not be so profound. For beneath natural society, in the heart of each of its members, there is always an intense and jealous solitude, the sleep of elemental life which can never be wholly broken, and above natural society there is always another solitude—a placid ethereal wilderness, the heaven of ideas—beckoning the mind.

AT HEAVEN'S GATE

SKYLARKS, if they exist elsewhere, must be homesick for England. They need these kindly mists to hide and to sustain them. Their flexible throats would soon be parched, far from these vaporous meadows and hedgerows rich in berries and loam. How should they live in arid tablelands, or at merciless altitudes, where there is nothing but scorching heat or a freezing blizzard? What space could they find for solitude and freedom in the tangle of tropical forests, amongst the monkeys and parrots? What reserve, what tenderness, what inward springs of happiness could they treasure amid those gross harlot-like flowers? No, they are the hermits of this mild atmosphere, fled to its wilderness of gentle light. Well may they leave it to eagles to rush against the naked sun, as if its round eye challenged them to single combat: not theirs the stupid ferocity of passion against fact, anger against light, swiftness against poise, beak and talons against intangible fire. Larks may not be very clever, but they are not so foolish as to be proud, or to scream hoarsely against the nature of things. Having wings and voluble throats they play with them for pure pleasure, they are little artists and little gentlemen, they disdain to employ their faculties for their mere utility, or only in order to pounce down to the earth, whenever they spy a dainty morsel, or to return to sulk shivering on some solitary crag, their voracity but half appeased, like eagles dreaming of their next victim. Of course, even the most playful songster must eat, and skylarks no doubt keep an eye open for worms, and their nest calls them back to terrene affections, but they are as forgetful of earth as they can be, and insatiable craving does not stamp itself on their bent necks, as if they were vultures, nor strain their feathers of iron. No more are they inspired by sentimental pangs and love-sick like the nightingale, they do not hide in the labyrinthine shade of ilex or cypress, from there to wail in the melancholy moonlight, as it were a seductive serenade addressed to mortal lovers. No, the trilling of larks is not for mankind. Like English poets they sing to themselves of nature, inarticulately happy in a bath of light and freedom, sporting for the sake of sport, turning what doubts they may have into sweetness, not asking to see or to know anything ulterior. They must needs drink the dew amongst these English fields, peeping into the dark little hearts and flushed petals of these daisies, like the heart and cheeks of an English child, or into these buttercups, yellow like his Saxon hair. They could hardly have built their nests far from this maze of little streams, or from these narrow dykes and ditches, 10 arched with the scented tracery of limes and willows. They needed this long, dull, chilly winter in which to gather their unsuspected fund of yearning and readiness for joy, so that when high summer comes at last they may mount with virgin confidence and ardour through these sunlit spaces, to pour their souls out at heaven's gate.

At heaven's gate, but not in heaven. The sky, as these larks rise higher and higher, grows colder and thinner, if they could rise high enough, it would be a black void. All this fluid and dazzling atmosphere is but the drapery of earth, this cerulean vault is only a film round the oceans. As these choristers pass beyond the nether veils of air, the sun becomes fierce and comfortless, they freeze and are dazzled, they must hurry home again to earth if they would live. They must put fuel in their little engines: after all it was flesh and blood in them that were praising the Lord. And accordingly, down they drop to their nests and peck about, anxious and silent, but their song never comes down. Up there they leave it, in the glittering desert it once ravished, in what we call the past. They bore their glad offering to the gate and returned empty, but the gladness of it, which in their palpitation and hurry they only half guessed, passed in and is a part of heaven. In the home of all good, from which their frail souls fetched it for a moment, it is still audible for any ear that ever again can attune itself to that measure. All that was loved or beautiful at any time, or that shall be so hereafter, all that never was but that ought to have been, lives in that paradise, in the brilliant treasure-house of the gods. 50

How many an English spirit, too modest to be heard here, has now committed its secret to that same heaven! Caught by the impulse of the hour, they rose like larks in the morning, cheerily, rashly, to meet the unforeseen, fatal, congenial adventure, the goal not seen, the air not measured, but the firm heart steady through the fog or blinding fire, making the best of what came, trembling but ready for what might come, with a simple courage which was half joy in living and half willingness to die. Their first flight was often their last. What fell to earth was only a poor dead body, one of a million, what remained above perhaps nothing to speak of, some boyish sally or wistful fancy, less than the song of a lark for God to treasure up in his omniscience and eternity. Yet these common brave fools knew as well as the lark the thing that they could do, and did it, and of other gifts and other adventures they were not envious.

Boys and free men are always a little inclined to flout what is not the goal of their present desires, or is beyond their present scope, spontaneity in them has its ebb-flow in mockery. Their tight little selves are too vigorous and too clearly determined to brood much upon distant things, but they are true to their own nature, they know and love the sources of their own strength. Like the larks, those English boys had drunk here the quintessence of many a sunlit morning, they had rambled through these same fields, fringed with hedges and peeping copse and downs purple with heather, these paths and streams had enured them often, they had been vaguely happy in these quiet, habitable places. It was enough for them to live, as for nature to revolve, and fate, in draining in one draught the modest cup of their spirit, spared them the weary dilution and waste of it in the world. The length of things is vanity, only their height is joy.

Of myself also I would keep nothing but what God may keep of me—some lovely essence, mine for a moment in that I beheld it, some object of devout love enshrined where all other hearts that have a like intelligence of love in their day may worship it, but my loves themselves and my reasonings are but a flutter of feathers weaker than a lark's, a prattle idler than his warblings, happy enough if they too may fly with him and die with him at the gate of heaven.

O WORLD, THOU CHOOSEST NOT
THE BETTER PART <sup>11</sup>

O WORLD, thou choosest not the better part!
It is not wisdom to be only wise,
And on the inward vision close the eyes,
But it is wisdom to believe the heart.
Columbus found a world, and had no chart,
Save one that faith deciphered in the skies,
To trust the soul's invincible surmise
Was all his science and his only art
Our knowledge is a torch of smoky pine
That lights the pathway but one step ahead
Across a void of mystery and dread <sup>11</sup>
Bid, then, the tender light of faith to shine
By which alone the mortal heart is led Unto the thinking of the thought divine.

ON THE DEATH OF A METAPHYSICIAN

UNHAPPY dreamer, who outwinged in flight
The pleasant region of the things I love,
And soared beyond the sunshine, and above
The golden cornfields and the dear and bright Warmth of the hearth,—blasphemer of delight,
Was your proud bosom not at peace with Jove,
That you sought, thankless for his guarded
grove,
The empty horror of abysmal night?
Ah, the thin air is cold above the moon!
I stood and saw you fall, befooled in death,
As, in your numbed spirit's fatal swoon, <sup>11</sup>
You cried you were a god, or were to be,
I heard with feeble moan your boastful breath
Bubble from depths of the Icarian sea

<sup>1</sup> Of his poetry, Santayana says 'If their prosody is worn and traditional, like a liturgy, it is because they represent the imitation of a mind into a world older and larger than itself, not the chance experiences of a stray individual, but his submission to what is not his chance experience, to the truth of nature and the moral heritage of mankind. Here is the uncertain hand of an apprentice, but of an apprentice in a great school. Verse is one of the traditions of literature. Like the orders of Greek architecture, the sonnet or the couplet or the quatrain are better than anything else that has been devised to serve the same function, and the innate freedom of poets to hazard new forms does not abolish the freedom of all men to adopt the old ones. For as to the subject of these poems, it is simply my philosophy in the making' Santayana, Poems (NY, 1935), ix-xii.

OF THEE THE NORTHMAN BY HIS

Of thee the Northman by his beachèd galley
Dreamt, as he watched the never-setting
Ursa
And longed for summer and thy light, O sacred Mediterranean.

Unseen he loved thee, for the heart within
him
Knew earth had gardens where he might be blessed Putting away long dreams and aimless, barbarous
Hunger for battle

The foretaste of thy languors thawed his bosom,
A great need drove him to thy caverned islands <sup>10</sup>
From the gray, endless reaches of the outer Desert of ocean

He saw thy pillars, saw thy sudden mountains
Wrinkled and stark, and in their crooked gorges,
'Neath peeping pine and cypress, guessed the torrent
Smothered in flowers

Thine incense to the sun, thy gathered vapours,
He saw suspended on the flanks of Taurus,
Or veiling the snowed bosom of the virgin
Sister of Atlas 20

He saw the luminous top of wide Olympus,
Fit for the happy gods, he saw the pilgrim
River, with rains of Ethiopia flooding
Populous Egypt

And having seen, he loved thee. His racked spirit,
By thy breath tempered and the light that clothes thee,

<sup>2</sup> 'All these "Odes" were written about the same time, inspired not by Sappho (for they are not in true Sapphics) but by a translation of her poems in Spanish which I had come upon among my father's books' Author's note.

Forgot the monstrous gods, and made of Nature
Mistress and mother

The more should I, O fatal sea, before thee
Of alien words make echoes to thy music, 30
For I was born where first the rills of Tagus
Turn to the westward,

And wandering long, alas! have need of drinking
Deep of the patience of thy perfect sadness, O thou that constant through the change of ages,
Beautiful ever,

Never wast wholly young and void of sorrows,
Nor ever canst be old, while yet the morning
Kindles thy ripples, or the golden evening
Dyes thee in purple 40

Thee, willing to be tamed but still untamable,
The Roman called his own until he perished,
As now the busy English hover o'er thee,
Stalwart and noble,

But all is naught to thee, while no harsh winter
Congeals thy fountains, and the blown Sahara Chokes not with dreadful sand thy deep and placid
Rock-guarded havens

Thou carest not what men may tread thy margin,
Nor I, while from some heather-scented headland 50
I may behold thy beauty, the eternal Solace of mortals

MY HEART REBELS AGAINST MY GENERATION

My heart rebels against my generation,
That talks of freedom and is slave to riches,
And, toiling 'neath each day's ignoble burden,
Boasts of the morrow

No space for noonday rest or midnight watches,
No purest joy of breathing under heaven!
Wretched themselves, they heap, to make them happy,
Many possessions

But thou, O silent Mother, wise, immortal,
To whom our toil is laughter,—take, divine
one, 10
This vanity away, and to thy lover
Give what is needful —

A staunch heart, nobly calm, averse to evil,
The windy sky for breath, the sea, the mountain,
A well-born, gentle friend, his spirit's brother,
Ever beside him

What would you gain, ye seekers, with your striving,
Or what vast Babel raise you on your shoulders?
You multiply distresses, and your children
Surely will curse you 20

O leave them rather friendlier gods, and fairer Orchards and temples, and a freer bosom!
What better comfort have we, or what other Profit in living,

Than to feed, sobered by the truth of Nature,
Awhile upon her bounty and her beauty,
And hand her torch of gladness to the ages Following after?

She hath not made us, like her other children,
Merely for peopling of her spacious kingdoms, 30
Beasts of the wild, or insects of the summer,
Breeding and dying,

But also that we might, half knowing, worship
The deathless beauty of her guiding vision,
And learn to love, in all things mortal, only
What is eternal.

A MINUET

ON REACHING THE AGE OF FIFTY

I

OLD Age, on tiptoe, lays her jewelled hand Lightly in mine —Come, tread a stately measure,
 Most gracious partner, nobly poised and bland
     Ours be no boisterous pleasure,
 But smiling conversation, with quick glance
 And memories dancing lightlier than we dance,
     Friends who a thousand joys Divide and double, save one joy supreme Which many a pang alloys
     Let wanton girls and boys                   10
 Cry over lovers' woes and broken toys
 Our waking life is sweeter than their dream

II

Dame Nature, with unwitting hand, Has sparsely strewn the black abyss with lights
 Minute, remote, and numberless We stand
     Measuring far depths and heights,
     Arched over by a laughing heaven,
 Intangible and never to be scaled
 If we confess our sins, they are forgiven
     We triumph, if we know we failed   20

III

Tears that in youth you shed, Congealed to pearls, now deck your silvery
     hair,
 Sighs breathed for loves long dead

Frosted the glittering atoms of the air
     Into the veils you wear Round your soft bosom and most queenly
     head,
     The shimmer of your gown Catches all tints of autumn, and the dew
 Of gardens where the damask roses blew,
 The myriad tapers from these arches hung
     Play on your diamonded crown,           31
 And stars, whose light angelical caressed
     Your virgin days,
 Give back in your calm eyes their holier rays
     The deep past living in your breast
 Heaves these half-merry sighs,
 And the soft accents of your tongue
 Breathe unrecorded charities

IV

Hasten not, the feast will wait,
 This is a master-night without a morrow   40
 No chill and haggard dawn, with after-sorrow,
     Will snuff the spluttering candle
     out,
 Or blanch the revellers homeward straggling late
     Before the rout Wearies or wanes, will come a calmer trance
 Lulled by the popped fragrance of this bower,
     We'll cheat the lapsing hour,
 And close our eyes, still smiling, on the dance

CLIFF KLINGENHAGEN

CLIFF KLINGENHAGEN had me in to dine With him one day, and after soup and meat,
 And all the other things there were to eat,
 Cliff took two glasses and filled one with wine
 And one with wormwood Then, without a sign
 For me to choose at all, he took the draught

Of bitterness himself, and lightly quaffed
 It off, and said the other one was mine

And when I asked him what the deuce he meant
 By doing that, he only looked at me   10
 And smiled, and said it was a way of his.
 And though I know the fellow, I have spent
 Long time a-wondering when I shall be
 As happy as Cliff Klingenhagen 15

RICHARD CORY

WHENEVER Richard Cory went down town,
 We people on the pavement looked at him
 He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
 Clean favored, and imperially slim

And he was always quietly arrayed,
 And he was always human when he talked,
 But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
 'Good-morning,' and he glittered when he walked

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
 And admirably schooled in every grace 10
 In fine, we thought that he was everything To make us wish that we were in his place

So on we worked, and waited for the light,
 And went without the meat, and cursed the bread,
 And Richard Cory, one calm summer night, Went home and put a bullet through his head 1897

HOW ANNANDALE WENT OUT

'THEY called it Annandale—and I was there
 To flourish, to find words, and to attend
 Liar, physician, hypocrite, and friend,
 I watched him, and the sight was not so fair
 As one or two that I have seen elsewhere
 An apparatus not for me to mend—
 A wreck, with hell between him and the end,
 Remained of Annandale, and I was there.

'I knew the ruin as I knew the man,
 So put the two together, if you can, 10
 Remembering the worst you know of me
 Now view yourself as I was, on the spot—
 With a slight kind of engine Do you see?
 Like this      You wouldn't hang me? I thought not '

MINIVER CHEEVY

MINIVER CHEEVY, child of scorn,
 Grew lean while he assailed the seasons,
 He wept that he was ever born,
 And he had reasons

Miniver loved the days of old When swords were bright and steeds were prancing,
 The vision of a warrior bold
 Would set him dancing.

Miniver sighed for what was not,
 And dreamed, and rested from his labors, 10
 He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot,
 And Priam's neighbors.

Miniver mourned the ripe renown
 That made so many a name so fragrant,
 He mourned Romance, now on the town,
 And Art, a vagrant.

Miniver loved the Medici,
 Albeit he had never seen one,
 He would have sinned incessantly
 Could he have been one 20

Miniver cursed the commonplace
 And eyed a khaki suit with loathing,
 He missed the mediæval grace
 Of iron clothing

Miniver scorned the gold he sought,
 But sore annoyed was he without it,
 Miniver thought, and thought, and thought,
 And thought about it

Miniver Cheevy, born too late,
 Scratched his head and kept on thinking,
 Miniver coughed and called it fate, 31
 And kept on drinking

FOR A DEAD LADY

No more with overflowing light
 Shall fill the eyes that now are faded,
 Nor shall another's fringe with night
 Their woman-hidden world as they did.
 No more shall quiver down the days
 The flowing wonder of her ways,
 Whereof no language may requite
 The shifting and the many-shaded.

The grace, divine, definitive,
 Clings only as a faint forestalling; 10
 The laugh that love could not forgive
 Is hushed, and answers to no calling;
 The forehead and the little ears
 Have gone where Saturn keeps the years;

The breast where roses could not live
Has done with rising and with falling.

The beauty, shattered by the laws
That have creation in their keeping,
No longer trembles at applause,
Or over children that are sleeping, 20
And we who delve in beauty's lore
Know all that we have known before
Of what inexorable cause
Makes Time so vicious in his reaping 1910

THE MASTER<sup>1</sup>

(LINCOLN)

A FLYING word from here and there
Had sown the name at which we sneered,
But soon the name was everywhere,
To be reviled and then revered
A presence to be loved and feared,
We cannot hide it, or deny
That we, the gentlemen who jeered,
May be forgotten by and by

He came when days were perilous
And hearts of men were sore beguiled, 10
And having made his note of us,
He pondered and was reconciled
Was ever master yet so mild
As he, and so untamable?
We doubted, even when he smiled,
Not knowing what he knew so well

He knew that undecieving fate
Would shame us whom he served unsought,

He knew that he must wince and wait—
The jest of those for whom he fought, 20
He knew devoutly what he thought
Of us and of our ridicule,
He knew that we must all be taught
Like little children in a school

We gave a glamour to the task
That he encountered and saw through,
But little of us did he ask,
And little did we ever do
And what appears if we review
The season when we railed and chaffed? 30
It is the face of one who knew
That we were learning while we laughed

<sup>1</sup> 'Supposed to have been written not long after the Civil War.' Author's note, Collected Poems (N.Y., 1937), 317

The face that in our vision feels Again the venom that we flung,
Transfigured to the world reveals
The vigilance to which we clung.
Shrewd, hallowed, harassed, and among
The mysteries that are untold,
The face we see was never young Nor could it wholly have been old. 40

For he, to whom we had applied
Our shopman's test of age and worth,
Was elemental when he died,
As he was ancient at his birth
The saddest among kings of earth,
Bowed with a galling crown, this man
Met rancor with a cryptic mirth, Laconic—and Olympian

The love, the grandeur, and the fame
Are bounded by the world alone, 50
The calm, the smouldering, and the flame
Of awful patience were his own
With him they are forever flown
Past all our fond self-shadowings,
Wherewith we cumber the Unknown
As with inept, Icarian wings

For we were not as other men
'Twas ours to soar and his to see,
But we are coming down again,
And we shall come down pleasantly, 60
Nor shall we longer disagree
On what it is to be sublime,
But flourish in our perigee
And have one Titan at a time

BEN JONSON ENTERTAINS A MAN FROM STRATFORD

YOU are a friend then, as I make it out,
Of our man Shakespeare, who alone of us
Will put an ass's head in Fairyland
As he would add a shilling to more shillings,
All most harmonious,—and out of his Miraculous inviolable increase Fills Ilion, Rome, or any town you like
Of olden time with timeless Englishmen,
And I must wonder what you think of
him—

All you down there where your small Avon flows 10
By Stratford, and where you're an Alderman

Some, for a guess, would have him riding back
To be a farrier there, or say a dyer,
Or maybe one of your adept surveyors;
Or like enough the wizard of all tanners
Not you—no fear of that, for I discern
In you a kindling of the flame that saves—
The nimble element, the true caloric,
I see it, and was told of it, moreover,
By our discriminate friend himself, no other 20
Had you been one of the sad average,
As he would have it,—meaning, as I take it,
The sinew and the solvent of our Island,
You'd not be buying beer for this Terpander's
Approved and estimated friend Ben Jonson, He'd never foist it as a part of his Contingent entertainment of a townsman
While he goes off rehearsing, as he must,
If he shall ever be the Duke of Stratford And my words are no shadow on your town— 30
Far from it, for one town's as like another As all are unlike London Oh, he knows
it,—
And there's the Stratford in him, he denies
it,
And there's the Shakespeare in him So,
God help him!
I tell him he needs Greek, but neither God
Nor Greek will help him Nothing will help that man
You see the fates have given him so much,
He must have all or perish,—or look out
Of London, where he sees too many lords They're part of half what ails him I suppose 40
There's nothing fouler down among the demons
Than what it is he feels when he remembers
The dust and sweat and ointment of his calling
With his lords looking on and laughing at
him
King as he is, he can't be king de facto,
And that's as well, because he wouldn't like
it;
He'd frame a lower rating of men then Than he has now, and after that would come
An abdication or an apoplexy
He can't be king, not even king of Stratford,— 50
Though half the world, if not the whole of it,

May crown him with a crown that fits no king
Save Lord Apollo's homesick emissary
Not there on Avon, or on any stream Where Naiads and their white arms are no more,
Shall he find home again. It's all too bad.
But there's a comfort, for he'll have that House—
The best you ever saw, and he'll be there 58
Anon, as you're an Alderman Good God!
He makes me lie awake o' nights and laugh.

And you have known him from his origin,
You tell me, and a most uncommon urchin
He must have been to the few seeing ones—
A trifle terrifying, I dare say,
Discovering a world with his man's eyes,
Quite as another lad might see some finches,
If he looked hard and had an eye for nature.
But this one had his eyes and their foretelling,
And he had you to fare with, and what else?
He must have had a father and a mother—
In fact I've heard him say so—and a dog, 71
As a boy should, I venture, and the dog,
Most likely, was the only man who knew
him.
A dog, for all I know, is what he needs
As much as anything right here to-day,
To counsel him about his disillusionings, Old aches, and parturitions of what's coming,—
A dog of orders, an emeritus,
To wag his tail at him when he comes home,
And then to put his paws up on his knees 80
And say, 'For God's sake, what's it all about?'

I don't know whether he needs a dog or not—
Or what he needs I tell him he needs Greek,
I'll talk of rules and Aristotle with him,
And if his tongue's at home he'll say to that,
'I have your word that Aristotle knows,
And you mine that I don't know Aristotle.'
He's all at odds with all the unities,
And what's yet worse, it doesn't seem to matter,
He treads along through Time's old wilderness 90
As if the tramp of all the centuries
Had left no roads—and there are none, for
him,

He doesn't see them, even with those
 eyes,—
 And that's a pity, or I say it is Accordingly we have him as we have him—
 Going his way, the way that he goes best,
 A pleasant animal with no great noise
 Or nonsense anywhere to set him off—
 Save only divers and inclement devils
 Have made of late his heart their dwelling place 100
 A flame half ready to fly out sometimes At some annoyance may be fanned up in
 him,
 But soon it falls, and when it falls goes out,
 He knows how little room there is in there
 For crude and futile animosities,
 And how much for the joy of being whole,
 And how much for long sorrow and old
 pain
 On our side there are some who may be given
 To grow old wondering what he thinks of us
 And some above us, who are, in his eyes, 110 Above himself,—and that's quite right and English
 Yet here we smile, or disappoint the gods
 Who made it so the gods have always eyes
 To see men scratch, and they see one down
 here
 Who itches, manor-bitten to the bone, Albeit he knows himself—yes, yes, he knows—
 The lord of more than England and of more Than all the seas of England in all time
 Shall ever wash D'ye wonder that I laugh?
 He sees me, and he doesn't seem to care,
 And why the devil should he? I can't tell
 you. 121

I'll meet him out alone of a bright Sunday, Trim, rather spruce, and quite the gentleman
 'What ho, my lord!' say I. He doesn't hear
 me,
 Wherefore I have to pause and look at him
 He's not enormous, but one looks at him
 A little on the round if you insist,
 For now, God save the mark, he's growing old,
 He's five and forty, and to hear him talk
 These days you'd call him eighty, then you'd add 130
 More years to that He's old enough to be The father of a world, and so he is

'Ben, you're a scholar, what's the time of day?'
 Says he, and there shines out of him again
 An aged light that has no age or station—
 The mystery that's his—a mischievous
 Half-mad serenity that laughs at fame
 For being won so easy, and at friends Who laugh at him for what he wants the most,
 And for his dukedom down in Warwickshire,— 140
 By which you see we're all a little jealous. . . .
 Poor Greene! I fear the color of his name
 Was even as that of his ascending soul,
 And he was one where there are many others,—
 Some scrivening to the end against their fate,
 Their puppets all in ink and all to die there,
 And some with hands that once would shade an eye
 That scanned Euripides and Æschylus
 Will reach by this time for a pot-house mop
 To slush their first and last of royalties 150
 Poor devils! and they all play to his hand,
 For so it was in Athens and old Rome.
 But that's not here or there, I've wandered off
 Greene does it, or I'm careful Where's that boy?

Yes, he'll go back to Stratford And we'll miss him?
 Dear sir, there'll be no London here without him
 We'll all be riding, one of these fine days, Down there to see him—and his wife won't like us,
 And then we'll think of what he never said
 Of women—which, if taken all in all 160
 With what he did say, would buy many horses
 Though nowadays he's not so much for women
 'So few of them,' he says, 'are worth the guessing'
 But there's a worm at work when he says
 that,
 And while he says it one feels in the air
 A deal of circumambient hocus-pocus They've had him dancing till his toes were tender,
 And he can feel 'em now, come chilly rains.
 There's no long cry for going into it,

However, and we don't know much about
 it 170
 But you in Stratford, like most here in London,
 Have more now in the Sonnets than you paid for,
 He's put one there with all her poison on,
 To make a singing fiction of a shadow
 That's in his life a fact, and always will be But she's no care of ours, though Time, I fear,
 Will have a more reverberant ado
 About her than about another one Who seems to have decoyed him, married
 him,
 And sent him scuttling on his way to London,— 180
 With much already learned, and more to learn,
 And more to follow Lord! how I see him
 now,
 Pretending, maybe trying, to be like us Whatever he may have meant, we never had
 him,
 He failed us, or escaped, or what you will,—
 And there was that about him (God knows what,— We'd flayed another had he tried it on us)
 That made as many of us as had wits
 More fond of all his easy distances Than one another's noise and clap-your-shoulder 190
 But think you not, my friend, he'd never talk!
 Talk? He was eldritch at it, and we listened—
 Thereby acquiring much we knew before
 About ourselves, and hitherto had held Irrelevant, or not prime to the purpose
 And there were some, of course, and there be now,
 Disordered and reduced amazedly
 To resignation by the mystic seal
 Of young finality the gods had laid On everything that made him a young demon, 200
 And one or two shot looks at him already
 As he had been their executioner,
 And once or twice he was, not knowing it,—
 Or knowing, being sorry for poor clay And saying nothing . . . Yet, for all his engines,
 You'll meet a thousand of an afternoon
 Who strut and sun themselves and see around 'em

A world made out of more that has a reason
 Than his, I swear, that he sees here to-day,
 Though he may scarcely give a Fool an exit
 But we mark how he sees in everything 211
 A law that, given that we flout it once too often,
 Brings fire and iron down on our naked heads
 To me it looks as if the power that made
 him,
 For fear of giving all things to one creature,
 Left out the first—faith, innocence, illusion,
 Whatever 'tis that keeps us out o' Bedlam,—
 And thereby, for his too consuming vision, Empowered him out of nature, though to see him,
 You'd never guess what's going on inside
 him 220
 He'll break out some day like a keg of ale
 With too much independent frenzy in it,
 And all for cellaring what he knows won't keep,
 And what he'd best forget—but that he can't You'll have it, and have more than I'm foretelling,
 And there'll be such a roaring at the Globe
 As never stunned the bleeding gladiators
 He'll have to change the color of its hair
 A bit, for now he calls it Cleopatra Black hair would never do for Cleopatra 230
 But you and I are not yet two old women,
 And you're a man of office What he does
 Is more to you than how it is he does it,—
 And that's what the Lord God has never told him
 They work together, and the Devil helps
 'em,
 They do it of a morning, or if not,
 They do it of a night, in which event
 He's peevish of a morning He seems old,
 He's not the proper stomach or the sleep—
 And they're two sovran agents to conserve
 him 240
 Against the fiery art that has no mercy
 But what's in that prodigious grand new House
 I gather something happening in his boyhood
 Fulfilled him with a boy's determination
 To make all Stratford 'ware of him. Well, well,
 I hope at last he'll have his joy of it,
 And all his pigs and sheep and bellowing beeves,

And frogs and owls and unicorns, moreover,
Be less than hell to his attendant ears.
Oh, past a doubt we'll all go down to see
him 250

He may be wise With London two days off, Down there some wind of heaven may yet revive him,

But there's no quickening breath from anywhere

Shall make of him again the poised young faun

From Warwickshire, who'd made, it seems, already

A legend of himself before I came
To blink before the last of his first lightning Whatever there be, there'll be no more of that,

The coming on of his old monster Time Has made him a still man, and he has dreams 260

Were fair to think on once, and all found hollow

He knows how much of what men paint themselves

Would blister in the light of what they are,
He sees how much of what was great now shares

An eminence transformed and ordinary,
He knows too much of what the world has hushed

In others, to be loud now for himself,
He knows now at what height low enemies May reach his heart, and high friends let him fall,

But what not even such as he may know 270
Bedevils him the worst his lark may sing
At heaven's gate how he will, and for as long

As joy may listen, but he sees no gate,
Save one whereat the spent clay waits a little
Before the churchyard has it, and the worm
Not long ago, late in an afternoon,
I came on him unseen down Lambeth way,
And on my life I was afraid of him
He gloomed and mumbled like a soul from Tophet,

His hands behind him and his head bent solemn 280

'What is it now,' said I, 'another woman?'
That made him sorry for me, and he smiled.
'No, Ben,' he mused, 'it's Nothing. It's all Nothing

We come, we go, and when we're done,
we're done,

Spiders and flies—we're mostly one or t'other—

We come, we go, and when we're done,
we're done',

'By God, you sing that song as if you knew
it'

Said I, by way of cheering him, 'what ails ye?'

'I think I must have come down here to think,'

Says he to that, and pulls his little beard,
'Your fly will serve as well as anybody, 291 And what's his hour? He flies, and flies, and flies,

And in his fly's mind has a brave appearance,

And then your spider gets him in her net,
And eats him out, and hangs him up to dry
That's Nature, the kind mother of us all
And then your slattern housemaid swings her broom,

And where's your spider? And that's Nature, also

It's Nature, and it's Nothing It's all
Nothing

It's all a world where bugs and emperors
Go singularly back to the same dust, 301
Each in his time, and the old, ordered stars
That sang together, Ben, will sing the same Old stave to-morrow'

When he talks like that,
There's nothing for a human man to do But lead him to some grateful nook like this

Where we be now, and there to make him drink

He'll drink, for love of me, and then be sick,
A sad sign always in a man of parts, 310
And always very ominous The great
Should be as large in liquor as in love,—
And our great friend is not so large in either

One disaffects him, and the other fails him,
Whatso he drinks that has an antic in it,
He's wondering what's to pay in his insides,
And while his eyes are on the Cyprian
He's fribbling all the time with that damned
House

We laugh here at his thrift, but after all It may be thrift that saves him from the devil, 321

God gave it, anyhow,—and we'll suppose
He knew the compound of his handiwork
To-day the clouds are with him, but anon

He'll out of 'em enough to shake the tree
Of life itself and bring down fruit unheard-of,—

And, throwing in the bruised and whole
together,

Prepare a wine to make us drunk with wonder,

And if he live, there'll be a sunset spell
Thrown over him as over a glassed lake
That yesterday was all a black wild water.

God send he live to give us, if no more, 331
What now's a-rampage in him, and exhibit,
With a decent half-allegiance to the ages
An earnest of at least a casual eye Turned once on what he owes to Gutenberg,

And to the fealty of more centuries
Than are as yet a picture in our vision
'There's time enough—I'll do it when I'm old,

And we're immortal men,' he says to that,
And then he says to me, 'Ben, what's "immortal?"' 340

Think you by any force of ordination
It may be nothing of a sort more noisy
Than a small oblivion of component ashes
That of a dream-addicted world was once A moving atomy much like your friend
here?

Nothing will help that man To make him
laugh,

I said then he was a mad mountebank,—
And by the Lord I nearer made him cry
I could have cat an eft then, on my knees,
Tail, claws, and all of him, for I had stung
The king of men, who had no sting for
me, 351

And I had hurt him in his memories,
And I say now, as I shall say again,
I love the man this side idolatry.

He'll do it when he's old, he says I wonder.
He may not be so ancient as all that
For such as he, the thing that is to do
Will do itself,—but there's a reckoning;
The sessions that are now too much his own,

The roiling inward of a still outside, 360
The churning out of all those blood-fed lines,

The nights of many schemes and little sleep,

The full brain hammered hot with too much thinking,

The vexed heart over-worn with too much aching,—

This weary jangling of conjoined affairs
Made out of elements that have no end,
And all confused at once, I understand,
Is not what makes a man to live forever.

O no, not now! He'll not be going now.
There'll be time yet for God knows what explosions 370

Before he goes. He'll stay awhile. Just wait

Just wait a year or two for Cleopatra,
For she's to be a balsam and a comfort;
And that's not all a jape of mine now,
either

For granted once the old way of Apollo Sings in a man, he may then, if he's able,
Strike unafraid whatever strings he will
Upon the last and wildest of new lyres;
Nor out of his new magic, though it hymn
The shrieks of dungeoned hell, shall he create 380

A madness or a gloom to shut quite out
A cleaving daylight, and a last great calm Triumphant over shipwreck and all storms.
He might have given Aristotle creeps, But surely would have given him his katharsis.

He'll not be going yet There's too much yet

Unsung within the man But when he goes,

I'd stake ye coin o' the realm his only care

For a phantom world he sounded and found wanting

Will be a portion here, a portion there, 390
Of this or that thing or some other thing
That has a patent and intrinsic
Equivalence in those egregious shillings
And yet he knows, God help him! Tell me,
now,

If ever there was anything let loose
On earth by gods or devils heretofore
Like this mad, careful, proud, indifferent Shakespeare!

Where was it, if it ever was? By heaven,
'Twas never yet in Rhodes or Pergamon—
In Thebes or Nineveh, a thing like this! 400
No thing like this was ever out of England;
And thus he knows. I wonder if he cares.
Perhaps he does . . . O Lord, that House in Stratford!

FLAMMONDE

THE man Flammonde, from God knows where,

With firm address and foreign air,
With news of nations in his talk
And something royal in his walk,
With glint of iron in his eyes,
But never doubt, nor yet surprise, Appeared, and stayed, and held his
head
As one by kings accredited

Erect, with his alert repose
About him, and about his clothes, 10
He pictured all tradition hears
Of what we owe to fifty years
His cleansing heritage of taste
Paraded neither want nor waste,
And what he needed for his fee
To live, he borrowed graciously

He never told us what he was,
Or what mischance, or other cause,
Had banished him from better days
To play the Prince of Castaways 20
Meanwhile he played surpassing well
A part, for most, unplayable,
In fine, one pauses, half afraid
To say for certain that he played.

For that, one may as well forego
Conviction as to yes or no,
Nor can I say just how intense
Would then have been the difference
To several, who, having striven 30
In vain to get what he was given,
Would see the stranger taken on
By friends not easy to be won

Moreover, many a malcontent
He soothed and found munificent,
His courtesy beguiled and foiled
Suspicion that his years were soiled,
His mien distinguished any crowd,
His credit strengthened when he bowed,
And women, young and old, were fond
Of looking at the man Flammonde 40

There was a woman in our town
On whom the fashion was to frown,
But while our talk renewed the tinge
Of a long-faded scarlet fringe,
The man Flammonde saw none of that,
And what he saw we wondered at—

That none of us, in her distress,
Could hide or find our littleness.

There was a boy that all agreed
Had shut within him the rare seed 50
Of learning We could understand,
But none of us could lift a hand.
The man Flammonde appraised the youth,
And told a few of us the truth,
And thereby, for a little gold,
A flowered future was unrolled

There were two citizens who fought
For years and years, and over nought,
They made life awkward for their friends,
And shortened their own dividends 60
The man Flammonde said what was wrong
Should be made right, nor was it long Before they were again in line,
And had each other in to dine

And these I mention are but four
Of many out of many more
So much for them But what of him—
So firm in every look and limb?
What small satanic sort of kink 70
Was in his brain? What broken link Withheld him from the destinies
That came so near to being his?

What was he, when we came to sift
His meaning, and to note the drift
Of incommunicable ways
That make us ponder while we praise?
Why was it that his charm revealed
Somehow the surface of a shield?
What was it that we never caught?
What was he, and what was he not? 80

How much it was of him we met
We cannot ever know, nor yet Shall all he gave us quite atone
For what was his, and his alone;
Nor need we now, since he knew best,
Nourish an ethical unrest Rarely at once will nature give
The power to be Flammonde and live

We cannot know how much we learn
From those who never will return, 90
Until a flash of unforeseen Remembrance falls on what has been.
We've each a darkening hull to climb,
And this is why, from time to time

In Tilbury Town, we look beyond Horizons for the man Flammonde.

THE MAN AGAINST THE SKY<sup>1</sup>

BETWEEN me and the sunset, like a dome
Against the glory of a world on fire,
Now burned a sudden hull,
Bleak, round, and high, by flame-lit height made higher,
With nothing on it for the flame to kill Save one who moved and was alone up
there
To loom before the chaos and the glare
As if he were the last god going home
Unto his last desire

Dark, marvelous, and inscrutable he moved on 10
Till down the fiery distance he was gone,
Like one of those eternal, remote things
That range across a man's imaginings
When a sure music fills him and he knows
What he may say thereafter to few men,—
The touch of ages having wrought
An echo and a glimpse of what he thought
A phantom or a legend until then,
For whether lighted over ways that save,
Or lured from all repose, 20
If he go on too far to find a grave,
Mostly alone he goes

Even he, who stood where I had found him,
On high with fire all round him,
Who moved along the molten west,
And over the round hill's crest
That seemed half ready with him to go down,
Flame-bitten and flame-cleft,
As if there were to be no last thing left
Of a nameless unimaginable town,— 30 Even he who climbed and vanished may have taken Down to the perils of a depth not known,
From death defended though by men forsaken,
The bread that every man must eat alone,
He may have walked while others hardly dared

Look on to see him stand where many fell,
And upward out of that, as out of hell,
He may have sung and striven
To mount where more of him shall yet be given,
Bereft of all retreat, 40
To sevenfold heat,—
As on a day when three in Dura shared
The furnace, and were spared
For glory by that king of Babylon Who made himself so great that God, who heard,
Covered him with long feathers, like a bird.

Again, he may have gone down easily,
By comfortable altitudes, and found,
As always, underneath him solid ground
Whereon to be sufficient and to stand 50
Possessed already of the promised land,
Far stretched and fair to see
A good sight, verily,
And one to make the eyes of her who bore
him
Shine glad with hidden tears
Why question of his ease of who before
him,
In one place or another where they left Their names as far behind them as their bones,
And yet by dint of slaughter toil and theft,
And shrewdly sharpened stones, 60
Carved hard the way for his ascendancy
Through deserts of lost years?
Why trouble him now who sees and hears
No more than what his innocence requires,
And therefore to no other height aspires Than one at which he neither quails nor tires?
He may do more by seeing what he sees
Than others eager for iniquities,
He may, by seeing all things for the best,
Incite futurity to do the rest 70

Or with an even likelihood,
He may have met with atrabilious eyes
The fires of time on equal terms and passed Indifferently down, until at last
His only kind of grandeur would have been,
Apparently, in being seen.
He may have had for evil or for good
No argument, he may have had no care
For what without himself went anywhere
To failure or to glory, and least of all 80
For such a stale, flamboyant miracle;
He may have been the prophet of an art

<sup>1</sup> Robinson wrote, 7 Jan 1932, in answer to a query
'Perhaps "The Man against the Sky" comes as near as anything to representing my poetic vision—as you are good enough to call it' Univ. of Colorado Studies, XIX.1, to face 318

Immovable to old idolatries,
 He may have been a player without a part,
 Annoyed that even the sun should have the skies
 For such a flaming way to advertise,
 He may have been a painter sick at heart
 With Nature's toiling for a new surprise,
 He may have been a cynic, who now, for all
 Of anything divine that his effete 90
 Negation may have tasted,
 Saw truth in his own image, rather small,
 Forbore to fever the ephemeral,
 Found any barren height a good retreat
 From any swarming street,
 And in the sun saw power superbly wasted;
 And when the primitive old-fashioned stars
 Came out again to shine on joys and wars
 More primitive, and all arrayed for doom,
 He may have proved a world a sorry thing
 In his imagining, 101
 And life a lighted highway to the tomb

Or, mounting with infirm unsearching tread,
 His hopes to chaos led,
 He may have stumbled up there from the past,
 And with an aching strangeness viewed the last Abysmal conflagration of his dreams,—
 A flame where nothing seems
 To burn but flame itself, by nothing fed;
 And while it all went out, 110
 Not even the faint anodyne of doubt
 May then have eased a painful going down
 From pictured heights of power and lost renown,
 Revealed at length to his outlived endeavor
 Remote and unapproachable forever,
 And at his heart there may have gnawed Sick memories of a dead faith foiled and flawed
 And long dishonored by the living death
 Assigned alike by chance
 To brutes and hierophants, 120
 And anguish fallen on those he loved around
     him
 May once have dealt the last blow to confound him,
 And so have left him as death leaves a child,
 Who sees it all too near,
 And he who knows no young way to forget
 May struggle to the tomb unreconciled.
 Whatever suns may rise or set

There may be nothing kinder for him here
 Than shafts and agonies,
 And under these 130
 He may cry out and stay on horribly,
 Or, seeing in death too small a thing to fear,
 He may go forward like a stoic Roman Where pangs and terrors in his pathway lie,—
 Or, seizing the swift logic of a woman,
 Curse God and die

Or maybe there, like many another one Who might have stood aloft and looked ahead,
 Black-drawn against wild red,
 He may have built, unawed by fiery gules 140
 That in him no commotion stirred,
 A living reason out of molecules
 Why molecules occurred,
 And one for smiling when he might have sighed
 Had he seen far enough,
 And in the same inevitable stuff
 Discovered an odd reason too for pride
 In being what he must have been by laws
 Infrangible and for no kind of cause
 Deterred by no confusion or surprise 150
 He may have seen with his mechanic eyes
 A world without a meaning, and had room,
 Alone amid magnificence and doom,
 To build himself an airy monument
 That should, or fail him in his vague intent, Outlast an accidental universe—
 To call it nothing worse—
 Or, by the burrowing gule
 Of Time disintegrated and effaced, Like once-remembered mighty trees go
     down 160
 To ruin, of which by man may now be traced
 No part sufficient even to be rotten,
 And in the book of things that are forgotten
 Is entered as a thing not quite worth while
 He may have been so great That satraps would have shivered at his frown,
 And all he prized alive may rule a state
 No larger than a grave that holds a clown,
 He may have been a master of his fate,
 And of his atoms,—ready as another 170
 In his emergence to exonerate
 His father and his mother,
 He may have been a captain of a host,
 Self-eloquent and ripe for prodigies,

Doomed here to swell by dangerous degrees,
And then give up the ghost Nahum's great grasshoppers were such as these,
Sun-scattered and soon lost

Whatever the dark road he may have taken,
This man who stood on high 180
And faced alone the sky,
Whatever drove or lured or guided him,—
A vision answering a faith unshaken,
An easy trust assumed by easy trials,
A sick negation born of weak denials,
A crazed abhorrence of an old condition,
A blind attendance on a brief ambition,— Whatever stayed him or derided him,
His way was even as ours,
And we, with all our wounds and all our powers, 190
Must each await alone at his own height
Another darkness or another light,
And there, of our poor self dominion reft,
If inference and reason shun
Hell, Heaven, and Oblivion,
May thwarted will (perforce precarious,
But for our conservation better thus)
Have no misgiving left
Of doing yet what here we leave undone?
Or if unto the last of these we cleave, 200
Believing or protesting we believe
In such an idle and ephemeral
Florescence of the diabolical,—
If, robbed of two fond old enormities,
Our being had no onward auguries,
What then were this great love of ours to say
For launching other lives to voyage again
A little farther into time and pain,
A little faster in a futile chase
For a kingdom and a power and a Race 210
That would have still in sight
A manifest end of ashes and eternal night?
Is this the music of the toys we shake
So loud,—as if there might be no mistake Somewhere in our indomitable will?
Are we no greater than the noise we make Along one blind atomic pilgrimage
Whereon by crass chance billeted we go Because our brains and bones and cartilage
Will have it so? 220
If this we say, then let us all be still
About our share in it, and live and die
More quietly thereby

Where was he going, this man against the sky?
You know not, nor do I
But this we know, if we know anything:
That we may laugh and fight and sing
And of our transience here make offering
To an orient Word that will not be erased,
Or, save in incommunicable gleams 230
Too permanent for dreams,
Be found or known
No tonic and ambitious irritant
Of increase or of want
Has made an otherwise insensate waste
Of ages overthrown
A ruthless, veiled, implacable foretaste
Of other ages that are still to be Depleted and rewarded variously Because a few, by fate's economy, 240
Shall seem to move the world the way it goes,
No soft evangel of equality,
Safe-cradled in a communal repose
That huddles into death and may at last
Be covered well with equatorial snows—
And all for what, the devil only knows—
Will aggregate an inkling to confirm
The credit of a sage or of a worm,
Or tell us why one man in five
Should have a care to stay alive 250
While in his heart he feels no violence
Laid on his humor and intelligence
When infant Science makes a pleasant face
And waves again that hollow toy, the Race,
No planetary trap where souls are wrought
For nothing but the sake of being caught
And sent again to nothing will attune
Itself to any key of any reason Why man should hunger through another season
To find out why 'twere better late than soon 260
To go away and let the sun and moon
And all the silly stars illuminate
A place for creeping things,
And those that root and trumpet and have
wings,
And herd and ruminate,
Or dive and flash and poise in rivers and seas,
Or by their loyal tails in lofty trees
Hang screeching lewd victorious derision
Of man's immortal vision

Shall we, because Eternity records 270

Too vast an answer for the time-born words

We spell, whereof so many are dead that once

In our capricious lexicons

Were so alive and final, hear no more

The Word itself, the living word

That none alive has ever heard

Or ever spelt,

And few have ever felt

Without the fears and old surrenderings

And terrors that began

When Death let fall a feather from his 280
wings

And humbled the first man?

Because the weight of our humility,

Wherefrom we gain

A little wisdom and much pain,

Falls here too sore and there too tedious,

Are we in anguish or complacency,

Not looking far enough ahead

To see by what mad couriers we are led 290
Along the roads of the ridiculous,

To pity ourselves and laugh at faith

And while we curse life bear it?

And if we see the soul's dead end in death,
Are we to fear it?

What folly is here that has not yet a name

Unless we say outright that we are liars?

What have we seen beyond our sunset fires

That lights again the way by which we came?

Why pay we such a price, and one we give

So clamoringly, for each racked empty
day 300

That leads one more last human hope
away,

As quiet fiends would lead past our crazed
eyes

Our children to an unseen sacrifice?

If after all that we have lived and thought,

All comes to Nought,—

If there be nothing after Now,

And we be nothing anyhow,

And we know that,—why live?

'Twere sure but weaklings' vain distress

To suffer dungeons where so many doors

Will open on the cold eternal shores 311

That look sheer down

To the dark tideless floods of Nothingness

Where all who know may drown.

JOHN GORHAM

'TELL me what you're doing over here,

John Gorham,

Sighing hard and seeming to be sorry when you're not;

Make me laugh or let me go now, for long faces in the moonlight

Are a sign for me to say again a word that you forgot.'—

'I'm over here to tell you what the moon already

May have said or maybe shouted ever since a year ago,

I'm over here to tell you what you are Jane Wayland,

And to make you rather sorry, I should say, for being so '—

'Tell me what you're saying to me now,
John Gorham,

Or you'll never see as much of me as ribbons any more, 10

I'll vanish in as many ways as I have toes and fingers,

And you'll not follow far for one where flocks have been before '—

'I'm sorry now you never saw the flocks,
Jane Wayland,

But you're the one to make of them as many as you need

And then about the vanishing It's I who mean to vanish,

And when I'm here no longer you'll be done with me indeed '—

'That's a way to tell me what I am, John Gorham!

How am I to know myself until I make you smile?

Try to look as if the moon were making faces at you,

And a little more as if you meant to stay a little while '— 20

'You are what it is that over rose-blown gardens

Makes a pretty flutter for a season in the sun,

You are what it is that with a mouse, Jane Wayland,

Catches him and lets him go and eats him up for fun '—

'Sure I never took you for a mouse, John Gorham,
All you say is easy, but so far from being true
That I wish you wouldn't ever be again the one to think so,
For it isn't cats and butterflies that I would be to you.'—

'All your little animals are in one picture—
One I've had before me since a year ago to-night, 30
And the picture where they live will be of you, Jane Wayland, Till you find a way to kill them or to keep them out of sight '—

'Won't you ever see me as I am, John
Gorham,
Leaving out the foolishness and all I never meant?
Somewhere in me there's a woman, if you know the way to find her Will you like me any better if I prove it and repent?'—

'I doubt if I shall ever have the time, Jane Wayland,
And I dare say all this moonlight lying round us might as well Fall for nothing on the shards of broken
urns that are forgotten,
As on two that have no longer much of anything to tell ' 40

EROS TURANNOS

SHE fears him, and will always ask
What fated her to choose him;
She meets in his engaging mask
All reasons to refuse him;
But what she meets and what she fears
Are less than are the downward years,
Drawn slowly to the foamless weirs
Of age, were she to lose him.

Between a blurred sagacity
That once had power to sound him, 10
And Love, that will not let him be
The Judas that she found him,
Her pride assuages her almost,
As if it were alone the cost —
He sees that he will not be lost,
And waits and looks around him.

A sense of ocean and old trees
Envelops and allures him;
Tradition, touching all he sees,
Beguiles and reassures him; 20
And all her doubts of what he says
Are dimmed with what she knows of days—
Till even prejudice delays
And fades, and she secures him.

The falling leaf inaugurates
The reign of her confusion;
The pounding wave reverberates
The dirge of her illusion,
And home, where passion lived and died,
Becomes a place where she can hide, 30
While all the town and harbor side
Vibrate with her seclusion.

We tell you, tapping on our brows,
The story as it should be,—
As if the story of a house
Were told, or ever could be,
We'll have no kindly veil between Her visions and those we have seen,—
As if we guessed what hers have been,
Or what they are or would be 40

Meanwhile we do no harm, for they
That with a god have striven,
Not hearing much of what we say,
Take what the god has given,
Though like waves breaking it may be,
Or like a changed familiar tree,
Or like a stairway to the sea
Where down the blind are driven.

THE GIFT OF GOD

BLESSED with a joy that only she
Of all alive shall ever know,
She wears a proud humility
For what it was that willed it so,—
That her degree should be so great
Among the favored of the Lord
That she may scarcely bear the weight
Of her bewildering reward.

As one apart, immune, alone,
Or featured for the shining ones, 10
And like to none that she has known
Of other women's other sons,—
The firm fruition of her need,
He shines anointed, and he blurs
Her vision, till it seems indeed
A sacrilege to call him hers.

She fears a little for so much
 Of what is best, and hardly dares
 To think of him as one to touch
 With aches, indignities, and cares; 20
 She sees him rather at the goal,
 Still shining, and her dream foretells
 The proper shining of a soul
 Where nothing ordinary dwells.

Perchance a canvass of the town
 Would find him far from flags and shouts,
 And leave him only the renown
 Of many smiles and many doubts;
 Perchance the crude and common tongue
 Would havoc strangely with his worth, 30
 But she, with innocence unwrung,
 Would read his name around the earth.

And others, knowing how this youth
 Would shine, if love could make him great,
 When caught and tortured for the truth
 Would only writhe and hesitate,
 While she, arranging for his days
 What centuries could not fulfill,
 Transmutes him with her faith and praise,
 And has him shining where she will. 40

She crowns him with her gratefulness,
 And says again that life is good,
 And should the gift of God be less
 In him than in her motherhood,
 His fame, though vague, will not be small,
 As upward through her dream he fares,
 Half clouded with a crimson fall
 Of roses thrown on marble stairs.

THE DARK HILLS

DARK hills at evening in the west,
 Where sunset hovers like a sound
 Of golden horns that sang to rest
 Old bones of warriors under ground,
 Far now from all the bannered ways
 Where flash the legions of the sun,
 You fade—as if the last of days
 Were fading, and all wars were done.

MR. FLOOD'S PARTY

OLD Eben Flood, climbing alone one night
 Over the hill between the town below
 And the forsaken upland hermitage
 That held as much as he should ever know

On earth again of home, paused warily.
 The road was his with not a native near;
 And Eben, having leisure, said aloud,
 For no man else in Tilbury Town to hear

'Well, Mr Flood, we have the harvest moon
 Again, and we may not have many more, 10
 The bird is on the wing, the poet says,
 And you and I have said it here before Drink to the bird.' He raised up to the light
 The jug that he had gone so far to fill,
 And answered huskily: 'Well, Mr Flood, Since you propose it, I believe I will.'

Alone, as if enduring to the end
 A valiant armor of scarred hopes outworn,
 He stood there in the middle of the road
 Like Roland's ghost winding a silent horn.
 Below him, in the town among the trees, 21
 Where friends of other days had honored
 him,
 A phantom salutation of the dead
 Rang thinly till old Eben's eyes were dim

Then, as a mother lays her sleeping child
 Down tenderly, fearing it may awake,
 He set the jug down slowly at his feet
 With trembling care, knowing that most things break,
 And only when assured that on firm earth
 It stood, as the uncertain lives of men 30
 Assuredly did not, he paced away,
 And with his hand extended paused again

'Well, Mr Flood, we have not met like this In a long time, and many a change has come To both of us, I fear, since last it was
 We had a drop together 'Welcome home!'
 Convivially returning with himself,
 Again he raised the jug up to the light;
 And with an acquiescent quaver said
 'Well, Mr Flood, if you insist, I might. 40

'Only a very little, Mr Flood—For auld lang syne No more, sir, that will do'

So, for the time, apparently it did,
 And Eben evidently thought so too,
 For soon amid the silver loneliness
 Of night he lifted up his voice and sang,
 Secure, with only two moons listening,
 Until the whole harmonious landscape rang—

'For auld lang syne' The weary throat gave out,
 The last word wavered, and the song was done 50
 He raised again the jug regretfully
 And shook his head, and was again alone.
 There was not much that was ahead of
 him,
 And there was nothing in the town below—
 Where strangers would have shut the many doors
 That many friends had opened long ago.

THE SHEAVES

WHERE long the shadows of the wind had rolled,
 Green wheat was yielding to the change assigned,
 And as by some vast magic undivined
 The world was turning slowly into gold
 Like nothing that was ever bought or sold
 It waited there, the body and the mind,
 And with a mighty meaning of a kind
 That tells the more the more it is not told

 So in a land where all days are not fair,
 Fair days went on till on another day 10
 A thousand golden sheaves were lying there,
 Shining and still, but not for long to stay—
 As if a thousand girls with golden hair Might rise from where they slept and go

NEW ENGLAND<sup>1</sup>

HERE where the wind is always north-northeast
 And children learn to walk on frozen toes, Wonder begets an envy of all those Who boil elsewhere with such a lyric yeast
 Of love that you will hear them at a feast

1 Concerning a misinterpretation of this sonnet in a correspondent's letter to The Gardiner [Me] Journal, Robinson wrote, 7 Feb 1924, in answer ' . . . he will see that the whole thing is a satirical attack not upon New England, but upon the same patronizing pagans whom he [the correspondent] flays with such vehemence in his own poem. As a matter of fact, I cannot quite see how the first eight lines of my sonnet are to be regarded as even intelligible if read in any other way than as an oblique attack upon all those who are forever throwing dead cats at New England for its alleged emotional and moral frigidity.' Quoted, Hogan, A Bibliography of Robinson (New Haven, 1936), 179-80

Where demons would appeal for some repose,
 Still clamoring where the chalice overflows
 And crying wildest who have drunk the least.

Passion is here a soilage of the wits, We're told, and Love a cross for them to bear, 10
 Joy shivers in the corner where she knits
 And Conscience always has the rockingchair,
 Cheerful as when she tortured into fits
 The first cat that was ever killed by Care.

FROM TRISTRAM

TRISTRAM AND ISOLT
OF IRELAND<sup>2</sup>

'God knows,' he said,
 'How far a man may be from his deserving
 And yet be fated for the undeserved' 470
 I might, were I the lord of your misgivings,
 Be worthier of them for destroying them,
 And even without the mightiness in me
 For that, I'll tell you, for your contemplation,
 Time is not life For many, and many more,
 Living is mostly for a time not dying—
 But not for me For me, a few more years
 Of shows and slaughters, or the unseal seat
 Of a small throne, would not be life
 Whatever
 It is that fills life high and full, till fate 480
 Itself may do no more, it is not time.
 Years are not life'

'I have not come so far
 To learn,' she said, and shook her head at
 him,
 'What years are, for I know. Years are not life,
 Years are the shells of life, and empty shells
 When they hold only days, and days, and days
 God knows if I know that—so let it pass.
 Let me forget, and let me ask you only
 Not to forget that all your feats at arms, 490
 Your glamour that is almost above envy,
 Your strength and eminence and everything,

2 The title is given by the editors

Leave me a woman still—a one-love
 woman,
 Meaning a sort of ravenous one-child
 mother,
 Whose one-love pictures in her composition
 Panthers and antelopes, children asleep,
 And all sorts of engaging animals
 That most resemble a much-disordered queen,
 Her crown abandoned and her hair in peril,
 And she herself a little deranged, no doubt,
 With too much happiness Whether he lives
 Or dies for her, he tells her is no matter, 502
 Wherefore she must obediently believe
 him
 All he would ask of her would be as easy
 As hearing waves, washing the shore down
 there
 For ever, and believing herself drowned
 In seeing so many of her, he might believe her
 To be as many at once as drops of rain,
 Perhaps a panther and a child asleep
 At the same time ' 510

He saw dark laughter sparkling
 Out of her eyes, but only until her face
 Found his, and on his mouth a moving fire

Told him why there was death, and what lost song
 Ulysses heard, and would have given his hands
 And friends to follow and to die for. Slowly,
 At last, the power of helplessness there was
 In all that beauty of hers that was for him, Breathing and burning there alone with
 him,
 Until it was almost a part of him, 520
 Suffused his passion with a tenderness Attesting a sealed certainty not his
 To cozen or wrench from fate, and one withheld
 In waiting mercy from oblivious eyes—
 His eyes and hers, that over darker water, Where darker things than shadows would be coming,
 Saw now no more than more stars in the sky
 He felt her throbbing softly in his arms,
 And held her closer still—with half a fear
 Returning that she might not be Isolt, 530
 And might yet vanish where she sat with
 him,
 Leaving him there alone, with only devils
 Of hell supplanting her

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

1876—

TOM MOONEY

1

TOM MOONEY sits behind a grating,
 Beside a corridor (He's waiting )
 Long since he picked or peeled or bit away
 The last white callous from his palms, they say
 The crick is gone from out his back,
 And all the grease and grime Gone from each finger-nail and every knuckle-crack
 (And that took time.)

2

Tom Mooney breathes behind a grating,
 Beside a corridor (He's waiting ) 10
 The Gold-men from ten cities hear in sleep
 Tom Mooney breathing—for he breathes so deep.

The Gold-men from ten cities rise from bed
 To make a brass crown for Tom Mooney's
 head,
 They gather round great oaken desks—
 each twists
 Two copper bracelets for Tom Mooney's wrists
 And down sky-scraper basements (all their own)
 They forge the spikes for his galvanic throne
 The Gold-men love the jests of old Misrule—
 At ease at last, they'll laugh their fill, 20 They'll deck Tom Mooney king, they will—
 King over knave and fool
 And from enameled doors of rearward office-vaults, Lettered in gold with names that never crack,

They will draw back the triple iron bolts,
Then scatter from the ridges of their roofs
The affidavits of their paper-proofs
Of pallid Tomfool's low and lubber stock.

3

Tom Mooney thinks behind a grating,
Beside a corridor (He's waiting) 30
(Tom Mooney free was but a laboring man, Tom Mooney jailed's the Thinker of Rodin)

The Workers in ten nations now have caught
The roll and rhythm of Tom Mooney's thought—

By that earth-girdling S O S,
The subtle and immortal wireless
Of Man's strong justice in distress
The Workers in ten nations think and plan
The pick-ax little Naples man,
The rice-swamp coolies in Japan 40
(No longer mere embroidery on a screen),
The crowds that swarm from factory gates,
At yellow dusks with all their hates,
In Ireland, Austria, Argentine,
In England, France, and Russia far (That slew a Czar),—

Or where the Teutons lately rent
The Iron Cross (on finding what it meant),
At yellow dusks with all their hates
From fiery shops or gas-choked mines, 50
From round-house, mill, or lumber-pines,
In the broad belt of these United States
The Workers, like the Gold-men, plan and wake,—

What bodes their waking?
The Workers, like the Gold-men, something make,—
What are they making?—
The Gold-men answer often—
'They make Tom Mooney's coffin.'

4

Tom Mooney talks behind a grating,
Beside a corridor (He's waiting) 60
You cannot get quite near Against the bars to lay your ear;
You find the light too dim
To spell the lips of him
But, like a beast's within a zoo (That was of old a god to savage clans),
His body shakes at you—
A beast's, a god's, a man's!
And from its ponderous, ancient rhythmic shaking

Ye'll guess what 'tis the workers now are making. 70

They make for times to come
From times of old—how old!—
From sweat, from blood, from hunger, and from tears,

From scraps of hope (conserved through bitter years

Despite the might and mockery of gold),
They make, these haggard men, a bomb,—
These haggard men with shawl-wives dumb

And pinched-faced children cold, Descendants of the oldest, earth-born stock,

Gnarled brothers of the surf, the ice, the fire, the rock, 80

Gray wolf and gaunt storm-bird
They make a bomb more fierce than dynamite,—

They weld a Word
And on the awful night
The Gold-men set Tom Mooney grinning (If such an hour shall be in truth's despite) They'll loose the places of much underpinning

In more than ten big cities, left and right

FROM TWO LIVES<sup>1</sup>

I

VIII

ONE night when early winter had begun
With gusty snows and frosty stars to keep Our lives still closer, and our love more deep
Than even in autumn wanderings with the sun,

x 'The austere form itself, the sonnet (if in any organic creation, whether oak-tree or poem, one can separate "form" itself from essence, meaning, end) grew inevitably out of the need, an absolute need, of an especially austere control, masterful and unrelenting, over especially intense and fierce emotional experience, while a certain freedom resulted from variations within the norm (rime-arrangement, management of the "turn," etc.) and from linking sonnets as stanzas (both in narrative progress and in end-enjambements) Two Lives is not a "sonnet-sequence" I seemed to be speaking directly to a few friends. The reworking of the raw stuff of life was in part the impersonal urge of art—as in the simplifications of time and action, and in the college atmosphere conceived as a little more intimate than that of a latter-day State university. The speech I used I had learned from my father's house, from schoolmates, from New England farmers, from Agatha

One night when we together, one-and-one,
 Were sitting in the cushioned window-space,
 Planning some purple flower-beds for the place
 After our marriage, with new vines to run
 About the basement wall, one night when time
 Seemed all to come, and at its coming ours,
 And we (as by an irony, sublime 11
 In its gaunt mockery of human powers!)
 Drifted at last backward to clime and clime
 And years and years of uncompanioned hours,

From her own lips I learned the awful truth—
 Which, like a child of hope with perfect
   smile,
 She babbled, O so innocent of guile—
 As some adventure of an alien youth,
 Rescued by white sails from a midsea isle
 Of shrieking beaks and fins and claws uncouth, 20
 Or eery dream demanding never ruth Because but dream and vanished the long while—
 As something far and strange that I should hear
 And why? Because she would conceal me naught,
 As bound in honor? No Because of fear I'd learn of others some day? No —She thought
 Her lover would rejoice—rejoice to share
 Her exaltation after such despair

From her own lips—yes, even as they smiled—
 I learned full truth 'In France, five years ago 30

herself, and from some old acquaintances, like Shakespeare, Byron, Wordsworth, and Emerson. For me one organic complex of speech This was in 1913, remember, before the Poetic Renaissance Hence, some reviewers in 1925, otherwise friendly, regretted an unemancipated diction and "helpless inversions" But English diction in higher art is still for me more than the usage of the twentieth century o'er beside over on occasion—if you have the instinct for the occasion And English syntax and word order, in the higher art, loses, not gains, by reduction of its old plasticity to the rigidity of modern French It is all a question of means to ends—of sincerity too of ends * Leonard, The Locomotive God (N Y, 1927), 339-41

(When father was ambassador, you know),
I lived with a band of ladies wan and wild,—
Myself a shuddering mamac, exiled
With strange physicians, and behind locked
   door
Mumbling in bed, or tracing on the floor,
"The Lord is my shepherd, I . . ."
   'Goodnight, my child'— (That none had told me, seems, you fancy, odd?)—
 And so I kissed and left her Did I cry?— I've never cried Or did I moan 'My God'?—
 Nor that Or walk out under starry sky?—
 I went upstairs, undressed, put out the
   light, 41
 And shook with pity and terror all the night

We act in crises not as one who dons
 A judge's robe and sits to praise or blame
 With walnut gavel, before high window-frame,
 Beside a Justice-and-her-scales in bronze;
 We act in crises not by pros and cons
 Of volumes in brown calfskin still the same,
 But, like the birds and beasts from which we came,
 By the long trend of character—the fons,
Fons et origo—fountainhead and source—
 Of deeper conduct, whether in unleashed hound 10
 That tears the fleeing stag unto the ground,
 Or thrush in battle for its fledgeling's corse,
 Or boy who sees the cracked dam, hears a sound,
 And down the peopled valley spurs his horse

XIII

MID-MORNING of mid-June Her sudden whim
 Among the guests (who chatted ill at ease)
 'O let's be married out beneath the trees—
 This mantel with its garlands is so prim'

1 Of this sonnet Leonard has said It seems to combine my own authentic ethical bent with intellectual analysis, concentrated feeling, concrete symbolic pictures from nature and human life, and homely honest phrasing—without the cant of sentiment or the worse cant of "originality" Benét, ed., Fifty Poets (N Y, 1933), 40

As if she said, 'Let's row an hour or swim,'
 As if she said, 'Let's pick the white sweet pease,
 And leave the pink and purple for the bees,'
 As if she said, 'Let's get the shears and trim
 The lilac stems.' . . . Blue lake and bluer
     sky
 Merged with the green of earth, of odorous
     earth, 10
 A scarlet tanager went flashing by,
 The unseen thrasher sang with all his mirth . . .
     'Same neighbor said with happy wedding of my eighty years.'

. . . . .

. . . . .

In my love and lore—
 As round her as a buoy
 As cunning to destroy
 As tied with her more

Train the wild away,
 That brow I kissed,
 The girls of everyday
 (Not lover-alienist!),— Selfhood strong
 Fearsome of— 10
 All gaunt broods of

Her as wife—
 She was in song,
 She was in love

her chuffonier—
 Of a scarf or gloves,—
 'He says, my love's
 A child of fifteen ies I were more like

'beds'—and there I saw her

In the door, white-plume on head, her shopping in hand,
 Smiles on her lips She came to me. . . .
     I kissed her She marked . . . Her face fell on my shoulder, so
 We clung together 'I'm so sorry, friend, 10
 You found my scrawl '—'I love you, child '—'I know '—
 'Forgive '—' 'Twas for my good—and there's an end '
 The rest was silence—the embrace and kiss
 Of love with love upon the precipice.

. . . . .

THAT afternoon the Postman brought, among
 The notes of condolence for father dead,
 Our monthly magazine I opened, read,
 And found at last, at last, the song I'd sung (Two years before) in print for old and young,
 In print at last for every clime and zone—
 'Amor Triumphans—Love is on the Throne'—
 And ran to her with news upon my tongue . . .
 Sitting in parlor, by the jardinière
 Under the mother's portrait, with a book: 10
 An instant flashed to life her olden look,
 Her olden crimson glowed an instant there,
 'Dear husband, thank you '—But upon her knees
 Lay the 'Alcestis' of Euripides

Thereafter I found these Greek lines underscored κάπειτα θάλαμον—and her chamber then— . . .
 ( . . . Οὔ . . . ) ἐσπεσοῦσα—hurrying, hurrying toward— . . .
 ( . . . So? . . . ) καὶ λέχος—and couch—ἐνταῦθα δὴ—
 Ah, there—δάκρυσε—she did weep again—( . . . Yes . . . ) καὶ λέγει τάδε—and this did say— 20

ἦν λέκτρον—O bed—ἐνθα παρθένη
 ἔλυσ' ἐγὼ κορεύματ'—where I unbound
 My virgin giraffe—ἐκ τοῦδ' ἀνδρός—for This man, my lover—οὗ θνήσκω πέρι
 For whose dear sake I die— . . . (And here
     I found

The margin with blurred letters scribbled o'er—
 Was it some final message meant for
 me?)
 χαῖρε—O farewell. . . (Dear, χαῖρε evermore!)

Indian Summer

(*O Earth-and-Autumn of the Setting Sun,
 She is not by, to know my task is done!*)

In the brown grasses slanting with the wind,
 Lone as a lad whose dog's no longer near,
 Lone as a mother whose only child has sinned,
 Lone on the loved hill . . . and below me
 here
 The thistle-down in tremulous atmosphere
 Along red clusters of the sumach streams,
 The shriveled stalks of goldenrod are sere,
 And crisp and white their flashing old

FROM A GOSPEL OF BEAUTY

3 ON THE BUILDING OF SPRINGFIELD <sup>1</sup>

LET not our town be large, remembering
That little Athens was the Muses' home,
That Oxford rules the heart of London
still,
't nat Florence gave the Renaissance to Rome

Record it for the grandson of your son—
A city is not builded in a day
Our little town cannot complete her soul
Till countless generations pass away.

Now let each child be joined as to a church
To her perpetual hopes, each man ordained:
Let every street be made a reverent aisle <sup>11</sup> Where Music grows and Beauty is unchained.

Let Science and Machinery and Trade
Be slaves of her, and make her all in all,
Building against our blatant, restless time
An unseen, skilful, medieval wall

Let every citizen be rich toward God.
Let Christ the beggar, teach divinity
Let no man rule who holds his money
dear
Let this, our city, be our luxury. <sup>20</sup>

We should build parks that students from afar
Would choose to starve in, rather than go home,
Fair little squares, with Phidian ornament,
Food for the spirit, milk and honeycomb

Songs shall be sung by us in that good
day,
Songs we have written, blood within the rhyme Beating, as when Old England still was glad,—
The purple, rich Elizabethan time.

. . . . .

<sup>1</sup> This poem was one of the three Lindsay recited on his travels, 'which three in series contain my whole gospel, directly or by implication.' It is mostly here

Say, is my prophecy too fair and far?
I only know, unless her faith be high, <sup>30</sup>
The soul of this, our Nineveh, is doomed,
Our little Babylon will surely die.

Some city on the breast of Illinois
No wiser and no better at the start By faith shall rise redeemed, by faith shall rise
Bearing the western glory in her heart.

The genius of the Maple, Elm and Oak,
The secret hidden in each grain of corn,
The glory that the prairie angels sing
At night when sons of Life and Love are born, <sup>40</sup>

Born but to struggle, squalid and alone,
Broken and wandering in their early years.
When will they make our dusty streets their goal,
Within our attics hide their sacred tears?

When will they start our vulgar blood athrill
With living language, words that set us free?
When will they make a path of beauty
clear
Between our riches and our liberty?

We must have many Lincoln-hearted men.
A city is not builded in a day <sup>50</sup>
And they must do their work, and come and go,
While countless generations pass away.

FROM ALEXANDER CAMPBELL

I MY FATHERS CAME FROM KENTUCKY

I WAS born in Illinois,—
Have lived there many days.
And I have Northern words,
And thoughts,
And ways.

But my great-grandfathers came
To the west with Daniel Boone,
And taught his babes to read,
And heard the redbird's tune,

And heard the turkey's call, 10
 And stilled the panther's cry,
 And rolled on the blue-grass
 hills,
 And looked God in the eye.

And feud and Hell were theirs;
 Love, like the moon's desire,
 Love like a burning-mine,
 Love like rifle-fire

I tell tales out of school
 Till these Yankees hate my style
 Why should the young cad cry, 20
 Shout with joy for a mile?

Why do I faint with love
 Till the prairies dip and reel?
 My heart is a kicking horse
 Shod with Kentucky steel

No drop of my blood from north
 Of Mason and Dixon's line.
 And this racer in my breast
 Tears my ribs for a sign

But I ran in Kentucky hills 30
 Last week They were hearth and
 home
 And the church at Grassy Springs,
 Under the redbird's wings
 Was peace and honeycomb 1920

THE LEADEN-EYED

LET not young souls be smothered out before
 They do quaint deeds and fully flaunt their pride
 It is the world's one crime its babes grow dull,
 Its poor are ox-like, lump and leadeneyed.

Not that they starve, but starve so dreamlessly,
 Not that they sow, but that they seldom reap,
 Not that they serve, but have no gods to serve,
 Not that they die, but that they die like sheep

THE EAGLE THAT IS FORGOTTEN <sup>1</sup>

(JOHN P. ALTGELD. BORN DECEMBER 30, 1847, DIED MARCH 12, 1902)

SLEEP softly . . . eagle forgotten . . .
 under the stone
 Time has its way with you there, and the clay has its own

'We have buried him now,' thought your foes, and in secret rejoiced
 They made a brave show of their mourning, their hatred unvoiced
 They had snarled at you, barked at you, foamed at you day after day
 Now you were ended They praised you
 . . . and laid you away

The others that mourned you in silence and terror and truth,
 The widow bereft of her crust, and the boy without youth,
 The mocked and the scorned and the wounded, the lame and the poor
 That should have remembered forever
 . . . remember no more 10

Where are those lovers of yours, on what name do they call,
 The lost, that in armies wept over your funeral pall?
 They call on the names of a hundred high-valiant ones,
 A hundred white eagles have risen the sons of your sons,
 The zeal in their wings is a zeal that your dreaming began
 The valor that wore out your soul in the service of man

Sleep softly . . . eagle forgotten . . .
 under the stone,
 Time has its way with you there and the
 clay has its own Sleep on, O brave-hearted, O wise man, that kindled the flame—

To live in mankind is far more than to live in a name, 20
To live in mankind, far, far more . . .
than to live in a name 1912

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN <sup>1</sup>

(To be sung to the tune of 'The Blood of the Lamb' with indicated instrument.)

I

(Bass drum beaten loudly)
BOOTH led boldly with his big bass drum—
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
The Saints smiled gravely and they said.
'He's come'
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
Walking lepers followed, rank on rank,
Lurching bravos from the ditches dank, Drabs from the alleyways and drug fiends pale—Minds still passion-ridden, soul-powers frail —
Vermin-eaten saints with moldy breath, 9
Unwashed legions with the ways of Death—
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)

(Banjos)
Every slum had sent its half-a-score
The round world over (Booth had groaned for more)
Every banner that the wide world flies
Bloomed with glory and transcendent dyes
Big-voiced lasses made their banjos bang, Tranced, fanatical they shrieked and sang —
'Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?'
Hallelujah! It was queer to see Bull-necked convicts with that land make free 20
Loons with trumpets blowed a blare, blare, blare
On, on upward thro' the golden air!

<sup>1</sup> Lindsay's ideal Democracy was to 'come through the services of three kinds of men in wise cooperation the priests, the statesmen and the artists Our priests shall be religious men like St Francis, or John Wesley, or General Booth, or Cardinal Newman' Lindsay, Adventures while Preaching (N Y, 1914), 184-85

'In my poem I merely turned into rhyme as well as I could, word for word, General Booth's own account of his life, and the telegraph dispatches of his death after going blind I set it to the tune that is not a tune, but a speech, a refrain used most frequently in the meetings of the Army on any public square to this day' Lindsay, Collected Poems (N Y, 1923), 22

2

(Bass drum slower and softer.)
Booth died blind and still by faith he trod,
Eyes still dazzled by the ways of God.
Booth led boldly, and he looked the chief Eagle countenance in sharp relief,
Beard a-flying, air of high command
Unabated in that holy land. 29

(Sweet flute music)
Jesus came from out the court-house door, Stretched his hands above the passing poor
Booth saw not, but led his queer ones there Round and round the mighty court-house square
Then, in an instant all that blear review
Marched on spotless, clad in raiment new.
The lame were straightened, withered limbs uncurled
And blind eyes opened on a new, sweet world.

(Bass drum louder)
Drabs and vixens in a flash made whole!
Gone was the weasel-head, the snout, the jowl!
Sages and sibyls now, and athletes clean, 40
Rulers of empires, and of forests green!

(Grand chorus of all instruments Tambourines to the foreground)
The hosts were sandalled, and their wings were fire!
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
But their noise played havoc with the angel-choir
(Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?)
Oh, shout Salvation! It was good to see Kings and Princes by the Lamb set free.
The banjos rattled and the tambourines
Jing-jing-jingled in the hands of Queens.

(Reverently sung, no instruments.)
And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer 50
He saw his Master thro' the flag-filled air.
Christ came gently with a robe and crown
For Booth the soldier, while the throng knelt down.
He saw King Jesus They were face to face,
And he knelt a-weeping in that holy place
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

THE CONGO<sup>1</sup>

A STUDY OF THE NEGRO RACE

1. Their Basic Savagery

FAT black bucks in a wine-barrel room,
 Barrel-house kings, with feet unstable,
 Sagged and reeled and pounded on the table,
 Pounded on the table, A deep rolling bass
 Beat an empty barrel with the handle of a broom,
 Hard as they were able,
 Boom, boom, BOOM,
 With a silk umbrella and the handle of a broom,
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM
 THEN I had religion, THEN I had a vision 10
 I could not turn from their revel in derision
 THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK, CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK More deliberate
 Then along that riverbank Solemnly
 A thousand mules chanted
 Tattooed cannibals danced in files,
 Then I heard the boom of the blood-lust song
 And a thigh-bone beating on a tin-pan gong
 And 'BLOOD' screamed the whistles and the fifes of the warriors,
 'BLOOD' screamed the skull-faced, lean witch-doctors, A rapidly rising climax of speed and racket
 'Whirl ye the deadly voo-doo rattle, 20
 Harry the uplands,
 Steal all the cattle,
 Rattle-rattle, rattle-rattle,
 Bing!
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM,'
 A roaring, epic, rag-time tune
 From the mouth of the Congo With a philosophic pause
 To the Mountains of the Moon. 30
 Death is an Elephant,
 Torch-eyed and horrible,
 Foam-flanked and terrible BOOM, steal the pygmies, BOOM, kill the Arabs,
 BOOM, kill the white men,
 Hoo, Hoo, Hoo
 Listen to the yell of Leopold's ghost
 Burning in Hell for his hand-maimed host Hear how the demons chuckle and yell
 Cutting his hands off, down in Hell 40
 Listen to the creepy proclamation,
 Blown through the lairs of the forest-nation,

1 The thought of the third section was inspired by a passage in a sermon by my pastor, F W Burnham, when he spoke of the death of Ray Eldred, a heroic missionary, who had recently perished on the Congo River. It is logical there should be six lines conforming to the original hymn-theory and set to the tune, "Hark ten thousand harps and voices." But the remainder of "The Congo" is based, however poorly, on the most conventional English tradition of imitative verbal music, going back through Southey's "Cataract of Lodore" to Dryden's "Alexander's Feast." In reciting "The Congo" I unconsciously introduced a new element of chanting, akin to the Gregorian Chant I had heard in the Paulist Fathers' Church, New York. I added this to my usual effort to elaborate the tone-color effects, and as a result of the two "The Congo" became the first recitation of my life to which big conventional gatherings of people would listen. All my sympathetic audiences up to that time had been the fireside sort, with chums, or on the road. Lindsay, Letter about My Four Programmes (Springfield, Ill., n.d.), 5.

Blown past the white-ants' hill of clay,
 Blown past the marsh where the butterflies play —
 'Be careful what you do,
 Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo,
 And all of the other
 Gods of the Congo,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you'

*All the o sounds very golden.
 Heavy accents very heavy 50 Light accents very light Last line whispered*

2 Their Irrepressible High Spirits

Wild crap-shooters with a whoop and a call Danced the juba in their gambling-hall
 And laughed fit to kill, and shook the town,
 And guyed the policemen and laughed them down
 With a boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, BOOM
 THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK, CUTTING THROUGH THE FOREST WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.
 A negro fairyland swung into view,
 A minstrel river
 Where dreams come true
 The eoony palace soared on high
 Through the blossoming trees to the evening sky
 The inlaid porches and casements shone
 With gold and ivory and elephant-bone
 And the black crowd laughed till their sides were sore
 At the baboon butler in the agate door,
 And the well-known tunes of the parrot band
 That trilled on the bushes of that magic-land

Rather shrill and high

Read exactly as in first section

*Lay emphasis on 60 the delicate ideas
 Keep as light-footed as possible.*

A troupe of skull-faced witch-men came Through the agate doorway in suits of flame,
 Yea, long-tailed coats with a gold-leaf crust
 And hats that were covered with diamond-dust.
 And the crowd in the court gave a whoop and a call
 And danced the juba from wall to wall
 But the witch-men suddenly stilled the throng
 With a stern cold glare, and a stern old song —
 'Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.'
 Just then from the doorway, as fat as shot,es,
 Came the cake-walk princes in their long red coats,
 Canes with a brilliant lacquer shine,
 And tall silk hats that were red as wine
 And they pranced with their butterfly partners there,
 Coal-black maidens with pearls in their hair,
 Knee-skirts trimmed with the jessamine sweet,
 And beils on their ankles and little black feet
 And the couples railed at the chant and the frown
 Of the witch-men lean, and laughed them down (O rare was the revel, and well worth while That made those glowering witch-men smile.)

70 With pomposity

With a great deliberation and ghostliness

*80 With overwhelming assurance,
 good cheer, and pomp*

With growing speed and sharply marked dance-rhythm.

The cake-walk royalty then began
 To walk for a cake that was tall as a man
 To the tune of 'Boomlay, boomlay, BOOM,'

90

While the witch-men laughed, with a sinister air,
 And sang with the scalawags prancing there —
 'Walk with care, walk with care,
 Or Mumbo-Jumbo, God of the Congo,
 And all of the other
 Gods of the Congo,
 Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you
 Beware, beware, walk with care,
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom,
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay, boom,
 Boomlay, boomlay, boomlay,
 BOOM '

Oh rare was the revel, and well worth while
 That made those glowering witch-men smile.

With a touch of negro dialect, and as rapidly as possible toward the end

100

3. The Hope of Their Religion

A good old negro in the slums of the town Preached at a sister for her velvet gown
 Howled at a brother for his low-down ways,
 His prowling, guzzling, sneak-thief days
 Beat on the Bible till he wore it out,
 Starting the jubilee revival shout
 And some had visions, as they stood on chairs,
 And sang of Jacob, and the golden stairs
 And they all repented, a thousand strong,
 From their stupor and savagery and sin and wrong
 And slammed with their hymn books till they shook the room
 With 'Glory, glory, glory,'
 And 'Boom, boom, BOOM '

Heavy bass With a literal imitation of camp-meeting racket, and trance

110

THEN I SAW THE CONGO, CREEPING THROUGH THE BLACK, CUTTING THROUGH THE JUNGLE WITH A GOLDEN TRACK.

Exactly as in the first section

120

And the gray sky opened like a new-rent veil
 And showed the apostles with their coats of mail
 In bright white steel they were seated round
 And their fire-eyes watched where the Congo wound
 And the twelve apostles, from their thrones on high, Thrilled all the forest with their heavenly cry —
 'Mumbo-Jumbo will die in the jungle,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you,
 Never again will he hoo-doo you '

Sung to the tune of 'Hark, ten thousand harps and voices '

130

Then along that river, a thousand miles,
 The vine-snared trees fell down in files.

With growing deliberation and joy

Pioneer angels cleared the way
 For a Congo paradise, for babes at play,
 For sacred capitals, for temples clean
 Gone were the skull-faced witch-men lean.
 There, where the wild ghost-gods had wailed
 A million boats of the angels sailed
 With oars of silver, and prows of blue
 And silken pennants that the sun shone through.
 'Twas a land transfigured, 'twas a new creation
 Oh, a singing wind swept the negro nation,
 And on through the backwoods clearing flew —

In a rather high key—as delicately as possible

140

I see your frame is fat and fine,
I see you drink your poison wine—
Blood and burning turpentine '

And the Devil said to Simon Legree:
'I like your style, so wicked and free.
Come sit and share my throne with me,
And let us bark and revel '
And there they sit and gnash their teeth,
And each one wears a hop-vine wreath
They are matching pennies and shooting craps, 60
They are playing poker and taking naps.
And old Legree is fat and fine
He heats the fire, he drinks the wine—
Blood and burning turpentine—
Down, down with the Devil;
Down, down with the Devil,
Down, down with the Devil.

THE GHOST OF THE BUFFALOES

LAST night at black midnight I woke with a cry,
The windows were shaking, there was thunder on high,
The floor was atremble, the door was ajar,
White fires, crimson fires, shone from afar.
I rushed to the dooryard The city was gone.
My home was a hut without orchard or lawn
It was mud-smear and logs near a whispering stream,
Nothing else built by man could I see in my dream . . .
Then . . .
Ghost-kings came headlong, row upon row, 10
Gods of the Indians, torches aglow.
They mounted the bear and the elk and the deer,
And eagles gigantic, aged and sere,
They rode long-horn cattle, they cried
'A-la-la '
They lifted the knife, the bow, and the spear,
They lifted ghost-torches from dead fires
below,
The midnight made grand with the cry
'A-la-la '
The midnight made grand with a red-god charge,
A red-god show,

A red-god show, 20
'A-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la '

With bodies like bronze, and terrible eyes Came the rank and the file, with catamount cries,
Gibbering, yipping, with hollow-skull
clacks,
Riding white bronchos with skeleton backs, Scalp-hunters, beaded and spangled and bad,
Naked and lustful and foaming and mad,
Flashing primeval demoniac scorn,
Blood-thirst and pomp amid darkness reborn
Power and glory that sleep in the grass 30 While the winds and the snows and the great rains pass
They crossed the gray river, thousands abreast,
They rode in infinite lines to the west,
Tide upon tide of strange fury and foam,
Spirits and wraiths, the blue was their home,
The sky was their goal where the star-flags
were furled,
And on past those far golden splendors they whirled
They burned to dim meteors, lost in the deep
And I turned in dazed wonder, thinking of sleep

And the wind crept by 40
Alone, unkempt, unsatisfied,
The wind cried and cried—
Muttered of massacres long past,
Buffaloes in shambles vast
An owl said 'Hark, what is a-wing?'
I heard a cricket carolling,
I heard a cricket carolling,
I heard a cricket carolling

Then . . .
Snuffing the lightning that crashed from on high 50
Rose royal old buffaloes, row upon row
The lords of the prairie came galloping by.
And I cried in my heart 'A-la-la, a-la-la.
A red-god show,
A red-god show,
A-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la, a-la-la.'

Buffaloes, buffaloes, thousands abreast,
A scourge and amazement, they swept to the west.

'Mumbo-Jumbo is dead in the jungle
Never again will he hoo-doo you.
Never again will he hoo-doo you '

*To the tune of
'Hark, ten thousand harps and voices'*

Redeemed were the forests, the beasts and the men,
And only the vulture dared again
By the far, lone mountains of the moon
To cry, in the silence, the Congo tune —
'Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you,
Mumbo-Jumbo will hoo-doo you.
Mumbo . Jumbo will . . hoo-doo . . . you.'

penetrating, terrified whisper*

FROM THE BOOKER WASHINGTON
TRILOGY

I SIMON LEGREE—A NEGRO SERMON <sup>1</sup>

(To be read in your own variety of negro dialect )

LEGREE's big house was white and green
His cotton-fields were the best to be seen
He had strong horses and opulent cattle,
And bloodhounds bold, with chains that would rattle
His garret was full of curious things
Books of magic, bags of gold,
And rabbits' feet on long twine strings
But he went down to the Devil

Legree, he sported a brass-buttoned coat,
A snake-skin necktie, a blood-red shirt 10
Legree he had a beard like a goat,
And a thick hairy neck, and eyes like dirt
His puffed-out cheeks were fish-belly
white,
He had great long teeth, and an appetite
He ate raw meat, 'most every meal,
And rolled his eyes till the cat would squeal

1 'Ideas are raging through the brains of even the duski-est of the negro leaders, and one can handle for such an audience almost any large thought he thinks he understands. He can put it into negro poetry, I maintain, if he is man enough, and still have it negro poetry. But he must keep his manner bright-colored, full throated, relaxed and tropical. By the manner I do not mean dialect. There are innumerable Pullman porters who speak English in a close approach to the white man's way.
But their thoughts and fancies are still straight from the jungle. 'Simon Legree' is an Afro-American grotesque, is a serious attempt to record the devil-fear that haunts the race, though it is written with a humorous close. Almost any reading negro, whatever his shrewd silence during working hours, is bound to remember Uncle Tom's Cabin with gratitude, and John Brown as well. He is bound to have an infinite variety of thoughts about them, grave and gay.'
Lindsay, Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, VIII, III, 146-47

His fist was an enormous size
To mash poor niggers that told him lies
He was surely a witch-man in disguise
But he went down to the Devil. 20

He wore hip-boots, and would wade all day
To capture his slaves that had fled away
But he went down to the Devil

He beat poor Uncle Tom to death
Who prayed for Legree with his last breath.
Then Uncle Tom to Eva flew,
To the high sanctoriums bright and new,
And Simon Legree stared up beneath,
And cracked his heels, and ground his teeth
And went down to the Devil 30

He crossed the yard in the storm and gloom,
He went into his grand front room
He said, 'I killed him, and I don't care.'
He kicked a hound, he gave a swear,
He tightened his belt, he took a lamp,
Went down cellar to the webs and damp.
There in the middle of the mouldy floor
He heaved up a slab, he found a door—
And went down to the Devil

His lamp blew out, but his eyes burned
bright 40
Simon Legree stepped down all night—
Down, down to the Devil
Simon Legree he reached the place,
He saw one half of the human race,
He saw the Devil on a wide green throne,
Gnawing the meat from a big ham-bone,
And he said to Mister Devil

'I see that you have much to eat—
A red ham-bone is surely sweet.
I see that you have lion's feet,' 50

With black bobbing noses, with red rolling tongues,
Coughing forth steam from their leather-wrapped lungs, 60
Cows with their calves, bulls big and vain,
Goring the laggards, shaking the mane,
Stamping flint feet, flashing moon eyes
Pompous and owlsh, shaggy and wise.
Like sea-cliffs and caves resounded their ranks
With shoulders like waves, and undulant flanks
Tide upon tide of strange fury and foam, Spirits and wraiths, the blue was their
home,
The sky was their goal where the star-flags
are furled,
And on past those far golden splendors they
whirled 70
They burned to dim meteors, lost in the
deep,
And I turned in dazed wonder, thinking of sleep

I heard a cricket's cymbals play,
A scarecrow lightly flapped his rags,
And a pan that hung by his shoulder
rang,
Rattled and thumped in a listless way,
And now the wind in the chumney sang,
The wind in the chumney,
The wind in the chimney,
The wind in the chimney, 80
Seemed to say —
'Dream, boy, dream,
If you anywise can
To dream is the work
Of beast or man
Life is the west-going dream-storms'
breath,
Life is a dream, the sigh of the skies,
The breath of the stars, that nod on their pillows
With their golden hair mussed over their
eyes'
The locust played on his musical wing, 90
Sang to his mate of love's delight
I heard the whippoorwill's soft fret.
I heard a cricket carolling,
I heard a cricket carolling,
I heard a cricket say 'Good-night,
good-night,
Good-night, good-night, . . .
good-night'

THE BRONCHO THAT WOULD NOT BE BROKEN<sup>1</sup>

A LITTLE colt—broncho, loaned to the farm
To be broken in time without fury or harm, Yet black crows flew past you, shouting alarm,
Calling 'Beware,' with lugubrious singing .
The butterflies there in the bush were romancing,
The smell of the grass caught your soul in a trance,
So why be a-fearing the spurs and the traces,
O broncho that would not be broken of
dancing?

You were born with the pride of the lords great and olden
Who danced, through the ages, in corridors golden 10
In all the wide farm-place the person most human
You spoke out so plainly with squealing and capering,
With whinnying, snorting, contorting and prancing,
As you dodged your pursuers, looking askance,
With Greek-footed figures, and Parthenon paces,
O broncho that would not be broken of
dancing

The grasshoppers cheered 'Keep whirling,' they said
The insolent sparrows called from the shed
'If men will not laugh, make them wish they were dead'
But arch were your thoughts, all malice displacing, 20
Though the horse-killers came, with snakewhips advancing
You bantered and cantered away your last chance

<sup>1</sup> Lindsay felt something of himself in this broncho whose breaking he saw on one of his journeys. He wrote 'The broncho should not have been called Dick. He should have been called Daniel Boone, or Davy Crockett or Custer or Richard, yes, Richard the Lion Hearted. I think I want on my coat of arms a broncho, rampant.' Lindsay, Adventures while Preach- ing (N Y, 1914), 136-37

And they scourged you, with Hell in their speech and their faces, O broncho that would not be broken of
dancing

'Nobody cares for you,' rattled the crows,
As you dragged the whole reaper, next day down the rows
The three mules held back, yet you danced on your toes
You pulled like a racer, and kept the mules chasing
You tangled the harness with bright eyes side-glancing,
While the drunk driver bled you—a pole for a lance— 30
And the giant mules bit at you—keeping their places
O broncho that would not be broken of
dancing

In that last afternoon your boyish heart broke
The hot wind came down like a sledgehammer stroke
The blood-sucking flies to a rare feast awoke
And they searched out your wounds, your death-warrant tracing
And the merciful men, their religion enhancing,
Stopped the red reaper, to give you a chance
Then you died on the prairie, and scorned
all disgraces,
O broncho that would not be broken of
dancing 40

THE CHINESE NIGHTINGALE<sup>1</sup>

A SONG IN CHINESE TAPESTRIES

'How, how,' he said 'Friend Chang,' I said,
'San Francisco sleeps as the dead—
Ended license, lust and play
Why do you iron the night away?

<sup>1</sup> 'Mr Lindsay wrote "The Chinese Nightingale" in Springfield and New York, between May and October, 1914, while his father and mother were in China visiting their son-in-law and daughter, who are medical missionaries at Lu-Chow-Fu. The poet, who has never seen China himself, says of the poem "The intention of the piece is to combine such elements of Chinese decoration and whimsy as are to be found by the superficial observer in the cario-store, the chop-suey restau-

Your big clock speaks with a deadly sound,
With a tick and a wail till dawn comes round

While the monster shadows glower and creep,
What can be better for man than sleep?

'I will tell you a secret,' Chang replied,
'My breast with vision is satisfied, 10
And I see green trees and fluttering wings,
And my deathless bird from Shanghai sings'

Then he lit five firecrackers in a pan.
'Pop, pop,' said the firecrackers,
'cra-cra-crack'

He lit a joss stick long and black
Then the proud gray joss in the corner stirred,

On his wrist appeared a gray small bird,
And this was the song of the gray small
bird

'Where is the princess, loved forever, Who made Chang first of the kings of men?' 20

And the joss in the corner stirred again,
And the carved dog, curled in his arms,
awoke,

Barked forth a smoke-cloud that whirled and broke

It piled in a maze round the ironing-place,
And there on the snowy table wide
Stood a Chinese lady of high degree,
With a scornful, witching, tea-rose
face. .

Yet she put away all form and pride,
And laid her glimmering veil aside
With a childlike smile for Chang and for
me 30

The walls fell back, night was aflower,
The table gleamed in a moonlit bower, While Chang, with a countenance carved of stone,

Ironed and ironed, all alone
And thus she sang to the busy man Chang
'Have you forgotten

Deep in the ages, long, long ago,
I was your sweetheart, there on the sand—Storm-worn beach of the Chinese land?

rant, the laundry, the Chinese theatre. To these are to be added such general ideas of China as may be acquired in any brief resumé of their religion, their customs and temperament." Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, V.v.227

We sold our grain in the peacock town— 40
Built on the edge of the sea-sands brown—
Built on the edge of the sea-sands
brown. . .

When all the world was drinking blood
From the skulls of men and bulls
And all the world had swords and clubs of
stone,
We drank our tea in China beneath the sacred spice-trees,
And heard the curled waves of the harbor moan.
And this gray bird, in Love's first spring,
With a bright-bronze breast and a bronze-
brown wing,
Captured the world with his carolling 50
Do you remember, ages after,
At last the world we were born to own?
You were the heir of the yellow throne—
The world was the field of the Chinese man
And we were the pride of the sons of Han?
We copied deep books and we carved in jade,
And wove blue silks in the mulberry shade . . .

'I remember, I remember
That Spring came on forever,
That Spring came on forever,'
Said the Chinese nightingale

My heart was filled with marvel and dream,
Though I saw the western street-lamps gleam,
Though dawn was bringing the western
day,
Though Chang was a laundryman ironing
away .
Mingled there with the streets and alleys,
The railroad-yard and the clock-tower
bright,
Demon clouds crossed ancient valleys,
Across wide lotus-ponds of light
I marked a giant firefly's flight

And the lady, rosy-red,
 Flourished her fan, her shimmering fan, Stretched her hand toward Chang, and said
 'Do you remember,
 Ages after,
 Our palace of heart-red stone?
 Do you remember

The little doll-faced children
With their lanterns full of moon-fire,
That came from all the empire 80
Honoring the throne?—
The loveliest fête and carnival
Our world had ever known?
The sages sat about us
With their heads bowed in their beards
With proper meditation on the sight.
Confucius was not born,
We lived in those great days
Confucius later said were lived aright. . . .
And this gray bird, on that day of spring, 90
With a bright-bronze breast and a bronze-
brown wing,
Captured the world with his carolling.
Late at night his tune was spent.
Peasants,
Sages,
Children,
Homeward went,
And then the bronze bird sang for you and
me
We walked alone Our hearts were high and free.
I had a silvery name, I had a silvery name, 100
I had a silvery name—do you remember
The name you cried beside the tumbling sea?

Chang turned not to the lady slim—
He bent to his work, ironing away,
But she was arch, and knowing and glowing,
For the bird on his shoulder spoke for him.

'Darling        darling        darling . . .
      darling        '
Said the Chinese nightingale

Said the Chinese nightingale

The great gray joss on the rustic shelf,
Rakish and shrewd, with his collar awry,
Sang impolitely, as though by himself,     xxx Drowning with his bellowing the nightingale's cry
'Back through a hundred, hundred years
Hear the waves as they clumb the piers.
Hear the howl of the silver seas,
Hear the thunder
Hear the gongs of holy China
How the waves and tunes combine
In a rhythmic clashing wonder,

Incantation old and fine 120
 "Dragons, dragons, Chinese dragons,
 Red firecrackers, and green firecrackers,
 And dragons, dragons, Chinese dragons " "

Then the lady, rosy-red,
 Turned to her lover Chang and said:
 'Dare you forget that turquoise dawn
 When we stood in our must-hung velvet
 lawn,
 And worked a spell this great joss taught, Till a God of the Dragons was charmed and caught?
 From the flag high over our palace home 130
 He flew to our feet in rainbow-foam—
 A king of beauty and tempest and thunder
 Panting to tear our sorrows asunder,
 A dragon of fair adventure and wonder
 We mounted the back of that royal slave
 With thoughts of desire that were noble and grave
 We swam down the shore to the dragon-
 mountains,
 We whirled to the peaks and the fiery fountains
 To our secret ivory house we were borne
 We looked down the wonderful wing-filled regions 140
 Where the dragons darted in glimmering legions
 Right by my breast the nightingale sang,
 The old rhymes rang in the sunlit mist
 That we this hour regain—
 Song-fire for the brain
 When my hands and my hair and my feet you kissed,
 When you cried for your heart's new
 pain,
 What was my name in the dragon-mist,
 In the rings of rainbowed rain?"

'Sorrow and love, glory and love,' 150
 Said the Chinese nightingale.
 'Sorrow and love, glory and love,'
 Said the Chinese nightingale

And now the joss broke in with his song.
 'Dying ember, bird of Chang,
 Soul of Chang, do you remember?—
 Ere you returned to the shining harbor
 There were pirates by ten thousand Descended on the town
 In vessels mountain-high and red and
 brown, 160

Moon-ships that climbed the storms and cut the skies
 On their prows were painted terrible bright
 eyes
 But I was then a wizard and a scholar and a priest;
 I stood upon the sand,
 With lifted hand I looked upon them
 And sunk their vessels with my wizard
 eyes,
 And the stately lacquer-gate made safe again
 Deep, deep below the bay, the seaweed and the spray,
 Embalmed in amber every pirate lies,
 Embalmed in amber every pirate lies ' 170

Then this did the noble lady say
 'Bird, do you dream of our home-coming
 day
 When you flew like a courier on before
 From the dragon-peak to our palace-door,
 And we drove the steed in your singing path—
 The ramping dragon of laughter and wrath
 And found our city all aglow,
 And knighted this joss that decked it so?
 There were golden fishes in the purple river
 And silver fishes and rainbow fishes 180
 There were golden junks in the laughing
 river,
 And silver junks and rainbow junks
 There were golden lilies by the bay and
 river,
 And silver lilies and tiger-lilies,
 And tinkling wind-bells in the gardens of the town
 By the black-lacquer gate
 Where walked in state
 The kind king Chang
 And his sweetheart mate . . .
 With his flag-born dragon 190
 And his crown of pearl . . . and . . .
 jade,
 And his nightingale reigning in the mulberry shade,
 And sailors and soldiers on the sea-sands
 brown,
 And priests who bowed them down to your song—
 By the city called Han, the peacock town,
 By the city called Han, the nightingale
 town,
 The nightingale town ' "

Then sang the bird, so strangely gay, Fluttering, fluttering, ghostly and gray,
A vague, unravelling, final tune,      200
Like a long unwinding silk cocoon,
Sang as though for the soul of him
Who ironed away in that bower dim.—

    'I have forgotten
    Your dragons great,
    Merry and mad and friendly and bold.
Dim is your proud lost palace-gate.
I vaguely know
There were heroes of old, Troubles more than the heart could hold,      210
There were wolves in the woods
Yet lambs in the fold,
Nests in the top of the almond tree. . . .
The evergreen tree      and the mulberry tree
Life and hurry and joy forgotten,

Years on years I but half-remember . . .
Man is a torch, then ashes soon,
May and June, then dead December,
Dead December, then again June.
Who shall end my dream's confusion?      220
Life is a loom, weaving illusion . . .
I remember, I remember
There were ghostly veils and laces . . .
In the shadowy bowery places . . .
With lovers' ardent faces
Bending to one another,
Speaking each his part
They infinitely echo
In the red cave of my heart.
"Sweetheart, sweetheart, sweetheart,"      230
They said to one another.
They spoke, I think, of perils past.
They spoke, I think, of peace at last.
One thing I remember
Spring came on forever,
Spring came on forever,
Said the Chinese nightingale.

EDGAR LEE MASTERS

1869—

FROM SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY<sup>1</sup>

THE HILL

WHERE are Elmer, Herman, Bert, Tom and Charley,
The weak of will, the strong of arm, the clown, the boozier, the fighter?
All, all, are sleeping on the hill.

<sup>1</sup> There are two hundred and forty-four characters in the book, not counting those who figure in the Spooniad and the Epilogue. There are nineteen stories developed by interrelated portraits. Practically every ordinary human occupation is covered, except those of the barber, the miller, the cobbler, the tailor and the garage man, and all these were depicted later in the New Spoon River. What critics overlook when they call the Anthology Zolaesque, and by doing so mean to degrade it, is the fact that when the book was put together in its definitive order, the fools, the drunkards, the failures came first, the people of one-birth minds got second place, and the heroes and the enlightened spirits came last, a sort of Divine Comedy, which some critics were acute enough to point out at once.

'The names I drew from both the Spoon River and the Sangamon river neighborhoods, combining first names here with surnames there, and taking some also from the constitutions and State papers of Illinois.' Masters, 'The Genesis of Spoon River,' The American Mercury, XXVIII, cix, 50.

One passed in a fever,
One was burned in a mine,
One was killed in a brawl,
One died in a jail,
One fell from a bridge toiling for children and wife—
All, all, are sleeping, sleeping, sleeping on the hill

Where are Ella, Kate, Mag, Lizzie and Edith,      10
The tender heart, the simple soul, the loud, the proud, the happy one?—
All, all, are sleeping on the hill

One died in shameful childbirth,
One of a thwarted love,
One at the hands of a brute in a brothel,
One of a broken pride, in the search for heart's desire,
One after life in far-away London and Paris
Was brought to her little space by Ella and Kate and Mag—
All, all, are sleeping, sleeping, sleeping on the hill.

Where are Uncle Isaac and Aunt Emuly, 20
 And old Towny Kincard and Sevigne Houghton,
 And Major Walker who had talked
 With venerable men of the revolution?—
 All, all, are sleeping on the hill.

They brought them dead sons from the war,
 And daughters whom life had crushed,
 And their children fatherless, crying—
 All, all, are sleeping, sleeping, sleeping on the hill.

Where is Old Fiddler Jones
 Who played with life all his ninety years, 30
 Braving the sleet with bared breast, Drinking, rioting, thinking neither of wife
 nor kin,
 Nor gold, nor love, nor heaven?
 Lo! he babbles of the fish-frys of long ago,
 Of the horse-races of long ago at Clary's Grove,
 Of what Abe Lincoln said
 One time at Springfield.

LUCINDA MATLOCK

I WENT to the dances at Chandlerville,
 And played snap-out at Winchester
 One time we changed partners,
 Driving home in the moonlight of muddle
 June,
 And then I found Davis
 We were married and lived together for seventy years,
 Enjoying, working, raising the twelve
 children,
 Eight of whom we lost
 Ere I had reached the age of sixty.
 I spun, I wove, I kept the house, I nursed the sick, 10
 I made the garden, and for holiday Rambled over the fields where sang the larks,
 And by Spoon River gathering many a shell,
 And many a flower and medicinal weed—Shouting to the wooded hills, singing to the green valleys
 At ninety-six I had lived enough, that is all,
 And passed a sweet repose.
 What is this I hear of sorrow and weariness,
 Anger, discontent and drooping hopes?
 Degenerate sons and daughters, 20
 Life is too strong for you—
 It takes life to love Life.

THOMAS TREVELYAN

READING in Ovid the sorrowful story of Itys,
 Son of the love of Tereus and Procne, slain
 For the guilty passion of Tereus for Philomela,
 The flesh of him served to Tereus by Procne,
 And the wrath of Tereus, the murderess pursuing
 Till the gods made Philomela a nightingale, Lute of the rising moon, and Procne a swallow!
 Oh livers and artists of Hellas centuries
 gone,
 Sealing in little thuribles dreams and wisdom,
 Incense beyond all price, forever fragrant,
 A breath whereof makes clear the eyes of the soul! 11
 How I inhaled its sweetness here in Spoon
 River!
 The thurible opening when I had lived and learned How all of us kill the children of love, and all of us,
 Knowing not what we do, devour their flesh,
 And all of us change to singers, although it be But once in our lives, or change—alas!—to swallows,
 To twitter amid cold winds and falling leaves!

FIDDLER JONES

THE earth keeps some vibration going
 There in your heart, and that is you
 And if the people find you can fiddle,
 Why, fiddle you must, for all your life
 What do you see, a harvest of clover?
 Or a meadow to walk through to the river?
 The wind's in the corn, you rub your hands
 For beeves hereafter ready for market,
 Or else you hear the rustle of skirts
 Like the girls when dancing at Little
 Grove. 12
 To Cooney Potter a pillar of dust
 Or whirling leaves meant ruinous drouth;
 They looked to me like Red-Head Sammy Stepping it off, to 'Toor-a-Loor.'
 How could I till my forty acres
 Not to speak of getting more,
 With a medley of horns, bassoons and piccolos

Stirred in my brain by crows and robins
 And the creak of a wind-mill—only these?
 And I never started to plow in my life 20
 That some one did not stop in the road
 And take me away to a dance or picnic.
 I ended up with forty acres,
 I ended up with a broken fiddle—
 And a broken laugh, and a thousand memories,
 And not a single regret.

BENJAMIN PANTIER

TOGETHER in this grave lie Benjamin Pantier, attorney at law,
 And Nig, his dog, constant companion, solace and friend
 Down the gray road, friends, children, men and women,
 Passing one by one out of life, left me till I was alone
 With Nig for partner, bed-fellow, comrade in drink
 In the morning of life I knew aspiration and saw glory
 Then she, who survives me, snared my soul
 With a snare which bled me to death, Till I, once strong of will, lay broken, indifferent,
 Living with Nig in a room back of a dingy office. 10
 Under my jaw-bone is snuggled the bony nose of Nig—
 Our story is lost in silence Go by, mad
     world!

MRS. BENJAMIN PANTIER

I KNOW that he told that I snared his soul
 With a snare which bled him to death
 And all the men loved him,
 And most of the women pitied him But suppose you are really a lady, and have delicate tastes,
 And loathe the smell of whiskey and onions.
 And the rhythm of Wordsworth's 'Ode'
     runs in your ears,
 While he goes about from morning till
     night
 Repeating bits of that common thing;
 'Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?' 10
 And then, suppose:
 You are a woman well endowed,
 And the only man with whom the law and morality

Permit you to have the marital relation
 Is the very man that fills you with disgust
 Every time you think of it—while you think of it
 Every time you see him?
 That's why I drove him away from home
 To live with his dog in a dingy room
 Back of his office 20

REUBEN PANTIER

WELL, Emily Sparks, your prayers were not wasted,
 Your love was not all in vain
 I owe whatever I was in life
 To your hope that would not give me up,
 To your love that saw me still as good Dear Emily Sparks, let me tell you the story
 I pass the effect of my father and mother;
 The milliner's daughter made me trouble
 And out I went in the world,
 Where I passed through every peril known
 Of wine and women and joy of life 11
 One night, in a room in the Rue de Rivoli,
 I was drinking wine with a black-eyed cocotte,
 And the tears swam into my eyes
 She thought they were amorous tears and smiled
 For thought of her conquest over me
 But my soul was three thousand miles
     away,
 In the days when you taught me in Spoon
     River
 And just because you no more could love
     me,
 Nor pray for me, nor write me letters, 20
 The eternal silence of you spoke instead.
 And the black-eyed cocotte took the tears for hers,
 As well as the deceiving kisses I gave her.
 Somehow, from that hour, I had a new vision—
 Dear Emily Sparks!

EMILY SPARKS

WHERE is my boy, my boy—
 In what far part of the world?
 The boy I loved best of all in the school?—
 I, the teacher, the old maid, the virgin
     heart,
 Who made them all my children.
 Did I know my boy aright,
 Thinking of him as spirit aflame,
 Active, ever aspiring?

Oh, boy, boy, for whom I prayed and prayed
 In many a watchful hour at night, 10
 Do you remember the letter I wrote you
 Of the beautiful love of Christ?
 And whether you ever took it or not,
 My boy, wherever you are,
 Work for your soul's sake,
 That all the clay of you, all the dross of you,
 May yield to the fire of you,
 Till the fire is nothing but light! . . .
 Nothing but light!

TRAINOR, THE DRUGGIST

ONLY the chemist can tell, and not always the chemist,
 What will result from compounding Fluids or solids
 And who can tell
 How men and women will interact
 On each other, or what children will result?
 There were Benjamin Panter and his wife,
 Good in themselves, but evil toward each other
 He oxygen, she hydrogen,
 Their son, a devastating fire 10
 I Trainor, the druggist, a mixer of chemicals,
 Killed while making an experiment,
 Lived unwedded

DAISY FRASER

DID you ever hear of Editor Whedon
 Giving to the public treasury any of the money he received
 For supporting candidates for office?
 Or for writing up the canning factory
 To get people to invest?
 Or for suppressing the facts about the bank,
 When it was rotten and ready to break?
 Did you ever hear of the Circuit Judge
 Helping anyone except the 'Q' railroad,
 Or the bankers? Or did Rev. Peet or Rev.
 Sibley 10
 Give any part of their salary, earned by keeping still,
 Or speaking out as the leaders wished them
 to do,
 To the building of the water works?
 But I, Daisy Fraser, who always passed Along the streets through rows of nods and smiles,
 And coughs and words such as 'there she goes,'
 Never was taken before Justice Arnett

Without contributing ten dollars and costs
 To the school fund of Spoon River!

ANNE RUTLEDGE

OUT of me unworthy and unknown
 The vibrations of deathless music,
 'With malice toward none, with charity for
 all.'
 Out of me the forgiveness of millions toward millions,
 And the beneficent face of a nation
 Shining with justice and truth
 I am Anne Rutledge who sleep beneath these weeds,
 Beloved in life of Abraham Lincoln,
 Wedded to him, not through union,
 But through separation 10
 Bloom forever, O Republic,
 From the dust of my bosom!

THE VILLAGE ATHEIST

YE young debaters over the doctrine
 Of the soul's immortality,
 I who lie here was the village atheist, Talkative, contentious, versed in the arguments
 Of the infidels.
 But through a long sickness
 Coughing myself to death
 I read the Upamshads and the poetry of Jesus
 And they lighted a torch of hope and intuition
 And desire which the Shadow, 10 Leading me swiftly through the caverns of darkness,
 Could not extinguish
 Listen to me, ye who live in the senses
 And think through the senses only Immortality is not a gift,
 Immortality is an achievement,
 And only those who strive mightily
 Shall possess it

WILLIAM AND EMILY

THERE is something about Death
 Like love itself!
 If with some one with whom you have know
 passion,
 And the glow of youthful love,
 You also, after years of life
 Together, feel the sinking of the fire,
 And thus fade away together,
 Gradually, faintly, delicately,
 As it were in each other's arms,

Passing from the familiar room— 10
That is a power of unison between souls
Like love itself!

FROM THE NEW SPOON RIVER

ROBERT CHAIN

THERE are two ways in life,
And I tried them both
First a life of no change,
Life like a gull, which has no dream
But to be a gull, fly over the waters,
Seeking its food, and to nest and sleep!
And then I became a creature that nurses
Growth and mutation in the brain,
Swims to land and turns its fins to legs 10
Sensing a shriveled life ahead,
And loathing the weary hour,
I changed myself to renew myself,
And lost myself!

FRANCES CORDELL

WHAT a moment of strange dying! Quickly
All my vision girdled earth and showed
me
Temples in far India, tombs in Persia,
Down the Appian way, and over Florence, Home of Dante, wandering place of Browning
And how strange, how prying was the vision
For the coffin of old Landor opened, Showed me what was left of that imperious,
Proud and lonely singer of strange beauty
There he lay, gone down to bits of nothing— 10
Just a few stray hairs, a piece of shoulder, Nothing else of him who wrote these verses
'Proud word you never spoke, but in some future
'Day you will keep not speaking of me
these words,
'Over my open volume you will linger,
'You will say in reading "This man loved
me."'
Who was she and where is gone her beauty?
In what place of cypress or of willows,
In what separation from her poet,
Lies the woman, never speaking proud
words? 20
Only these, as I have said while reading
'This man loved me,' tears upon the pages!

RICHARD HARNED

GOLDEN bees at the heart of violets,
Heavy with starry wine of the flower,
The lizard lurks for you there in the thickets
Armed in mimesis green as the leaves.
The emerald wasp is watching the clay pots,
All day filled with your spoil of the June,
The Fab in terminal scarf of azure,
And breast bedecked in Florentine gold Thursts for the fruit of your toil for children
Born of her, pressed by the will to life 10
And the small gray flies come trooping after Wasps and Fabs with shark toothed jaws.
What is it all but a great devouring?
What but Nature that passes us on From stomach to stomach, till man the spirit
Fights against spirit, devouring, devoured?
Golden bees! I died believing
All mounts up to some finest life,
All is love, and the death of loving;
And if there is life that is higher than Art 20
It's peace that shines in God!

HENRY ZOLL, THE MILLER

HAVE you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days?
How it breeds wriggling life,
And seethes and crackles with poisonous froth,
Then lies as still as a snake gone blind?
And how can the mill pond know itself
When its water has caked to scum and worms?
And how can it know the world or the sky
When it has no mirror with which to see them?
But the river above the bend is wise.
Its waters are swift and cold and clear, 10
Always changing and always fresh,
And full of ripples and swirls and waves,
That image a thousand stars by night,
And a thousand phases of sun and clouds,
By a changing movie of forest and hills!
And down in its healthful depths the pickerel
Chase each other like silver shadows,
And the swift game fish swim up the stream.
Well, this is the soul of a man, my friend.
You brood at first, then froth with regret, 20

Then caked with hatred, and sink to dullness,
Or else you struggle and keep on the move,
Forget and solve and learn and emerge,
Full of sparkle and stars.
And down in your depths there's flashing
laughter,
Swimming against the current!

JOHNNY APPLESEED <sup>1</sup>

WHEN the air of October is sweet and cold as the wine of apples Hanging ungathered in frosted orchards along the Grand River,
I take the road that winds by the resting fields and wander
From Eastmanville to Nuncia down to the Villa Crossing

I look for old men to talk with, men as old as the orchards,
Men to tell me of ancient days, of those who built and planted, Lichen gray, branch broken, bent and sighing, Hobbling for warmth in the sun and for places to sit and smoke

For there is a legend here, a tale of the croaking old ones
That Johnny Appleseed came here, planted some orchards around here,
When nothing was here but the pine trees, oaks and the beeches, <sup>11</sup>
And nothing was here but the marshes, lake and the river.

Peter Van Zylén is ninety and this he tells me
My father talked with Johnny Appleseed
there on the hill-side,
There by the road on the way to Fruitport, saw him
Clearing pines and oaks for a place for an apple orchard

Peter Van Zylén says: He got that name from the people
For carrying apple-seed with him and planting orchards

<sup>1</sup> John Chapman (c 1775-1847), known as 'Johnny Appleseed,' was a Swedenborgian lover of nature who wandered through the Middle West, planting freely apple-orchards and herbs. His eccentricities and gentle goodness made him even in his own time into a half-legendary personage.

All the way from Ohio, through Indiana across here,
Planting orchards, they say, as far as Illinois <sup>20</sup>

Johnny Appleseed said, so my father told
me
I go to a place forgotten, the orchards will thrive and be here
For children to come, who will gather and eat hereafter
And few will know who planted, and none will understand

I laugh, said Johnny Appleseed. Some fellow buys this timber Five years, perhaps from to-day, begins to clear for barley
And here in the midst of the timber is hidden an apple orchard
How did it come here? Lord! Who was it here before me?

Yes, I was here before him, to make these places of worship,
Labor and laughter and gain in the late October <sup>30</sup>
Why did I do it, eh? Some folks say I am crazy
Where do my labors end? Far west, God only knows!

Said Johnny Appleseed there on the hillside. Listen!
Beware the deceit of nurseries, sellers of seeds of the apple Think! You labor for years in trees not worth the raising
You planted what you knew not, bitter or sour for sweet

No luck more bitter than poor seed, but one as bitter
The planting of perfect seed in soil that feeds and fails,
Nourishes for a little, and then goes spent forever
Look to your seed, he said, and remember the soil. <sup>40</sup>

And after that is the fight the foe curled up at the root,
The scale that crumples and deadens, the moth in the blossoms,

Becoming a life that coils at the core of a thing of beauty.
You bite your apple, a worm is crushed on your tongue!

And it's every bit the truth, said Peter Van
Zylen
So many things love an apple as well as ourselves
A man must fight for the thing he loves, to possess it.
Apples, freedom, heaven, said Peter Van
Zylen.

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY AND THE KING COBRA

I

In the days of steaming swamps and tropic
ferns,
When life was fermenting and crackling, and trying to escape
The trance of Nature, and get beyond itself, Footless creatures chose legs, and conquered the land
Then they abandoned the conquest, and took back to the water,
And became the drooling sea-crocodile,
The laughing mosasaur,
And the silly giant called the ichthyosaur,
And the pleisiosaur, with a mouth like a goose,
All flapping, floundering, and laughing to be back in the water, 10
Unenvious of their relatives who got wings,
And long tails, and bat-like rudders,
And turtle-beaks, which stood agape,
grinning like Moloch,
Roosting on sun-hot rocks.

Those were the days when there was nothing but demons,
Nothing but horns, hoofs, teeth and fangs.

Somewhere here the crawling, footless, coiling
Worm of hell lost his father and mother,
And went on without ancestors, and without memory of ancestors,
Or any worship of ancestors, and ended up as hell's perfection, 20 Ended as the cobra, crawling forever as abandoned diabolism,

As embodied hate and sullen loneliness.
But the footless creatures who clove to the land,
And longed till their ears could catch Something beside this sound and the next
sound,
Sounds without recurring periods and pauses,
Without continuity or rhythm;
The footless creatures which longed themselves to claws,
And then longed their claws to fingers,
Which at last could set down the signs of eternity for oboes, 30
For clarinets, horns and strings—
These footless creatures started the breed which fathered Beethoven at last,
And thus came the finale, the consummation
Beethoven and the King Cobra.

2

Nature is a sleeping spirit Nature is a trance, a mass drugged by eternity,
A petrification, a solid jelly, a self-containment,
A contemplation which cannot arise from itself,
Or get out of itself, or look upon itself.
Man has escaped from this deep catalepsy:
He has soared up, and can look down, 40
He has flown forward, and can glance back;
He can turn upon the past, and see the future.
But as he ages he ceases gradually to be outside himself,
Or see himself
He becomes again all-self-contained, reduced to one mood of Nature,
Reduced to the eye which contemplates,
but does not know
So he descends to the mund of the cobra,
On the way to the unconsciousness of Nature,
Which is Death, the cobra's cousin. 50

Nature is spirit, but the spirit of calm swamp-slush;
Nature is unconscious, but it casts upon
matter
The reflection of what has created Nature.
Nature as the whole of things lies locked in the unconsciousness

Which is the primal condition of all terraqueous things
 The same power which slumbers in the stone,
 And dreams in the flower, and sends half-legged beings
 Out of the water to the land, then back to the water,
 And into trees, and on to rocks—
 This same power awakes in the cobra, 60
 It awakes in Beethoven.
 It awakes when anything separates itself from Nature,
 And becomes two instead of one,
 And becomes outside as well as inside,
 And becomes something more than a landscape's mood,
 Something more than a motionless eye,
 Becomes in truth an eye that knows enemies,
 And a head that knows that pain is in the flesh,
 And comes from turning from one to two,
 And that pain brings something into existence 70
 Which is an advance upon a mere stare

It is here that a separation takes place between Nature, the creator,
 And any mind created Pain is the penalty, and fear, both births of consciousness.
 And thus with this state of being common to both Beethoven and the cobra Beethoven can disturb the cobra
 By shocking its ear to be aware of sounds and octaves
 Too much for an ear which is a tympanum and cochlea of mere snake grisle and bone, Murmurous with its swamp nativity, and fitted to listen
 For enemies and food, nothing else, 80
 For the sound of a twig snapping, not polyphones

What but irritation, disturbance,
 What but annoyance and pain,
 Made the thing at one with Nature
 Become the thing escaped and fighting
 Nature,
 Both because it resists being jailed again,
 And because it resents ever being turned loose?

What are irritation, disturbance, annoyance,
 pain?
 Are they not evil?
 So Beethoven's music must be evil to the cobra, 90
 For it forces the cobra's ear to do more than listen
 For enemies and for food.
 The cobra evoked from the great trance
 Continues as an evil, we say But Beethoven so evoked after long aeons
 Is he not evil, too?
 Is he truth and beauty, yet a sufferer, and producing suffering?
 Is he truth and beauty, who awakens greater consciousness?
 Or is he continued evil, bringing pain and
 despair,
 And deeper looks into the nothingness whence we came, 100
 And a forecast of the resumption of sleep whither we tend?
 Is he then evil as he shows these things to the full?
 Does he not disturb us, as he does the
 cobra,
 Which crawls and writhes and lifts itself
 As it hears Beethoven through oboes
 Tell of his sorrows and sufferings,
 The neglect that the world heaped upon
 him,
 His poverty and loneliness, Loneliness as lonely as this glass-cage of the cobra,
 All of which Beethoven uttered in music,
 and in the cry. 110
 'I have no friend,
 'I am alone in the world
 'O God, my Rock, my All,
 'Thou Unutterable, hear Thy unhappy,
 'Thy most unhappy of mortals'
 Is not the cobra also alone and unhappy?
 And these cries of Beethoven
 Do they not set vibrating
 The unutterable, and the unhappy,
 And the loneliness which is the cobra? 120

3

Beethoven was miserable, in agony, in the trap of life
 But the king cobra is all misery, all agony,
 All embodied evil, being by Nature trapped to be within itself,
 And by man trapped to be within this glass cage

It is trapped by being fated to be constantly aware of its venom genius,
 That is the groundwork, the essence and all of its being,
 And the shape of its head, the stare of its eyes show this
 With this goes the sense of enmity between the cobra and man,
 And fear of man, and fear of the jungle and night, and that is being trapped Its life is poison, and that is its wisdom also,
     and that is being trapped. 130
 Its wisdom is hate for the Power which has invented traps, Hate for the Power which has trapped its thought in a shallow skull,
 And locked its thought in a trap of contemplation,
 Where all the traps are contemplated dimly
 It is trapped to the life of sensuous particulars,
 While the whole teases, and is never known,
 The whole is a slowed-down film
 It is trapped by will without knowledge;
 It is trapped by a small speck of brain plasm
 From which has issued narrow channels 140
 Of sight and hearing, Through which the world of visible and audible things
 Man the keeper before the cage, standing safe,
 And Beethoven with strings, clarinets and horns
 Gorges through like a freshet, and bursts the channels, and tortures the brain.
 It is trapped when guessing the life blisses of other creatures,
 It is trapped, being shut from some realer realm of life,
 It is trapped, and compelled to crawl and coil,
 And lick forth a tongue to aid half-eyes;
 It is trapped in loneliness, not able to live loneliness as the soul can, 150
 Not able in loneliness to sink into the trance of the ancient swamps,
 But by its loneliness made more aware Of its separateness, and of enemies and dangers without—
 Such a curse upon anything that can feel!
 Such loneliness at the dark bottom-point of hell's cone!

It is trapped by dim memory of heredity,
 But kept from going back to water,
 And kept from taking to the air,
 And cut off bitterly from the lineage of man
 For man descended not from the snake, 160
 But from old, patriarchal, drowsy, dreaming reptiles.
 It is trapped to the life of the jungle
     forever,
 It is trapped by hate of the Cause of
     consciousness,
 And it brews venom in revenge.
 It is trapped forever to the shape of a gorilla's cylindrical excrement,
 It is stripped and exposed forever like the phallus of Polyphemus,
 The horror and disgust of worst and best
     eyes!
 It is trapped by regret for vanished æons of earth
 When there was peace in the pulse of the earth mood
 Which made a oneness of plants, rocks, ooze, and primordial plasm 170
 It is trapped because the chance is now gone forever to get feet or wings, and fly the jungle
 It is trapped by the will which has made this elongated frightfulness,
 The will—from what source?—which has made Teeth and fangs and poison,
 And the hunger of cannibalism
 For there is a Dual Thing Which might have made the cobra half good,
 Not all evil
 And this the cobra feels, and licks forth its forked tongue
 In hate of this Dual Thing 180
 It is trapped by the power within it From the Power without it, which has implanted in it
 This insane will of dealing death.
 It is trapped by being the contemplation of the motionless eye,
 Where no smile lurks, no sense of voluptuous content;
 But where alert malice sparkles and burns,
     and winks like a half-ashed coal,
 And flashes hate and hunger and irritable watchfulness.
 It is trapped by being engendered and then spurned by a superior soul,

It is trapped by being set aside and deserted by a soul becoming superior as man, as Beethoven;
 It is trapped by being life which looks neither to what is above, 190
 Nor to what is below,
 But to what is ahead in the weeds, the gopher snake as food.
 And thus barred from worlds and worlds of
 life,
 And crushed by exultant trumpets,
 By horns and strings,
 And by drums that echo frightful dangers and depths
 The cobra lies stretched in the cage with motionless eye
 The cobra is a monist All is Hate,
 And the cobra is all hate.
 The cobra is the hate of man, made pure poison, 200
 Condensed in one organism of
 flesh,
 For life as horror, as cancer, as war,
 As ruin and unreason and madness.

4

It is more than a hundred years past and gone
 Since Beethoven cried
 'God, O God, my Guardian, my Rock, my
 All!
 'Thou seest my heart, and knowest how it distresses me
 'To do harm to others, though doing right to my darling Karl 'Hear, Thou Unutterable, hear Thy unhappy,
 'Most unhappy of mortals 210
 'I have no friend, and am alone in the
 world.'

Shall this cry never die out?
 Never be hushed as the crackling of weeds is hushed
 After the giant thunder-lizard has walked
 on?
 Shall it never vanish as the rib-marks of the serpent in the sand
 Are erased by the wind?
 It is more than a hundred years now since Beethoven
 Set down his misery and his ecstasy,
 His wounded and baffled spirit,
 His climbing and sun-lit and triumphant spirit 220

In dots and curves, in numerals and time signatures,
 In key signatures, in braves and semi-braves,
 In major and minor keys, and ledger lines and clefs,
 In bars of duple, triple and quadruple time,
 in rests and scales,
 In indications for winds and strings,
 Flutes, horns, bassoons, and viols—
 All set down, and all to say in harmony Alone! Alone! Alone!
 All set down so to direct forever the players of instruments
 How to pass from the earthquake rumble of the lost city of the soul 230
 To the sunlight and song of the safe slopes,
 How to pass with whisperings and falterings,
 Almost as of children in fear,
 To fathomless depths of courage and
 wisdom,
 How to pace the harmony of the going-out,
 And the returning-in of the blood of the Universe,
 When the heart of the Great Law opens and closes its valves.
 And how with plucked strings of summoned courage,
 And the clamor of drums, to climb, to stand
 Where no cobra crawls, no devil walks, 240
 No charms of hell are worked,
 And where the silence of a great summit
 Opens out as a flower trembles and unfolds, Revealing the drone of spheres, the song,
 the infinite music
 Of light, which is also sound,
 And which is impulse at the root of all motion,
 And which is without end in space or time

It is more than a hundred years since the secrets
 Of Beethoven's soul, of his vision,
 Were noted on paper in these cryptograms
 Yet, and because this was done 251 Beethoven's suffering and rapture reverberate still,
 And by the instantaneous penetration of invisible fire
 Can pass through granite, through steel,
 through measureless space;
 Can pass through the glass of the cobra's
 cage,

And assail the stagnant, green-scum of his hate,
 Lying sprawled with motionless eye,
 Neither immersed in the unconsciousness of Nature,
 Nor separated from it, and by that truth in mastery of it.
 So by magnetic waves of fire 260
 Does Beethoven enter the cage of the cobra,
 And start to torture it with colossal mystery,
 Which the cobra cannot strike.
 The cobra can only weave and writhe and stretch,
 And lift up long lengths of its body in the corner,
 And crawl and lie with slight shivers, like the flank of a fly-plagued horse—
 All before a presence invulnerable to fangs and venom

The king cobra has much attention just now
 An oyster-white thickness has overgrown his right eye,
 So that he sees only with his left eye 270
 The cobra has shed his skin several times,
 And each time has failed to slough off
 The scale from his right eye
 And now he must be helped by his keeper,
 Or the eye will be wholly blind, and that will double his loneliness,
 As much so as deafness increased the loneliness of Beethoven
 The oyster-white thickness is seven-layered,
 Made up of semi-globular beads,
 Half translucent, but massed together impenetrable to light.
 And the cobra should see, says the cobra's keeper. 280
 Hence the keeper traps him into a box, Where the cobra's head is held while the oyster scales are snipped off.
 The cobra was fierce with anger, and fought.
 But when the cobra looked from that eye,
 And could see the black and white of the cage,
 Like squares embroidered on canvas,
 (Having no yellow spot in either eye), It acted glad, and glided happily on to the floor of the cage again,
 And devoured a five-foot gopher snake Provided for it by the keeper; 290

Devoured the gopher snake as a man kills and eats a hog or steer,
 Or as men destroy men in business or war.
 The cobra took the gopher snake by the
 head,
 And swallowed it inch by inch, foot by foot,
 All the way down, gurgitating its spasms,
 Until only the end of the tail flicked,
 And vanished.

5

This is the way Beethoven entered the cage of the cobra
 The next day after the seven-fold scale was removed,
 The next day after the cobra swallowed the gopher snake, 300
 The Ninth Symphony was played at the Park,
 And the keeper turned on the radio in the repule room
 To see what the cobra would do,
 When the sounds of the Scherzo, and the Ode to Joy
 Echoed and re-echoed about the stone walls
 The cobra was lying outstretched with motionless eye,
 He was not hungry—he had swallowed the gopher snake the day before He wanted no mate—the rutting season was past
 He could see—the seven-fold scale had been snipped
 He lay there slick as a gray, glazed cob-web, Dulled like slurred nacre, and yellow 311
 As the inside of a clam-shell, and gray as agate.
 He was a length of dimmed iridescence of saffron and pearl,
 And scaled like the permian gar-fish,
 Or the legs of the ancient archæopterix.
 What but an enemy or music could disturb
 him?
 Thus he lay calm as hate which is softly seething
 When the radio began to sound,
 As the musicians at the Park took the soul of Beethoven
 From the dots, dashes, signs and symbols of score sheets, 320
 And gave it voice as lettered there, forever sealed, and forever unsealed at will
 As the echo of Beethoven's soul echoing the Great Mystery somewhere,

Not as an imitation of Nature, or of anything in Nature,
 But as a response to Something,
 Even as the agitation of the cobra is a response to Beethoven.

The second violins and cellos, the first violins, tenors and basses Begin to whisper their way from the top to the bottom of the treble stave
 To the bottom of the bass
 A clarinet breaks in like the call of a lonesome summer bird,
 And one by one the wind-instruments enter, 330
 And then the flutes and oboes divide the lamentation
 They are saying: 'God, O God, my Guardian,
 'My Rock, my All! Hear Thou, Unutterable,
 'Hear Thy unhappy, most unhappy of mortals '

6

The cobra stirs,
 The cobra sends a ripple of skin down its length
 The cobra knows nothing of poverty it has swallowed the gopher snake
 The cobra knows nothing of a nephew's ingratitude,
 Or the slight of friends, or the neglect of the
 world,
 Or the hatefulness of business 340
 But this is restless music, and the cobra grows restless
 This is sound which is first impatience, and then melancholy,
 And the cobra grows impatient, melancholy waves stir him
 For fire can burn beings which know not what fire is
 This is tenderness, and the cobra resents tenderness,
 As he would strike the hand that petted his
 head
 These sorrows of Beethoven have found the language of sound Through magnetic waves, which are light and vibration,
 And vibrating themselves set vibrations singing and surging
 In the cobra itself, which becomes thus vibrating particles. 350

The waves of Beethoven's music advance through the cobra's nerves, Making rhythmic motions of the particles in the nerves of the cobra,
 And that is like a man in pain before the mystery of his fate

The cobra shifts his place, and licks forth his tongue
 He may be shocked into hereditary memory of the steaming swamps
 When the tyrannosaur and the diplodocus went mad,
 And trampled the lizards and the crocodiles,
 And the first snake one hundred feet long,
 And when the pteranodon with twenty-four feet of outstretched wings Flapped in fear among the fronds 360
 Of gigantic tree ferns
 This may be the cause of the cobra's shifting and moving,
 Or it may be only that this sound stirs
 him,
 As fire would stir him, or the tap of the keeper on the glass of the cage
 But he does not crawl from his place yet
 Like a rope slightly shaken a rhythm goes through him
 From head to tail, but he keeps his place
 Amid the reverberating music of Beethoven.

The Scherzo changes all Beethoven's soul stepped from darkness to brilliant light, 370
 From despair to the rapture of strength
 Overcoming the world
 Beethoven caught the spirit of a fresh May
 morning,
 And it inspired him to exult with trumpets and strings,
 And drums and trombones.
 There are no such mornings in the jungle.
 The rhythm of three bars changed to the rhythm of four bars
 Is nothing less than the secret ecstasy of May,
 It is nothing less than the thrill of life Making the worm feel the blisses of creation, 380
 And making man himself a dweller with Eternity.

And now this ecstatic storm of harmony
 Is not only the voices of strong men,

And the creak of great pulleys worked by
 them
 To lift colossal blocks of granite to the terraces
 Of timeless pyramids,
 It is not merely discords resolved,
 It is not the mere toppling and crash of colossi,
 Followed by the silence of Egyptian palm groves,
 It is not merely the audible silence 390
 Which comes before the hollow sound,
 And is followed by the hollow silence
 When covers are lifted and placed on great earthen jars
 Which have been filled with water for thirsty villages
 It is not merely the trumpeting of mastodons
 Amid carboniferous thickets,
 Or along level valleys of lava and giant cactus—
 It is not merely these,
 Nor merely Democritus laughing and shouting as he chases the discovered atom
 Near the orbit of Uranus where time and space become one, 400
 It is not merely any of these.
 But it is the song of infinite cranes
 Lifting worlds into their orbits,
 It is the deep sighing of æons of time,
 It is the chuckle of vast ages,
 It is the puffing and the halloos of periodic cycles
 Toiling up the spirals of infinitude,
 It is the sound of smooth-lipped lids of crystal
 Being placed on the huge vials of despair and fear,
 After their bitter waters have been poured into the flaming rivers 410

Of all old Hells to the roar of steam.
 It is the sound of ponderable slabs Being laid and fitted to the sarcophagi of dead demi-gorgons;
 It is the happy laughter from the cradle of the infant Heracles
 As he strangled the snakes sent by the enmity of Hera;
 It is the shout of Heracles despising the common kingdom
 Of which Hera, the jealous goddess, deprived him
 It is the howl of fire from worlds which should be burned,
 Amid the drift and swirl of apocalyptic smoke,
 It is the splash of the lake of fire 420
 When death is hurled down and engulfed,
 It is the thunder of mountain-high gates being opened,
 Which reveal the landscapes of eternity,
 It is the shout and the song of Apollo
 As he races and shoots arrows after fleeing dragons.
 It is the chant of the sun as god of this world,
 Worthy of worship as the source of life!

7

And now it was that the keeper returned to the cage
 To see what the cobra was doing
 The cobra had crawled to the corner 430
 It had lifted one third of its length aloft
 There in the corner,
 It was reaching up with its head, licking out its tongue,
 It was leaning back unsteadily being unable to hold
 So much of its length aloft
 There in the presence of Beethoven.

CHICAGO

Hog Butcher for the World,
 Tool Maker, Stack of Wheat, Player with Railroads and the Nation's Freight Handler, Stormy, husky, brawling,
 City of the Big Shoulders:

They tell me you are wicked, and I believe them; for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys
 And they tell me you are crooked, and I answer Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again
 And they tell me you are brutal, and my reply is On the faces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger.

And having answered so I turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and I give them back the sneer and say to
them

Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning 10

Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities,

Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness,

Bareheaded,

Shovelling,

Wrecking,

Planning,

Building, breaking, rebuilding,

Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth,
laughing with white teeth,

Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs,

Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle, 20

Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse, and under his ribs the heart of the people,

Laughing!

Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling
laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher, Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads

TO A CONTEMPORARY BUNKSHOOTER

You come along . . . tearing your shirt
. . . yelling about Jesus

Where do you get that stuff?

What do you know about Jesus?

Jesus had a way of talking soft and outside of a few bankers and higher-ups among the con men of Jerusalem everybody liked to have this Jesus around because he never made any fake passes and everything he said went and he helped the sick and gave the people hope.

You come along squirting words at us, shaking your fist and call us all damn fools

so fierce the froth slobbers over your lips
. . . always blabbing we're all going to hell straight off and you know all about
it

I've read Jesus' words I know what he said You don't throw any scare into me.
I've got your number I know how much you know about Jesus

He never came near clean people or dirty people but they felt cleaner because he came along It was your crowd of bankers and business men and lawyers hired the sluggers and murderers who put Jesus out of the running

I say the same bunch backing you nailed the nails into the hands of this Jesus of Nazareth He had lined up against him the same crooks and strong-arm men now lined up with you paying your way

Thus Jesus was good to look at, smelled good, listened good He threw out something fresh and beautiful from the skin of his body and the touch of his hands wherever he passed along

You slimy bunkshooter, you put a smut on every human blossom in reach of your rotten breath belching about hell-fire and hiccapping about this Man who lived a clean life in Galilee 10

When are you going to quit making the carpenters build emergency hospitals for women and girls driven crazy with wrecked nerves from your gibberish about Jesus?—I put it to you again Where do you get that stuff? What do you know about Jesus?

Go ahead and bust all the chairs you want to Smash a whole wagon-load of furniture at every performance Turn sixty somersaults and stand on your nutty head If it wasn't for the way you scare the women and kids I'd feel sorry for you and pass the hat

I like to watch a good four-flusher work, but not when he starts people puking and calling for the doctors

I like a man that's got nerve and can pull off a great original performance, but you—you're only a bug-house pedlar of second-hand gospel—you're only shoving out a phoney imitation of the goods this Jesus wanted free as air and sunlight

You tell people living in shanties Jesus is going to fix it up all right with them by giving them mansions in the skies after they're dead and the worms have eaten
em

You tell $6 a week department store girls all they need is Jesus, you take a steel trust wop, dead without having lived, grey and shrunken at forty years of age, and you tell him to look at Jesus on the cross and he'll be all right

You tell poor people they don't need any more money on pay day and even if it's fierce to be out of a job, Jesus'll fix that up all right, all right—all they gotta do is take Jesus the way you say

I'm telling you Jesus wouldn't stand for the stuff you're handing out Jesus played it different The bankers and lawyers of Jerusalem got their sluggers and murderers to go after Jesus just because Jesus wouldn't play their game He didn't sit in with the big thieves

I don't want a lot of gab from a bunk-shooter in my religion

I won't take my religion from any man who never works except with his mouth and never cherishes any memory except the face of the woman on the American silver dollar 20

I ask you to come through and show me where you're pouring out the blood of your life

I've been to this suburb of Jerusalem they call Golgotha, where they nailed Him, and I know if the story is straight it was real blood ran from His hands and the nail-holes, and it was real blood spurted in red drops where the spear of the Roman soldier rammed in between the ribs of this Jesus of Nazareth

JOY

LET a joy keep you.
Reach out your hands
And take it when it runs by,
As the Apache dancer
Clutches his woman.
I have seen them
Live long and laugh loud,
Sent on singing, singing, Smashed to the heart
Under the ribs 10
With a terrible love.
Joy always,
Joy everywhere—
Let joy kill you!
Keep away from the little deaths.

STUFF of the moon
Runs on the lapping sand
Out to the longest shadows.
Under the curving willows,
And round the creep of the wave
line, Fluxions of yellow and dusk on the waters
Make a wide dreaming pansy of an old pond

GONE

EVERYBODY loved Chick Lorimer in our town
Far off
Everybody loved her
So we all love a wild girl keeping a hold
On a dream she wants Nobody knows now where Chick Lorimer went.
Nobody knows why she packed her trunk
. . . a few old things
And is gone,
Gone with her little chin
Thrust ahead of her 10
And her soft hair blowing careless
From under a wide hat, Dancer, singer, a laughing passionate lover.

Were there ten men or a hundred hunting Chick?
 Were there five men or fifty with aching hearts?
 Everybody loved Chick Lorimer.
 Nobody knows where she's gone.

I AM THE PEOPLE, THE MOB

I AM the people—the mob—the crowd—the mass
 Do you know that all the great work of the world is done through me?
 I am the workingman, the inventor, the maker of the world's food and clothes
 I am the audience that witnesses history.
 The Napoleons come from me and the Lincolns They die And then I send forth more Napoleons and Lincolns I am the seed ground I am a prairie that will stand for much plowing Terrible storms pass over me I forget The best of me is sucked out and wasted I forget Everything but Death comes to me and makes me work and give up what I have And I forget Sometimes I growl, shake myself and spatter a few red drops for history to remember Then—I forget
 When I, the People, learn to remember, when I, the People, use the lessons of yesterday and no longer forget who robbed me last year, who played me for a fool—then there will be no speaker in all the world say the name 'The People,' with any fleck of a sneer in his voice or any far-off smile of derision
 The mob—the crowd—the mass—will ar-rise then

CABOOSE THOUGHTS

It's going to come out all right—do you know?
 The sun, the birds, the grass—they know.
 They get along—and we'll get along
 Some days will be rainy and you will sit waiting
 And the letter you wait for won't come,
 And I will sit watching the sky tear off grey and grey
 And the letter I wait for won't come.

There will be ac-ci-dents.
 I know ac-ci-dents are coming.
 Smash-ups, signals wrong, washouts, trestles rotten, 10
 Red and yellow ac-ci-dents.
 But somehow and somewhere the end of the run
 The train gets put together again
 And the caboose and the green tail
 lights
 Fade down the right of way like a new white hope.

I never heard a mocking-bird in Kentucky
 Spilling its heart in the morning

I never saw the snow on Chumbarazo.
 It's a high white Mexican hat, I hear

I never had supper with Abe Lincoln 20
 Nor a dish of soup with Jim Hill.

But I've been around
 I know some of the boys here who can go a little
 I know girls good for a burst of speed any time

I heard Williams and Walker
 Before Walker died in the bughouse.

I knew a mandolin player Working in a barber shop in an Indiana
 town,
 And he thought he had a million dollars

I knew a hotel girl in Des Moines 30
 She had eyes, I saw her and said to myself

The sun rises and the sun sets in her
 eyes

I was her steady and her heart went pit-a-pat

We took away the money for a prize waltz at a Brotherhood dance

She had eyes, she was safe as the bridge over the Mississippi at Burlington,
 I married her

Last summer we took the cushions going west.

Pike's Peak is a big old stone, believe
 me

It's fastened down, something you can count on.

It's going to come out all right—do you
know?
The sun, the birds, the grass—they know. 40
They get along—and we'll get along 1916 1918

WILDERNESS

THERE is a wolf in me . fangs pointed for tearing gashes a red tongue for raw meat . and the hot lapping of blood—I keep this wolf because the wilderness gave it to me and the wilderness will not let it go

There is a fox in me a silver-grey fox
. I sniff and guess . I pick things out of the wind and air . I nose in the dark night and take sleepers and eat them and hide the feathers I circle and loop and double-cross

There is a hog in me—a snout and a belly a machinery for eating and grunting
. a machinery for sleeping satisfied in the sun—I got this too from the wilderness and the wilderness will not let it go

There is a fish in me . . . I know I came from salt-blue water-gates . I scur-ried with shoals of herring I blew waterspouts with porpoises before land was before the water went down before Noah before the first chapter of Genesis

There is a baboon in me clamberingclawed . dog-faced . yawping a galoot's hunger hairy under the armpits . here are the hawk-eyed hankering men here are the blond and blue-eyed women . here they hide curled asleep waiting ready to snarl and kill ready to sing and give milk waiting—I keep the baboon because the wilderness says so

There is an eagle in me and a mocking-bird
. . and the eagle flies among the Rocky Mountains of my dreams and fights among the Sierra crags of what I want
. . and the mocking-bird warbles in the early forenoon before the dew is gone, warbles in the underbrush of my Chat-tanooogs of hope, gushes over the blue

Ozark foothills of my wishes—And I got the eagle and the mocking-bird from the wilderness.

O, I got a zoo, I got a menagerie, inside my ribs, under my bony head, under my red-valve heart—and I got something else it is a man-child heart, a woman-child heart it is a father and mother and lover it came from God-Knows-Where it is going to God-Knows-Where—For I am the keeper of the zoo I say yes and no
I sing and kill and work I am a pal of the world I came from the wilderness.

SINGING NIGGER

YOUR bony head, Jazbo, O dock walloper,
Those grappling hooks, those wheelbarrow handlers,
The dome and the wings of you, nigger,
The red roof and the door of you,
I know where your songs came from
I know why God listens to your, 'Walk All Over God's Heaven'
I heard you shooting craps, 'My baby's going to have a new dress'
I heard you in the cinders, 'I'm going to live anyhow until I die'
I saw five of you with a can of beer on a summer night and I listened to the five of you harmonizing six ways to sing, 'Way Down Yonder in the Cornfield'
I went away asking where I come from. 10

PRAYERS OF STEEL

LAY me on an anvil, O God
Beat me and hammer me into a crowbar.
Let me pry loose old walls
Let me lift and loosen old foundations

Lay me on an anvil, O God.
Beat me and hammer me into a steel spike.
Drive me into the girders that hold a skyscraper together Take red-hot rivets and fasten me into the central girders
Let me be the great nail holding a skyscraper through blue nights into white stars.

COOL TOMBS

WHEN Abraham Lincoln was shoveled into the tombs, he forgot the copperheads and the assassin . . . in the dust, in the cool
tombs

And Ulysses Grant lost all thought of con men and Wall Street, cash and collateral turned ashes . . . in the dust, in the cool
tombs.

Pocahontas' body, lovely as a poplar, sweet as a red haw in November or a pawpaw in May, did she wonder? does she remember? . . . in the dust, in the cool tombs?

Take any streetful of people buying clothes and groceries, cheering a hero or throwing confetti and blowing tin horns .
tell me if the lovers are losers . tell me if any get more than the lovers in the dust . . . in the cool tombs.

SHENANDOAH

IN the Shenandoah Valley, one rider grey and one rider blue, and the sun on the riders wondering

Piled in the Shenandoah, riders blue and riders grey, piled with shovels, one and another, dust in the Shenandoah taking them quicker than mothers take children done with play.

The blue nobody remembers, the grey nobody remembers, it's all old and old nowadays in the Shenandoah

And all is young, a butter of dandelions slung on the turf, climbing blue flowers of the wishing woodlands wondering a midnight purple violet claims the sun among old heads, among old dreams of repeating heads of a rider blue and a rider grey in the Shenandoah

GRASS

PILE the bodies high at Austerlitz and Waterloo

Shovel them under and let me work—
I am the grass, I cover all.

And pile them high at Gettysburg
And pile them high at Ypres and Verdun.
Shovel them under and let me work
Two years, ten years, and passengers ask the conductor

What place is this?

Where are we now?

I am the grass.

10

Let me work.

OLD TIMERS

I AM an ancient reluctant conscript

On the soup wagons of Xerxes I was a cleaner of pans

On the march of Miltiades' phalanx I had a haft and head,

I had a bristling gleaming spear-handle

Red-headed Cæsar picked me for a teamster

He said, 'Go to work, you Tuscan bastard
Rome calls for a man who can drive horses '

The units of conquest led by Charles the Twelfth,

The whirling whimsical Napolconic columns

They saw me one of the horseshoers. 10

I trimmed the feet of a white horse
Bonaparte swept the night stars with.

Lincoln said, 'Get into the game, your nation takes you '

And I drove a wagon and team, and I had my arm shot off

At Spotsylvania Court House.

I am an ancient reluctant conscript.

BROKEN-FACE GARGOYLES

ALL I can give you is broken-face gargoyles.
It is too early to sing and dance at funerals, Though I can whisper to you I am looking for an undertaker humming a lullaby and throwing his feet in a swift and mystic buck-and-wing, now you see it and now you don't.

Fish to swim a pool in your garden flashing
a speckled silver,
A basket of wine-saps filling your room with flame-dark for your eyes and the tang of valley orchards for your nose,
Such a beautiful pail of fish, such a beautiful peck of apples, I cannot bring you now.
It is too early and I am not footloose yet.

I shall come in the night when I come with a hammer and saw
I shall come near your window, where you look out when your eyes open in the morning,

And there I shall slam together birdhouses and bird-baths for wing-loose wrens and hummers to live in, birds with yellow wing tips to blur and buzz soft all summer, 10

So I shall make little fool homes with doors, always open doors for all and each to run away when they want to

I shall come just like that even though now it is early and I am not yet footloose,

Even though I am still looking for an undertaker with a raw, wind-bitten face and a dance in his feet

I make a date with you (put it down) for six o'clock in the evening a thousand years from now.

All I can give you now is broken-face gargoyles.

All I can give you now is a double gorilla head with two fish mouths and four eagle eyes hooked on a street wall, spouting water and looking two ways to the ends of the street for the new people, the young strangers, coming, coming, always coming.

It is early

I shall yet be footloose

SHIRT

My shirt is a token and symbol,
more than a cover for sun and rain,
my shirt is a signal,
and a teller of souls

I can take off my shirt and tear it, and so make a ripping razzly noise,
and the people will say,
'Look at him tear his shirt.'

I can keep my shirt on
I can stick around and sing like a little bird 10
and look 'em all in the eye and never be fazed.

I can keep my shirt on.

JAZZ FANTASIA

DRUM on your drums, batter on your ban-joes, sob on the long cool winding saxophones. Go to it, O jazzmen.

Sling your knuckles on the bottoms of the happy tin pans, let your trombones ooze, and go husha-husha-hush with the slippery sand-paper.

Moan like an autumn wind high in the lonesome tree-tops, moan soft like you wanted somebody terrible, cry like a racing car slipping away from a motorcycle cop, bang-bang' you jazzmen, bang altogether drums, traps, banjoes, horns, tin cans—make two people fight on the top of a stairway and scratch each other's eyes in a clinch tumbling down the stairs.

Can the rough stuff . . . now a Mississippi steamboat pushes up the night river with a hoo-hoo-hoo-oo . . . and the green lanterns calling to the high soft stars . . . a red moon rides on the humps of the low river hills . . . go to it, O jazzmen.

OSSAWATOMIE

I DON'T know how he came,
shambling, dark, and strong.

He stood in the city and told men
My people are fools, my people are young and strong, my people must learn, my people are terrible workers and fighters.

Always he kept on asking: Where did that blood come from?

They said: You for the fool killer, you for the booby hatch
and a necktie party

They hauled him into jail.
 They sneered at him and spit on him, 10
 And he wrecked their jails,
 Singing, 'God damn your jails,'
 And when he was most in jail
 Crummy among the crazy in the dark
 Then he was most of all out of jail
 Shambling, dark, and strong,
 Always asking Where did that blood come from?

They laid hands on him
 And the fool killers had a laugh
 And the necktie party was a go, by God 20
 They laid hands on him and he was a goner
 They hammered him to pieces and he stood up
 They buried him and he walked out of the grave, by God, Asking again Where did that blood come from?

LOSERS

If I should pass the tomb of Jonah
 I would stop there and sit for awhile;
 Because I was swallowed one time deep in the dark
 And came out alive after all

If I pass the burial spot of Nero
 I shall say to the wind, 'Well, well!—
 I who have fiddled in a world on fire,
 I who have done so many stunts not worth doing

I am looking for the grave of Sinbad too
 I want to shake his ghost-hand and say, 10
 'Neither of us died very early, did we?'

And the last sleeping-place of Nebuchadnezzar—
 When I arrive there I shall tell the wind.
 'You ate grass, I have eaten crow—
 Who is better off now or next year?'

Jack Cade, John Brown, Jesse James,
 There too I could sit down and stop for awhile
 I think I could tell their headstones
 'God, let me remember all good losers '

I could ask people to throw ashes on their heads 20
 In the name of that sergeant at Belleau
 Woods,
 Walking into the drumfires, calling his men,
 'Come on, you . . . Do you want to live forever?'

THREES

I WAS a boy when I heard three red words
 a thousand Frenchmen died in the streets for: Liberty, Equality, Fraternity—I asked why men die for words

I was older, men with mustaches, sideburns, lilacs, told me the high golden words are.
 Mother, Home, and Heaven—other older men with face decorations said God, Duty, Immortality
 —they sang these threes slow from deep lungs

Years tacked off their say-so on the great clocks 10
 of doom and damnation, soup and nuts meteors flashed their say-so and out of great Russia came three dusky syllables workmen took guns and went out to die for: Bread, Peace, Land

And I met a marine of the U S A , a leatherneck with a girl on his knee for a memory in ports circling the earth and he said Tell me how to say three things
 and I always get by—gimme a plate of ham and eggs—
 how much?—and—do you love me, kid?

NIGHT STUFF

LISTEN a while, the moon is a lovely woman,
 a lonely woman, lost in a silver dress, lost in a circus rider's silver dress

Listen a while, the lake by night is a lonely woman, a lovely woman, circled with birches and pines mixing their green and white among stars shattered in spray clear nights

I know the moon and the lake have twisted the roots under my heart the same as a lonely woman, a lovely woman, in a silver dress, in a circus rider's silver dress

THE strong men keep coming on
They go down shot, hanged, sick, broken
They live on fighting, singing, lucky as

Call hallelujah, call amen, call deep thanks.

FROM THE PEOPLE, YES

THE PEOPLE WILL LIVE ON

The people will live on
The learning and blundering people will live on
They will be tricked and sold and again sold
And go back to the nourishing earth for rootholds,
The people so peculiar in renewal and comeback,
You can't laugh off their capacity to take
it
The mammoth rests between his cyclonic dramas

The people so often sleepy, weary, enigmatic, is a vast huddle with many units saying

10

'I earn my living
I make enough to get by and it takes all my time.
If I had more time
I could do more for myself and maybe for others
I could read and study and talk things over and find out about things.

It takes time.

20

I wish I had the time.'

The people is a tragic and comic two-face hero and hoodlum· phantom and gorilla twisting to moan with a gargoyle mouth
'They buy me and sell me . . . it's a game            sometime I'll break loose . . .'

Once having marched
Over the margins of animal necessity,
Over the grim line of sheer subsistence
Then man came

30

To the deeper rituals of his bones,
To the lights lighter than any bones,
To the time for thinking things over,
To the dance, the song, the story,
Or the hours given over to dreaming,
Once having so marched

Between the finite limitations of the five senses and the endless yearnings of man for the beyond the people hold to the humdrum bidding of work and food while reaching out when it comes their way for lights beyond the prison of the five senses, for keepsakes lasting beyond any hunger or death

44

This reaching is alive.
The panderers and liars have violated and smutted it

Yet this reaching is alive yet for lights and keepsakes.

The people know the salt of the sea    50 and the strength of the winds lashing the corners of the earth
The people take the earth as a tomb of rest and a cradle of hope
Who else speaks for the Family of Man?
They are in tune and step with constellations of universal law.

The people is a polychrome, a spectrum and a prism held in a moving monolith,    60 a console organ of changing themes, a clavilux of color poems wherein the sea offers fog and the fog moves off in rain and the labrador sunset shortens to a nocturne of clear stars serene over the shot spray of northern lights.

The steel mull sky is alive.
 The fire breaks white and zigzag 70 shot on a gun-metal gloaming.
 Man is a long time coming.
 Man will yet win
 Brother may yet line up with brother:

This old anvil laughs at many broken hammers
 There are men who can't be bought.
 The fireborn are at home in fire

The stars make no noise
 You can't hinder the wind from blowing.
 Time is a great teacher. 80
 Who can live without hope?

In the darkness with a great bundle of grief the people march
 In the night, and overhead a shovel of stars for keeps, the people march
 'Where to? what next?'

1871-

FROM AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY

AN AMERICAN PROBLEM <sup>1</sup>

Two incidents which occurred at this time tended still more to sharpen the contrary points of view holding between Clyde and Roberta. One of these was no more than a glimpse which Roberta had one evening of Clyde pausing at the Central Avenue curb in front of the post-office to say a few words to Arabella Stark, who in a large and impressive-looking car, was waiting for her father who was still in the Stark Building opposite. And Miss Stark, fashionably outfitted according to the season, her world and her own pretentious taste, was affectedly posed at the wheel, not only for the benefit of Clyde but the public in general. And to Roberta, who by now was reduced to the verge of distraction between Clyde's delay and her determination to compel him to act in her behalf, she appeared to be little less than an epitome of all the security, luxury and freedom from responsibility which so enticed and hence caused Clyde to delay and be as indifferent as possible to the dire state which confronted her. For, alas, apart from this claim of her condition, what had she to offer him comparable to all he would be giving up in case he acceded to her request? Nothing—a thought which was far from encouraging.

Yet, at this moment contrasting her own wretched and neglected state with that of this Miss Stark, for example, she found herself a prey to an even more complaining and antagonistic mood than had hitherto characterized her. It was not right. It was not fair. For during the several weeks that had passed since last they had discussed this matter, Clyde had scarcely said a word to her at the factory or elsewhere, let alone called upon her at her room, fearing as he did the customary inquiry which he could not satisfy. And this caused her to feel that not only was he neglecting but resenting her most sharply.

And yet as she walked home from this trivial and fairly representative scene, her heart was not nearly so angry as it was sad and sore because of the love and comfort that had vanished and was not likely ever to come again. ever . ever ever Oh, how terrible, how terrible!

On the other hand, Clyde, and at approximately this same time, was called upon to witness a scene identified with Roberta, which, as some might think, only an ironic and even malicious fate could have intended or permitted to come to pass. For motoring north the following Sunday to Arrow Lake to the lodge of the Trumbulls' to take advantage of an early spring week-end planned by Sondra, the party on nearing Biltz, which was in the direct line of the trip, was compelled to detour east in the direction of Roberta's home. And coming finally to a north and south road which ran directly from Trippettsville past the Alden farm, they turned north into that. And a few minutes later, came directly to the corner adjoining the Alden farm, where an east and west road led to Biltz. Here Tracy

Trumbull, driving at the time, requested that some one should get out and inquire at the adjacent farm-house as to whether this road did lead to Biltz. And Clyde, being nearest to one door, jumped out. And then, glancing at the name on the mail-box which stood at the junction and evidently belonged to the extremely dilapidated old farm-house on the rise above, he was not a little astonished to note that the name was that of Titus Alden—Roberta's father. Also, as it instantly came to him, since she had described her parents as being near Biltz, this must be her home. It gave him pause, caused him for the moment to hesitate as to whether to go on or not, for once he had given Roberta a small picture of himself, and she might have shown it up here. Again the mere identification of this lorn, dilapidated realm with Roberta and hence himself, was sufficient to cause him to wish to turn and run.

But Sondra, who was sitting next him in the car and now noting his hesitation, called 'What's the matter, Clyde? Afraid of the bow-wow?' And he, realizing instantly that they would comment further on his actions if he did not proceed at once, started up the path. But the effect of this house, once he contemplated it thoroughly, was sufficient to arouse in his brain the most troubled and miserable of thoughts. For what a house, to be sure! So lonely and bare, even in this bright, spring weather! The decayed and sagging roof. The broken chimney to the north—rough lumps of cemented field stones lying at its base, the sagging and semi-toppling chimney to the south, sustained in place by a log chain. The unkempt path from the road below, which slowly he ascended! He was not a little dejected by the broken and displaced stones which served as steps before the front door. And the unpainted dilapidated out-buildings, all the more dreary because of these others.

'Gee!' To think that this was Roberta's home. And to think, in the face of all that he now aspired to in connection with Sondra and this social group at Lycurgus, she should be demanding that he marry her! And Sondra in the car with him here to see—if not know. The poverty! The reduced grimness of it all. How far he had traveled away from just such a beginning as this!

With a weakening and sickening sensation at the pit of his stomach, as of some blow administered there, he now approached the door. And then, as if to further distress him, if that were possible, the door was opened by Titus Alden, who, in an old, thread-bare and out-at-elbows coat, as well as baggy, worn, jean trousers and rough, shineless, ill-fitting country shoes, desired by his look to know what he wanted. And Clyde, being taken aback by the clothes, as well as a marked resemblance to Roberta about the eyes and mouth, now as swiftly as possible asked if the east and west road below ran through Biltz and joined the main highway north. And although he would have preferred a quick 'yes' so that he might have turned and gone, Titus preferred to step down into the yard and then, with a gesture of the arm, indicated that if they wanted to strike a really good part of the road, they had better follow this Trippettsville north and south road for at least two more miles, and then turn west. Clyde thanked him briefly and turned almost before he had finished and hurried away.

For, as he now recalled, and with an enormous sense of depression, Roberta was thinking and at this very time, that soon now, and in the face of all Lycurgus had to offer him—Sondra—the coming spring and summer—the love and romance, gayety, position, power—he was going to give all that up and go away with and marry her. Sneak away to some out-of-the-way place! Oh, how horrible! And with a child at his age! Oh, why had he ever been so foolish and weak as to identify himself with her in this intimate way? Just because of a few lonely evenings! Oh, why, why couldn't he have waited and then this other world would have opened up to him just the same? If only he could have waited!

And now unquestionably, unless he could speedily and easily disengage himself from her, all this other splendid recognition would be destined to be withdrawn from him, and this other world from which he sprang might extend its gloomy, poverty-stricken arms to him and envelop him once more, just as the poverty of his family had enveloped and almost strangled him from the first. And it even occurred to him, in a vague way for the first time, how strange it was that this girl and he, whose origin had been strikingly similar, should have been so drawn to each other in the beginning. Why should it have been? How strange life was, anyway? But even more harrowing than this, was the problem of a way out that was before him. And his mind from now on, on this trip, was once more searching for some solution. A word of complaint from Roberta or her parents to his uncle or Gilbert, and assuredly he would be done for.

The thought so troubled him that once in the car, and although previously he had been chattering along with the others about what might be in store ahead in the way of divertissement, he now sat silent. And Sondra, who sat next to him and who previously had been whispering at intervals of her plans for the summer, now, instead of resuming the patter, whispered 'What come over de sweet phing?' (When Clyde appeared to be the least reduced in mind she most affected this patter with him, since it had an almost electric, if sweetly tormenting effect on him. 'His baby-talking girl,' he sometimes called her.) 'Facey all dark now. Little while ago facey all smiles. Come make facey all nice again. Smule at Sondra. Squeeze Sondra's arm like good boy, Clyde.'

She turned and looked up into his eyes to see what if any effect this baby-worded cajolery was having, and Clyde did his best to brighten, of course. But even so, and in the face of all this amazingly wonderful love on her part for him, the specter of Roberta and all that she represented now in connection with all this, was ever before him—her state, her very recent edict in regard to it, the obvious impossibility of doing anything now but go away with her.

Why—rather than let himself in for a thing like that—would it not be better, and even though he lost Sondra once and for all, for him to decamp as in the instance of the slain child in Kansas City—and be heard of nevermore here. But then he would lose Sondra, his connections here, and his uncle—this world! The loss! The loss! The misery of once more drifting about here and there, of being compelled to write his mother once more concerning certain things about his flight, which some one writing from here might explain to her afterwards—and so much more damagingly. And the thoughts concerning him on the part of his relatives! And of late he had been writing his mother that he was doing so well. What was it about his life that made things like this happen to him? Was this what his life was to be like? Running away from one situation and another just to start all over somewhere else—perhaps only to be compelled to flee from something worse. No, he could not run away again. He must face it and solve it in some way. He must!

THE DEMIURGE <sup>1</sup>

—What is man, that his welfare be considered?—an ape who chatters to himself of kinship with the archangels while filthily he digs for groundnuts.

—Yet more clearly do I perceive that this same man is a maimed god. . . He is under penalty condemned to compute eternity with false weights and to estimate infinity with a yardstick, and he very often does it . . .

—There lies the choice which every man must make—or rationally to accept his own limitations? or stupendously to play the fool and swear that he is at will omnipotent?

—DIZAIN DES REINES

I

OFF-HAND (began John Charteris), I would say that books are best insured against oblivion through practise of the auctorial virtues of distinction and clarity, of beauty and symmetry, of tenderness and truth and urbanity. That covers the ground, I think and so it remains merely to cite supporting instances here and there, by mentioning a few writers who have observed these requirements, and thus to substantiate my formula without unnecessary divagation . . .

Therefore I shall be very brief. And even so, I imagine, you will not be inclined to listen to much of what I am about to say, if only because, like most of us, you are intimidated by that general attitude toward culture and the humanities which has made of American literature, among foreign penmen, if not precisely an object of despairing envy, at least of feeling comment. In particular, I imagine that my frequent references to the affairs and people of fled years will annoy you, since the American book-purchaser shies from such pedantic, and indeed from any, allusion to the past, with that distrust peculiar to persons with criminal records. In fact, this murderer, too, is often haunted, I dare say, by memories of his victim, in thinking of the time he has killed, whether with the 'uplifting' or with the 'daring' current novels of yesterday.

But you perceive, I trust, that your personal indifference, and the lazy contempt of America as a whole, toward art matters no more affects the eternal verity and the eternal importance of art than do the religious practises of Abyssinia, say, affect the verity and importance of the New Testament. You perceive, I trust, that you ought to be interested in art matters, whatever is your actual emotion. You understand, in fine—as a mere abstract principle—what your feeling 'ought to be.' Well, it is precisely that tendency to imagine yourself and your emotions as these things 'ought to be' which convicts you, over any verbal disclaimer, of a vital interest in art matters: and it is that tendency about which I propose to speak very briefly.

And yet, so insidious is the influence of general opinion, even when manifested as plain unreason, that, I confess, whenever anyone talks of 'art' and 'æsthetic theories,' I myself am inclined to find him vaguely ridiculous, and to detect in every word he utters a flavor of affectation. So should you prove quite as susceptible as I to the herd-instinct I shall have no ground for complaint. Meanwhile in theory—without of necessity accompanying my friend Felix Kennaston all the way to his conclusion that the sum of corporeal life represents an essay in romantic fiction,—I can perceive plainly enough that the shape-giving principle of all sentient beings is artistic. That is a mere matter of looking at living creatures and noticing their forms. . . . But the principle goes deeper, in that it shapes too the minds of men, by this universal tendency to imagine—and to think of as in reality existent—all the tenants of earth and all the affairs of earth, not as they are, but 'as they ought to be.' And so it comes about that romance has invariably been the demi-urgic and beneficent force, not merely in letters, but in every matter which concerns mankind, and that 'realism,' with its teaching that the mile-posts along the road are as worthy of consideration as the goal, has always figured as man's chief enemy . . .

Indeed, that scathing criticism which Sophocles passed, howsoever anciently on a contemporary, remains no less familiar than significant,—'He paints men as they are. I paint them as they ought to be.' It is aside from the mark that in imputing such veracity to Euripides the singer of Colonus was talking nonsense: the point is that Sophocles saw clearly what was, and what continues to be, the one unpardonable sin against art and human welfare.

For the Greeks, who were nurtured among art's masterworks, recognized, with much of that perturbing candor wherewith children everywhere appraise their associates, that gracefully to prevaricate about mankind and human existence was art's signal function. As a by-product of this perception, Hellenic literature restrained its endeavors, quite naturally, to embroidering events that were incontestable because time had erased the evidence for or against their actual occurrence. and the poets, in their quest of protagonists worth noble handling, evoked them from bright mists of antiquity, wherethrough, as far as went existent proofs, men might in reality have moved 'as they ought to be.' Thus, even Homer, the most ancient of great verbal artists, elected to deal with legends that in his day were venerable and in Homer when Ajax lifts a stone it is with the strength of ten warriors, and Odysseus, when such a procedure at all promotes the progress of the story, becomes invisible. It seems—upon the whole,—less probable that Homer drew either of these accomplishments from the actual human life about him, than from simple consciousness that it would be very gratifying if men could do these things. And, indeed, as touches enduring art, to write ‘with the eye upon the object’ appears a relatively modern pretence, perhaps not unconnected with the coetaneous phrase of ‘all my eye’

Then, when the Attic drama came to flowerage, the actors were masked, so that their features might display unhuman perfection, the actors were mounted upon cothurni, to lend impressiveness to man’s physical mediocrity; and the actors were clothed in draperies which philanthropically eclipsed humanity’s frugal graces. In painting or sculpture, where the human body could be idealized with a free hand, the Greek rule was nakedness. In drama, where the artist’s material was incorrigible flesh, there was nothing for it save to disguise the uncaptivating ground-work through some discreet employment of fair apparel. Thus only could the audience be hoodwinked into forgetting for a while what men and women really looked like. In drama, therefore, Theseus declaimed in imperial vestments, and in sculpture wore at the very most a fig-leaf. It is hardly necessary to point out that the Greeks shared few of our delusions concerning ‘decency’ for, of course, they had no more moral aversion to a man’s appearing naked in the street than to a toad’s doing so, and objected simply on the ground that both were ugly. So they resolutely wrote about—and carved and painted, for that matter—men ‘as they ought to be’ doing such things as it would be gratifying for men to do if these feats were humanly possible. And in the twilight evening of Greek literature you will find Theocritus clinging with unshaken ardor to unreality, and regaling the town-folk of Alexandria with tales of an improbable Sicily, where the inhabitants are on terms of friendly intimacy with cyclopes, water-nymphs and satyrs.

3

Equally in the Middle Ages did literature avoid deviation into the credible

When carpets of brocade were spread in April meadows it was to the end that barons and ladies might listen with delight to peculiarly unpalatable accounts of how Sire Roland held the pass at Roncevaux single-handed against an army, and of Lancelot’s education at the bottom of a pond by elfin pedagogues, and of how Virgil builded Naples upon eggshells. When English-speaking tale-tellers began to concoct homespun romances they selected such themes as Bevis of Southampton’s addiction to giant-killing, and Guy of Warwick’s encounter with a man-eating cow eighteen feet long, and the exploits of Thomas of Reading, who exterminated an infinity of dragons and eloped with Prester John’s daughter after jilting the Queen of Fairyland. Chaucer, unquestionless, was so injudicious as to dabble in that muddy stream of contemporaneous happenings which time alone may clarify, but the parts of Chaucer that endure are a Knight’s story of mythological events, a Prioress’s unsubstantiated account of a miracle, a Nun’s Priest’s anticipation of Rostand’s barnyard fantasy, and a ream or two of other delightful flim-flams. From his contemporaries Chaucer got such matter as the Miller’s tale of a clerk’s misadventures in osculation.

4

But with the invention of printing, thoughts spread so expeditiously that it became possible to acquire quite serviceable ideas without the trouble of thinking, and very few of us since then have cared to risk impairment of our minds by using them. A consequence was that, with inaction, man’s imagination in general grew more sluggish, and demurred, just as mental indolence continues to balk, over the exertion of conceiving an unfamiliar locale, in any form of art. The deterioration, of course, was gradual, and for a considerable while theatrical audiences remained receptively illiterate. And it seems at first sight gratifying to note that for a lengthy period Marlowe was the most ‘popular’ of the Elizabethan playwrights for in Marlowe’s superb verse there is really very little to indicate that the writer had ever encountered any human beings, and certainly nothing whatever to show that he had seriously considered this especial division of fauna, whereas all his scenes are laid somewhere a long way west of the Hesperides. Yet Marlowe's popularity, one cannot but suspect, was furthered by unæsthetic aids, in divers 'comic' scenes which time has beneficently destroyed. At all events, complaisant dramatists, out of a normal preference for butter with their daily bread, soon began to romance about contemporary life. It is not Shakespeare's least claim to applause that he sedulously avoided doing anything of the sort. To the other side, being human, Shakespeare was not untainted by the augmenting trend toward 'realism,' and in depicting his fellows was prone to limit himself to exaggeration of their powers of fancy and diction. This, as we now know, is a too sparing employment of untruthfulness and there is ground for sharp arraignment of the imbecility attributed to Lear, and Othello, and Hamlet, and Macbeth, and Romeo—to cite only a few instances,—by any candid estimate of their actions, when deprived of the transfiguring glow wherewith Shakespeare invests what is being done, by evoking a haze of lovely words. For, really, to go mad because a hostess resents your bringing a hundred servants on a visit, or to murder your wife because she has misplaced a handkerchief, is much the sort of conduct which is daily chronicled by the morning-paper, and in charity to man's self-respect should be restricted to the ostentatious impermanence of journalism. But at bottom Shakespeare never displayed any very hearty admiration for humanity as a race, and would seem to have found not many more commendable traits in general exercise among mankind than did the authors of the Bible.

Few of the art-reverencing Elizabethans, however, or of the earlier Jacobean, handled the surrounding English life when they dealt with the contemporaneous. It was with a reassuringly remote Italian background, against which almost anything might be supposed to happen, in the way of picturesque iniquity and poisoned wine, so that they composed with much of that fine irresponsibility wherewith American journalists expose the court-life of Madrid and Vienna. But the maturing Jacobean drama, under the insidious and dreadful influence of common-sense, tended spasmodically toward untruths about the workaday life of its audience, with such depressing results as Hyde Park, The Roaring Girl and The New Inn, by men who in the field of unrestricted imagination had showed themselves to be possessed of genuine ability. It should always be remembered in favor of the Puritans that when they closed the theatres 'realism' was sprawling upon the stage.

5

Then came the gallant protest of the Restoration, when Wycherley and his successors in drama, commenced to write of contemporary life in much the spirit of modern musical comedy, which utilizes a fac-simile of the New York Pennsylvania Railway Station, or of the Capitol at Washington, as an appropriate setting for a ballet and a comedian's colloquy with the orchestra leader. Thus here the scenes are in St. James's Park, outside Westminster, in the New Exchange, and in other places familiar to the audience, and the characters barter jokes on current events, but the laws of the performers' mimic existence are frankly extra-mundane, and their antics, in Restoration days as now, would have subjected the perpetrators to immediate arrest upon the auditorial side of footlights. A great deal of queer nonsense has been printed concerning the comedy of Gallantry, upon the startling assumption that its authors copied the life about them. It is true that Wycherley, in this well-nigh the first of English authors to go astray, began the pernicious practise of depicting men as being not very much better than they actually are, of that I will speak later, but Wycherley had the saving grace to present his men and women as trammelled by the social restrictions of Cloud-Cuckoo-Land alone. And, were there nothing else, it seems improbable that Congreve, say, really believed that every young fellow spoke habitually in terms of philosophic wit and hated his father, and that every old hunk possessed, more or less vicariously, a beautiful second wife, and that people married without noticing either that the parson or the bride was a familiar acquaintance pretending to be somebody else, and that monetary competence and happiness and all-important documents, as well as a sudden turn for heroic verse, were regularly accorded to everybody toward eleven o'clock in the evening.

6

Thus far the illiterate ages, when as yet so few persons could read that literature tended generally toward the acted drama. The stage could supply much illusory assistance, in the way of pads and wigs and grease-paints and soft lightings, toward making men appear heroic and women charming. but, after all, the rôles were necessarily performed by human beings, and the charitable deceit was not continuous. The audience was ever and anon being reminded, against its firm-set will, that men were mediocre creatures.

Now could the poets, howsoever rapidly now multiplied their verse-books, satisfactorily delude their patrons into overlooking this unpleasant fact. For one reason or another, men as a whole have never taken kindly to printed poetry: most of us are unable to put up with it at all, and even to the exceptional person verse after an hour's reading becomes unaccountably tiresome. Prose—for no very patent cause—is much easier going. So the poets proved ineffectual comforters, who could but rarely be-drug even the few to whom their charms did not seem gibberish.

With the advent of the novel, all this was changed. Not merely were you relieved from metrical fatigue, but there came no commonplace flesh-and-blood to give the lie to the artist's pretensions. It was possible, really for the first time, acceptably to present in literature men 'as they ought to be.' Richardson could dilate as unrestrainedly as he pleased upon the super-eminence in virtue and sin, respectively, of his Grandison and his Lovelace emboldened by the knowledge that there was nothing to check him off save the dubious touchstone of his reader's common-sense. Fielding was not only able to conduct a broad-shouldered young ruffian to fortune and a lovely wife, but could moreover endow Tom Jones with all sorts of heroic and estimable qualities such as (in mere unimportant fact) rascals do not display in actual life. When the novel succeeded the drama it was no longer necessary for the artist to represent human beings with even partial veracity: and this new style of writing at once became emblematic

And so it has been ever since. Novelists have severally evolved their pleasing symbols wherewith approximately to suggest human beings and the business of human life, much as remote Egyptians drew serrated lines to convey the idea of water and a circle to indicate eternity. The symbols have often varied, but there has rarely been any ill-advised attempt to depict life as it seems in the living of it, or to crystallize the vague notions and feeble sensations with which human beings, actually, muddle through to an epitaph, if only because all sensible persons, obscurely aware that this routine is far from what it ought to be, have always preferred to deny its existence. And moreover, we have come long ago to be guided in any really decisive speech or action by what we have read somewhere, and so, may fairly claim that literature should select (as it does) such speeches and such actions as typical of our essential lives, rather than the gray interstices, which we perforce fill in extempore, and botch.

As concerns the novelists of the day before yesterday, this evasion of veracity is already more or less conceded: the 'platitudinous heroics' of Scott and the 'exaggerated sentimentalism' of Dickens are notorious in quite authoritative circles whose ducdame is the honest belief that art is a branch of pedagogy. Thackeray, as has been pointed out elsewhere, avoids many a logical outcome of circumstance, when recognition thereof would be inconvenient, by killing off somebody and blinding the reader with a tear-drenched handkerchief. And when we sanely appraise the most cried-up writer of genteel 'realism,' matters are not conducted much more candidly. Here is a fair sample—'From the very beginning of my acquaintance with you, your manners, impressing me with the fullest belief of your arrogance, your conceit, and your selfish disdain of the feelings of others, were such as to form that ground-work of disapprobation on which succeeding events have built so immovable a dislike, and I had not known you a month before I felt that you were the last man in the world whom I could ever be prevailed on to marry.' It is Miss Austen's most famous, most beloved, and most 'natural' character replying—not by means of a stilted letter, but colloquially, under the stress of emotion—to a proposal of marriage by the man she loves. This is a crisis which in human life a normal young woman simply does not meet with any such rhetorical architecture . . . So there really seems small ground for wonder that Mr Darcy observed, 'You have said quite enough, madam', and no cause whatever for surprise that he hastily left the room, and was heard to open the front-door and quit the house

Yet, be it forthwith added, Scott and Dickens and Thackeray, and even Miss Austen, were in the right, from one or another æsthetic standpoint, in thus variously editing and revising their contemporaries' unsatisfactory disposition of life. Indeed, upon no plea could they be bound to emulate malfeasance

Criticism as to the veracity of more recent writers is best dismissed with the well-merited commendation that novelists to-day continue rigorously to respect the Second Commandment. Meanwhile it may, with comparative safety, be pointed out that no interred writer of widely conceded genius has ever displayed in depicting the average of human speech and thought and action, and general endowments, such exactness as would be becoming in an affidavit, but rather, when his art touched on these dangerous topics, has regarded romantic prevarication as a necessity. The truth about ourselves is the one truth, above all others, which we are adamant not to face. And this determination springs, not wholly from vanity, but from a profound race-sense that by such denial we have little to lose, and a great deal to gain

7

For, as has been said before, an inveterate Sophocles notes clearly that veracity is the one unpardonable sin, not merely against art, but against human welfare . . . You will observe that the beginnings of fiction everywhere, among all races, take with curious unanimity the same form. It is always the history of the unlooked-for achievements and the ultimate, very public triumph of the ill-used youngest son. From the myth of Zeus, third son of Chronos, to the third prince of the fairy-tale, there is no exception. Everywhere it is to the despised weakling that romance accords the final and very public victory. For in the life-battle for existence it was of course the men of puniest build who first developed mental ability, since hardier compeers, who took with bloodied hands that which they wanted, had no especial need of less reliable makeshifts and everywhere this weakling, quite naturally, afforded himself in imagination what the force of circumstance denied him in fact. Competent persons, then as now, had neither the time nor ability for literature.

By and by a staggering stroke of genius improved the tale by adding the handicap of sex-weakness and Cinderella (whom romance begot and deified as Psyche) straightway led captive every dreamer's hitherto unvoiced desire. This is the most beloved story in the world's library, and, barring a tremendous exception to which I shall presently return, will always remain without rival. Any author anywhere can gain men's love by remodeling (not too drastically) the history of Cinderella: thousands of calligraphic persons have, of course, availed themselves of this fortunate circumstance and the seeming miracle is that the naive and the most sophisticated continue to thrill, at each re-telling of the hackneyed story, with the instant response of fiddlestrings, to an interpretation of life which one is tempted to describe as fiddlesticks. Yet an inevitable, very public triumph of the downtrodden—with all imaginable pomp and fanfare—is of necessity a tenet generally acceptable to a world of ineffectual inhabitants, each one of whom is a monarch of dreams incarcerated in a prison of flesh, and each of whom is hourly fretted, no less by the indifference of nature to his plight, than by the irrelevancy thereto of those social orderings he dazedly ballots into existence . . . Christianity, with its teaching that the oppressed shall be exalted, and the unhappy made free of eternal bliss, thus came in the nick of occasion, to promise what the run of men were eager to believe. Such a delectable prospect, irrespective of its plausibility, could not in the nature of things fail to become popular as has been strikingly attested by man's wide acceptance of the rather exigent requirements of Christianity, and his honest endeavors ever since to interpret them as meaning whatever happens to be convenient at an early period to have wrenched comfort from prefiguring man as the hero of the cosmic romance. For it was unpleasantly apparent that man did not excel in physical strength, as set against the other creatures of a planet whereon may be encountered tigers and elephants. His senses were of low development, as compared with the senses of insects and, indeed, senses possessed by some of these small contemporaries man presently found he did not share, nor very clearly understand. The luxury of wings, and even the common comfort of a caudal appendage, was denied him. He walked painfully, without hoofs, and, created naked as a shelled almond, with difficulty outlived a season of inclement weather. Physically, he displayed in not a solitary trait a product of nature's more ambitious labor. . . . He, thus, surpassed the rest of vital creation in nothing except, as was beginning to be rumored, the power to reason, and even so, was apparently too magnanimous to avail himself of the privilege.

But to acknowledge such disconcerting facts would never do just as inevitably, therefore, as the peafowl came to listen with condescension to the nightingale, and the tortoise to deplore the slapdash ways of his contemporaries, man probably began very early to regale himself with flattering narratives as to his nature and destiny. Among the countless internecine animals that roamed earth, puissant with claw and fang and sinew, an ape reft of his tail, and grown rusty at climbing, was the most formidable, and in the end would triumph. It was of course considered blasphemous to inquire into the grounds for this belief, in view of its patent desirability, for the race was already human. So the prophetic portrait of man treading among cringing pleosauri to browbeat a frightened dinosaur was duly scratched upon the cave's wall, and art began forthwith to accredit human beings with every trait and destiny which they desiderated. . . .

And so to-day, as always, we delight to hear about invincible men and women of unearthly loveliness—corrected and considerably augmented versions of our family circle,—performing feats illimitably beyond our modest powers. And so to-day no one upon the preferable side of Bedlam wishes to be reminded of what we are in actuality, even were it possible, by any disastrous miracle, ever to dispel the mist which romance has evoked about all human doings, and to the golden twilight of which old usage has so accustomed us that, like nocturnal birds, our vision grows perturbed in a clearer atmosphere. And we have come very firmly to believe in the existence of men everywhere, not as in fact they are, but 'as they ought to be.'

8

Now art, like all the other noteworthy factors in this remarkable world, serves in the end utilitarian purposes. When a trait is held up as desirable, for a convincingly long while, the average person, out of self-respect, pretends to possess it. With time, he acts letter-perfect as one endowed therewith, and comes unshakably to believe that it has guided him from infancy. For while everyone is notoriously swayed by appearances, this is more especially true of his own appearance. Cleanliness is, if not actually next to godliness, so far a promoter of benevolence that no man feels upon quite friendly terms with his fellow-beings when conscious that he needs a shave, and if in grief you resolutely contort your mouth into a smile you somehow do become forthwith aware of a considerable mitigation of misery. . . . So it is that man's vanity and hypocrisy and lack of clear thinking are in a fair way to prove in the outcome his salvation.

All is vanity, quoth the son of David, inverting the truth for popular consumption, as became a wise Preacher who knew that vanity is all. For man alone of animals plays the ape to his dreams. That a dog dreams vehemently is matter of public knowledge; it is perfectly possible that in his more ecstatic visions he usurps the shape of his master, and visits Elysian pantries in human form. With awakening, he observes that in point of fact he is a dog, and as a rational animal, makes the best of canineship. But with man the case is otherwise, in that when logic leads to any humiliating conclusion, the sole effect is to discredit logic.

So has man's indomitable vanity made a harem of his instincts, and walled off a seraglio wherein to beget the virtues and refinements and all ennobling factors in man's long progress from gorillaship. As has been suggested, creative literature would seem to have sprung simply from the instinct of any hurt animal to seek revenge,—and 'to get even,' as the phrase runs, in the field of imagination when such revenge was not feasible in any other arena. Then, too, it is an instinct common to brute creatures that the breeding or even the potential mother must not be bitten,—upon which modest basis a little by a little mankind builded the fair code of domnei, or woman-worship, which for so long a while did yeoman service among legislators toward keeping half our citizens 'out of the mire of politics,' and which still enables any reputable looking married woman to kill whatsoever male she elects with impunity. From the shuddering dread that beasts manifest toward uncomprehended forces, such as wind and thunder and tall waves, man developed religion, and a consoling assurance of divine paternity. And when you come to judge what he made of sexual desire, appraising the deed in view as against the wondrous overture of courtship and that infinity of high achievements which time has seen performed as grace-notes, words fail before his egregious thaumaturgy. For after any such stupendous bit of hocus-pocus, there seems to be no limit fixed to the conjurations of human vanity.

9

And these aspiring notions blended a great while since, into what may be termed the Chivalrous attitude toward life. Thus it is that romance, the real demiurge, the first and loveliest daughter of human vanity, contrives all those dynamic illusions which are used to further the ultimate ends of romance. The cornerstone of Chivalry I take to be the idea of vicarship for the chivalrous person is, in his own eyes at least, the child of God, and goes about this world as his Father's representative in an alien country. It was very adroitly to human pride, through an assumption of man's personal responsibility in his truest action, that Chivalry made its appeal, and exhorted every man to keep faith, not merely with the arbitrary will of a strong god, but with himself. There is no cause for wonder that the appeal was irresistible, when to each man it thus admitted that he himself was the one thing seriously to be considered. . . . So man became a chivalrous animal, and about this flattering notion of divine vicarship builded his elaborate mediæval code, to which, in essentials, a great number of persons adhere even nowadays. Questionless, however, the Chivalrous attitude does not very happily fit in with modern conditions, whereby the self-elected obligations of the knight-errant toward repressing evil are (in theory at all events) more efficaciously discharged by an organized police and a jury system.

And perhaps it was never, quite, a 'practical' attitude,—no, mais quel geste! as was observed by a pre-eminently chivalrous person. At worst, it is an attitude which one finds very taking to the fancy as the posture is exemplified by divers mediæval chroniclers, who had sound notions about portraying men 'as they ought to be.'

There is Nicolas de Caen, for instance, who in his Dizain des Reines (with which I am familiar, I confess, in the English version alone) presents with some naïveté this notion of divine vicarship, in that he would seem to restrict it to the nobility and gentry. 'For royal persons and their immediate associates,' Dom Nicolas assumes at outset, 'are the responsible stewards of Heaven' and regarding them continuously as such, he selects from the lives of various queens ten crucial moments wherein (as Nicolas phrases it), 'Destiny has thrust her sceptre into the hands of a human being, and left the weakling free to steer the pregnant outcome. Now prove thyself to be at bottom a god or else a beast, saith Destiny, and now eternally abide that choice.' Yet thus, and this alone, when you come to think of it, is what Desuny says, not merely to 'royal persons and their immediate associates,' but to everyone.

And in his Roman de Lustignan Nicolas deals with that quaint development of the Chivalrous attitude to which I just alluded, that took form, as an allied but individual illusion, in domnei, or woman-worship, and found in a man's mistress an ever-present reminder, and sometimes a rival of God. There is something not unpathetic in the thought that this once world-controlling force is restricted to-day to removing a man's hat in an elevator and occasionally compelling a surrender of his seat in a streetcar. . . . But this Roman de

Lusignan also has been put into English, with an Afterword by the translator wherein the theories of domnei are rather painstakingly set forth and thereto I shall presently recur, for further consideration of this illusion of domnei

Always, of course, the Chivalrous attitude was an intelligent attitude, in which one spun romances and accorded no meticulous attention to mere facts . For thus to spin romances is to bring about, in every sense, man's recreation, since man alone of animals can, actually, acquire a trait by assuming, in defiance of reason, that he already possesses it. To spin romances is, indeed, man's proper and peculiar function in a world wherein he only of created beings can make no profitable use of the truth about himself For man alone of animals plays the ape to his dreams So he fares onward chivalrously, led by ignes fatui no doubt, yet moving onward And that the goal remains ambiguous seems but a trivial circumstance to any living creature who knows, he knows not how, that to stay still can be esteemed a virtue only in the dead.

Indeed, when I consider the race to which I have the honor to belong, I am filled with respectful wonder . . . All about us flows and gyrates unceasingly the material universe,—an endless inconceivable jumble of rotatory blazing gas and frozen spheres and detonating comets, wherethrough spins Earth like a frail midge And to this blown molecule adhere what millions and millions and millions of parasites just such as I am, begetting and dreaming and slaying and abnegating and

10

30

40

toiling and making mirth, just as did aforetime those countless generations of our forebears, every one of whom was likewise a creature just such as I am! Were the human beings that have been subjected to confinement in flesh each numbered, as is customary in other penal institutes, with what interminable row of digits might one set forth your number, say, or mine?

Nor is this everything For my reason, such as it is, perceives this race, in its entirety, in the whole outcome of its achievement, to be beyond all wording petty and ineffectual and no more than thought can estimate the relative proportion to the material universe of our poor Earth, can thought conceive with what quintillionths to express that fractional part which I, as an individual parasite, add to Earth's negligible fretting by ephemerae

And still—behold the miracle!—still I believe life to be a personal transaction between myself and Omnipotence, I believe that what I do is somehow of importance, and I believe that I am on a journey toward some very public triumph not unlike that of the third prince in the fairy-tale . . . Even to-day I believe in this dynamic illusion For that creed was the first great inspiration of the demiurge,—man's big romantic idea of Chivalry, of himself as his Father's representative in an alien country,—and it is a notion at which mere fact and reason yelp denial unavailingly For every one of us is so constituted that he knows the romance to be true, and corporal fact and human reason in this matter, as in divers others, to be the suborned and perjured witnesses of 'realism'

FROM TEN DAYS THAT SHOOK THE WORLD

THE Military Revolutionary Committee, with a fierce intensity, followed up its victory

NOVEMBER 14TH.

To all Army, corps, divisional and regimental Committees, to all Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, to all, all, all.

Conforming to the agreement between the Cossacks, yunkers, soldiers, sailors and workers, it has been decided to arraign Alexander Feodorovitch Kerensky before a tribunal of the people. We demand that Kerensky be arrested, and that he be ordered, in the name of the organizations hereinafter mentioned, to come immediately to Petrograd and present himself to the tribunal.

SIGNED,

The Cossacks of the First Division of Ussuri Cavalry, the Committee of Yun-kers of the Petrograd detachment of Franc-Tireurs, the delegate of the Fifth Army

PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR

DYBENKO

The Committee for Salvation, the Duma, the Central Committee of the Socialist Revolutionary party—proudly claiming Kerensky as a member—all passionately protested that he could only be held responsible to the Constituent Assembly

On the evening of November 16th I watched two thousand Red Guards swing down the Zagorodny Prospekt behind a military band playing the Marseillaise—and how appropriate it sounded—with blood-red flags over the dark ranks of workmen, to welcome home again their brothers who had defended 'Red Petrograd' In the bitter dusk they tramped, men and women, their tall bayonets swaying, through streets faintly lighted and slippery with mud, between silent crowds of bourgeois, contemptuous but fearful .

All were against them—business men, speculators, investors, land-owners, army officers, politicians, teachers, students, professional men, shop-keepers, clerks, agents The other Socialist parties hated the Bolsheviks with an implacable hatred. On the side of the Soviets were the rank and file of the workers, the sailors, all the undemoralized soldiers, the landless peasants, and a few—a very few—intellectuals. . . .

From the farthest corners of great Russia, whereupon desperate street-fighting burst like a wave, news of Kerensky's defeat came echoing back the immense roar of proletarian victory Kazan, Saratov, Novgorod, Vinnitza—where the streets had run with blood, Moscow, where the Bolsheviks had turned their artillery against the last stronghold of the bourgeoisie—the Kremlin

'They are bombarding the Kremlin!' The news passed from mouth to mouth in the streets of Petrograd, almost with a sense of terror. Travellers from 'white and shining little mother Moscow' told fearful tales. Thousands killed; the Tverskaya and the Kuznetsky Most in flames, the church of Vasil Blazheiny a smoking ruin, Uspensky Cathedral crumbling down, the Spasskaya Gate of the Kremlin tottering, the Duma burned to the ground

Nothing that the Bolsheviks had done could compare with this fearful blasphemy in the heart of Holy Russia To the ears of the devout sounded the shock of guns crashing in the face of the Holy Orthodox Church, and pounding to dust the sanctuary of the Russian nation . .

On November 15th, Lunatcharsky, Commissar of Education, broke into tears at the session of the Council of People's Commissars, and rushed from the room, crying, 'I cannot stand it! I cannot bear the monstrous destruction of beauty and tradition'

That afternoon his letter of resignation was published in the newspapers

I have just been informed, by people arriving from Moscow, what has happened there

The Cathedral of St Basil the Blessed, the Cathedral of the Assumption, are being bombarded. The Kremlin, where are now gathered the most important art treasures of Petrograd and of Moscow, is under artillery fire There are thousands of victims.

The fearful struggle there has reached a pitch of bestial ferocity.

What is left? What more can happen?

I cannot bear this My cup is full I am unable to endure these horrors. It is impossible to work under the pressure of thoughts which drive me mad!

That is why I am leaving the Council of People's Commissars.

I fully realize the gravity of this decision But I can bear no more . . .

That same day the White Guards and yunkers in the Kremlin surrendered, and were allowed to march out unharmed The treaty of peace follows

1 The Committee of Public Safety ceases to exist.

2. The White Guard gives up its arms and dissolves The officers retain their swords and regulation side-arms In the Military Schools are retained only the arms necessary for instruction, all others are surrendered by the yunkers The Military Revolutionary Committee guarantees the liberty and inviolability of the person

3 To settle the question of disarmament, as set forth in section 2, a special commission is appointed, consisting of representatives from all organisations which took part in the peace negotiations

4 From the moment of the signature of this peace treaty, both parties shall immediately give order to cease firing and halt all military operations, taking measures to ensure punctual obedience to this order

5 At the signature of the treaty, all prisoners made by the two parties shall be released

For two days now the Bolsheviks had been in control of the city The frightened citizens were creeping out of their cellars to seek their dead, the barricades in the streets were being removed Instead of diminishing, however, the stories of destruction in Moscow continued to grow And it was under the influence of these fearful reports that we decided to go there

Petrograd, after all, in spite of being for a century the seat of Government, is still an artificial city Moscow is real Russia, Russia as it was and will be, in Moscow we would get the true feeling of the Russian people about the Revolution Life was more intense there.

For the past week the Petrograd Military Revolutionary Committee, aided by the rank and file of the Railway Workers, had seized control of the Nicolai Railroad, and hurled trainload after trainload of sailors and Red Guards southwest . . . We were provided with passes from Smolny, without which no one could leave the capital When the train backed into the station, a mob of shabby soldiers, all carrying huge sacks of eatables, stormed the doors, smashed the windows, and poured into all the compartments, filling up the aisles and even climbing onto the roof Three of us managed to wedge our way into a compartment, but almost immediately about twenty soldiers entered . . . There was room for only four people, we argued, expostulated, and the conductor joined us—but the soldiers merely laughed. Were they to bother about the comfort of a lot of boorzhua (bourgeois)? We produced the passes from Smolny, instantly the soldiers changed their attitude

'Come, comrades,' cried one, 'these are American tovarishtchi They have come thirty thousand versts to see our Revolution, and they are naturally tired. . '

With polite and friendly apologies the soldiers began to leave Shortly afterward we heard them breaking into a compartment occupied by two stout, well-dressed Russians, who had bribed the conductor and locked their door . .

About seven o'clock in the evening we drew out of the station, an immense long train drawn by a weak little locomotive burning wood, and stumbled along slowly, with many stops The soldiers on the roof kicked with their heels and sang whining peasant songs, and in the corridor, so jammed that it was impossible to pass, violent political debates raged all night long Occasionally the conductor came through, as a matter of habit, looking for tickets He found very few except ours, and after a half-hour of futile wrangling, lifted his arms despairingly and withdrew The atmosphere was stifling, full of smoke and foul odours, if it hadn't been for the broken windows we would doubtless have smothered during the night

In the morning, hours late, we looked out upon a snowy world. It was bitter cold About noon a peasant woman got on with a basket-full of bread-chunks and a great can of luke warm coffee-substitute From then on until dark there was nothing but the packed train, jolting and stopping, and occasional stations where a ravenous mob swooped down on the scantily-furnished buffet and swept it clean . . . At one of these halts I ran into Nogin and Rykov, the seceding Commissars, who were returning to Moscow to put their grievances before their own Soviet, and further along was Bukharin, a short, red-bearded man with the eyes of a fanatic—'more Left than Lenin,' they said of him.

Then the three strokes of the bell and we made a rush for the train, worming our way through the packed and noisy aisle.

A good-natured crowd, bearing the discomfort with humorous patience, interminably arguing about everything from the situation in Petrograd to the British Trade-Union system, and disputing loudly with the few boorzhui who were on board. Before we reached Moscow almost every car had organized a Committee to secure and distribute food, and these Committees became divided into political factions, who wrangled over fundamental principles.

The station at Moscow was deserted. We went to the office of the Commissar, in order to arrange for our return tickets. He was a sullen youth with the shoulder-straps of a Lieutenant, when we showed him our papers from Smolny, he lost his temper and declared that he was no Bolshevik, that he represented the Committee of Public Safety.

It was characteristic—in the general turmoil attending the conquest of the city, the chief railway station had been forgotten by the victors.

Not a cab in sight. A few blocks down the street, however, we woke up a grotesquely-padded izvoztchik asleep upright on the box of his little sleigh. 'How much to the centre of the town?'

He scratched his head. 'The barin won't be able to find a room in any hotel,' he said. 'But I'll take you around for a hundred rubles.' Before the Revolution it cost two! We objected, but he simply shrugged his shoulders. 'It takes a good deal of courage to drive a sleigh nowadays,' he went on. 'We could not beat him down below fifty.'

As we sped along the silent, snowy half-lighted streets, he recounted his adventures during the six days' fighting. 'Driving along, or waiting for a fare on the corner,' he said, 'all of a sudden pooff! a cannon ball exploding here, pooff! a cannon ball there, ratt-ratt! a machine-gun. . . I gallop, the devils shooting all around. I get to a nice quiet street and stop, doze a little, pooff! another cannon ball, ratt-ratt. Devils! Devils! Devils! Brrr!'

In the centre of the town the snow-piled streets were quiet with the stullness of convalescence. Only a few arc-lights were burning, only a few pedestrians hurried along the side-walks. An icy wind blew from the great plain, cutting to the bone. At the first hotel we entered an office illuminated by two candles.

'Yes, we have some very comfortable rooms, but all the windows are shot out. If the gospodin does not mind a little fresh air. . .'

Down the Tverskaya the shop-windows were broken, and there were shell-holes and torn-up paving stones in the street. Hotel after hotel, all full, or the proprietors still so frightened that all they could say was, 'No, no, there is no room! There is no room!' On the main streets, where the great banking-houses and mercantile houses lay, the Bolshevik artillery had been indiscriminately effective. As one Soviet official told me, 'Whenever we didn't know just where the yunkers and White Guards were, we bombarded their pocket-books.'

At the big Hotel National they finally took us in, for we were foreigners, and the Military Revolutionary Committee had promised to protect the dwellings of foreigners.

On the top floor the manager showed us where shrapnel had shattered several windows. 'The animals!' said he, shaking his fist at imaginary Bolsheviks. 'But wait! Their time will come; in just a few days now their ridiculous Government will fall, and then we shall make them suffer!'

We dined at a vegetarian restaurant with the enticing name, 'I Eat Nobody,' and Tolstoy's picture prominent on the walls, and then sallied out into the streets.

The headquarters of the Moscow Soviet was in the palace of the former Governor-General, an imposing white building fronting Skobeliev Square. Red Guards stood sentry at the door. At the head of the wide, formal stairway, whose walls were plastered with announcements of committee-meetings and addresses of political parties, we passed through a series of lofty ante-rooms, hung with red-shrouded pictures in gold frames, to the splendid state salon, with its magnificent crystal lustres and gilded cornices. A low-voiced hum of talk, underlaid with the whurring bass of a score of sewing machines, filled the place. Huge bolts of red and black cotton cloth were unrolled, serpentine across the parqueted floor and over tables, at which sat half a hundred women, cutting and sewing streamers and banners for the Funeral of the Revolutionary Dead. The faces of these women were roughened and scarred with life at its most difficult, they worked now sternly, many of them with eyes red from weeping. . . . The losses of the Red Army had been heavy.

At a desk in one corner was Rogov, an intelligent, bearded man with glasses, wearing the black blouse of a worker. He invited us to march with the Central Executive Committee in the funeral procession next morning.

'It is impossible to teach the Socialist Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks anything!' he exclaimed. 'They compromise from sheer habit. Imagine! They proposed that we hold a joint funeral with the yunkers!'

Across the hall came a man in a ragged soldier-coat and shapka, whose face was familiar, I recognized Melnichansky, whom I had known as the watch-maker George Melcher in Bayonne, New Jersey, during the great Standard Oil strike. Now, he told me, he was secretary of the Moscow Metal-Workers' Union, and a Commissar of the Military Revolutionary Committee during the fighting.

'You see me!' he cried, showing his decrepit clothing. 'I was with the boys in the Kremlin when the yunkers came the first time. They shut me up in the cellar and swiped my overcoat, my money, watch and even the ring on my finger. This is all I've got to wear!'

From him I learned many details of the bloody six-day battle which had rent Moscow in two. Unlike in Petrograd, in Moscow the City Duma had taken command of the yunkers and White Guards. Rudnev, the Mayor, and Minor, president of the Duma, had directed the activities of the Committee of Public Safety and the troops. Riabsev, Commandant of the city, a man of democratic instincts, had hesitated about opposing the Military Revolutionary Committee, but the Duma had forced him. . . . It was the Mayor who had urged the occupation of the Kremlin, 'They will never dare fire on you there,' he said. . . .

One garrison regiment, badly demoralized by long inactivity, had been approached by both sides. The regiment held a meeting to decide what action to take. Resolved, that the regiment remain neutral, and continue its present activities—which consisted in peddling rubbers and sunflower seeds!

'But worst of all,' said Melnichansky, 'we had to organize while we were fighting. The other side knew just what it wanted; but here the soldiers had their Soviet and the workers theirs. . . . There was a fearful wrangle over who should be Commander-in-chief, some regiments talked for days before they decided what to do, and when the officers suddenly deserted us, we had no battle-staff to give orders.'

Vivid little pictures he gave me. On a cold grey day he had stood at a corner of the Nikitskaya, which was swept by blasts of machine-gun fire. A throng of little boys were gathered there—street waifs who used to be newsboys. Shripping, excited as if with a new game, they waited until the firing slackened, and then tried to run across the street. . . . Many were killed, but the rest dashed backward and forward, laughing, daring each other.

Late in the evening I went to the Dvorianskoye Sobranie—the Nobles' Club—where the Moscow Bolsheviks were to meet and consider the report of Nogin, Rykov and the others who had left the Council of People's Commissars.

The meeting-place was a theatre, in which, under the old regime, to audiences of officers and glittering ladies, amateur presentations of the latest French comedy had once taken place.

At first the place filled with the intellectuals—those who lived near the centre of the town. Nogin spoke, and most of his listeners were plainly with him. It was very late before the workers arrived, the working-class quarters were on the outskirts of the town, and no street-cars were running. But about midnight they began to clump up the stairs, in groups of ten or twenty—big, rough men, in coarse clothes, fresh from the battle-line, where they had fought like devils for a week, seeing their comrades fall all about them.

Scarcely had the meeting formally opened before Nogin was assailed with a tempest of jeers and angry shouts. In vain he tried to argue, to explain; they would not listen. He had left the Council of People's Commissars, he had deserted his post while the battle was raging. As for the bourgeois press, here in Moscow there was no more bourgeois press, even the City Duma had been dissolved. Bukharin stood up, savage, logical, with a voice which plunged and struck, plunged and struck . . . Him they listened to with shining eyes. Resolution, to support the action of the Council of People's Commissars, passed by overwhelming majority. So spoke Moscow.

Late in the night we went through the empty streets and under the Iberian Gate to the great Red Square in front of the Kremlin. The church of Vasilı Blazheiny loomed fantastic, its bright-coloured, convoluted and blazoned cupolas vague in the darkness. There was no sign of any damage.

Along one side of the square the dark towers and walls of the Kremlin stood up. On the high walls flickered redly the light of hidden flames, voices reached us across the immense place, and the sound of picks and shovels. We crossed over.

Mountains of dirt and rock were piled high near the base of the wall. Climbing these we looked down into two massive pits, ten or fifteen feet deep and fifty yards long, where hundreds of soldiers and workers were digging in the light of huge fires.

A young student spoke to us in German. 'The Brotherhood Grave,' he explained. 'To-morrow we shall bury here five hundred proletarians who died for the Revolution.'

He took us down into the pit. In frantic haste swung the picks and shovels, and the earth-mountains grew. No one spoke. Overhead the night was thick with stars, and the ancient Imperial Kremlin wall towered up immeasurably.

'Here in this holy place,' said the student, 'holiest of all Russia, we shall bury our most holy. Here where are the tombs of the Tsars, our Tsar—the People—shall sleep . . .' His arm was in a sling, from a bullet-wound gained in the fighting. He looked at it. 'You foreigners look down on us Russians because so long we tolerated a mediæval monarchy,' said he. 'But we saw that the Tsar was not the only tyrant in the world, capitalism was worse, and in all the countries of the world capitalism was Emperor. . . Russian revolutionary tactics are best.

As we left, the workers in the pit, exhausted and running with sweat in spite of the cold, began to clumb wearily out. Across the Red Square a dark knot of men came hurrying. They swarmed into the pits, picked up the tools and began digging, digging, without a word . . .

So, all the long night volunteers of the People relieved each other, never halting in their driving speed, and the cold light of the dawn laid bare the great Square, white with snow, and the yawning brown pits of the Brotherhood Grave, quite finished.

We rose before sunrise, and hurried through the dark streets to Skobeliev Square. In all the great city not a human being could be seen, but there was a faint sound of stirring, far and near, like a deep wind coming. In the pale half-light a little group of men and women were gathered before the Soviet headquarters, with a sheaf of gold-lettered red banners—the Central Executive Committee of the Moscow Soviets. It grew light. From afar the vague stirring sound deepened and became louder, a steady and tremendous bass. The city was rising. We set out down the Tverskaya, the banners flapping overhead. The little street chapels along our way were locked and dark, as was the Chapel of the Iberian Virgin, which each new Tsar used to visit before he went to the Kremlin to crown himself, and which, day or night, was always open and crowded, and brilliant with the candles of the devout gleaming on the gold and silver and jewels of the ikons.

Now, for the first time since Napoleon was in Moscow, they say, the candles were out.

The Holy Orthodox Church had withdrawn the light of its countenance from Moscow, the nest of irreverent vipers who had bombarded the Kremlin. Dark and silent and cold were the churches, the priests had disappeared. There were no popes to officiate at the Red Burial, there had been no sacrament for the dead, nor were any prayers to be said over the grave of the blasphemers. Tikhon, Metropolitan of Moscow, was soon to excommunicate the Soviets . . .

Also the shops were closed, and the propertied classes stayed at home—but for other reasons. This was the Day of the People, the rumour of whose coming was thunderous as surf.

Already through the Iberian Gate a human river was flowing, and the vast Red Square was spotted with people, thousands of them. I remarked that as the throng passed the Iberian Chapel, where always before the passerby had crossed himself, they did not seem to notice it.

We forced our way through the dense mass packed near the Kremlin wall, and stood upon one of the dirt-mountains. Already several men were there, among them Muranov, the soldier who had been elected Commandant of Moscow—a tall, simple-looking, bearded man with a gentle face.

Through all the streets to the Red Square the torrents of people poured, thousands upon thousands of them, all with the look of the poor and the toiling. A military band came marching up, playing the Internationale, and spontaneously the song caught and spread like wind-ripples on a sea, slow and solemn. From the top of the Kremlin wall gigantic banners unrolled to the ground, red, with great letters in gold and in white, saying, 'Martyrs of the Beginning of World Social Revolution,' and 'Long Live the Brotherhood of Workers of the World.'

A bitter wind swept the Square, lifting the banners. Now from the far quarters of the city the workers of the different factories were arriving, with their dead. They could be seen coming through the Gate, the blare of their banners, and the dull red—like blood—of the coffins they carried. These were rude boxes, made of unplanned wood and daubed with crimson, borne high on the shoulders of rough men who marched with tears streaming down their faces, and followed by women who sobbed and screamed, or walked stiffly, with white, dead faces. Some of the coffins were open, the lid carried behind them; others were covered with gilded or silvered cloth, or had a soldier's hat nailed on the top. There were many wreaths of hideous artificial flowers.

Through an irregular lane that opened and closed again the procession slowly moved toward us. Now through the Gate was flowing an endless stream of banners, all shades of red, with silver and gold lettering, knots of crepe hanging from the top—and some Anarchist flags, black with white letters. The band was playing the Revolutionary Funeral March, and against the immense singing of the mass of people, standing uncovered, the paraders sang hoarsely, choked with sobs.

Between the factory-workers came companies of soldiers with their coffins, too, and squadrons of cavalry, riding at salute, and artillery batteries, the cannon wound with red and black—forever, it seemed. Their banners said, 'Long Live the Third International!' or 'We Want an Honest, General, Democratic Peace!'

Slowly the marchers came with their coffins to the entrance of the grave, and the bearers clambered up with their burdens and went down into the pit. Many of them were women—squat, strong proletarian women. Behind the dead came other women—women young and broken, or old, wrinkled women making noises like hurt animals, who tried to follow their sons and husbands into the Brotherhood Grave, and shrieked when compassionate hands restrained them. The poor love each other so!

All the long day the funeral procession passed, coming in by the Iberian Gate and leaving the Square by way of the Nikolskaya, a river of red banners, bearing words of hope and brotherhood and stupendous prophecies, against a back-ground of fifty thousand people,—under the eyes of the world's workers and their descendants forever.

One by one the five hundred coffins were laid in the pits. Dusk fell, and still the banners came drooping and fluttering, the band played the Funeral March, and the huge assemblage chanted. In the leafless branches of the trees above the grave the wreaths were hung, like strange, multi-coloured blossoms. Two hundred men began to shovel in the dirt. It rained dully down upon the coffins with a thudding sound, audible beneath the singing.

The lights came out. The last banners passed, and the last moaning women, looking back with awful intensity as they went. Slowly from the great Square ebbed the proletarian tide.

I suddenly realized that the devout Russian people no longer needed priests to pray them into heaven. On earth they were building a kingdom more bright than any heaven had to offer, and for which it was a glory to die. . . .

HENRY L. MENCKEN

1880—

BRYAN

HAS it been duly marked by historians that the late William Jennings Bryan's last secular act on this globe of sin was to catch flies? A curious detail, and not without its sardonic overtones. He was the most sedulous fly-catcher in American history, and in many ways the most successful. His quarry, of course, was not Musca domestica but Homo neandertalensis. For forty years he tracked it with coo and bellow, up and down the rustic backways of the Republic. Wherever the flambeaux of Chautauqua smoked and guttered, and the bilge of Idealism ran in the veins, and Baptist pastors dammed the brooks with the sanctified, and men gathered who were weary and heavy laden, and their wives who were full of Peruna and as fecund as the shad (Alosa sapidissima)—there the indefatigable Jennings set up his traps and spread his bait. He knew every country town in the South and West, and he could crowd the most remote of them to suffocation by simply winding his horn. The city proletariat, transiently flustered by him in 1896, quickly penetrated his buncombe and would have no more of him, the cockney gallery jeered him at every Democratic national convention for twenty-five years. But out where the grass grows high, and the horned cattle dream away the lazy afternoons, and men still fear the powers and principalities of the air—out there between the corn-rows he held his old puissance to the end. There was no need of beaters to drive in his game. The news that he was coming was enough. For mules the flivver dust would choke the roads. And when he rose at the end of the day to discharge his Message there would be such breathless attention, such a rapt and enchanted ecstasy, such a sweet rustle of amens as the world had not known since Johann fell to Herod's sardonic ax.

There was something peculiarly fitting in the fact that his last days were spent in a one-horse Tennessee village, and that death found him there. The man felt at home in such simple and Christian scenes. He liked people who sweated freely, and were not debauched by the refinements of the toilet. Making his progress up and down the Main Street of little Dayton, surrounded by gaping primates from the upland valleys of the Cumberland Range, his coat laid aside, his bare arms and hairy chest shining damply, his bald head sprinkled with dust—so accoutred and on display he was obviously happy. He liked getting up early in the morning, to the tune of cocks crowing on the dunghill. He liked the heavy, greasy victuals of the farmhouse kitchen. He liked country lawyers, country pastors, all country people. He liked country sounds and country smells. I believe that this liking was sincere—perhaps the only sincere thing in the man. His nose showed no uneasiness when a hillman in faded overalls and hickory shirt accosted him on the street, and besought him for light upon some mystery of Holy Writ. The simian gabble of the cross-roads was not gabble to him, but wisdom of an occult and superior sort. In the presence of city folks he was palpably uneasy. Their clothes, I suspect, annoyed him, and he was suspicious of their too delicate manners. He knew all the while that they were laughing at him—if not at his baroque theology, then at least at his alpaca pantaloons. But the yokels never laughed at him. To them he was not the huntsman but the prophet, and toward the end, as he gradually forsook mundane politics for more ghostly concerns, they began to elevate him in their hierarchy. When he died he was the peer of Abraham. His old enemy, Wilson, aspiring to the same white and shining robe, came down with a thump. But Bryan made the grade. His place in the Tennessee hagiography is secure. If the village barber saved any of his hair, then it is curing gall-stones down there to-day But what label will he bear in more urbane regions? One, I fear, of a far less flattering kind. Bryan lived too long, and descended too deeply into the mud, to be taken seriously hereafter by fully literate men, even of the kind who write school-books There was a scattering of sweet words in his funeral notices, but it was no more than a response to conventional sentimentality The best verdict the most romantic editorial writer could dredge up, save in the humorless South, was to the general effect that his imbecilities were excused by his earnestness—that under his clowning, as under that of the juggler of Notre Dame, there was the zeal of a steadfast soul But this was apology, not praise, precisely the same thing might be said of Mary Baker G Eddy, the late Czar Nicholas, or Czolgosz The truth is that even Bryan's sincerity will probably yield to what is called, in other fields, definitive criticism Was he sincere when he opposed imperialism in the Philippines, or when he fed it with deserving Democrats in Santo Domingo? Was he sincere when he tried to shove the Prohibitionists under the table, or when he seized their banner and began to lead them with loud whoops? Was he sincere when he bellowed against war, or when he dreamed of himself as a tin-soldier in uniform, with a grave reserved among the generals? Was he sincere when he denounced the late John W. Davis, or when he swallowed Davis? Was he sincere when he fawned over Champ Clark, or when he betrayed Clark? Was he sincere when he pleaded for tolerance in New York, or when he bawled for the faggot and the stake in Tennessee?

This talk of sincerity, I confess, fatigues me If the fellow was sincere, then so was P. T. Barnum The word is disgraced and degraded by such uses He was, in fact, a charlatan, a mountebank, a zany without shame or dignity. His career brought him into contact with the first men of his time, he preferred the company of rustic ignoramuses. It was hard to believe, watching him at Dayton, that he had traveled, that he had been received in civilized societies, that he had been a high officer of state He seemed only a poor clod like those around him, deluded by a childish theology, full of an almost pathological hatred of all learning, all human dignity, all beauty, all fine and noble things He was a peasant come home to the barnyard Imagine a gentleman, and you have imagined everything that he was not What animated him from end to end of his grotesque career was simply ambition—the ambition of a common man to get his hand upon the collar of his superiors, or, failing that, to get his thumb into their eyes. He was born with a roaring voice, and it had the trick of inflaming half-wits. His whole career was devoted to raising those half-wits against their betters, that he himself might shine His last battle will be grossly misunderstood if it is thought of as a mere exercise in fanaticism—that is, if Bryan the Fundamentalist Pope is mistaken for one of the bucolic Fundamentalists There was much more in it than that, as everyone knows who saw him on the field What moved him, at bottom, was simply hatred of the city men who had laughed at him so long, and brought him at last to so tatterdemalion an estate He lusted for revenge upon them He yearned to lead the anthropoid rabble against them, to punish them for their execution upon him by attacking the very vitals of their civilization He went far beyond the bounds of any merely religious frenzy, however inordinate When he began denouncing the notion that man is a mammal even some of the hinds at Dayton were agape And when, brought upon Darrow's cruel hook, he writhed and tossed in a very fury of malignancy, bawling against the baldest elements of sense and decency like a man frantic—when he came to that tragic climax of his striving there were snickers among the hinds as well as hosannas

Upon that hook, in truth, Bryan committed suicide, as a legend as well as in the body. He staggered from the rustic court ready to die, and he staggered from it ready to be forgotten, save as a character in a third-rate farce, witless and in poor taste It was plain to everyone who knew him, when he came to Dayton, that his great days were behind him—that, for all the fury of his hatred, he was now definitely an old man, and headed at last for silence. There was a vague, unpleasant manginess about his appearance, he somehow seemed dirty, though a close glance showed him as carefully shaven as an actor, and clad in immaculate linen All the hair was gone from the dome of his head, and it had begun to fall out, too, behind his ears, in the obscene manner of the late Samuel Gompers. The resonance had departed from his voice, what was once a bugle blast had become reedy and quavering. Who knows that, like Demosthenes, he had a lisp? In the old days, under the magic of his eloquence, no one noticed it. But when he spoke at Dayton it was always audible.

When I first encountered him, on the sidewalk in front of the office of the rustic lawyers who were his associates in the Scopes case, the trial was yet to begin, and so he was still expansive and amiable. I had printed in the Nation, a week or so before, an article arguing that the Tennessee anti-evolution law, whatever its wisdom, was at least constitutional—that the rustics of the State had a clear right to have their progeny taught whatever they chose, and kept secure from whatever knowledge violated their superstitions. The old boy professed to be delighted with the argument, and gave the gaping bystanders to understand that I was a publicist of parts. Not to be outdone, I admired the preposterous country shirt that he wore—sleeveless and with the neck cut very low. We parted in the manner of two ambassadors. But that was the last touch of amiability that I was destined to see in Bryan. The next day the battle joined and his face became hard. By the end of the week he was simply a walking fever. Hour by hour he grew more bitter. What the Christian Scientists call malicious animal magnetism seemed to radiate from him like heat from a stove. From my place in the courtroom, standing upon a table, I looked directly down upon him, sweating horribly and pumping his palm-leaf fan. His eyes fascinated me, I watched them all day long. They were blazing points of hatred. They glittered like occult and sinister gems. Now and then they wandered to me, and I got my share, for my reports of the trial had come back to Dayton, and he had read them. It was like coming under fire.

Thus he fought his last fight, thirsting savagely for blood. All sense departed from him. He bit right and left, like a dog with rabies. He descended to demagoguery so dreadful that his very associates at the trial table blushed. His one yearning was to keep his yokels heated up—to lead his forlorn mob of imbeciles against the foe. That foe, alas, refused to be alarmed. It insisted upon seeing the whole battle as a comedy. Even Darrow, who knew better, occasionally yielded to the prevailing spirit. One day he lured poor Bryan into the folly I have mentioned: his astounding argument against the notion that man is a mammal. I am glad I heard it, for otherwise I'd never believe in it. There stood the man who had been thrice a candidate for the Presidency of the Republic—there he stood in the glare of the world, uttering stuff that a boy of eight would laugh at! The artful Darrow led him on. He repeated it, ranted for it, bellowed it in his cracked voice. So he was prepared for the final slaughter. He came into life a hero, a Galahad, in bright and shining armor. He was passing out a poor mountebank.

The chances are that history will put the peak of democracy in America in his time; it has been on the downward curve among us since the campaign of 1896. He will be remembered perhaps, as its supreme impostor, the reductio ad absurdum of its pretension. Bryan came very near being President. In 1896, it is possible, he was actually elected. He lived long enough to make patriots thank the inscrutable gods for Harding, even for Coolidge. Dullness has got into the White House, and the smell of cabbage boiling, but there is at least nothing to compare to the intolerable buffoonery that went on in Tennessee. The President of the United States may be an ass, but he at least doesn't believe that the earth is square, and that witches should be put to death, and that Jonah swallowed the whale. The Golden Text is not painted weekly on the White House wall, and there is no need to keep ambassadors waiting while Pastor Simpson, of Smithville, prays for rain in the Blue Room. We have escaped something—by a narrow margin, but still we have escaped.

That is, so far. The Fundamentalists, once apparently sweeping all before them, now face minorities prepared for battle even in the South—here and there with some assurance of success. But it is too early, it seems to me, to send the firemen home, the fire is still burning on many a far-flung hill, and it may begin to roar again at any moment. The evil that men do lives after them. Bryan, in his malice, started something that it will not be easy to stop In ten thousand country towns his old heelers, the evangelical pastors, are propagating his gospel, and everywhere the yokels are ready for it. When he disappeared from the big cities, the big cities made the capital error of assuming that he was done for If they heard of him at all, it was only as a crimp for real-estate speculators—the heroic foe of the un-earned increment hauling it in with both hands He seemed preposterous, and thence harmless But all the while he was busy among his old lieges, preparing for a jacquerie that should floor all his enemies at one blow He did his job competently He had vast skill at such enterprises Heave an egg out of a Pullman window, and you will hit a Fundamentalist almost everywhere in the United States to-day They swarm in the country towns, inflamed by their shamans, and with a saint, now, to venerate They are thick in the mean streets behind the gas-works They are everywhere where learning is too heavy a burden for mortal minds to carry, even the vague, pathetic learning on tap in little red schoolhouses. They march with the Klan, with the Christian Endeavor Society, with the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, with the Epworth League, with all the rococo bands that poor and unhappy folk organize to bring some light of purpose into their lives. They have had a thrill, and they are ready for more.

Such is Bryan's legacy to his country He couldn't be President, but he could at least help magnificently in the solemn business of shutting off the Presidency from every intelligent and self-respecting man The storm, perhaps, won't last long, as time goes in history It may help, indeed, to break up the democratic delusion, now already showing weakness, and so hasten its own end But while it lasts it will blow off some roofs

FROM DEATH COMES FOR THE ARCHBISHOP

MISSIONARY JOURNEYS<sup>1</sup>

I

The White Mules

IN mid-March, Father Vaillant was on the road, returning from a missionary journey to Albuquerque He was to stop at the

rancho of a rich Mexican, Manuel Lujon, to marry his men and maid servants who were living in concubinage, and to baptize the children There he would spend the night To-morrow or the day after he would go on to Santa Fé, halting by the way at the In-writing, when the general tendency is to force things up In this kind of writing the mood is the thing—all the little figures and stories are mere improvisation that come out of it What I got from Father Machebeuf's letters was the mood, the spirit in which they accepted the accidents and hardships of a desert country, the joyful energy that kept them going To attempt to convey this hardihood of spirit one must use language a little stiff, a little formal, one must not be afraid of the old trite phraseology of the frontier Some of those time-worn phrases I used as the note from the piano by which the violinist tunes his instrument Not that there was much difficulty in keeping the pitch I did not sit down to write the book until the feeling of it had so teased me that I could not get on with other things The writing of it took only a few months, because the book had all been lived many times before it was written, and the happy mood in which I began never paled It was like going back and playing the early composers after a surfeit of modern music' Cather, 'A Letter from Willa Cather,' The Commonwealth, VII, III, 714 The selection, here printed in the revised version of the 'Autograph Edition,' is Book II of Death Comes for the Archbishop (N Y, 1927)

<sup>1</sup> 'My book was a conjunction of the general and the particular, like most works of the imagination I had all my life wanted to do something in the style of legend, which is absolutely the reverse of dramatic treatment Since I first saw the Puvion de Chavannes frescoes of the life of Saint Geneviève in my student days, I have wished that I could try something a little like that in prose, something without accent, with none of the artificial elements of composition. In the Golden Legend the martyrdoms of the saints are no more dwelt upon than are the trivial incidents of their lives, it is as though all human experiences, measured against one supreme spiritual experience, were of about the same importance The essence of such writing is not to hold the note, not to use an incident for all there is in it—but to touch and pass on I felt that such writing would be a delightful kind of discipline in these days when the "situation" is made to count for so much in dian pueblo of Santo Domingo to hold service. There was a fine old mission church at Santo Domingo, but the Indians were of a haughty and suspicious disposition. He had said Mass there on his way to Albuquerque, nearly a week ago. By dint of canvassing from house to house, and offering medals and religious colour prints to all who came to church, he had got together a considerable congregation. It was a large and prosperous pueblo, set among clean sand-hills, with its rich irrigated farm-lands lying just below, in the valley of the Rio Grande. His congregation was quiet, dignified, attentive. They sat on the earth floor, wrapped in their best blankets, repose in every line of their strong, stubborn backs. He harangued them in such Spanish as he could command, and they listened with respect. But bring their children to be baptized, they would not. The Spaniards had treated them very badly long ago, and they had been meditating upon their grievance for many generations. Father Vaillant had not baptized one infant there, but he meant to stop to-morrow and try again. Then back to his Bishop, provided he could get his horse up La Bajada Hill.

He had bought his horse from a Yankee trader and had been woefully deceived. One week's journey of from twenty to thirty miles a day had shown the beast up for a wind-broken wreck. Father Vaillant's mind was full of material cares as he approached Manuel Lujon's place beyond Bernalillo. The rancho was like a little town, with all its stables, corrals, and stake fences. The casa grande was long and low, with glass windows and bright blue doors, a portale running its full length, supported by blue posts. Under this portale the adobe wall was hung with bridles, saddles, great boots and spurs, guns and saddle-blankets, strings of red peppers, foxskins, and the skins of two great rattlesnakes.

When Father Vaillant rode in through the gateway, children came running from every direction, some with no clothing but a little shirt, and women with no shawls over their black hair came running after the children. They all disappeared when Manuel Lujon walked out of the great house, hat in hand, smiling and hospitable. He was a man of thirty-five, settled in figure and somewhat full under the chin. He greeted the priest in the name of God and put out a hand to help him alight, but Father Vaillant sprang quickly to the ground.

'God be with you, Manuel, and with your house. But where are those who are to be married?'

'The men are all in the field, Padre. There is no hurry. A little wine, a little bread, coffee, repose—and then the ceremonies.'

'A little wine, very willingly, and bread, too. But not until afterward. I meant to catch you all at dinner, but I am two hours late because my horse is bad. Have someone bring in my saddle-bags, and I will put on my vestments. Send out to the fields for your men, Señor Lujon. A man can stop work to be married.'

The swarthy host was dazed by this dispatch. 'But one moment, Padre. There are all the children to baptize, why not begin with them, if I cannot persuade you to wash the dust from your sainted brow and repose a little.'

'Take me to a place where I can wash and change my clothes, and I will be ready before you can get them here. No, I tell you, Lujon, the marriages first, the baptisms afterward, that order is but Christian. I will baptize the children to-morrow morning, and their parents will at least have been married overnight.'

Father Joseph was conducted to his chamber, and the older boys were sent running off across the fields to fetch the men. Lujon and his two daughters began constructing an altar at one end of the sala. Two old women came to scrub the floor, and another brought chairs and stools.

'My God, but he is ugly, the Padre!' whispered one of these to the others. 'He must be very holy. And did you see the great wart he has on his chin? My grandmother could take that away for him if she were alive, poor soul! Somebody ought to tell him about the holy mud at Chumayo. That mud might dry it up. But there is nobody left now who can take warts away.'

'No, the times are not so good any more,' the other agreed. 'And I doubt if all this marrying will make them any better. Of what use is it to marry people after they have lived together and had children? and the man is maybe thinking about another woman, like Pablo. I saw him coming out of the brush with that oldest girl of Trinidad's, only Sunday night'

The reappearance of the priest upon the scene cut short further scandal. He knelt down before the improvised altar and began his private devotions. The women tipped away. Señor Lujon himself went out toward the servants' quarters to hurry the candidates for the marriage sacrament. The women were giggling and snatching up their best shawls. Some of the men had even washed their hands. The household crowded into the sala, and Father Vaillant married couples with great dispatch.

'To-morrow morning, the baptisms,' he announced. 'And the mothers see to it that the children are clean, and that there are sponsors for all.'

After he had resumed his travelling-clothes, Father Joseph asked his host at what hour he dined, remarking that he had been fasting since an early breakfast.

'We eat when it is ready—a little after sunset, usually. I have had a young lamb killed for your Reverence.'

Father Joseph kindled with interest. 'Ah, and how will it be cooked?'

Señor Lujon shrugged. 'Cooked? Why, they put it in a pot with chili, and some onions, I suppose.'

'Ah, that is the point. I have had too much stewed mutton. Will you permit me to go into the kitchen and cook my portion in my own way?'

Lujon waved his hand. 'My house is yours, Padre. Into the kitchen I never go—too many women. But there it is, and the woman in charge is named Rosa.'

When the Father entered the kitchen, he found a crowd of women discussing the marriages. They quickly dispersed, leaving old Rosa by her fireplace, where hung a kettle from which issued the savour of cooking mutton fat, all too familiar to Father Joseph. He found a half sheep hanging outside the door, covered with a bloody sack, and asked Rosa to heat the oven for him, announcing that he meant to roast the hunk leg.

'But, Padre, I baked before the marriages. The oven is almost cold. It will take an hour to heat it, and it is only two hours till supper.'

'Very well. I can cook my roast in an hour.'

'Cook a roast in an hour!' cried the old woman. 'Mother of God, Padre, the blood will not be dried in it!'

'Not if I can help it!' said Father Joseph fiercely. 'Now hurry with the fire, my good woman.'

When the Padre carved his roast at the supper-table, the serving-girls stood behind his chair and looked with horror at the delicate stream of pink juice that followed the knife. Manuel Lujon took a slice for politeness, but he did not eat it. Father Vaillant had his gigot to himself.

All the men and boys sat down at the long table with the host, the women and children would eat later. Father Joseph and Lujon, at one end, had a bottle of white Bordeaux between them. It had been brought from Mexico City on mule-back, Lujon said. They were discussing the road back to Santa Fé, and when the missionary remarked that he would stop at Santo Domingo, the host asked him why he did not get a horse there. 'I am afraid you will hardly get back to Santa Fé on your own. The pueblo is famous for breeding good horses. You might make a trade.'

'No,' said Father Vaillant. 'Those Indians are of a sullen disposition. If I were to have dealings with them, they would suspect my motives. If we are to save their souls, we must make it clear that we want no profit for ourselves, as I told Father Gallegos in Albuquerque.'

Manuel Lujon laughed and glanced down the table at his men, who were all showing their white teeth. 'You said that to the Padre at Albuquerque? You have courage. He is a rich man, Padre Gallegos. All the same, I respect him. I have played poker with him. He is a great gambler and takes his losses like a man. He stops at nothing, plays like an American.'

'And I,' retorted Father Joseph, 'I have not much respect for a priest who either plays cards or manages to get rich.'

'Then you do not play?' asked Lujon. 'I am disappointed. I had hoped we could have a game after supper. The evenings are dull enough here. You do not even play dominoes.'

'Ah, that is another matter!' Father Joseph declared. 'A game of dominoes, there by the fire, with coffee, or of that excellent grape brandy you allowed me to taste, that I would find refreshing And tell me, Manuelito, where do you get that brandy? It is like a French liqueur.'

'It is well seasoned. It was made at Bernalillo in my grandfather's time. They make it there still, but it is not so good now.'

The next morning, after coffee, while the children were being got ready for baptism, the host took Father Vaillant through his corrals and stables to show him his stock.

He exhibited with peculiar pride two cream-coloured mules, stalled side by side. With his own hand he led them out of the stable, in order to display to advantage their handsome coats, not bluish-white, as with white horses, but a rich, deep ivory, that in shadow changed to fawn-colour. Their tails were clipped at the ends into the shape of bells.

'Their names,' said Lujon, 'are Contenta and Angelica, and they are as good as their names. It seems that God has given them intelligence. When I talk to them, they look up at me like Christians, they are very companionable. They are always ridden together and have a great affection for each other.'

Father Joseph took one by the halter and led it about. 'Ah, but they are rare creatures! I have never seen a mule or horse coloured like a young fawn before.' To his host's astonishment, the wiry little priest sprang upon Contenta's back with the agility of a grasshopper. The mule, too, was astonished. She shook herself violently, bolted toward the gate of the barnyard, and at the gate stopped suddenly. Since this did not throw her rider, she seemed satisfied, trotted back, and stood placidly beside Angelica.

'But you are a caballero, Father Vaillant!' Lujon exclaimed. 'I doubt if Father Gallegos would have kept his seat—though he is something of a hunter.'

'The saddle is to be my home in your country, Lujon. What an easy gait this mule has, and what a narrow back! I notice that especially. For a man with short legs, like me, it is a punishment to ride eight hours a day on a wide horse. And this I must do day after day. From here I go to Santa Fé, and, after a day in conference with the Bishop, I start for Mora.'

'For Mora?' exclaimed Lujon. 'Yes, that is far, and the roads are very bad. On your mare you will never do it. She will drop dead under you.' While he talked, the Father remained upon the mule's back, stroking her with his hand.

'Well, I have no other. God grant that she does not drop somewhere far from food and water. I can carry very little with me except my vestments and the sacred vessels.'

The Mexican had been growing more and more thoughtful, as if he were considering something profound and not altogether cheerful. Suddenly his brow cleared, and he turned to the priest with a radiant smile, quite boyish in its simplicity.

'Father Vaillant,' he burst out in a slightly oratorical manner, 'you have made my house right with Heaven, and you charge me very little. I will do something very nice for you, I will give you Contenta for a present, and I hope to be particularly remembered in your prayers.'

Springing to the ground, Father Vaillant threw his arms about his host. 'Manuelito!' he cried, 'for this darling mule I think I could almost pray you into Heaven!'

The Mexican laughed, too, and warmly returned the embrace. Arm-in-arm they went in to begin the baptisms.

The next morning, when Lujon went to call Father Vaillant for breakfast, he found him in the barnyard, leading the two mules about and smoothing their fawn-coloured flanks, but his face was not the cheerful countenance of yesterday.

'Manuel,' he said at once, 'I cannot accept your present. I have thought upon it overnight, and I see that I cannot. The Bishop works as hard as I do, and his horse is little better than mine. You know he lost everything on his way out here, in a shipwreck at Galveston—among the rest a fine wagon he had had built for travel on these plains. I could not go about on a mule like this when my Bishop rides a common hack. It would be inappropriate. I must ride away on my old mare.'

'Yes, Padre?' Manuel looked troubled and somewhat aggrieved. 'Why should the Padre spoil everything? It had all been very pleasant yesterday, and he had felt like a prince of generosity. I doubt if she will make La Bajada Hill,' he said slowly, shaking his head. 'Look my horses over and take the one that suits you They are all better than yours.'

'No, no,' said Father Vaillant decidedly 'Having seen these mules, I want nothing else They are the colour of pearls, really! I will raise the price of marriages until I can buy this pair from you A missionary must depend upon his mount for companionship in his lonely life I want a mule that can look at me like a Christian, as you said of these '

Señor Lujon sighed and looked about his barnyard as if he were trying to find some escape from this situation

Father Joseph turned to him with vehemence 'If I were a rich ranchero, like you, Manuel, I would do a splendid thing, I would furnish the two mounts that are to carry the Word of God about this heathen country, and then I would say to myself There go my Bishop and my Vicario, on my beautiful cream-coloured mules '

'So be it, Padre,' said Lujon with a mournful smile 'But I ought to get a good many prayers On my whole estate there is nothing I prize like those two True, they might pine if they were parted for long They have never been separated, and they have a great affection for each other Mules, as you know, have strong affections It is hard for me to give them up '

'You will be all the happier for that, Manuelito,' Father Joseph cried heartily 'Every time you think of these mules, you will feel pride in your good deed '

Soon after breakfast Father Vaillant departed, riding Contenta, with Angelica trotting submissively behind, and from his gate Señor Lujon watched them disconsolately until they disappeared He felt he had been worried out of his mules, and yet he bore no resentment He did not doubt Father Joseph's devotedness, nor his singleness of purpose After all, a Bishop was a Bishop, and a Vicar was a Vicar, and it was not to their discredit that they worked like a pair of common parish priests He believed he would be proud of the fact that they rode Contenta and Angelica Father Vaillant had forced his hand, but he was rather glad of it

The Lonely Road to Mora

THE Bishop and his Vicar were riding through the rain in the Truchas Mountains

The heavy, lead-coloured drops were driven slantingly through the air by an icy wind from the peak These raindrops, Father Latour kept thinking, were the shape of tadpoles, and they broke against his nose and cheeks, exploding with a splash, as if they were hollow and full of air The priests were riding across high mountain meadows, which in a few weeks would be green, though just now they were slate-coloured. On every side lay ridges covered with blue-green fir trees, above them rose the horny backbones of mountains. The sky was very low, purplish lead-coloured clouds let down curtains of mist into the valleys between the pine ridges There was not a glimmer of white light in the dark vapours working overhead—rather, they took on the cold green of the evergreens Even the white mules, their coats wet and matted into tufts, had turned a slaty hue, and the faces of the two priests were purple and spotted in that singular light

Father Latour rode first, sitting straight upon his mule, with his chin lowered just enough to keep the drive of rain out of his eyes Father Vaillant followed, unable to see much—in weather like this his glasses were of no use, and he had taken them off He crouched down in the saddle, his shoulders well over Contenta's neck Father Joseph's sister, Philomène, who was Mother Superior of a convent in her native town in the Puy-de-Dôme, often tried to picture her brother and Bishop Latour on these long missionary journeys of which he wrote her, she imagined the scene and saw the two priests moving through it in their cassocks, bareheaded, like the pictures of Saint Francis Xavier with which she was familiar The reality was less picturesque—but for all that, no one could have mistaken these two men for hunters or traders They wore clerical collars about their necks instead of neckerchiefs, and on the breast of his buckskin jacket the Bishop's silver cross hung by a silver chain

They were on their way to Mora, the third day out, and they did not know just how far they had still to go Since morning they had not met a traveller or seen a human habitation They believed they were on the right trail, for they had seen no other. The first night of their journey they had spent at Santa Cruz, lying in the wárm, wide valley of the Rio Grande, where the fields and gardens were already softly coloured with early spring. But since they had left the Española country behind them, they had contended first with wind and sand-storms, and now with cold. The Bishop was going to Mora to assist the Padre there in disposing of a crowd of refugees who filled his house. A new settlement in the Conejos Valley had lately been raided by Indians, many of the inhabitants were killed, and the survivors, who were originally from Mora, had managed to get back there, utterly destitute.

Before the travellers had crossed the mountain meadows, the rain turned to sleet. Their wet buckskins quickly froze, and the rattle of icy flakes struck them and bounded off. The prospect of a night in the open was not cheering. It was too wet to kindle a fire, their blankets would become soaked on the ground. As they were descending the mountain on the Mora side, the grey daylight seemed already beginning to fail, though it was only four o'clock.

Father Latour turned in his saddle and spoke over his shoulder.

'The mules are certainly very tired, Joseph. They ought to be fed.'

'Push on,' said Father Vaillant. 'We will come to shelter of some kind before night sets in.' The Vicar had been praying steadfastly while they crossed the meadows, and he felt confident that Saint Joseph would not turn a deaf ear.

Before the hour was done, they did indeed come upon a wretched adobe house, so poor and mean that they might not have seen it had it not lain close beside the trail, on the edge of a steep ravine. The stable looked more habitable than the house, and the priests thought perhaps they could spend the night in it.

As they rode up to the door, a man came out, bareheaded, and they saw to their surprise that he was not a Mexican, but an American, of a very unprepossessing type. He spoke to them in some drawling dialect they could scarcely understand and asked if they wanted to stay the night. During the few words they exchanged with him, Father Latour felt a growing reluctance to remain even for a few hours under the roof of this ugly, evil-looking fellow. He was tall, gaunt, and ill-formed, with a snake-like neck, terminating in a small, bony head. Under his close-clipped hair this repellent head showed a number of thick ridges, as if the skull joinings were overgrown by layers of superfluous bone. With its small, rudimentary ears, this head had a positively malignant look. The man seemed not more than half human, but he was the only householder on the lonely road to Mora.

The priests dismounted and asked him whether he could put their mules under shelter and give them grain feed.

'As soon as I git my coat on I will. You kin come in.'

They followed him into a room where a piñon fire blazed in the corner, and went toward it to warm their stiffened hands. Their host made an angry, snarling sound in the direction of the partition, and a woman came out of the next room. She was a Mexican.

Father Latour and Father Vaillant addressed her courteously in Spanish, greeting her in the name of the Holy Mother, as was customary. She did not open her lips, but stared at them blankly for a moment, then dropped her eyes and cowered as if she were terribly frightened. The priests looked at each other, it struck them both that this man had been abusing her in some way. Suddenly he turned on her.

'Clear off them cheers fur the strangers. They won't eat ye, if they air priests.'

She began distractedly snatching rags and wet socks and dirty clothes from the chairs. Her hands were shaking so that she dropped things. She was not old, she might have been very young, but she was probably half-witted. There was nothing in her face but blankness and fear.

Her husband put on his coat and boots, went to the door, and stopped with his hand on the latch, throwing over his shoulder a crafty, hateful glance at the bewildered woman.

'Here, you! Come right along, I'll need ye!'

She took her black shawl from a peg and followed him. Just at the door she turned and caught the eyes of the visitors, who were looking after her in compassion and perplexity. Instantly that stupid face became intense, prophetic, full of awful meaning. With her finger she pointed them away, away!—two quick thrusts into the air.

Then, with a look of horror beyond anything language could convey, she threw back her head and drew the edge of her palm quickly across her distended throat—and vanished. The doorway was empty, the two priests stood staring at it, speechless. That flash of electric passion had been so swift, the warning it communicated so vivid and definite, that they were struck dumb.

Father Joseph was the first to find his tongue

'There is no doubt of her meaning. Your pistol is loaded, Jean?'

'Yes, but I neglected to keep it dry. No matter.'

They hurried out of the house. It was still light enough to see the stable through the grey drive of rain, and they went toward it.

'Señor American,' the Bishop called, 'will you be good enough to bring out our mules?'

The man came out of the stable. 'What do you want?'

'Our mules. We have changed our minds. We will push on to Mora. And here is a dollar for your trouble.'

The man took a threatening attitude. As he looked from one to the other his head played from side to side exactly like a snake's. 'What's the matter? My house ain't good enough for ye?'

'No explanation is necessary. Go into the barn and get the mules, Father Joseph.'

'You dare go into my stable, you—priest!'

The Bishop drew his pistol. 'No profanity, Señor. We want nothing from you but to get away from your uncivil tongue. Stand where you are.'

The man was unarmed. Father Joseph came out with the mules, which had not been unsaddled. The poor things were each munching a mouthful, but they needed no urging to be gone; they did not like this place. The moment they felt their riders on their backs they trotted quickly along the road, which dropped immediately into the arroyo. While they were descending, Father Joseph remarked that the man would certainly have a gun in the house, and that he had no wish to be shot in the back.

'Nor I. But it is growing too dark for that, unless he should follow us on horseback,' said the Bishop. 'Were there horses in the stable?'

'Only a burro.'

Father Vaillant was relying upon the protection of Saint Joseph, whose office he had fervently said that morning. The warning given them by that poor woman, with such scant opportunity, seemed evidence that some protecting power was mindful of them.

By the time they had ascended the far side of the arroyo, night had closed down and the rain was pouring harder than ever.

'I am by no means sure that we can keep in the road,' said the Bishop. 'But at least I am sure we are not being followed. We must trust to these intelligent beasts. Poor woman! He will suspect her and abuse her, I am afraid.' He kept seeing her in the darkness as he rode on, her face in the firelight, and her terrible pantomime.

They reached the town of Mora a little after midnight. The Padre's house was full of refugees, and two of them were put out of a bed in order that the Bishop and his Vicar could get into it.

In the morning a boy came from the stable and reported that he had found a crazy woman lying in the straw, and that she begged to see the two Padres who owned the white mules. She was brought in, her clothing cut to rags, her legs and face and even her hair so plastered with mud that the priests could scarcely recognize the woman who had saved their lives the night before.

She said she had never gone back to the house at all. When the two priests rode away, her husband had run to the house to get his gun, and she had plunged down a washout behind the stable into the arroyo, and had been on the way to Mora all night. She had supposed he would overtake her and kill her, but he had not. She reached the settlement before daybreak, and crept into the stable to warm herself among the animals and wait until the household was awake. Kneeling before the Bishop, she began to relate such horrible things that he stopped her and turned to the native priest.

'This is a case for the civil authorities. Is there a magistrate here?'

There was no magistrate, but there was a retired fur trapper who acted as notary and could take evidence. He was sent for, and in the interval Father Latour instructed the refugee women from Conejos to bathe this poor creature and put decent clothes on her, and to care for the cuts and scratches on her legs.

An hour later the woman, whose name was Magdalena, calmed by food and kindness, was ready to tell her story. The notary had brought along his friend, Saint Vrain, a Canadian trapper who understood Spanish better than he. The woman was known to Saint Vrain, moreover, who confirmed her statement that she was born Magdalena Valdez, at Los Ranchos de Taos, and that she was twenty-four years old. Her husband, Buck Scales, had drifted into Taos with a party of hunters from somewhere in Wyoming. All white men knew him for a dog and a degenerate—but to Mexican girls, marriage with an American meant coming up in the world. She had married him six years ago, and had been living with him ever since in that wretched house on the Mora trail. During that time he had robbed and murdered four travellers who had stopped there for the night. They were all strangers, not known in the country. She had forgot their names, but one was a German boy who spoke very little Spanish and little English, a nice boy with blue eyes, and she had grieved for him more than for the others. They were all buried in the sandy soil behind the stable. She was always afraid their bodies might wash out in a storm. Their horses Buck had ridden off by night and sold to Indians somewhere in the north. Magdalena had borne three children since her marriage, and her husband had killed each of them a few days after birth, by ways so horrible that she could not relate it. After he killed the first baby, she ran away from him, back to her parents at Ranchos. He came after her and made her go home with him by threatening harm to the old people. She was afraid to go anywhere for help, but twice before she had managed to warn travellers away, when her husband happened to be out of the house. This time she had found courage because, when she looked into the faces of these two Padres, she knew they were good men, and she thought if she ran after them they could save her. She could not bear any more killing. She asked nothing better than to die herself, if only she could hide near a church and a priest for a while, to make her soul right with God.

Saint Vrain and his friend got together a search-party at once. They rode out to Scales's place and found the remains of four men buried under the corral behind the stable, as the woman had said. Scales himself they captured on the road from Taos, where he had gone to look for his wife. They brought him back to Mora, but Saint Vrain rode on to Taos to fetch a magistrate.

There was no calabozo in Mora, so Scales was put into an empty stable, under guard. This stable was soon surrounded by a crowd of people, who loitered to hear the blood-curdling threats the prisoner shouted against his wife. Magdalena was kept in the Padre's house, where she lay on a mat in the corner, begging Father Latour to take her back to Santa Fé, so that her husband could not get at her. Though Scales was bound, the Bishop felt alarmed for her safety. He and the American notary, who had a pistol of the new revolver model, sat in the sala and kept watch over her all night.

In the morning the magistrate and his party arrived from Taos. The notary told him the facts of the case in the plaza, where everyone could hear. The Bishop enquired whether there was any place for Magdalena in Taos, as she could not stay on here in such a state of terror. A man dressed in buckskin hunting-clothes stepped out of the crowd and asked to see Magdalena. Father Latour conducted him into the room where she lay on her mat. The stranger went up to her, removing his hat. He bent down and put his hand on her shoulder. Although he was clearly an American, he spoke Spanish in the native manner.

'Magdalena, don't you remember me?'

She looked up at him as out of a dark well, something became alive in her deep, haunted eyes. She caught with both hands at his fringed buckskin knees.

'Cristobal!' she wailed. 'Oh, Cristobal!'

'I'll take you home with me, Magdalena, and you can stay with my wife. You wouldn't be afraid in my house, would you?'

'No, no, Cristobal, I would not be afraid with you. I am not a wicked woman.'

He smoothed her hair. 'You're a good girl, Magdalena—always were. It will be all right. Just leave things to me.'

Then he turned to the Bishop. 'Señor

Vicario, she can come to me. I live near Taos. My wife is a naive woman, and she'll be good to her. That varmint won't come about my place, even if he breaks jail. He knows me. My name is Carson.'

Father Latour had looked forward to meeting the scout. He had supposed him to be a very large man, of powerful body and commanding presence. This Carson was not so tall as the Bishop himself, was very slight in frame, modest in manner, and he spoke English with a soft Southern drawl. His face was both thoughtful and alert, anxiety had drawn a permanent ridge between his blue eyes. Under his blond moustache his mouth had a singular refinement. The lips were full and delicately modelled. There was something curiously unconscious about his mouth, reflective, a little melancholy—and something that suggested a capacity for tenderness.

The Bishop felt a quick glow of pleasure in looking at the man. As he stood there in his buckskin clothes one felt in him standards, loyalties, a code which is not easily put into words, but which is instantly felt when two men who live by it come together by chance. He took the scout's hand. 'I have long wanted to meet Kit Carson,' he said, 'even before I came to New Mexico. I have been hoping you would pay me a visit at Santa Fé.'

The other smiled. 'I'm right shy, sir, and I'm always afraid of being disappointed. But I guess it will be all right from now on.'

This was the beginning of a long friendship.

On their ride back to Carson's ranch, Magdalena was put in Father Vaillant's care, and the Bishop and the scout rode together. Carson said he had become a Catholic merely as a matter of form, as Americans usually did when they married a Mexican girl. His wife was a good woman and very devout, but religion had seemed to him pretty much a woman's affair until his last trip to California. He had been sick out there, and the Fathers at one of the missions took care of him.

'I began to see things different, and thought I might some day be a Catholic in earnest. I was brought up to think priests were rascals, and that the nuns were bad women—all the stuff they talk back in Missouri. A good many of the native priests here bear out that story. Our Padre Martinez at Taos is an old scapegrace, if ever there was one, he's got children and grandchildren in almost every settlement around here. And Padre Lucero at Arroyo Hondo is a miser, takes everything a poor man's got to give him a Christian burial.'

The Bishop discussed the needs of his people at length with Carson. He felt great confidence in his judgment. The two men were about the same age, both a little over forty, and both had been sobered and sharpened by wide experience. Carson had been guide in world-renowned explorations, but he was still almost as poor as in the days when he was a beaver trapper. He lived in a little adobe house with his Mexican wife. The great country of desert and mountain ranges between Santa Fé and the Pacific coast was not yet mapped or charted, the most reliable map of it was in Kit Carson's brain. This Missourian, whose eye was so quick to read a landscape or a human face, could not read a printed page. He could at that time barely write his own name. Yet one felt in him a quick and discriminating intelligence. That he was illiterate was an accident, he had got ahead of books, gone where the printing-press could not follow him. Out of the hardships of his boyhood—from fourteen to twenty picking up a bare living as cook or mule-driver for wagon trains, often in the service of brutal and desperate characters—he had preserved a clean sense of honour and a compassionate heart. In talking to the Bishop of poor Magdalena he said sadly 'I used to see her in Taos when she was such a pretty girl. Ain't it a pity?'

The degenerate murderer, Buck Scales, was hanged after a short trial. Early in April the Bishop left Santa Fé on horseback and rode to St. Louis, on his way to attend the Provincial Council at Baltimore. When he returned in September, he brought back with him five courageous nuns, Sisters of Loretto, to found a school for girls in letterless Santa Fé. He sent at once for Magdalena and took her into the service of the Sisters. She became housekeeper and manager of the Sisters' kitchen. She was devoted to the nuns, and so happy in the service of the Church that when the Bishop visited the school he used to enter by the kitchen-garden in order to see her serene and handsome face. For she became beautiful, as Carson said she had been as a girl

After the blight of her horrible youth was over, she seemed to bloom again in the household of God.

STRANGELY STILL THE DAYS<sup>1</sup>

I

DURING the first days of October a few white, downy snowflakes hung quivering in the air floated about . . . fell in great oscillating circles They seemed headed for nowhere, they followed no common course, but finally they reached the ground and disappeared

The air cleared again There came a drowsy, sun-filled interval . . . nothing but golden haze quite bereft of all life

The sun had no strength these days It peeped out in the morning, glided across the sky as before, yet life it had not until toward evening, as it was nearing the western rim of the prairie Then it awoke, grew big and blushing, took on a splendour which forced everyone to stop and look, the western sky foamed and flooded with a wanton richness of colour, which ran up in streams to meet the coming night Folks would walk about in the evenings speaking in low tones Never in their lives had they seen such sunsets!

. . . Day after day the same . . . evening after evening Strangely still the days . . . the evenings more mysteriously quiet How could one lift one's voice against such silence!

Then one morning—October was nearly passed—the sun could not get his eye open at all, the heavens rested close above the plain, grey, dense, and still The chill of this greyness drove through the air though no wind stirred People went indoors to put on more clothes, came out again, but froze worse than ever. . . . Bleak, grey, God-forsaken, the empty desolation stretched on every hand . . .

Sometime in the afternoon snowflakes began to fall They came sailing down from the north until the air was a close-packed swarm of greyish-white specks, all bound in the same direction The evening was short-lived that day, and died in a pitch-black night that weighed down the heart . . .

. . . Again day came, and brought no other light than that which the greyish-white specks gave All that day the snow fell—all the next night . . .

At last it grew light once more—but the day had no sun A cold wind howled about the huts—left them, and tore down into the white snow blanket, shaking out of it blinding swirls The swirls vanished and reappeared—died down, flared up again and tore on . . . New ones constantly rose many . . .

Per Hansa and his boys worked like fire-brands during the last days before winter set in Every task that came to their hands delighted them, they went from one fairy tale into the next—came out again, and there was a new one at hand, they gave themselves no peace, either by night or by day But Beret could not share their mood, she would watch them absently as they left the house, or when they were due to return, she would wander about with And-Ongen on her arm, looking for them through the window, and keeping a hot dish in readiness on the stove They were sure to be cold, poor fellows! . . . Then when they were seated around the table, wrapped up in all their remarkable experiences, the talk would jump from one incident to another, and she would find herself unable to follow it Their liveliness and loud laughter only drove her heavy thoughts into a still deeper darkness

<sup>1</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from Giants in the Earth (N.Y., 1927), 197-208 Book I of the novel, prior to its translation into English, appeared as I De Dage (Oslo, Norway, 1924)

She had to admit, however, that Per Hansa could accomplish the most marvelous things, she could not imagine where he had learned it all . . . There were the walls, for example, of which he himself was especially proud, and which Store-Hans never tired of admiring. He had begun work on these walls immediately after he had returned from the trip east to the Hallings' with the potatoes. The lume had been mixed according to directions, and spread over the walls—three coats of it, no less, now the sod hut shone so brightly inside that it dazzled the eyes. . . . Before the snow came, Beret thought it delightful to have such walls, but after there was nothing but whiteness outside—pure whiteness as far as the eye could see and the thought could reach—she regretted that he had touched them. Her eyes were blinded wherever she looked, either outdoors or indoors, the black-brown earthen floor was the only object on which she could rest them comfortably, and so she always looked down now, as she sat in the house. But hunt at it, and thus ruin his pleasure, she could not . . . And it really didn't matter much to her, she would endure it for the brief time that remained!

She was thankful enough, though, for all the fine fish that he had brought home. Per Hansa had taken both boys with him on the great expedition east to the Sioux River, there they had made a tremendous catch with the help of the net, and Per Hansa had talked with the Tronders about many extraordinary things, and had gained much valuable information . . . Heaps of frozen fish now lay outside all along the wall, Per Hansa explained to her what a God-send it was that the snow finally had come. Him! Good Heavens! If it hadn't come soon he would have been obliged to go out and get it! Now he was spared that trouble, with the aid of the snowdrifts they could have fresh fish through the whole winter . . . 'Hey, woman!' he said with a laugh, whenever she complained of how desolate it was since the snow had come. 'Can't you understand that we could never manage things without the snow? Hey, wife—white and fine, both outdoors and indoors! . . . Wonder if something couldn't be done to the floor, too?' . . .

Now it came to light what had been working in Per Hansa's mind when he had bought all that salt, he salted down quantities of the fish, and packed them away in all the vessels they could spare.

But in the opinion of the boys, the duck hunt with the net was the crowning adventure. Never had there been such an enthusiastic party, the father was almost the worst of the three! Now the great secret of his planning and scheming over the ducks was revealed. While Store-Hans and his brother had only talked about capturing them and wondered what could be done, Per Hansa had figured out every detail in his mind, if the ducks got the best of him on one tack, he would fool them on another, into the net somehow they must go!

For three nights they had all stayed out in the swamps to the westward, toiling and fighting among the myriads of birds, in the morning they would come home after daylight, wet as crows, numb all over, and blue in the face with cold. But they always brought a catch! As soon as the evening came they would be off again.

Each time Beret pleaded sadly, both by word and glance, for them to stay at home. . . . They would wear themselves out this way. What could they possibly do with all these fowl? Just wait and see, they might not need so much food—something might happen . . . The boys only laughed at these objections, their mother sounded just like Sofie, probably all women were alike—they had no sense. Just imagine such a ridiculous idea—catch no more birds! . . . The father joined in with them and poked mild fun at the mother. How silly it would be not to grab good food when it lay right at their door! Suppose the swamps were to freeze up to-night? And after they had picked the ducks, there would be fine feather beds for both herself and Little Per! . . . Per Hansa's voice softened. And besides, there was no more delicate fare than those ducks on any king's table!

But she would not be carried along . . . 'We won't need them!' she said, dispiritedly . . . and fell into silence.

Dusk settled, the menfolk left—and she was alone with the child again.

But at last winter shut down in earnest, the swamps froze up and duck hunting came to an end for that year.

'I think we ought to carry some soup meat to our neighbours,' said Per Hansa . . . 'This time it'll be something better than badger stew!'

Every person in the little settlement had been rushed with work during the last days before Father Winter came. They all had a feeling that he wasn't very far away, that old fellow, and thought it best to be well prepared to receive him. Hans Olsa, Tonseten, and the Solum boys had been east to the Sioux River again for wood; they had made two trips, and home had seen very little of them lately. Few visits had been made, everyone had been busy with his own affairs . . . For other reasons than this, visitors came but seldom to Per Hansa's now, there was something queer about the woman in that place, she said so little, at times people felt that they were unwelcome there. She was apt to break out suddenly with some remark that they could only wonder at, they hardly knew whether to be surprised or offended.

But on the day when the boys carried a gift of ducks to all the houses in the neighbourhood, proud of the dainty food they brought, and relating what sounded like a fairy tale, everyone went over to Per Hansa's to learn how he had gone about catching these birds. For Ole and Store-Hans wouldn't tell, though they pled them with questions. The Solum boys came first, with Tonseten and Kjersti hard upon their heels, last of all came Hans Olsa and Sorine.

Once inside, they completely forgot their curiosity about the duck hunting, they stood with their mouths open, looking up one wall and down the next.

'Why . . . why . . . what in the wide world was this? Had they plastered snow on the walls? Sam thought it really was snow, and touched it gingerly with his finger. What was it, anyway? Could it possibly be paint? . . . My stars, how fine it looked! . . . Per Hansa sat there, sucking his pipe and enjoying his little triumph, it seemed to him that he had never liked his neighbours so well as at this moment . . . Beret went about listening quietly, in her face was a troubled expression. Not for all the world would she have had the work on the walls undone! . . .

Amazement was universal. Sorine smiled in her pleasant, kindly way; she went over to Beret and said with warm sympathy

'Now you certainly have got a fine house! . . . You'll thrive all the better for it.' . . . At that, she began to help her with the work. But Kjersti, with an emphatic slap on her thigh, voiced it as her opinion that it was a dirty shame that she and Sorine had picked up such poor sticks for husbands! Why couldn't they ever hatch up some nice scheme? Why was Per Hansa the only man among them with his head on the right end? Yes, they certainly ought to feel ashamed of themselves, sitting there! . . . Tonseten took offence at this, he felt constrained to remind her that he was the fellow who had risen to the occasion and captured the Sognings! She'd better remember that; for what would have become of them all in the long run if the Sognings hadn't joined them? 'And I don't exactly see what this new notion of Per Hansa's is really good for,' he spluttered on. 'It's getting to be so damned swell in here that pretty soon a fellow can't even spit!' . . . Tonseten looked accusingly at Beret, it was from her that Per Hansa got these stuck-up airs. She was never willing to be like plain folks, that woman! The Solum boys took great delight in the white walls, this was really beautiful. When they got married they would do the very same thing!

Hans Olsa sucked his pipe and said but little. This seemed very queer to him, he turned it over and over in his mind, but couldn't solve the problem. Was this like Per Hansa, who had always confided everything to him? . . . But here he was going about doing everything alone! When he had learned how a black earthen wall could be made shining white at so small a cost, why hadn't he told the others? There was so little cheer out here, they all sorely needed to share whatever they found . . . The big, rugged features were very sober, he had to look hard at Per Hansa. No, it was the same good-natured face that one liked so well to have near by! This affair was just one of his many pranks, the longer Hans Olsa gazed at his neighbour, the more plausible grew this solution inside that big head of his.

Awhile later, as the two men stood together outside the door, watching the falling snow, he said, quietly

'You have made it pretty fine inside, Per Hansa, but He Who is now whitening the outside of your walls does fully as well . . . You shouldn't be vain in your own strength, you know!'

'Oh, nonsense, Hans Olsa!' laughed Per Hansa 'What are you prating about? . . . Here, take along a couple more ducks for Sorrina!' . . .

III

It was well enough that winter had come at last, thought Per Hansa, he really needed to lay off and rest awhile. After a good square meal of ducks or fresh fish, he would light his pipe and stretch himself, saying

'Ha!—now we're really as well off here, my Beret-girl, as anybody could ever wish to be!' He did not always expect an answer, and seldom got one. Then he would throw himself on the bed and take a good after-dinner nap, often sleeping continuously on into the night. Life seemed very pleasant now!

In this fashion he spent quite a number of days, the bad weather still held out. Per Hansa continued to do full justice to the fare. When he had eaten his fill he would point out again to Beret how well off they were, and go to his couch to sleep the sleep of the righteous. It was almost uncanny—he could never seem to get sleep enough! He slept both day and night, and still he felt the need of more rest . . . Now and then he would go to the door to look out at the weather, and glance across toward the neighbours. No . . . nothing to do outside—the weather was too beastly! He would come in again, and stretch himself, and yawn . . .

The days wore on.

Yes, they wore on. One exactly like the other. Per Hansa couldn't grasp the strange contradiction that had begun to impress him, he knew that the days were actually growing shorter—were being shorn more closely by every passing night, but—weren't they growing longer?

Indeed they were—no question about it! They finally grew so long that he was at a dead loss to find something to do with which to end them. He assured himself that all this leisure was very fine, that he needed to ease up a bit, during the fall he hadn't spared himself, now it felt like a blessing to sit around and play the gentleman. Times would be strenuous enough for him once more, when spring came with fair weather and his great estate needed to be planted; he would just lay off and rest for a while yet! . . .

The days only grew longer and longer.

In the end, this enforced idleness began to gall him. The landscape showed a monotonous sameness . . . never the slightest change . . . Grey sky—damp, icy cold . . . Snow fell . . . snow flew . . . He could only guess now where the huts of Hans Olsa lay. There wasn't a thing to do outdoors, plenty of wood lay chopped and ready for use, it took but a little while to do the chores . . . Beyond this, everything took care of itself outside.

Per Hansa sat by the table, or lay down on the bed when he got tired of sitting up, tried to sleep as long as possible, woke up with a start, turned over and tried to sleep again, rose and sat by the table once more, when he grew weary of lying down.

The days wore on, and yet got nowhere . . . Time had simply come to a standstill! He had never seen the like, this was worse than the dearest lay-up in Lofoten!

The boys were almost as badly off, they too sat restless and idle, and because they had nothing at all to occupy their minds they often came to blows, so that the father had to interfere. But he was never very rough with them, poor boys, what else could they find for amusement? The mother always reminded him of their books . . . Yes, of course—certainly they must learn to read, the father said, no heathen were going to grow up in his house! He tried to be stern with them over this matter, but then . . . after all, boys were boys, he remembered!

At length he realized that this sort of life could not go on. He didn't give a hang for the weather—put on his coat and bade the boys do the same, then they went out and attacked the woodpile. They sawed and they chopped, they lugged in wood and piled it up, first they stacked up as much chopped wood as they could stow in the odd corners of the house, then they built a curious little fort of chopped wood out in the yard—very neatly and craftily constructed—and piled it full, too, this work cheered them up and kept their minds occupied, though the weather was bitterly cold and inclement. They toiled at it from early morning until late at night, and hardly took time off to eat their dinner, the boys began to get sick of the job and complained of being tired. The woodpile lasted exactly four days, when they had chopped up the last stick there was nothing left for them to do outside.

Then they sat idle again.

The bad spell of weather held out interminably. A cold, piercing wind from the northeast blew the livelong day, and moaned about the corners at night. Snow flew more snow fell.

No sun. No sky. The air was a grey, ashen mist which breathed a deathly chill, it hung around and above them thick and frozen. In the course of time there was a full moon at night, somewhere behind the veil. Then the mist grew luminous and alive—strange to behold. Night after night the ghostly spectacle would return.

Per Hansa would gaze at it and think. Now the trolls are surely abroad!

One evening Tonseten and Kjersti came over. They sat and talked until it grew very late. One could readily see that Syvert was out of sorts about something, he puffed at his pipe in glum, ill humor, glared at Per Hansa's walls, and didn't have much to say. When he did speak his voice was unnecessarily loud.

Kjersti and Beret sat together on the bed; they seemed to be finding a good deal to chat about.

Kjersti was in an unusually neighbourly mood, she had come over to ask if well, if she couldn't do something for Beret? She had some woollen yarn at home in her chest, very soft and very fine. Would Beret be offended if she knitted a pair of socks for the little newcomer they were all awaiting?

It was fine yarn, the very finest! Beret must just try to imagine how lonesome she was, sitting at home all alone with that useless husband of hers—and no little newcomer to wait for!

She had plenty of yarn, she could easily make the socks long enough to serve as leggings, too. The work would really bring joy to her—and to Syvert, too, poor fellow, to whom no little newcomer would ever arrive!

... Ah, well! ... God pity us, Syvert wasn't so bad, after all—far be it from her to complain! ... At that, Kjersti happened to think of a story she had heard, about a couple who couldn't seem to get a child though they wanted one very badly. Here the story was, since they happened to be talking about such matters. ... This wife had so little sense that she sought the aid of a witch woman, who gave her both devil's drink and beaver-geld, she rubbed herself with the stuff and drank some of it, too, but no change came, that is, not until one summer when a shoal of herring came into the fjord and with it a fleet of strange fishermen. Alas! desire makes a hot fire, once it has been kindled! But what do you suppose?—her husband became just as fond of that child as if he had been the father of it! ... Wasn't that a queer thing? ... But when the boy was a year old and was on the point of being christened—well, on that very Sunday it happened, as they were sailing across the fjord, that the boat capsized and the Lord took both mother and child, right there and then! He had taken away what he had refused to give in honour, and more besides. ... There was something mysterious about such things, didn't Beret think so? And wasn't it strange that the father should have been so fond of that child? Kjersti had known them both very well.

Beret listened attentively to this tale, putting in a word here and there.

Over at the table, the men had pricked up their ears as the story began, they heard it all. Per Hansa looked at Syvert and laughed, Syvert, in turn, glared at the wall and said, angrily.

'I should think you'd be able to find something American to talk about! ... We're through now with all that troll business over in Norway!' ... He got up and started to go.

But Per Hansa wouldn't listen to their leaving just yet, since they had braved the weather to make a call they might as well sit awhile longer. ... 'You'll have the wind astern, Syvert, going home! ... Come on, sit down and behave yourself!'

On another afternoon all of Hans Olsa's household came over. They stayed till dark, then they began to say that perhaps they'd better be going now—but they made no move to leave. Sorine had brought a gift for Beret. There had been a few bits of cloth lying around the house, for which she could find no use, it had been rather lonesome these days and she had needed something to do, so she had made a little article for this newcomer whom everyone was waiting for! At that, Sorine drew out from her ample bosom a child's cap, of red, white, and blue stripes, with long silk ribbons, all sewed with the greatest care. It was a beautiful cap, all had to see it, there were many warm words of praise. Beret received it in silence, her eyes were wet as she took the cap and laid it carefully in the big chest. . . .

To-night it was Beret who refused to let the visitors leave. She absolutely insisted. Such quantities of food lay outside around the house—far more than they would ever need—that they might as well stay for supper and help to eat it! . . . This proposal overjoyed Per Hansa. It was the plain truth, as Beret said, they had more than they needed—and there was plenty left in the Sioux River, for that matter, to-night they were going to celebrate with fresh fish for supper! . . . He went outside and brought in a generous supply of the frozen fish, which he scaled and cut up, he was in the finest of spirits—it seemed just like the good old days in Lofoten.

That evening was a happy interlude for them all.

FROM MAIN STREET

WELCOME TO OUR CITY!<sup>1</sup>

This is America—a town of a few thousand, in a region of wheat and corn and dairies and little groves

The town is, in our tale, called 'Gopher Prairie, Minnesota.' But its Main Street is the continuation of Main Streets everywhere. The story would be the same in Ohio or Montana, in Kansas or Kentucky or Illinois, and not very differently would it be told Up York State or in the Carolina hills.

Main Street is the climax of civilization. That this Ford car might stand in front of the Bon Ton Store, Hannibal invaded Rome and Erasmus wrote in Oxford cloisters. What Ole Jensen the grocer says to Ezra Stowbody the banker is the new law for London, Prague, and the unprofitable isles of the sea, whatsoever Ezra does not know and sanction, that thing is heresy, worthless for knowing and wicked to consider.

Our railway station is the final aspiration of architecture. Sam Clark's annual hardware turnover is the envy of the four coun- ties which constitute God's Country. In the sensitive art of the Rosebud Movie Palace there is a Message, and humor strictly moral.

Such is our comfortable tradition and sure faith. Would he not betray himself an alien cynic who should otherwise portray Main Street, or distress the citizens by speculating whether there may not be other faiths?

I

30 UNDER the rolling clouds of the prairie a moving mass of steel. An irritable clank and rattle beneath a prolonged roar. The sharp scent of oranges cutting the soggy smell of unbathed people and ancient baggage.

Towns as planless as a scattering of pasteboard boxes on an attic floor. The stretch of faded gold stubble broken only by clumps of willows encircling white houses and red barns.

40 No 7, the way-train, grumbling through Minnesota, imperceptibly climbing the giant tableland that slopes in a thousand-mile rise from hot Mississippi bottoms to the Rockies.

It is September, hot, very dusty.

There is no smug Pullman attached to the train, and the day coaches of the East are replaced by free chair cars, with each seat cut into two adjustable plush chairs,

the head-rests covered with doubtful linen towels. Halfway down the car is a semi-partition of carved oak columns, but the aisle is of bare, splintery, grease-blackened wood. There is no porter, no pillows, no provision for beds, but all today and all tonight they will ride in this long steel box—farmers with perpetually tired wives and children who seem all to be of the same age, workmen going to new jobs, traveling salesmen with derbies and freshly shined shoes

They are parched and cramped, the lines of their hands filled with grime, they go to sleep curled in distorted attitudes, heads against the window-panes or propped on rolled coats on seat-arms, and legs thrust into the aisle. They do not read, apparently they do not think. They wait. An early-wrinkled, young-old mother, moving as though her joints were dry, opens a suitcase in which are seen creased blouses, a pair of slippers worn through at the toes, a bottle of patent medicine, a tin cup, a paper-covered book about dreams which the news-butcher has coaxed her into buying. She brings out a graham cracker which she feeds to a baby lying flat on a seat and wailing hopelessly. Most of the crumbs drop on the red plush of the seat, and the woman sighs and tries to brush them away, but they leap up impishly and fall back on the plush.

A soiled man and woman munch sandwiches and throw the crusts on the floor. A large brick-colored Norwegian takes off his shoes, grunts in relief, and props his feet in their thick gray socks against the seat in front of him.

An old woman whose toothless mouth shuts like a mud-turtle's, and whose hair is not so much white as yellow like moldy linen, with bands of pink skull apparent between the tresses, anxiously lifts her bag, opens it, peers in, closes it, puts it under the seat, and hastily picks it up and opens it and hides it all over again. The bag is full of treasures and of memories: a leather buckle, an ancient band-concert program, scraps of ribbon, lace, satin. In the aisle beside her is an extremely indignant parakeet in a cage.

Two facing seats, overflowing with a Slovene iron-miner's family, are littered with shoes, dolls, whisky bottles, bundles wrapped in newspapers, a sewing bag. The oldest boy takes a mouth-organ out of his coat pocket, wipes the tobacco crumbs off, and plays 'Marching through Georgia' till every head in the car begins to ache.

The news-butcher comes through selling chocolate bars and lemon drops. A girl-child ceaselessly trots down to the water-cooler and back to her seat. The stuff paper envelope which she uses for cup drips in the aisle as she goes, and on each trip she stumbles over the feet of a carpenter, who grunts, 'Ouch! Look out!'

The dust-caked doors are open, and from the smoking-car drifts back a visible blue line of stinging tobacco smoke, and with it a crackle of laughter over the story which the young man in the bright blue suit and lavender tie and light yellow shoes has just told to the squat man in garage overalls.

The smell grows constantly thicker, more stale.

To each of the passengers his seat was his temporary home, and most of the passengers were slatternly housekeepers. But one seat looked clean and deceptively cool. In it were an obviously prosperous man and a black-haired, fine-skinned girl whose pumps rested on an immaculate horsehide bag.

They were Dr. Will Kennicott and his bride, Carol.

They had been married at the end of a year of conversational courtship, and they were on their way to Gopher Prairie after a wedding journey in the Colorado mountains.

The hordes of the way-train were not altogether new to Carol. She had seen them on trips from St. Paul to Chicago. But now that they had become her own people, to bathe and encourage and adorn, she had an acute and uncomfortable interest in them. They distressed her. They were so stolid. She had always maintained that there is no American peasantry, and she sought now to defend her faith by seeing imagination and enterprise in the young Swedish farmers, and in a traveling man working over his order-blanks. But the older people, Yankees as well as Norwegians, Germans, Finns, Canucks, had settled into submission to poverty. They were peasants, she groaned.

'Isn't there any way of waking them up?

What would happen if they understood scientific agriculture?' she begged of Kennicott, her hand groping for his

It had been a transforming honeymoon. She had been frightened to discover how tumultuous a feeling could be roused in her Will had been lordly—stalwart, jolly, impressively competent in making camp, tender and understanding through the hours when they had lain side by side in a tent pitched among pines high up on a lonely mountain spur

His hand swallowed hers as he started from thoughts of the practise to which he was returning 'These people? Wake 'em up? What for? They're happy'

'But they're so provincial No, that isn't what I mean They're—oh, so sunk in the mud'

'Look here, Carrie You want to get over your city idea that because a man's pants aren't pressed, he's a fool These farmers are mighty keen and up-and-coming'

'I know! That's what hurts Life seems so hard for them—these lonely farms and this gritty train'

'Oh, they don't mind it Besides, things are changing The auto, the telephone, rural free delivery, they're bringing the farmers in closer touch with the town Takes time, you know, to change a wilderness like this was fifty years ago But already, why, they can hop into the Ford or the Overland and get into the movies on Saturday evening quicker than you could get down to 'em by trolley in St Paul'

'But if it's these towns we've been passing that the farmers run to for relief from their bleakness—Can't you understand? Just look at them!'

Kennicott was amazed Ever since childhood he had seen these towns from trains on this same line He grumbled, 'Why, what's the matter with 'em? Good hustling burgs It would astonish you to know how much wheat and rye and corn and potatoes they ship in a year'

'But they're so ugly'

'I'll admit they aren't comfy like Gopher Prairie But give 'em time'

'What's the use of giving them time unless some one has desire and training enough to plan them? Hundreds of factories trying to make attractive motor cars, but these towns—left to chance. No! That can't be true It must have taken genius to make them so scrawny!'

'Oh, they're not so bad,' was all he answered He pretended that his hand was the cat and hers the mouse For the first time she tolerated him rather than encouraged him She was staring out at Schoenstrom, a hamlet of perhaps a hundred and fifty inhabitants, at which the train was stopping

A bearded German and his pucker-mouthed wife tugged their enormous imitation-leather satchel from under a seat and waddled out The station agent hoisted a dead calf aboard the baggage-car There were no other visible activities in Schoenstrom In the quiet of the halt, Carol could hear a horse kicking his stall, a carpenter shingling a roof

The business-center of Schoenstrom took up one side of one block, facing the railroad It was a row of one-story shops covered with galvanized iron, or with clapboards painted red and bilious yellow The buildings were as ill-assorted, as temporary-looking, as a mining camp street in the motion-pictures The railroad station was a one-room frame box, a mirey cattle-pen on one side and a crimson wheat-elevator on the other. The elevator, with its cupola on the ridge of a shingled roof, resembled a broad-shouldered man with a small, vicious, pointed head The only habitable structures to be seen were the florid red-brick Catholic church and rectory at the end of Main Street

Carol picked at Kennicott's sleeve 'You wouldn't call this a not-so-bad town, would you?'

'These Dutch burgs are kind of slow Still, at that—See that fellow coming out of the general store there, getting into the big car? I met him once He owns about half the town, besides the store Rauskule, his name is He owns a lot of mortgages, and he gambles in farm-lands Good nut on him, that fellow Why, they say he's worth three or four hundred thousand dollars! Got a dandy great big yellow brick house with tiled walks and a garden and everything, other end of town—can't see it from here—I've gone past it when I've driven through here Yes sir!'

'Then, if he has all that, there's no excuse whatever for this place! If his three hundred thousand went back into the town, where it belongs, they could burn up these shacks, and build a dream-village, a jewel! Why do the farmers and the townpeople let the Baron keep it?

'I must say I don't quite get you sometimes, Carrie. Let him? They can't help themselves! He's a dumm old Dutchman, and probably the priest can twist him around his finger, but when it comes to picking good farming land, he's a regular wiz!'

'I see. He's their symbol of beauty. The town erects him, instead of erecting buildings.'

'Honestly, don't know what you're driving at. You're kind of played out, after this long trip. You'll feel better when you get home and have a good bath, and put on the blue negligee. That's some vampire costume, you witch!'

He squeezed her arm, looked at her knowingly.

They moved on from the desert stillness of the Schoenstrom station. The train creaked, banged, swayed. The air was nauseatingly thick. Kennicott turned her face from the window, rested her head on his shoulder. She was coaxed from her unhappy mood. But she came out of it unwillingly, and when Kennicott was satisfied that he had corrected all her worries and had opened a magazine of saffron detective stories, she sat upright.

Here—she meditated—is the newest empire of the world, the Northern Middle-west, a land of dairy herds and exquisite lakes, of new automobiles and tar-paper shanties and silos like red towers, of clumsy speech and a hope that is boundless. An empire which feeds a quarter of the world—yet its work is merely begun. They are pioneers, these sweaty wayfarers, for all their telephones and bank-accounts and automatic pianos and co-operative leagues. And for all its fat richness, theirs is a pioneer land. What is its future? she wondered. A future of cities and factory smut where now are loping empty fields? Homes universal and secure? Or placid châteaux ringed with sullen huts? Youth free to find knowledge and laughter? Willingness to sift the sanctified lies? Or creamy-skinned fat women, smeared with grease and chalk, gorgeous in the skins of beasts and the bloody feathers of slain birds, playing bridge with puffy pink-nailed jeweled fingers, women who after much expenditure of labor and bad temper still grotesquely resemble their own fatulent lap-dogs? The ancient stale inequalities, or something different in history, unlike the tedious maturity of other empires? What future and what hope?

Carol's head ached with the riddle.

She saw the prairie, flat in giant patches or rolling in long hummocks. The width and bigness of it, which had expanded her spirit an hour ago, began to frighten her. It spread out so, it went on so uncontrollably, she could never know it. Kennicott was closeted in his detective story. With the loneliness which comes most depressingly in the midst of many people she tried to forget problems, to look at the prairie objectively.

The grass beside the railroad had been burnt over, it was a smudge prickly with charred stalks of weeds. Beyond the undeviating barbed-wire fences were clumps of golden rod. Only this thin hedge shut them off from the plains—shorn wheatlands of autumn, a hundred acres to a field, prickly and gray near-by but in the blurred distance like tawny velvet stretched over dipping hillocks. The long rows of wheat-shocks marched like soldiers in worn yellow tabards. The newly plowed fields were black banners fallen on the distant slope. It was a martial immensity, vigorous, a little harsh, unsoftened by kindly gardens.

The expanse was relieved by clumps of oaks with patches of short wild grass, and every mile or two was a chain of cobalt slews, with the flicker of blackbirds' wings across them.

All this working land was turned into exuberance by the light. The sunshine was dizzy on open stubble, shadows from immense cumulus clouds were forever sliding across low mounds, and the sky was wider and lofter and more resolutely blue than the sky of cities. . . . she declared.

'It's a glorious country, a land to be big in,' she crooned.

Then Kennicott startled her by chuckling, 'D' you realize the town after the next is Gopher Prairie? Home!'

That one word—home—it terrified her. Had she really bound herself to live, mescapably, in this town called Gopher Prairie? And this thuck man beside her, who dared to define her future, he was a stranger! She turned in her seat, stared at him Who was he? Why was he sitting with her? He wasn't of her kind! His neck was heavy, his speech was heavy, he was twelve or thirteen years older than she, and about him was none of the magic of shared adventures and eagerness She could not believe that she had ever slept in his arms That was one of the dreams which you had but did not officially admit.

She told herself how good he was, how dependable and understanding She touched his ear, smoothed the plane of his solid jaw, and, turning away again, concentrated upon liking his town It wouldn't be like these barren settlements It couldn't be! Why, it had three thousand population That was a great many people There would be six hundred houses or more And—The lakes near it would be so lovely She'd seen them in the photographs They had looked charming hadn't they?

As the train left Wahkeenyan she began nervously to watch for the lakes—the entrance to all her future life But when she discovered them, to the left of the track, her only impression of them was that they resembled the photographs

A mile from Gopher Prairie the track mounts a curving low ridge, and she could see the town as a whole With a passionate jerk she pushed up the window, looked out, the arched fingers of her left hand trembling on the sill, her right hand at her breast

And she saw that Gopher Prairie was merely an enlargement of all the hamlets which they had been passing Only to the eyes of a Kennicott was it exceptional The huddled low wooden houses broke the plains scarcely more than would a hazel thicker The fields swept up to it, past it It was unprotected and unprotecting, there was no dignity in it nor any hope of greatness Only the tall red grain-elevator and a few tunny church-steeple rose from the mass It was a frontier camp. It was not a place to live in, not possibly, not conceivably

The people—they'd be as drab as their houses, as flat as their fields She couldn't stay here She would have to wrench loose from this man, and flee

She peeped at him She was at once helpless before his mature fixity, and touched by his excitement as he sent his magazine skittering along the aisle, stooped for their bags, came up with flushed face, and gloated, 'Here we are!'

She smiled loyally, and looked away The train was entering town The houses on the outskirts were dusky old red mansions with wooden frills, or gaunt frame shelters like grocery boxes, or new bungalows with concrete foundations imitating stone

Now the train was passing the elevator, the grim storage-tanks for oil, a creamery, a lumber yard, a stock-yard muddy and trampled and stinking Now they were stopping at a squat red frame station, the platform crowded with unshaven farmers and with loafers—unadventurous people with dead eyes She was here She could not go on It was the end—the end of the world She sat with closed eyes, longing to push past Kennicott, hide somewhere in the train, flee on toward the Pacific

Something large arose in her soul and commanded, 'Stop it! Stop being a whining baby!' She stood up quickly, she said, 'Isn't it wonderful to be here at last!'

He trusted her so She would make herself like the place And she was going to do tremendous things—

She followed Kennicott and the bobbing ends of the two bags which he carried They were held back by the slow line of disembarking passengers She reminded herself that she was actually at the dramatic moment of the bride's home-coming She ought to feel exalted She felt nothing at all except irritation at their slow progress toward the door

Kennicott stooped to peer through the windows He shyly exulted

'Look! Look! There's a bunch come down to welcome us! Sam Clark and the mussus and Dave Dyer and Jack Elder, and, yes sir, Harry Haydock and Juanita, and a whole crowd! I guess they see us now Yuh, yuh sure, they see us! See 'em waving!'

She obediently bent her head to look out at them She had hold of herself She was ready to love them But she was embarrassed by the heartiness of the cheering group From the vestibule she waved to them, but she clung a second to the sleeve of the brakeman who helped her down before she had the courage to dive into the cataract of hand-shaking people, people whom she could not tell apart. She had the impression that all the men had coarse voices, large damp hands, toothbrush mustaches, bald spots, and Masonic watch-charms.

She knew that they were welcoming her. Their hands, their smiles, their shouts, their affectionate eyes overcame her. She stammered, "Thank you, oh, thank you!"

One of the men was clamoring at Kennicott, "I brought my machine down to take you home, doc."

"Fine business, Sam!" cried Kennicott, and, to Carol, "Let's jump in. That big Paige over there. Some boat, too, believe me! Sam can show speed to any of these Marmons from Minncapolis!"

Only when she was in the motor car did she distinguish the three people who were to accompany them. The owner, now at the wheel, was the essence of decent self-satisfaction, a baldish, largish, level-eyed man, rugged of neck but sleek and round of face—face like the back of a spoon bowl. He was chuckling at her, "Have you got us all straight yet?"

"Course she has! Trust Carrie to get things straight and get 'em darn quick! I bet she could tell you every date in history!" boasted her husband.

But the man looked at her reassuringly and with a certainty that he was a person whom she could trust she confessed, "As a matter of fact I haven't got anybody straight."

"Course you haven't, child. Well, I'm Sam Clark, dealer in hardware, sporting goods, cream separators, and almost any kind of heavy junk you can think of. You can call me Sam—anyway, I'm going to call you Carrie, seein' 's you've been and gone and married this poor fish of a bum medic that we keep round here." Carol smiled lavishly, and wished that she called people by their given names more easily. "The fat cranky lady back there beside you, who is pretending that she can't hear me giving her away, is Mrs. Sam'l Clark, and this hungry-looking squirt up here beside me is Dave Dyer, who keeps his drug store running by not filling your hubby's prescriptions right—fact you might say he's the guy that put the "shun" in "prescription." So! Well, leave us take the bonny bride home. Say, doc, I'll sell you the Canderden place for three thousand plunks. Better be thinking about building a new home for Carrie. Prettiest Frau in G P, if you asks me!"

Contentedly Sam Clark drove off, in the heavy traffic of three Fords and the Minnie-mashie House Free 'Bus.

"I shall like Mr. Clark . . . I can't call him "Sam"! They're all so friendly." She glanced at the houses, tried not to see what she saw, gave way in "Why do these stories lie so? They always make the bride's homecoming a bower of roses. Complete trust in noble spouse. Lies about marriage. I'm not changed. And this town—O my God! I can't go through with it. This junk-heap!"

Her husband bent over her. "You look like you were in a brown study. Scared? I don't expect you to think Gopher Prairie is a paradise, after St. Paul. I don't expect you to be crazy about it, at first. But you'll come to like it so much—life's so free here and best people on earth."

She whispered to him (while Mrs. Clark considerably turned away), "I love you for understanding. I'm just—I'm beastly oversensitive. Too many books. It's my lack of shoulder-muscles and sense. Give me time, dear."

"You bet! All the time you want!"

She laid the back of his hand against her cheek, snuggled near him. She was ready for her new home.

Kennicott had told her that, with his widowed mother as housekeeper, he had occupied an old house, "but nice and roomy, and well-heated, best furnace I could find on the market." His mother had left Carol her love, and gone back to Lac-qui-Meur.

It would be wonderful, she exulted, not to have to live in Other People's Houses, but to make her own shrine. She held his hand tightly and stared ahead as the car swung round a corner and stopped in the street before a prosaic frame house in a small parched lawn.

4

A concrete sidewalk with a "parking" of grass and mud. A square smug brown house, rather damp. A narrow concrete walk up to it. Sickly yellow leaves in a windrow with dried wings of box-elder seed and snags of wool from the cotton woods A screened porch with pillars of thin painted pine surmounted by scrolls and brackets and bumps of jigsawed wood No shrubbery to shut off the public gaze A lugubrious bay-window to the right of the porch Window curtains of starched cheap lace revealing a pink marble table with a conch shell and a Family Bible

'You'll find it old-fashioned—what do you call it?—Mid-Victorian I left it as is, so you could make any changes you felt were necessary' Kennicott sounded doubtful for the first time since he had come back to his own

'It's a real home!' She was moved by his humility She gaily motioned good-by to the Clarks He unlocked the door—he was leaving the choice of a maid to her, and there was no one in the house She juggled while he turned the key, and scampered in . . . It was next day before either of them remembered that in their honeymoon camp they had planned that he should carry her over the sill

In hallway and front parlor she was conscious of dinginess and lugubriousness and airlessness, but she insisted, 'I'll make it all jolly' As she followed Kennicott and the bags up to their bedroom she quavered to herself the song of the fat little gods of the hearth

I have my own home,
To do what I please with,
To do what I please with,
My den for me and my mate and my cubs,
My own!

She was close in her husband's arms, she clung to him, whatever of strangeness and slowness and insularity she might find in him, none of that mattered so long as she could slip her hands beneath his coat, run her fingers over the warm smoothness of the satin back of his waistcoat, seem almost to creep into his body, find in him strength, find in the courage and kindness of her man a shelter from the perplexing world

'Sweet, so sweet,' she whispered.

'The Clarks have invited some folks to their house to meet us, tonight,' said Kennicott, as he unpacked his suit-case.

'Oh, that is nice of them!'

'You bet I told you you'd like 'em. Squarest people on earth Uh, Carrie—Would you mind if I sneaked down to the office for an hour, just to see how things are?'

'Why, no Of course not I know you're keen to get back to work '

'Sure you don't mind?'

'Not a bit Out of my way Let me unpack '

But the advocate of freedom in marriage was as much disappointed as a drooping bride at the alacrity with which he took that freedom and escaped to the world of men's affairs She gazed about their bedroom, and its full dismalness crawled over her the awkward knuckly L-shape of it, the black walnut bed with apples and spotty pears carved on the headboard, the imitation maple bureau, with pink-daubed scent-bottles and a petticoated pin-cushion on a marble slab uncomfortably like a gravestone, the plain pine washstand and the garlanded waterpitcher and bowl The scent was of horsehair and plush and Florida Water

'How could people ever live with things like this?' she shuddered She saw the furniture as a circle of elderly judges, condemning her to death by smothering The tottering brocade chair squeaked, 'Choke her—choke her—smother her' The old linen smelled of the tomb She was alone in this house, this strange still house, among the shadows of dead thoughts and haunting repressions 'I hate it! I hate it!' she panted 'Why did I ever—'

She remembered that Kennicott's mother had brought these family relics from the old home in Lac-qui-Meurt 'Stop it! They're perfectly comfortable things They're—comfortable Besides—Oh, they're horrible! We'll change them, right away '

Then, 'But of course he has to see how things are at the office—'

She made a pretense of busying herself with unpacking The chintz-lined, silver-fitted bag which had seemed so desirable a luxury in St Paul was an extravagant vanity here The daring black chemise of frail chuffon and lace was a hussy at which the deep-bosomed bed stiffened in disgust, and she hurled it into a bureau drawer, hid it beneath a sensible linen blouse

She gave up unpacking She went to the window, with a purely literary thought of village charm—hollyhocks and lanes and apple-cheeked cottagers. What she saw was the side of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church—a plain clapboard wall of a sour liver color, the ash-pile back of the church, an unpainted stable, and an alley in which a Ford delivery-wagon had been stranded. This was the terraced garden below her boudoir, this was to be her scenery for—

'I mustn't! I mustn't! I'm nervous this afternoon. Am I sick?' Good Lord, I hope it isn't that! Not now! How people lie! How these stories lie! They say the bride is always so blushing and proud and happy when she finds that out, but—I'd hate it! I'd be scared to death! Some day but—Please, dear nebulous Lord, not now! Bearded sniffy old men sitting and demanding that we bear children. If they had to bear them—! I wish they did have to! Not now! Not till I've got hold of this job of liking the ash-pile out there! I must shut up. I'm mildly insane. I'm going out for a walk. I'll see the town by myself. My first view of the empire I'm going to conquer!

She fled from the house.

She stared with seriousness at every concrete crossing, every hitching-post, every rake for leaves, and to each house she devoted all her speculation. What would they come to mean? How would they look six months from now? In which of them would she be dining? Which of these people whom she passed, now mere arrangements of hair and clothes, would turn into intimates, loved or dreaded, different from all the other people in the world?

As she came into the small business-section she inspected a broad-beamed grocer in an alpaca coat who was bending over the apples and celery on a slanted platform in front of his store. Would she ever talk to him? What would he say if she stopped and stated, 'I am Mrs. Dr. Kennicott. Some day I hope to confide that a heap of extremely dubious pumpkins as a window-display doesn't exhilarate me much.'

(The grocer was Mr. Frederick F. Ludelmeyer, whose market is at the corner of Main Street and Lincoln Avenue. In supposing that only she was observant Carol was ignorant, misled by the indifference of cities. She fancied that she was slipping through the streets invisible, but when she had passed, Mr. Ludelmeyer puffed into the store and coughed at his clerk, 'I seen a young woman, she come along the side street. I bet she iss Doc Kennicott's new bride, good-looker, nice legs, but she wore a hell of a plain suit, no style, I wonder will she pay cash, I bet she goes to Howland & Gould's more as she does here, what you done with the poster for Fluffed Oats?')

2

When Carol had walked for thirty-two minutes she had completely covered the town, east and west, north and south, and she stood at the corner of Main Street and Washington Avenue and despaired.

Main Street with its two-story brick shops, its story-and-a-half wooden residences, its muddy expanse from concrete walk to walk, its huddle of Fords and lumber-wagons, was too small to absorb her. The broad, straight, unenticing gashes of the streets let in the grasping prairie on every side. She realized the vastness and the emptiness of the land. The skeleton iron windmill on the farm a few blocks away, at the north end of Main Street, was like the ribs of a dead cow. She thought of the coming of the Northern winter, when the unprotected houses would crouch together in terror of storms galloping out of that wild waste. They were so small and weak, the little brown houses. They were shelters for sparrows, not homes for warm laughing people.

She told herself that down the street the leaves were a splendor. The maples were orange, the oaks a solid tint of raspberry. And the lawns had been nursed with love. But the thought would not hold. At best the trees resembled a thinned woodlot. There was no park to rest the eyes. And since not Gopher Prairie but Wakarusa was the county-seat, there was no court-house with its grounds.

She glanced through the fly-specked windows of the most pretentious building in sight, the one place which welcomed strangers and determined their opinion of the charm and luxury of Gopher Prairie—the Minniemashie House. It was a tall lean shabby structure, three stories of yellow-streaked wood, the corners covered with sanded pine slabs purporting to symbolize stone In the hotel office she could see a stretch of bare unclean floor, a line of rickety chairs with brass cuspidors between, a writing-desk with advertisements in mother-of-pearl letters upon the glass-covered back The dining-room beyond was a jungle of stained table-cloths and catsup bottles

She looked no more at the Minniemashie House.

A man in cuffless shirt-sleeves with pink arm-garters, wearing a linen collar but no tie, yawned his way from Dyer's Drug Store across to the hotel He leaned against the wall, scratched a while, sighed, and in a bored way gossiped with a man tilted back in a chair A lumber-wagon, its long green box filled with large spools of barbed-wire fencing, creaked down the block A Ford, in reverse, sounded as though it were shaking to pieces, then recovered and rattled away. In the Greek candy-store was the whine of a peanut-roaster, and the oily smell of nuts

There was no other sound nor sign of life

She wanted to run, fleeing from the encroaching prairie, demanding the security of a great city Her dreams of creating a beautiful town were ludicrous Oozing out from every drab wall, she felt a forbidding spirit which she could never conquer

She trailed down the street on one side, back on the other, glancing into the cross streets It was a private Seeing Main Street tour She was within ten minutes beholding not only the heart of a place called Gopher Prairie, but ten thousand towns from Albany to San Diego

Dyer's Drug Store, a corner building of regular and unreal blocks of artificial stone Inside the store, a greasy marble soda-fountain with an electric lamp of red and green and curdled-yellow mosaic shade Pawed-over heaps of toothbrushes and combs and packages of shaving-soap Shelves of soap-cartons, teething-rings, garden-seeds, and patent medicines in yellow packages—nostrums for consumption, for 'women's diseases'—notorious mixtures of opium and alcohol, in the very shop to which her husband sent patients for the filling of prescriptions

From a second-story window the sign 'W P Kennicott, Phys & Surgeon,' glistened on black sand.

A small wooden motion-picture theater called 'The Rosebud Movie Palace.' Lithographs announcing a film called 'Fatty in Love'

Howland & Gould's Grocery In the display window, black, overripe bananas and lettuce on which a cat was sleeping Shelves lined with red crêpe paper which was now faded and torn and concentrically spotted

Flat against the wall of the second story the signs of lodges—the Knights of Pythias, the Maccabees, the Woodmen, the Masons

Dahl & Oleson's Meat Market—a reek of blood

A jewelry shop with tinny-looking wrist-watches for women In front of it, at the curb, a huge wooden clock which did not go

A fly-buzzing saloon with a brilliant gold and enamel whisky sign across the front Other saloons down the block From them a stunk of stale beer, and thick voices bellying pidgin German or trolling out dirty songs—vice gone feeble and unenterprising and dull—the delicacy of a mining-camp minus its vigor In front of the saloons, farmwives sitting on the seats of wagons, waiting for their husbands to become drunk and ready to start home

A tobacco shop called 'The Smoke House,' filled with young men shaking dice for cigarettes Racks of magazines, and pictures of coy fat prostitutes in striped bathing-suits

A clothing store with a display of 'ox-blood-shade Oxfords with bull-dog toes' Suits which looked worn and glossless while they were still new, flabbily draped on dummies like corpses with painted cheeks

The Bon Ton Store—Haydock & Simons—the largest shop in town The first-story front of clear glass, the plates cleverly bound at the edges with brass The second story of pleasant tapestry brick One window of excellent clothes for men, interspersed with collars of floral pique which showed mauve daisies on a saffron ground Newness and an obvious notion of neatness and service Haydock & Simons Haydock She had met a Haydock at the station, Harry Haydock, an active person of thirty-five He seemed great to her, now, and very like a saint His shop was clean!

Axel Egge's General Store, frequented

by Scandinavian farmers. In the shallow dark window-space heaps of sleazy sateens, badly woven galateas, canvas shoes designed for women with bulging ankles, steel and red glass buttons upon cards with broken edges, a cottony blanket, a graniteware frying-pan reposing on a sun-faded crêpe blouse

Sam Clark's Hardware Store An air of frankly metallic enterprise Guns and churns and barrels of nails and beautiful shiny butcher knives

Chester Dashaway's House Furnishing Emporium A vista of heavy oak rockers with leather seats, asleep in a dismal row

Billy's Lunch Thick handleless cups on the wet oilcloth-covered counter. An odor of onions and the smoke of hot lard. In the doorway a young man audibly sucking a tooth-pick

The warehouse of the buyer of cream and potatoes The sour smell of a dairy

The Ford Garage and the Buick Garage, competent one-story brick and cement buildings opposite each other Old and new cars on grease-blackened concrete floors. Tire advertisements The roaring of a tested motor, a racket which beat at the nerves Surly young men in khaki union-overalls The most energetic and vital places in town

A large warehouse for agricultural implements An impressive barricade of green and gold wheels, of shafts and sulky seats, belonging to machinery of which Carol knew nothing—potato-planters, manure-spreaders, silage-cutters, disk-harrows, breaking-plows

A feed store, its windows opaque with the dust of bran, a patent medicine advertisement painted on its roof.

Ye Art Shoppe, Prop Mrs. Mary Ellen Wilks, Christian Science Library open daily free A touching fumble at beauty A one-room shanty of boards recently covered with rough stucco A show-window delicately rich in error vases starting out to imitate tree-trunks but running off into blobs of gilt—an aluminum ash-tray labeled 'Greetings from Gopher Prairie'—a Christian Science magazine—a stamped sofa-cushion portraying a large ribbon tied to a small poppy, the correct skeins of embroidery-silk lying on the pillow Inside the shop, a glimpse of bad carbon prints of bad and famous pictures, shelves of phonograph records and camera films, wooden toys, and in the midst an anxious small woman sitting in a padded rocking chair

A barber shop and pool room. A man in shirt sleeves, presumably Del Snafflin the proprietor, shaving a man who had a large Adam's apple

Nat Hicks's Tailor Shop, on a side street off Main A one-story building. A fashion-plate showing human pitchforks in garments which looked as hard as steel plate.

On another side street a raw red-brick Catholic Church with a varnished yellow door.

The post-office—merely a partition of glass and brass shutting off the rear of a mildewed room which must once have been a shop A tilted writing-shelf against a wall rubbed black and scattered with official notices and army recruiting-posters.

The damp, yellow-brick schoolbuilding in its cindery grounds.

The State Bank, stucco masking wood

The Farmers' National Bank An Ionic temple of marble Pure, exquisite, solitary A brass plate with 'Ezra Stowbody, Pres't.'

A score of similar shops and establishments

Behind them and mixed with them, the houses, meek cottages or large, comfortable, soundly uninteresting symbols of prosperity

In all the town not one building save the Ionic bank which gave pleasure to Carol's eyes, not a dozen buildings which suggested that, in the fifty years of Gopher Prairie's existence, the citizens had realized that it was either desirable or possible to make this, their common home, amusing or attractive.

It was not only the unsparing unapologetic ugliness and the rigid straightness which overwhelmed her It was the planlessness, the flimsy temporariness of the buildings, their faded unpleasant colors The street was cluttered with electric-light poles, telephone poles, gasoline pumps for motor cars, boxes of goods Each man had built with the most valiant disregard of all the others Between a large new 'block' of two-story brick shops on one side, and the fire-brick Overland garage on the other side, was a one-story cottage turned into a millinery shop The white temple of the Farmer's Bank was elbowed back by a grocery of glaring yellow brick. One store-building had a patchy galvanized iron cornice, the building beside it was crowned with battlements and pyramids of brick capped with blocks of red sandstone.

She escaped from Main Street, fled home.

She wouldn't have cared, she insisted, if the people had been comely. She had noted a young man loafing before a shop, one unwashed hand holding the cord of an awning, a middle-aged man who had a way of staring at women as though he had been married too long and too prosaically, an old farmer, solid, wholesome, but not clean—his face like a potato fresh from the earth. None of them had shaved for three days.

'If they can't build shrines, out here on the prairie, surely there's nothing to prevent their buying safety-razors!' she raged.

She fought herself. 'I must be wrong. People do live here. It can't be as ugly as—as I know it is! I must be wrong. But I can't do it. I can't go through with it.'

She came home too seriously worried for hysteria, and when she found Kennicott waiting for her, and exulting, 'Have a walk? Well, like the town? Great lawns and trees, eh?' she was able to say, with a self-protective maturity new to her, 'It's very interesting.'

3

The train which brought Carol to Gopher Prairie also brought Miss Bea Sorenson.

Miss Bea was a stalwart, corn-colored, laughing young woman, and she was bored by farm-work. She desired the excitements of city-life, and the way to enjoy city-life was, she had decided, to 'go get a job as hired girl in Gopher Prairie.' She contentedly lugged her pasteboard telescope from the station to her cousin, Tina Malmquist, maid of all work in the residence of Mrs. Luke Dawson.

'Vell, so you come to town,' said Tina.

'Ya. Ay get a job,' said Bea.

'Vell . . . You got a fella now?'

'Ya. Yim Yacobson.'

'Vell. I'm glad to see you. How much you want a week?'

'Sex dollar.'

'There ain't nobody pay dat. Vait! Dr.

Kennicott, I t'ink he marry a girl from de Cities. Maybe she pay dat Vell. You go take a walk.'

'Ya,' said Bea.

So it chanced that Carol Kennicott and Bea Sorenson were viewing Main Street at the same time.

Bea had never before been in a town larger than Scandia Crossing, which has sixty-seven inhabitants.

As she marched up the street she was meditating that it didn't hardly seem like it was possible there could be so many folks all in one place at the same time. My! It would take years to get acquainted with them all. And swell people, too! A fine big gentleman in a new pink shirt with a diamond, and not no washed out blue denum working-shirt. A lovely lady in a longery dress (but it must be an awful hard dress to wash). And the stores!

Not just three of them, like there were at Scandia Crossing, but more than four whole blocks!

The Bon Ton Store—big as four barns—my! it would simply scare a person to go in there, with seven or eight clerks all looking at you. And the men's suits, on figures just like human. And Axel Egge's, like home, lots of Swedes and Norskes in there, and a card of dandy buttons, like rubies.

A drug store with a soda fountain that was just huge, awful long, and all lovely marble, and on it there was a great big lamp with the biggest shade you ever saw—all different kinds colored glass stuck together, and the soda spouts, they were silver, and they came right out of the bottom of the lampstand! Behind the fountain there were glass shelves, and bottles of new kinds of soft drinks, that nobody ever heard of. Suppose a fella took you there!

A hotel, awful high, higher than Oscar Tollefson's new red barn, three stories, one right on top of another, you had to suck your head back to look clear up to the top. There was a swell traveling man in there—probably been to Chicago, lots of times.

Oh, the dandiest people to know here!

There was a lady going by, you wouldn't hardly say she was any older than Bea herself, she wore a dandy new gray suit and black pumps. She almost looked like she was looking over the town, too. But you couldn't tell what she thought. Bea would like to be that way—kind of quiet, so nobody would get fresh Kind of—oh, elegant

A Lutheran Church Here in the city there'd be lovely sermons, and church twice on Sunday, every Sunday!

And a movie show!

A regular theater, just for movies With the sign 'Change of bill every evening' Pictures every evening!

There were movies in Scandia Crossing, 10 but only once every two weeks, and it took the Sorensons an hour to drive in—papa was such a tightwad he wouldn't get a Ford. But here she could put on her hat any evening, and in three minutes' walk be to the movies, and see lovely fellows in dress-suits and Bill Hart and everything!

How could they have so many stores? Why! There was one just for tobacco alone, and one (a lovely one—the Art Shoppy it was) for pictures and vases and stuff, with 20 oh, the dandiest vase made so it looked just like a tree trunk!

Bea stood on the corner of Main Street and Washington Avenue The roar of the city began to frighten her There were five automobuls on the street all at the same time—and one of 'em was a great big car that must of cost two thousand dollars—and the 'bus was starting for a train with 30 five elegant-dressed fellows, and a man was pasting up red bills with lovely pictures of washing-machines on them, and the jeweler was laying out bracelets and wrist-watches and everything on real velvet

What did she care if she got six dollars a week? Or two! It was worth while working for nothing, to be allowed to stay here And think how it would be in the evening, all 40 lighted up—and not with no lamps, but with electric! And maybe a gentleman friend taking you to the movies and buying you a strawberry ice cream soda!

Bea trudged back

'Vell? You lak it?' said Tina

'Ya Ay lak it Ay t'ink maybe Ay stay here,' said Bea

4

The recently built house of Sam Clark, 50 in which was given the party to welcome Carol, was one of the largest in Gopher Prairie It had a clean sweep of clapboards, a solid squareness, a small tower, and a large screened porch Inside, it was as shiny, as hard, and as cheerful as a new oak upright piano

Carol looked imploringly at Sam Clark as he rolled to the door and shouted, 'Welcome, little lady! The keys of the city are yours!'

Beyond him, in the hallway and the living-room, sitting in a vast circle as though they were attending a funeral, she saw the guests They were waiting so! They were waiting for her! The determination to be all one pretty flowerlet of appreciation leaked away She begged of Sam, 'I don't dare face them! They expect so much. They'll swallow me in one mouthful—glump!—like that!'

'Why, sister, they're going to love you—same as I would if I didn't think the doc here would beat me up!'

'B-but—I don't dare! Faces to the right of me, faces in front of me, volley and wonder!'

She sounded hysterical to herself, she fancied that to Sam Clark she sounded insane But he chuckled, 'Now you just cuddle under Sam's wing, and if anybody rubbers at you too long, I'll shoo 'em off Here we go! Watch my smoke—Sam'l, the ladies' delight and the bridegrooms' terror!'

His arm about her, he led her in and bawled, 'Ladies and worse halves, the bride! We won't introduce her round yet, because she'll never get your bum names straight anyway Now bust up this star-chamber!'

They uttered politely, but they did not move from the social security of their circle, and they did not cease staring

Carol had given creative energy to dressing for the event Her hair was demure, low on her forehead with a parting and a coiled braid Now she wished that she had piled it high Her frock was an ingénue slip of lawn, with a wide gold sash and a low square neck, which gave a suggestion of throat and molded shoulders But as they looked her over she was certain that it was all wrong She wished alternately that she had worn a spinsterish high-necked dress, and that she had dared to shock them with a violent brick-red scarf which she had bought in Chicago

She was led about the circle Her voice mechanically produced safe remarks

'Oh, I'm sure I'm going to like it here ever so much,' and 'Yes, we did have the best time in Colorado—mountains,' and 'Yes, I lived in St Paul several years Euclid P Tinker? No, I don't remember meeting him, but I'm pretty sure I've heard of him.'

Kennicott took her aside and whispered, 'Now I'll introduce you to them, one at a time.'

'Tell me about them first.'

'Well, the nice-looking couple over there are Harry Haydock and his wife, Juanita. Harry's dad owns most of the Bon Ton, but it's Harry who runs it and gives it the pep. He's a hustler. Next to him is Dave Dyer the druggist—you met him this afternoon—mighty good duck-shot. The tall husk beyond him is Jack Elder—Jackson Elder—owns the planing-mill, and the Minnie-mashue House, and quite a share in the Farmers' National Bank. Him and his wife are good sports—him and Sam and I go hunting together a lot. The old cheese there is Luke Dawson, the richest man in town. Next to him is Nat Hicks, the tailor.'

'Really? A tailor?'

'Sure. Why not? Maybe we're slow, but we are democratic. I go hunting with Nat same as I do with Jack Elder.'

'I'm glad. I've never met a tailor socially. It must be charming to meet one and not have to think about what you owe him. And do you—Would you go hunting with your barber, too?'

'No but—No use running this democracy thing into the ground. Besides, I've known Nat for years, and besides, he's a mighty good shot and—That's the way it is, see? Next to Nat is Chet Dashaway. Great fellow for chinning. He'll talk your arm off, about religion or politics or books or anything.'

Carol gazed with a polite approximation to interest at Mr. Dashaway, a tan person with a wide mouth. 'Oh, I know! He's the furniture-store man!' She was much pleased with herself.

'Yump, and he's the undertaker. You'll like him. Come shake hands with him.'

'Oh no, no! He doesn't—he doesn't do the embalming and all that—himself? I couldn't shake hands with an undertaker!'

'Why not? You'd be proud to shake hands with a great surgeon, just after he'd been carving up people's bellies.'

She sought to regain her afternoon's calm of maturity. 'Yes. You're right. I want—oh, my dear, do you know how much I want to like the people you like? I want to see people as they are.'

'Well, don't forget to see people as other folks see them as they are! They have the stuff. Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here? Born and brought up here!'

'Bresnahan?'

'Yes—you know—president of the Velvet Motor Company of Boston, Mass—make the Velvet Twelve—biggest automobile factory in New England.'

'I think I've heard of him.'

'Sure you have. Why, he's a millionaire several times over! Well, Perce comes back here for the black-bass fishing almost every summer, and he says if he could get away from business, he'd rather live here than in Boston or New York or any of those places. He doesn't mind Chet's undertaking.'

'Please! I'll—I'll like everybody! I'll be the community sunbeam!'

He led her to the Dawsons.

Luke Dawson, lender of money on mortgages, owner of Northern cut-over land, was a hesitant man in unpressed soft gray clothes, with bulging eyes in a milky face. His wife had bleached cheeks, bleached hair, bleached voice, and a bleached manner. She wore her expensive green frock, with its passementiered bosom, bead tassels, and gaps between the buttons down the back, as though she had bought it second-hand and was afraid of meeting the former owner. They were shy. It was 'Professor' George Edwin Mott, superintendent of schools, a Chinese mandarin turned brown, who held Carol's hand and made her welcome.

When the Dawsons and Mr. Mott had stated that they were 'pleased to meet her,' there seemed to be nothing else to say, but the conversation went on automatically.

'Do you like Gopher Prairie?' whimpered Mrs. Dawson.

'Oh, I'm sure I'm going to be ever so happy.'

'There's so many nice people.' Mrs. Dawson looked to Mr. Mott for social and intellectual aid. He lectured.

'There's a fine class of people. I don't like some of these retired farmers who come here to spend their last days—especially the Germans. They hate to pay school-taxes. They hate to spend a cent. But the rest are a fine class of people. Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here? Used to go to school right at the old building!

'I heard he did.'

'Yes. He's a prince. He and I went fishing together, last time he was here.'

The Dawsons and Mr. Mott teetered upon weary feet, and smiled at Carol with crystallized expressions. She went on.

'Tell me, Mr. Mott. Have you ever tried any experiments with any of the new educational systems? The modern kindergarten methods or the Gary system?'

'Oh. Those. Most of these would-be reformers are simply notoriety-seekers. I believe in manual training, but Latin and mathematics always will be the backbone of sound Americanism, no matter what these faddists advocate—heaven knows what they do want—knitting, I suppose, and classes in wiggling the ears!'

The Dawsons smiled their appreciation of listening to a savant. Carol waited till Kennicott should rescue her. The rest of the party waited for the miracle of being amused.

Harry and Juanita Haydock, Rita Simons and Dr. Terry Gould—the young smart set of Gopher Prairie. She was led to them. Juanita Haydock flung at her in a high, cackling, friendly voice.

'Well, this is so nice to have you here. We'll have some good parties—dances and everything. You'll have to join the Jolly Seventeen. We play bridge and we have a supper once a month. You play, of course?'

'N-no, I don't.'

'Really? In St. Paul?'

'I've always been such a book-worm.'

'We'll have to teach you. Bridge is half the fun of life.' Juanita had become patronizing, and she glanced disrespectfully at Carol's golden sash, which she had previously admired.

Harry Haydock said politely, 'How do you think you're going to like the old burg?'

'I'm sure I shall like it tremendously.'

'Best people on earth here. Great hustlers, too. Course I've had lots of chances to go live in Minneapolis, but we like it here. Real he-town. Did you know that Percy Bresnahan came from here?'

Carol perceived that she had been weakened in the biological struggle by disclosing her lack of bridge. Roused to nervous desire to regain her position she turned on Dr. Terry Gould, the young and pool-playing competitor of her husband. Her eyes coquetted with him while she gushed.

'I'll learn bridge. But what I really love most is the outdoors. Can't we all get up a boating party, and fish, or whatever you do, and have a picnic supper afterwards?'

'Now you're talking!' Dr. Gould affirmed. He looked rather too obviously at the cream-smooth slope of her shoulder. 'Like fishing? Fishing is my middle name. I'll teach you bridge. Like cards at all?'

'I used to be rather good at bezique.'

She knew that bezique was a game of cards—or a game of something else. Roulette, possibly. But her lie was a triumph. Juanita's handsome, high-colored, horsey face showed doubt. Harry stroked his nose and said humbly, 'Bezique? Used to be great gambling game, wasn't it?'

While others drifted to her group, Carol snatched up the conversation. She laughed and was frivolous and rather brittle. She could not distinguish their eyes. They were a blurry theater-audience before which she self-consciously enacted the comedy of being the Clever Little Bride of Doc Kennicott.

'These—here celebrated Open Spaces, that's what I'm going out for. I'll never read anything but the sporting-page again. Will converted me on our Colorado trip. There were so many mousey tourists who were afraid to get out of the motor 'bus that I decided to be Annie Oakley, the Wild Western Wampire, and I bought oh! a vociferous skirt which revealed my perfectly nice ankles to the Presbyterian glare of all the Ioway schoolma'ams, and I leaped from peak to peak like the nimble chamoyos, and—You may think that Herr Doctor Kennicott is a Nimrod, but you ought to have seen me daring him to strip to his BVD's and go swimming in an icy mountain brook.'

She knew that they were thinking of becoming shocked, but Juanita Haydock was admiring, at least. She swaggered on.

'I'm sure I'm going to ruin Will as a respectable practitioner—Is he a good doctor, Dr. Gould?

Kennicott's rival gasped at this insult to professional ethics, and he took an appreciable second before he recovered his social manner. 'I'll tell you, Mrs. Kennicott.' He smiled at Kennicott, to imply that whatever he might say in the stress of being witty was not to count against him in the commerce-medical warfare. 'There's some people in town that say the doc is a fair to middlin' diagnostician and prescription-writer, but let me whisper this to you—but for heaven's sake don't tell him I said so—don't you ever go to him for anything more serious than a pendectomy of the left ear or a strabismus of the cardiograph.'

No one save Kennicott knew exactly what this meant, but they laughed, and Sam Clark's party assumed a glittering lemon-yellow color of brocade panels and champagne and tulle and crystal chandeliers and sporting duchesses. Carol saw that George Edwin Mott and the blanching Mr. and Mrs. Dawson were not yet hypnotized. They looked as though they wondered whether they ought to look as though they disapproved. She concentrated on them.

'But I know whom I wouldn't have dared to go to Colorado with! Mr. Dawson there! I'm sure he's a regular heart-breaker. When we were introduced he held my hand and squeezed it frantically.'

'Haw! Haw! Haw!' The entire company applauded Mr. Dawson was beatified. He had been called many things—loan-shark, skunkflint, tightwad, pussyfoot—but he had never before been called a flirt.

'He is wicked, isn't he, Mrs. Dawson? Don't you have to lock him up?'

'Oh no, but maybe I better,' attempted Mrs. Dawson, a tint on her pallid face.

For fifteen minutes Carol kept it up. She asserted that she was going to stage a musical comedy, that she preferred café parfait to beefsteak, that she hoped Dr. Kennicott would never lose his ability to make love to charming women, and that she had a pair of gold stockings. They gaped for more. But she could not keep it up. She retired to a chair behind Sam Clark's bulk. The smile-wrinkles solemnly flattened out in the faces of all the other collaborators in having a party, and again they stood about hoping but not expecting to be amused.

Carol listened. She discovered that conversation did not exist in Gopher Prairie. Even at this affair, which brought out the young smart set, the hunting squire set, the respectable intellectual set, and the solid financial set, they sat up with gaiety as with a corpse.

Juanita Haydock talked a good deal in her rattling voice but it was invariably of personalities: the rumor that Raymie Wutherspoon was going to send for a pair of patent leather shoes with gray buttoned tops, the rheumatism of Champ Perry, the state of Guy Pollock's grippe, and the dementia of Jim Howland in painting his fence salmon-pink.

Sam Clark had been talking to Carol about motor cars, but he felt his dunes as host. While he droned, his brows popped up and down. He interrupted himself, 'Must stir 'em up.' He worried at his wife, 'Don't you think I better stir 'em up?' He shouldered into the center of the room, and cried:

'Let's have some stunts, folks.'

'Yes, let's!' shrieked Juanita Haydock.

'Say, Dave, give us that stunt about the Norwegian catching a hen.'

'You bet, that's a slick stunt, do that, Dave!' cheered Chet Dashaway.

Mr. Dave Dyer obliged.

All the guests moved their lips in anticipation of being called on for their own stunts.

'Ella, come on and recite "Old Sweetheart of Mine," for us,' demanded Sam.

Miss Ella Stowbody, the spinster daughter of the Ionic Bank, scratched her dry palms and blushed. 'Oh, you don't want to hear that old thing again.'

'Sure we do! You bet!' asserted Sam.

'My voice is in terrible shape tonight.'

'Tut! Come on!'

Sam loudly explained to Carol, 'Ella is our shark at elocuting. She's had professional training. She studied singing and oratory and dramatic art and shorthand for a year, in Milwaukee.'

Miss Stowbody was reciting. As encore to 'An Old Sweetheart of Mine,' she gave a peculiarly optimistic poem regarding the value of smiles.

There were four other stunts: one Jewish, one Irish, one juvenile, and Nat Hicks's parody of Mark Antony's funeral oration.

During the winter Carol was to hear Dave Dyer's hen-catching impersonation seven times, 'An Old Sweetheart of Mine' nine times, the Jewish story and the funeral oration twice, but now she was ardent, and, because she did so want to be happy and simple-hearted, she was as disappointed as the others when the stunts were finished, and the party instantly sank back into coma.

They gave up trying to be festive, they began to talk naturally, as they did at their shops and homes.

The men and women divided, as they had been tending to do all evening. Carol was deserted by the men, left to a group of matrons who steadily pattered of children, sickness, and cooks—their own shop-talk. She was piqued. She remembered visions of herself as a smart married woman in a drawing-room, fencing with clever men. Her dejection was relieved by speculation as to what the men were discussing, in the corner between the piano and the phonograph. Did they rise from these housewifely personalities to a larger world of abstractions and affairs?

She made her best curtsy to Mrs. Dawson, she twittered, 'I won't have my husband leaving me so soon! I'm going over and pull the wretch's ears!' She rose with a jeune fille bow. She was self-absorbed and self-approving because she had attained the quality of sentimentality. She proudly dipped across the room and, to the interest and commendation of all beholders, sat on the arm of Kennicott's chair.

He was gossiping with Sam Clark, Luke Dawson, Jackson Elder of the planing-mill, Chet Dashaway, Dave Dyer, Harry Haydock, and Ezra Stowbody, president of the Ionic bank.

Ezra Stowbody was a troglodyte. He had come to Gopher Prairie in 1865. He was a distinguished bird of prey—swooping thin nose, turtle mouth, thick brows, port-wine cheeks, floss of white hair, contemptuous eyes. He was not happy in the social changes of thirty years. Three decades ago, Dr. Westlake, Julius Flickerbaugh the lawyer, Merriman Peedy the Congregational pastor and himself had been the arbiters. That was as it should be, the fine arts—medicine, law, religion, and finance—recognized as aristocratic, four Yankees democratically chatting with but ruling the Ohioans and Illini and Swedes and Germans who had ventured to follow them. But Westlake was old, almost retired; Julius Flickerbaugh had lost much of his practice to livelier attorneys; Reverend (not The Reverend) Peedy was dead, and nobody was impressed in this rotten age of automobiles by the 'spanking grays' which Ezra still drove. The town was as heterogeneous as Chicago. Norwegians and Germans owned stores. The social leaders were common merchants. Selling nails was considered as sacred as banking. These upstarts—the Clarks, the Haydocks—had no dignity. They were sound and conservative in politics, but they talked about motor cars and pump-guns and heaven only knew what new-fangled fads. Mr. Stowbody felt out of place with them. But his brick house with the mansard roof was still the largest residence in town, and he held his position as squire by occasionally appearing among the younger men and reminding them by a wintry eye that without the banker none of them could carry on their vulgar businesses.

As Carol defied decency by sitting down with the men, Mr. Stowbody was piping to Mr. Dawson, 'Say, Luke, when was't Biggins first settled in Winnebago Township? Wa'n't it in 1879?'

'Why no 'twa'n't!' Mr. Dawson was indignant. 'He come out from Vermont in 1867—no, wait, in 1868, it must have been—and took a claim on the Rum River, quite a ways above Anoka.'

'He did not!' roared Mr. Stowbody. 'He settled first in Blue Earth County, hum and his father!'

('Whether this old duck Biggins had an English setter or a Llewellyn. They've been arguing it all evening!')

Dave Dyer interrupted to give tidings, 'D' tell you that Clara Biggins was in town couple days ago? She bought a hot-water bottle—expensive one, too—two dollars and thirty cents!'

'Yaaaaaah!' snarled Mr. Stowbody. 'Course. She's just like her grandad was. Never save a cent. Two dollars and twenty—thirty, was it?—two dollars and thirty cents for a hot-water bottle! Brick wrapped up in a flannel petticoat just as good, anyway!'

'How's Ella's tonsils, Mr. Stowbody?' yawned Chet Dashaway

While Mr Stowbody gave a somatic and psychic study of them, Carol reflected, 'Are they really so terribly interested in Ella's tonsils, or even in Ella's esophagus? I wonder if I could get them away from personalities? Let's risk damnation and try.'

'There hasn't been much labor trouble around here, has there, Mr Stowbody?' she asked innocently

'No, ma'am, thank God, we've been free from that, except maybe with hired girls and farm-hands Trouble enough with these foreign farmers, if you don't watch these Swedes they turn socialist or populist or some fool thing on you in a minute Of course, if they have loans you can make 'em listen to reason I just have 'em come into the bank for a talk, and tell 'em a few things I don't mind their being democrats, so much, but I won't stand having socialists around But thank God, we ain't got the labor trouble they have in these cities Even Jack Elder here gets along pretty well, in the planing-mill, don't you, Jack?'

'Yep Sure Don't need so many skilled workmen in my place, and it's a lot of these cranky, wage-hogging, half-baked skilled mechanics that start trouble—reading a lot of this anarchist literature and union papers and all.'

'Do you approve of union labor?' Carol inquired of Mr Elder

'Me? I should say not! It's like this I don't mind dealing with my men if they think they've got any grievances—though Lord knows what's come over workmen, nowadays—don't appreciate a good job But still, if they come to me honestly, as man to man, I'll talk things over with them But I'm not going to have any outsider, any of these walking delegates, or whatever fancy names they call themselves now—bunch of rich grafters, living on the ignorant workmen! Not going to have any of those fellows butting in and telling me how to run my business!'

Mr Elder was growing more excited, more belligerent and patriotic 'I stand for freedom and constitutional rights. If any man don't like my shop, he can get up and git Same way, if I don't like him, he gits And that's all there is to it I simply can't understand all these complications and hoop-te-doodles and government reports and wage-scales and God knows what all that these fellows are balling up the labor situation with, when it's all perfectly simple. They like what I pay 'em, or they get out That's all there is to it!'

'What do you think of profit-sharing?' Carol ventured

Mr Elder thundered his answer, while the others nodded, solemnly and in tune, like a shop-window of flexible toys, comic mandarins and judges and ducks and clowns, set quivering by a breeze from the open door

'All this profit-sharing and welfare work and insurance and old-age pension is simply poppycock Enfeebles a workman's independence—and wastes a lot of honest profit The half-baked thinker that isn't dry behind the ears yet, and these suffragettes and God knows what all buttinskis there are that are trying to tell a business man how to run his business, and some of these college professors are just about as bad, the whole kit and bilin' of 'em are nothing in God's world but socialism in disguise! And it's my bounden duty as a producer to resist every attack on the integrity of American industry to the last ditch Yes—SIR!'

Mr Elder wiped his brow

Dave Dyer added, 'Sure! You bet! What they ought to do is simply to hang every one of these agitators, and that would settle the whole thing right off Don't you think so, doc?'

'You bet,' agreed Kennicott

The conversation was at last relieved of the plague of Carol's intrusions and they settled down to the question of whether the justice of the peace had sent that hobo drunk to jail for ten days or twelve It was a matter not readily determined Then Dave Dyer communicated his carefree adventures on the gipsy trail

'Yep I get good time out of the flivver 'Bout a week ago I motored down to New Wurttemberg That's forty-three—No, let's see. It's seventeen miles to Belldale, and 'bout six and three-quarters, call it seven, to Torgenquist, and it's a good nineteen miles from there to New Wurttemberg—seventeen and seven and nineteen, that makes, uh, let me see seventeen and seven 's twenty-four, plus nineteen, well say plus twenty, that makes forty-four, well anyway, say about forty-three or -four miles from here to New Wurttemberg. We got started about seven-fifteen, prob'ly seven-twenty, because I had to stop and fill the radiator, and we ran along, just keeping up a good steady gait—'

Mr Dyer did finally, for reasons and purposes admitted and justified, attain to New Wurttemberg

Once—only once—the presence of the alien Carol was recognized Chet Dashaway leaned over and said asthmatically, 'Say, uh, have you been reading this serial "Two Out" in Tingling Tales? Corking yarn! Gosh, the fellow that wrote it certainly can sling baseball slang!'

The others tried to look literary Harry Haydock offered, 'Juanita is a great hand for reading high-class stuff, like "Mid the Magnolias" by this Sara Hetwiggin Butts, and "Riders of Ranch Reckless" Books But me,' he glanced about importantly, as one convinced that no other hero had ever been in so strange a plight, 'I'm so darn busy I don't have much time to read '

'I never read anything I can't check against,' said Sam Clark

Thus ended the literary portion of the conversation, and for seven minutes Jackson Elder outlined reasons for believing that the pike-fishing was better on the west shore of Lake Minniemashie than on the east—though it was indeed quite true that on the east shore Nat Hicks had caught a pike altogether admirable

The talk went on It did go on! Their voices were monotonous, thick, emphatic They were harshly pompous, like men in the smoking-compartments of Pullman cars They did not bore Carol They frightened her She panted, 'They will be cordial to me, because my man belongs to their tribe God help me if I were an outsider!'

Smiling as changelessly as an ivory figurine she sat quiescent, avoiding thought, glancing about the living-room and hall, noting their betrayal of unimaginative commercial prosperity. Kennicott said, 'Dandy interior, eh? My idea of how a place ought to be furnished Modern' She looked polite, and observed the oiled floors, hardwood staircase, unused fireplace with tiles which resembled brown linoleum, cut-glass vases standing upon doilies, and the barred, shut, forbidding unit bookcases that were half filled with swashbuckler novels and unread-looking sets of Dickens, Kipling, O Henry, and Elbert Hubbard

She perceived that even personalities were failing to hold the party. The room filled with hesitancy as with a fog. People cleared their throats, tried to choke down yawns. The men shot their cuffs and the women stuck their combs more firmly into their back hair.

Then a rattle, a daring hope in every eye, the swinging of a door, the smell of strong coffee, Dave Dyer's mewing voice in a triumphant, 'The eats!' They began to chatter They had something to do They could escape from themselves They fell upon the food—chicken sandwiches, maple cake, drug-store ice cream. Even when the food was gone they remained cheerful They could go home, any time now, and go to bed!

They went, with a flutter of coats, chiffon scarfs, and good-bys

Carol and Kennicott walked home.

'Did you like them?' he asked

'They were terribly sweet to me.'

'Uh, Carrie—You ought to be more careful about shocking folks Talking about gold stockings, and about showing your ankles to schoolteachers and all!' More mildly 'You gave 'em a good time, but I'd watch out for that, 'f I were you Juanita Haydock is such a damn cat I wouldn't give her a chance to criticize me '

'My poor effort to lift up the party! Was I wrong to try to amuse them?'

'No! No! Honey, I didn't mean—You were the only up-and-coming person in the bunch I just mean—Don't get onto legs and all that immoral stuff. Pretty conservative crowd '

She was silent, raw with the shameful thought that the attentive circle might have been criticizing her, laughing at her.

'Don't, please don't worry!' he pleaded

Silence

'Gosh, I'm sorry I spoke about it. I just meant—But they were crazy about you. Sam said to me, "That little lady of yours is the slickest thing that ever came to this town," he said, and Ma Dawson—I didn't hardly know whether she'd like you or not, she's such a dried-up old bird, but she said, "Your bride is so quick and bright, I declare, she just wakes me up." '

Carol liked praise, the flavor and fatness of it, but she was so energetically being sorry for herself that she could not taste this commendation

'Please! Come on! Cheer up!' His lips said it, his anxious shoulder said it, his arm about her said it, as they halted on the obscure porch of their house.

'Do you care if they think I'm flighty, Will?'

'Me? Why, I wouldn't care if the whole world thought you were this or that or anything else You're my—well, you're my soul!'

He was an undefined mass, as solid-seeming as rock She found his sleeve, pinched it, cried, 'I'm glad! It's sweet to be wanted! You must tolerate my frivolousness You're all I have!'

He lifted her, carried her into the house, and with her arms about his neck she forgot 10 Main Street.

RING LARDNER

1885-1933

THE GOLDEN HONEYMOON

MOTHER says that when I start talking I never know when to stop But I tell her the only time I get a chance is when she ain't around, so I have to make the most of it I guess the fact is neither one of us would be welcome in a Quaker meeting, but as I tell Mother, what did God give us tongues for if He didn't want we should use them? Only she says He didn't give them to us to say the same thing over and over again, like I do, and repeat myself But I say

'Well, Mother,' I say, 'when people is like you and I and been married fifty years, do you expect everything I say will be something you ain't heard me say before? But it may be new to others, as they ain't nobody else lived with me as long as you have'

So she says

'You can bet they ain't, as they couldn't nobody else stand you that long.'

'Well,' I tell her, 'you look pretty healthy'

'Maybe I do,' she will say, 'but I looked even healthier before I married you'

You can't get ahead of Mother.

Yes, sir, we was married just fifty years ago the seventeenth day of last December and my daughter and son-in-law was over from Trenton to help us celebrate the Golden Wedding My son-in-law is John H Kramer, the real estate man He made $12,000 one year and is pretty well thought of around Trenton, a good, steady, hard worker The Rotarians was after him a long time to join, but he kept telling them his home was his club But Edie finally made him join. That's my daughter.

Well, anyway, they come over to help us celebrate the Golden Wedding and it was pretty crumpy weather and the furnace don't seem to heat up no more like it used to and Mother made the remark that she hoped this winter wouldn't be as cold as the last, referring to the winter previous So Edie said if she was us, and nothing to keep us home, she certainly wouldn't spend no more winters up here and why didn't we just shut off the water and close up the house and go down to Tampa, Florida? You know we was there four winters ago and staid five weeks, but it cost us over three hundred and fifty dollars for hotel bill alone So Mother said we wasn't going no place to be robbed So my son-in-law spoke up and said that Tampa wasn't the only place in the South, and besides we didn't have to stop at no high price hotel but could rent us a couple rooms and board out somewheres, and he had heard that St Petersburg, Florida, was the spot and if we said the word he would write down there and make inquiries

Well, to make a long story short, we decided to do it and Edie said it would be our Golden Honeymoon and for a present my son-in-law paid the difference between a section and a compartment so as we could have a compartment and have more privacy In a compartment you have an upper and lower berth just like the regular sleeper, but it is a shut in room by itself and got a wash bowl. The car we went in was all compartments and no regular berths at all. It was all compartments.

We went to Trenton the night before and staid at my daughter and son-in-law and we left Trenton the next afternoon at 3 23 p m.

This was the twelfth day of January. Mother set facing the front of the train, as it makes her giddy to ride backwards. I set facing her, which does not affect me. We reached North Philadelphia at 4 03 p m and we reached West Philadelphia at 4 14, but did not go into Broad Street. We reached Baltimore at 6 30 and Washington, D C, at 7 25. Our train laid over in Washington two hours till another train come along to pick us up and I got out and strolled up the platform and into the Union Station. When I come back, our car had been switched on to another track, but I remembered the name of it, the La Belle, as I had once visited my aunt out in Oconomowoc, Wisconsin, where there was a lake of that name, so I had no difficulty in getting located. But Mother had nearly fretted herself sick for fear I would be left.

'Well,' I said, 'I would of followed you on the next train.'

'You could of,' said Mother, and she pointed out that she had the money.

'Well,' I said, 'we are in Washington and I could of borrowed from the United States Treasury. I would of pretended I was an Englishman.'

Mother caught the point and laughed heartily.

Our train pulled out of Washington at 9.40 p m and Mother and I turned in early, I taking the upper. During the night we passed through the green fields of old Virginia, though it was too dark to tell if they was green or what color. When we got up in the morning, we was at Fayetteville, North Carolina. We had breakfast in the dining car and after breakfast I got in conversation with the man in the next compartment to ours. He was from Lebanon, New Hampshire, and a man about eighty years of age. His wife was with him, and two unmarried daughters and I made the remark that I should think the four of them would be crowded in one compartment, but he said they had made the trip every winter for fifteen years and knowed how to keep out of each other's way. He said they was bound for Tarpon Springs.

We reached Charleston, South Carolina, at 12.50 p.m. and arrived at Savannah, Georgia, at 4 20. We reached Jacksonville, Florida, at 8 45 p m. and had an hour and a quarter to lay over there, but Mother made a fuss about me getting off the train, so we had the darky make up our berths and retired before we left Jacksonville. I didn't sleep good as the train done a lot of hemming and hawing, and Mother never sleeps good on a train as she says she is always worrying that I will fall out. She says she would rather have the upper herself, as then she would not have to worry about me, but I tell her I can't take the risk of having it get out that I allowed my wife to sleep in an upper berth. It would make talk.

We was up in the morning in time to see our friends from New Hampshire get off at Tarpon Springs, which we reached at 6 53 a m.

Several of our fellow passengers got off at Clearwater and some at Belleair, where the train backs right up to the door of the mammoth hotel. Belleair is the winter headquarters for the golf dudes and everybody that got off there had their bag of sticks, as many as ten and twelve in a bag. Women and all. When I was a young man we called it shinny and only needed one club to play with and about one game of it would of been a-plenty for some of these dudes, the way we played it.

The train pulled into St. Petersburg at 8 20 and when we got off the train you would think they was a riot, what with all the darkies barking for the different hotels.

I said to Mother, I said

'It is a good thing we have got a place picked out to go to and don't have to choose a hotel, as it would be hard to choose amongst them if every one of them is the best.'

She laughed.

We found a jitney and I give him the address of the room my son-in-law had got for us and soon we was there and introduced ourselves to the lady that owns the house, a young widow about forty-eight years of age. She showed us our room, which was light and airy with a comfortable bed and bureau and washstand. It was twelve dollars a week, but the location was good, only three blocks from Williams Park.

St. Pete is what folks calls the town, though they also call it the Sunshine City, as they claim they's no other place in the country where they's fewer days when Old Sol don't smile down on Mother Earth, and one of the newspapers gives away all their copies free every day when the sun don't shine. They claim to of only give them away some sixty-odd times in the last eleven years. Another nickname they have got for the town is 'the Poor Man's Palm Beach,' but I guess they's men that comes there that could borrow as much from the bank as some of the Willie boys over to the other Palm Beach.

During our stay we paid a visit to the Lewis Tent City, which is the headquarters for the Tin Can Tourists. But maybe you ain't heard about them. Well, they are an organization that takes their vacation trips by auto and carries everything with them. That is, they bring along their tents to sleep in and cook in and they don't patronize no hotels or cafeterias, but they have got to be bona fide auto campers or they can't belong to the organization.

They tell me they's over 200,000 members to it and they call themselves the Tin Cannners on account of most of their food being put up in tin cans. One couple we seen in the Tent City was a couple from Brady, Texas, named Mr and Mrs Pence, which the old man is over eighty years of age and they had came in their auto all the way from home, a distance of 1,641 miles. They took five weeks for the trip, Mr. Pence driving the entire distance.

The Tin Cannners hails from every State in the Union and in the summer time they visit places like New England and the Great Lakes region, but in the winter the most of them comes to Florida and scatters all over the State. While we was down there, they was a national convention of them at Gainesville, Florida, and they elected a Fredonia, New York, man as their president. His title is Royal Tin Can Opener of the World. They have got a song wrote up which everybody has got to learn it before they are a member.

'The tin can forever! Hurrah, boys! Hurrah!
Up with the tin can! Down with the foel

We will rally round the campfire, we'll rally once again,
Shouting, "We auto camp forever!"'

That is something like it. And the members has also got to have a tin can fastened on to the front of their machine.

I asked Mother how she would like to travel around that way and she said

'Fine, but not with an old rattle brain like you driving.'

'Well,' I said, 'I am eight years younger than this Mr Pence who drove here from Texas.'

'Yes,' she said, 'but he is old enough to not be skitush.'

You can't get ahead of Mother.

Well, one of the first things we done in St Petersburg was to go to the Chamber of Commerce and register our names and where we was from as they's great rivalry amongst the different States in regards to the number of their citizens visiting in town and of course our little State don't stand much of a show, but still every little bit helps, as the fella says. All and all, the man told us, they was eleven thousand names registered, Ohio leading with some fifteen hundred-odd and New York State next with twelve hundred. Then come Michigan, Pennsylvania and so on down, with one man each from Cuba and Nevada.

The first night we was there, they was a meeting of the New York-New Jersey Society at the Congregational Church and a man from Ogdensburg, New York State, made the talk. His subject was Rainbow Chasing. He is a Rotarian and a very convicting speaker, though I forget his name.

Our first business, of course, was to find a place to eat and after trying several places we run on to a cafeteria on Central Avenue that suited us up and down. We eat pretty near all our meals there and it averaged about two dollars per day for the two of us, but the food was well cooked and everything nice and clean. A man don't mind paying the price if things is clean and well cooked.

On the third day of February, which is Mother's birthday, we spread ourselves and eat supper at the Poinsettia Hotel and they charged us seventy-five cents for a sirloin steak that wasn't hardly big enough for one.

I said to Mother 'Well,' I said, 'I guess

it's a good thing every day ain't your birthday or we would be in the poorhouse'

'No,' says Mother, 'because if every day was my birthday, I would be old enough by this time to of been in my grave long ago'

You can't get ahead of Mother

In the hotel they had a card-room where they was several men and ladies playing five hundred and this new fangled whist 10 bridge We also seen a place where they was dancing, so I asked Mother would she like to trip the light fantastic toe and she said no, she was too old to squirm like you have got to do now days We watched some of the young folks at it awhile till Mother got disgusted and said we would have to see a good movie to take the taste out of our mouth. Mother is a great movie heroynie and we go twice a week here at home

But I want to tell you about the Park. The second day we was there we visited the Park, which is a good deal like the one in Tampa, only bigger, and they's more fun goes on here every day than you could shake a stick at In the middle they's a big bandstand and chairs for the folks to set and listen to the concerts, which they give you music for all tastes, from Dixie up to classical pieces like Hearts and Flowers

Then all around they's places marked off for different sports and games—chess and checkers and dominoes for folks that enjoys those kind of games, and roque and horse-shoes for the numbler ones I used to pitch a pretty fair shoe myself, but ain't done much of it in the last twenty years

Well, anyway, we bought a membership ticket in the club which costs one dollar for the season, and they tell me that up to a couple years ago it was fifty cents, but they had to raise it to keep out the riffraff

Well, Mother and I put in a great day watching the pitchers and she wanted I should get in the game, but I told her I was all out of practice and would make a fool of myself, though I seen several men pitching who I guess I could take their measure without no practice However, they was some good pitchers, too, and one boy from 50 Akron, Ohio, who could certainly throw a pretty shoe. They told me it looked like he would win the championship of the United States in the February tournament We come away a few days before they held that and I never did hear if he win I forget his name, but he was a clean cut young fella and he has got a brother in Cleveland that's a Rotarian

Well, we just stood around and watched the different games for two or three days and finally I set down in a checker game with a man named Weaver from Danville, Illinois He was a pretty fair checker player, but he wasn't no match for me, and I hope that don't sound like bragging But I always could hold my own on a checker-board and the folks around here will tell you the same thing I played with this Weaver pretty near all morning for two or three mornings and he beat me one game and the only other time it looked like he had a chance, the noon whistle blowed and we had to quit and go to dinner.

20 While I was playing checkers, Mother would set and listen to the band, as she loves music, classical or no matter what kind, but anyway she was setting there one day and between selections the woman next to her opened up a conversation She was a woman about Mother's own age, seventy or seventy-one, and finally she asked Mother's name and Mother told her her name and where she was from and Mother 30 asked her the same question, and who do you think the woman was?

Well, sir, it was the wife of Frank M Hartsell, the man who was engaged to Mother till I stepped in and cut him out, fifty-two years ago!

Yes, sir!

You can imagine Mother's surprise! And Mrs Hartsell was surprised, too, when Mother told her she had once been friends 40 with her husband, though Mother didn't say how close friends they had been, or that Mother and I was the cause of Hartsell going out West But that's what we was Hartsell left his town a month after the engagement was broke off and ain't never been back since He had went out to Michigan and become a veterinary, and that is where he had settled down, in Hillsdale, Michigan, and finally married his wife

50 Well, Mother screwed up her courage to ask if Frank was still living and Mrs Hartsell took her over to where they was pitching horse-shoes and there was old Frank, waiting his turn And he knowed Mother as soon as he seen her, though it was over fifty years. He said he knowed her by her eyes.

'Why, it's Lucy Frost!' he says, and he throwed down his shoes and quit the game.

Then they come over and hunted me up and I will confess I wouldn't of knowed him. Him and I is the same age to the month, but he seems to show it more, some way. He is balder for one thing. And his beard is all white, where mine has still got a streak of brown in it. The very first thing I said to him, I said

'Well, Frank, that beard of yours makes me feel like I was back north. It looks like a regular blizzard.'

'Well,' he said, 'I guess youn would be just as white if you had it dry cleaned.'

But Mother wouldn't stand that.

'Is that so?' she said to Frank. 'Well, Charley ain't had no tobacco in his mouth for over ten years!'

And I ain't!

Well, I excused myself from the checker game and it was pretty close to noon, so we decided to all have dinner together and they was nothing for it only we must try their cafeteria on Thurd Avenue. It was a little more expensive than ours and not near as good, I thought. I and Mother had about the same dinner we had been having every day and our bill was $1.10. Frank's check was $1.20 for he and his wife. The same meal wouldn't of cost them more than a dollar at our place.

After dinner we made them come up to our house and we all set in the parlor, which the young woman had give us the use of to entertain company. We begun talking over old times and Mother said she was a-scared Mrs. Hartsell would find it turesome listening to we three talk over old times, but as it turned out they wasn't much chance for nobody else to talk with Mrs. Hartsell in the company. I have heard lots of women that could go it, but Hartsell's wife takes the cake of all the women I ever seen. She told us the family history of everybody in the State of Michigan and bragged for a half hour about her son, who she said is in the drug business in Grand Rapids, and a Rotarian.

When I and Hartsell could get a word in edgeways we joked one another back and forth and I chafed him about being a horse doctor.

'Well, Frank,' I said, 'you look pretty prosperous, so I suppose they's been plenty of glanders around Hillsdale.'

'Well,' he said, 'I've managed to make more than a fair living. But I've worked pretty hard.'

'Yes,' I said, 'and I suppose you get called out all hours of the night to attend births and so on.'

Mother made me shut up.

Well, I thought they wouldn't never go home and I and Mother was in misery trying to keep awake, as the both of us generally always takes a nap after dinner. Finally they went, after we had made an engagement to meet them in the Park the next morning, and Mrs. Hartsell also invited us to come to their place the next night and play five hundred. But she had forgot that they was a meeting of the Michigan Society that evening, so it was not till two evenings later that we had our first card game.

Hartsell and his wife lived in a house on Thurd Avenue North and had a private setting room besides their bedroom. Mrs. Hartsell couldn't quit talking about their private setting room like it was something wonderful. We played cards with them, with Mother and Hartsell partners against his wife and I. Mrs. Hartsell is a miserable card player and we certainly got the worst of it.

After the game she brought out a dish of oranges and we had to pretend it was just what we wanted, though oranges down there is like a young man's whiskers, you enjoy them at first, but they get to be a pesky nuisance.

We played cards again the next night at our place with the same partners and I and Mrs. Hartsell was beat again. Mother and Hartsell was full of compliments for each other on what a good team they made, but the both of them knowed well enough where the secret of their success laid. I guess all and all we must of played ten different evenings and they was only one night when Mrs. Hartsell and I come out ahead. And that one night wasn't no fault of hern.

When we had been down there about two weeks, we spent one evening as their guest in the Congregational Church, at a social give by the Michigan Society. A talk was made by a man named Bitting of Detroit, Michigan, on How I was Cured of Story Telling. He is a big man in the Rotarians and give a witty talk

A woman named Mrs Oxford rendered some selections which Mrs Hartsell said was grand opera music, but whatever they was my daughter Edie could of give her cards and spades and not made such a hulabaloo about it neither.

Then they was a ventriloquist from Grand Rapids and a young woman about forty-five years of age that mimicked different kinds of birds I whispered to Mother that they all sounded like a chicken, but she nudged me to shut up

After the show we stopped in a drug store and I set up the refreshments and it was pretty close to ten o'clock before we finally turned in Mother and I would of preferred tending the movies, but Mother said we mustn't offend Mrs Hartsell, though I asked her had we came to Florida to enjoy ourselves or to just not offend an old chatterbox from Michigan.

I felt sorry for Hartsell one morning. The women folks both had an engagement down to the chiropodist's and I run across Hartsell in the Park and he foolishly offered to play me checkers

It was him that suggested it, not me, and I guess he repented himself before we had played one game But he was too stubborn to give up and set there while I beat him game after game and the worst part of it was that a crowd of folks had got in the habit of watching me play and there they all was, looking on, and finally they seen what a fool Frank was making of himself, and they began to chafe him and pass remarks Like one of them said

'Who ever told you you was a checker player!'

And

'You might maybe be good for tiddle-de-winks, but not checkers!'

I almost felt like letting him beat me a couple games. But the crowd would of knowed it was a put up job.

Well, the women folks joined us in the Park and I wasn't going to mention our little game, but Hartsell told about it himself and admitted he wasn't no match for me

'Well,' said Mrs Hartsell, 'checkers ain't much of a game anyway, is it?' She said 'It's more of a children's game, ain't it? At least, I know my boy's children used to play it a good deal.'

'Yes, ma'am,' I said. 'It's a children's game the way your husband plays it, too.'

Mother wanted to smooth things over, so she said

'Maybe they's other games where Frank can beat you.'

'Yes,' said Mrs. Hartsell, 'and I bet he could beat you pitching horse-shoes'

'Well,' I said, 'I would give him a chance to try, only I ain't pitched a shoe in over sixteen years'

'Well,' said Hartsell, 'I ain't played checkers in twenty years'

'You ain't never played it,' I said.

'Anyway,' says Frank, 'Lucy and I is your master at five hundred'

Well, I could of told him why that was, but had decency enough to hold my tongue.

It had got so now that he wanted to play cards every night and when I or Mother wanted to go to a movie, any one of us would have to pretend we had a headache and then trust to goodness that they wouldn't see us sneak into the theater. I don't mind playing cards when my partner keeps their mind on the game, but you take a woman like Hartsell's wife and how can they play cards when they have got to stop every couple seconds and brag about their son in Grand Rapids?

Well, the New York-New Jersey Society announced that they was goin to give a social evening too and I said to Mother, I said

'Well, that is one evening when we will have an excuse not to play five hundred.'

'Yes,' she said, 'but we will have to ask Frank and his wife to go to the social with us as they asked us to go to the Michigan social'

'Well,' I said, 'I had rather stay home than drag that chatterbox everywheres we go.'

So Mother said

'You are getting too cranky. Maybe she does talk a little too much but she is good hearted And Frank is always good company'

So I said

'I suppose if he is such good company you wished you had of married him'

Mother laughed and said I sounded like I was jealous. Jealous of a cow doctor!

Anyway we had to drag them along to the social and I will say that we give them a much better entertainment than they had given us.

Judge Lane of Paterson made a fine talk on business conditions and a Mrs. Newell of Westfield imitated birds, only you could really tell what they was the way she done it. Two young women from Red Bank sung a choral selection and we clapped them back and they gave us Home to Our Mountains and Mother and Mrs. Hartsell both had tears in their eyes. And Hartsell, too.

Well, some way or another the chairman got wind that I was there and asked me to make a talk and I wasn't even going to get up, but Mother made me, so I got up and said

'Ladies and gentlemen,' I said 'I didn't expect to be called on for a speech on an occasion like this or no other occasion as I do not set myself up as a speech maker, so will have to do the best I can, which I often say is the best anybody can do.'

Then I told them the story about Pat and the motorcycle, using the brogue, and it seemed to tickle them and I told them one or two other stories, but altogether I wasn't on my feet more than twenty or twenty-five minutes and you ought to of heard the clapping and hollering when I set down. Even Mrs. Hartsell admitted that I am quite a speechifier and said if I ever went to Grand Rapids, Michigan, her son would make me talk to the Rotarians.

When it was over, Hartsell wanted we should go to their house and play cards, but his wife reminded him that it was after 9 30 p.m., rather a late hour to start a card game, but he had went crazy on the subject of cards, probably because he didn't have to play partners with his wife. Anyway, we got rid of them and went home to bed.

It was the next morning, when we met over to the Park, that Mrs. Hartsell made the remark that she wasn't getting no exercise so I suggested that why didn't she take part in the roque game.

She said she had not played a game of roque in twenty years, but if Mother would play she would play. Well, at first Mother wouldn't hear of it, but finally consented, more to please Mrs. Hartsell than anything else.

Well, they had a game with a Mrs. Ryan from Eagle, Nebraska, and a young Mrs. Morse from Rutland, Vermont, who Mother had met down to the chiropodist's. Well, Mother couldn't hit a flea and they all laughed at her and I couldn't help from laughing at her myself and finally she quit and said her back was too lame to stoop over. So they got another lady and kept on playing and soon Mrs. Hartsell was the one everybody was laughing at, as she had a long shot to hit the black ball, and as she made the effort her teeth fell out on to the court. I never seen a woman so flustered in my life. And I never heard so much laughing, only Mrs. Hartsell didn't join in and she was madder than a hornet and wouldn't play no more, so the game broke up.

Mrs. Hartsell went home without speaking to nobody, but Hartsell stayed around and finally he said to me, he said

'Well, I played you checkers the other day and you beat me bad and now what do you say if you and me play a game of horse-shoes?'

I told him I hadn't pitched a shoe in sixteen years, but Mother said

'Go ahead and play. You used to be good at it and maybe it will come back to you.'

Well, to make a long story short, I give in. I oughtn't to of never tried it, as I hadn't pitched a shoe in sixteen years, and I only done it to humor Hartsell.

Before we started, Mother patted me on the back and told me to do my best, so we started in and I seen right off that I was in for it, as I hadn't pitched a shoe in sixteen years and didn't have my distance. And besides, the plating had wore off the shoes so that they was points right where they stuck into my thumb and I hadn't throwed more than two or three times when my thumb was raw and it pretty near killed me to hang on to the shoe, let alone pitch it.

Well, Hartsell throws the awkwardest shoe I ever seen pitched and to see him pitch you wouldn't think he would ever come nowhere near, but he is also the luckiest pitcher I ever seen and he made some pitches where the shoe lit five and six feet short and then schooned up and was a ringer. They's no use trying to beat that kind of luck.

They was a pretty fair size crowd watching us and four or five other ladies besides Mother, and it seems like, when Hartsell pitches, he has got to chew and it kept the ladies on the anxious seat as he don't seem to care which way he is facing when he leaves go.

You would think a man as old as him would of learnt more manners

Well, to make a long story short, I was just beginning to get my distance when I had to give up on account of my thumb, which I showed it to Hartsell and he seen I couldn't go on, as it was raw and bleeding. Even if I could of stood it to go on myself, Mother wouldn't of allowed it after she seen my thumb. So anyway I quit and Hartsell said the score was nineteen to six, but I don't know what it was. Or don't care, neither

Well, Mother and I went home and I said I hoped we was through with the Hartsells as I was sick and tired of them, but it seemed like she had promised we would go over to their house that evening for another game of their everlasting cards

Well, my thumb was giving me considerable pain and I felt kind of out of sorts and I guess maybe I forgot myself, but anyhow, when we was about through playing Hartsell made the remark that he wouldn't never lose a game of cards if he could always have Mother for a partner

'Well, you had a chance fifty years ago to always have her for a partner, but you wasn't man enough to keep her'

I was sorry the minute I had said it and Hartsell didn't know what to say and for once his wife couldn't say nothing. Mother tried to smooth things over by making the remark that I must of had something stronger than tea or I wouldn't talk so silly. But Mrs. Hartsell had froze up like an iceberg and hardly said good night to us and I bet her and Frank put in a pleasant hour after we was gone

As we was leaving, Mother said to him 'Never mind Charley's nonsense, Frank. He is just mad because you beat him all hollow pitching horse-shoes and playing cards'

She said that to make up for my slip, but at the same time she certainly riled me. I tried to keep ahold of myself, but as soon as we was out of the house she had to open up the subject and begun to scold me for the break I had made.

Well, I wasn't in no mood to be scolded. So I said

'I guess he is such a wonderful pitcher and card player that you wished you had married him.'

'Well,' she said, 'at least he ain't a baby to give up pitching because his thumb has got a few scratches.'

'And how about you,' I said, 'making a fool of yourself on the roque court and then pretending your back is lame and you can't play no more!'

'Yes,' she said, 'but when you hurt your thumb I didn't laugh at you, and why did you laugh at me when I sprained my back?'

'Who could help from laughing!' I said.

'Well,' she said, 'Frank Hartsell didn't laugh.'

'Well,' I said, 'why didn't you marry him?'

'Well,' said Mother, 'I almost wished I had!'

'And I wished so, too!' I said

'I'll remember that!' said Mother, and that's the last word she said to me for two days

We seen the Hartsells the next day in the Park and I was willing to apologize, but they just nodded to us. And a couple days later we heard they had left for Orlando, where they have got relatives.

I wished they had went there in the first place

Mother and I made it up setting on a bench

'Listen, Charley,' she said, 'This is our Golden Honeymoon and we don't want the whole thing spoilt with a silly old quarrel.'

'Well,' I said, 'did you mean that about wishing you had married Hartsell?'

'Of course not,' she said, 'that is, if you didn't mean that you wished I had, too.'

So I said

'I was just tired and all wrought up. I thank God you chose me instead of him as they's no other woman in the world who I could of lived with all these years'

'How about Mrs. Hartsell?' says Mother.

'Good gracious!' I said 'Imagine being married to a woman that plays five hundred like she does and drops her teeth on the roque court!

'Well,' said Mother, 'it wouldn't be no worse than being married to a man that ex-pectorates towards ladies and is such a fool in a checker game.'

So I put my arm around her shoulder and she stroked my hand and I guess we got kind of spoony

They was two days left of our stay in St
Petersburg and the next to the last day
Mother introduced me to a Mrs Kendall from Kingston, Rhode Island, who she had met at the chiropodist's.

Mrs Kendall made us acquainted with her husband, who is in the grocery business
They have got two sons and five grandchildren and one great-grandchild. One of their sons lives in Providence and is way up in the Elks as well as a Rotarian

We found them very congenial people and we played cards with them the last two nights we was there. They was both experts and I only wished we had met them sooner instead of running into the Hartsells. But the Kendalls will be there again next winter and we will see more of them, that is, if we decide to make the trip again.

We left the Sunshine City on the eleventh day of February, at 11 a.m. This gave us a day trip through Florida and we seen all the country we had passed through at night on the way down

We reached Jacksonville at 7 p.m. and pulled out of there at 8 10 p.m. We reached Fayetteville, North Carolina, at nine o'clock the following morning, and reached Washington, D.C., at 6 30 p.m., laying over there half an hour

We reached Trenton at 11 01 p.m. and had wired ahead to my daughter and son-in-law and they met us at the train and we went to their house and they put us up for the night. John would of made us stay up all night, telling about our trip, but Edie said we must be tired and made us go to bed. That's my daughter

The next day we took our train for home and arrived safe and sound, having been gone just one month and a day

Here comes Mother, so I guess I better shut up

LOLA RIDGE

1883-1941

FACES

A LATE snow beats
With cold white fists upon the tenements—
Hurriedly drawing blinds and shutters,
Like tall old slatterns
Pulling aprons about their heads

Lights slanting out of Mott Street
Gibber out,
Or dribble through bar-room slits,
Anonymous shapes
Conniving behind shuttered panes
Caper and disappear
Where the Bowery
Is throbbing like a fistula
Back of her ice-scabbed fronts.

Livid faces
Glimmer in furtive doorways,
Or spill out of the black pockets of alleys,
Smears of faces like muddied beads,
Making a ghastly rosary
The night mumbles over

And the snow with its devilish and silken whisper

Patrolling arcs
Blowing shrill blasts over the Bread Line
Stalk them as they pass, Silent as though accouched of th
darkness,

And the wind noses among them
Like a skunk
That roots about the heart

Colder
And the Elevated slams upon the silence
Like a ponderous door
Then all is still again,
Save for the wind fumbling over
The empty swaying faces—
The wind rummaging
Like an old Jew

Faces in glimmering rows
(No sign of the abject life—
Not even a blasphemy)
But the spindle legs keep time
To a lumping rhythm,

40

And the shadows twitch upon the snow Convulsively—
 As though death played
 With some ungainly dolls

SONS OF BELIAL

1

We are old,
 Old as song
 Before Rome was Or Cyrene
 Mad nights knew us
 And old men's wives
 We knew who spilled the sacred oil
 For young-gold harlots of the town . . .
 We knew where the peacocks went
 And the white doe for sacrifice 10

2

We were the sons of Belial
 One black night
 Centuries ago
 We beat at a door
 In Gilead
 We took the Levite's concubine
 We plucked her hands from off the
                     door
 We choked the cry into her throat
 And stuck the stars among her hair
 We glimpsed the madly swaying stars Between the rhythms of her hair
 And all our mute and separate strings Swelled in a raging symphony . . .
 Our blood sang pæans
 All that night
 Till dawn fell like a wounded swan
 Upon the fields of Gilead

3

We are old
 Old as song
 We are dumb song (Epics tangled
In our blood
When we haled Hypatia
Over the stones
In Alexandria)
 Could we loose
 The wild rhythms clinched in us . . .
 March in bands of troubadours. . . .
 We would be of gentle mood
 When Christ healed us 40

Who were dumb—
 When he freed our shut-in song—
 We strewed green palms
 At his pale feet
 We sang hosannas
 In Jerusalem
 And all our fumbling voices blent
 In a brief white harmony (But a mightier song
Was in us pent
When we nailed Christ
To a four-armed tree) 50

4

We are young
 When we rise up with singing roots, (Warm rains washing
Gutters of Berlin
Where we stamped Rosa . . . Luxemburg
On a night in spring)
 Rhythms skurry in our blood
 Little nimble rats of song
 In our feet run crazily
 And all is dust                      we trample                      on 60

Mad nights when we make ritual (Feet running before the sleuth-light . . .
And the smell of burnt flesh
By a flame-ringed hut
In Missouri,
Sweet as on Rome's pyre )
 We make ropes of rigadoons
 With copper feet that jig on air
 We are the Mob
 Old as song
 Tyre knew us
 And Israel

REVEILLE

COME forth, you workers!
 Let the fires go cold—
 Let the iron spill out, out of the troughs—
 Let the iron run wild
 Like a red bramble on the floors—
 Leave the mill and the foundry and the mine
 And the shrapnel lying on the wharves—Leave the desk and the shuttle and the loom—
 Come,
 With your ashen lives,
 Your lives like dust in your hands 10

I call upon you, workers.
It is not yet light
But I beat upon your doors
You say you await the Dawn
But I say you are the Dawn.
Come, in your irresistible unspent force
And make new light upon the mountains.

You have turned deaf ears to others—
Me you shall hear 20
Out of the mouths of turbines,
Out of the turgid throats of engines,
Over the whistling steam,
You shall hear me shrilly piping
Your mills I shall enter like the wind,
And blow upon your hearts,
Kindling the slow fire

They think they have tamed you, workers—
Beaten you to a tool
To scoop up hot honor 30
Till it be cool—
But out of the passion of the red frontiers
A great flower trembles and burns and glows
And each of its petals is a people

Come forth, you workers—
Clinging to your stable
And your wisp of warm straw—
Let the fires grow cold,
Let the iron spill out of the troughs,
Let the iron run wild 40
Like a red bramble on the floors . . .

As our forefathers stood on the prairies
So let us stand in a ring,
Let us tear up their prisons like grass
And beat them to barricades—
Let us meet the fire of their guns
With a greater fire,
Till the birds shall fly to the mountains
For one safe bough

FROM FIREHEAD

LIGHT SONG <sup>1</sup>

ON the taut string He was the night bowed somerly its ancient music,
And He, attuned to diapasens, Heard in the conch shell of darkness the murmur of many peoples

<sup>1</sup> Miss Ridge says "The passage, from "He," the first book of Firehead, is not, of course, given in its entirety

He felt strange fluxions in him and tender and sharp vibrations, Mob cries, the kisses of the whip that were as mouths pressed too close, the falterd

Kiss of Judas, faintly malodorous like a jonquil that had lain too long on the breast of a dead man,

Chill yet on his cheek, the warm kiss of Mary and pressure of John's bright
head

All blent in a vast music, not again
To sound apart in any separate strain But move in the clear whole wherein He whirled 10

Incandescent, in the pillared flame
Of music that is time made audible With all its massed formations high in air

And wheeling columns streaming out of sight—

To what bright conquest or achieved
despair

Or flaming end past compass or compute?
Music, over time made absolute,
Holding eternal, in the light that moves
From sun to sun, an octave in its flight
The little hatreds and the chiming loves 20

Light grew in him like a stalk up and up to meet the far shining,

As it was in the beginning the first stammering upon the waters

He expanded, treading upon space, through him sweetly flowing

The effluvia in which all things move, He saw

Earth watching out of her seas, great eyes lidded in darkness, sluggishly lifting

The night that drooped upon them, earth supine

or even in the exact form in which it appears in the long poem. For in order to give some kind of unity to the fragment presented I have separated the central light-theme from its context, very much as one might draw a single white-thread from a multi-colored weave

Firehead was commenced in August 1927, shortly after my return from Boston, where like many others I had gone to protest against the legal killing of Sacco and Vanzetti—who, as most of us know, were falsely accused and died for a crime of which they were innocent. In the days following I wrote a number of verses about the men, and then started to go on with some other work. Suddenly one day, and without premeditation, I wrote some lyrics on the theme of the Crucifixion. Only then did I begin to plan the structure of the poem and to study my background. Benét, ed., Fifty Poets (N.Y., 1933), 52–53

In the vast equations of the night that upbore her as on immense wings;
 He heard
 Out of the unfathomable arches and stretches of the night
 The moments falling Summers endlessly uncoiling from off the golden Spool of the sun and dawns like barefoot virgins, with the early 30 Wonder in their eyes, passed him in silvery procession .
 He, privy with the delicate speech of things, knowing their infinite gestures, telling Trees by the differing cadences of leaves that prattle to the ear sweetly of no thing . . .
 Knowing the vanity of a rose . . . and how
 stone
 Cries at the emergence of great waters Heard now the feet of centuries . . . in these Enormous footfalls other sounds were lost
 It was a silent world, Until into its silence that was as the heart of a song or as the quiet at the core of hurricanes,
 A word out-leapt, an overgrowth
 A bloody hand shaped like his own, 40
 To a separate life from out his mouth
 (The wind blew salt in each nail-hole
 It fanned into a living coal)
 In vast semi-circle thrown Sleeping lay the curved horizon,
 Till the hand that spanned the zone,
 The streaming hand shaped like his own,
 Seized and swung it like a scythe
 He saw the spinning blade divide
 The ancient body of the night, 50
 A humming scimitar it cleft
 The blue deep parts within her nave
 No other vaulting thing had reft
 And plunged in some high fountain-head
 That trumpeted with light
 Light gushed out of the rift and made
 A radiance upon the mountains,
 Light supernal, turning the rocks to fire,
 Holding the seas before it like a glass,
 Compelling to its own fabulous desire 60
 The small pure waters of his sight
 So that for a moment the Omnipotent,

Blazoning his face above the mountains,
 Might look therein and be made glad,
 Light omnivorous and without mercy
 Consuming all things for fuel—
 Denying no toad, beast, man, fowl, worm—
 Seizing, transfixing the mean norm,
 Leaving it starrily, as it left Peter Pierced with the white crow of dawn, 70
 In the arrested moment like a spear
 To remain without falling and without flight,
 A cynosure to burn forever there
 Impaled on the implacable light.
 Light making bright things its own,
 Implicit in it all dark gestations
 Of life that terribly flowers and burns again to the white bone, Light no god might blow out with his jealous breath
 Nor the chained mountains stamp on with a ponderous foot, Informing the night's arteries, swelling the great hill-roots, 80
 Down,
 Full veins of earth, purpling the dim strata,
 Down
 Through the dark declivities, touching the riant fire under the world Until his spirit merging into the light's excess
 Grew one with that which fed on it . . .
 Light, falling on Judea, smiting her rocks to song .
 All things resolving into light and light into love . love denying
 No toad, beast, man, fowl, worm .
 In one song of monstrous adoration 90
 1927-1929 1929
 FROM VIA IGNIS
 I
 THOU, multi-one, whose contours none may mark
 In spinning whole, for the brief shapes which thrust
 Their wilding heads from ferment of this dust
 Thou leavenest with tumultuous spark,
 Art all-equating; no offending part
 From part divided but has stance in thee.

The flame consuming and the smoking
heart
Have place in thy shining advocacy

Thou, who art termless only in degree
More than the lightnings that of thee suspire, 10
Over the lilies and the working grain
And the rumor epoch of the brain,
Shalt pass with the arrogant caste of fire—
One in the orders of eternity

3

O lovely Light, look on thy ray perverse<sup>t</sup>
That makes a puny transit of the night
The generations of the suns traverse
What star shall be its period of flight?
On what horizon shall the light constrain,
To move, in thy design, in shining order
With docile bodies of the fire, this vain
Brief ray addict to rapine and to murder?

Is there no peace, but heritage of wars, Here, where we drive to impact on the dark, 10
For us, thy progeny, of the fire born
To weave our broken rhythms in the stars—
Is there no rest for this infuriate spark
And the blood singing to the ancient horn?

7

O Light, forsake not thy adoring hills,
Belovèd of the mornings, earliest To stretch from out the longing of her breast
In flight forever theeward Earth fulfills
Her pact with thee, let not the void engulf
This goodly loam Though its contentious brood
Die in some final dissonance, each self Hath fumbled toward thee in his solitude Though none be left, some spring when lilacs close,
Petitioning in fragrance, incomplete, 10
Earth shall attend thee, as in first of days,
In some new Eden with the loam at heat,
Bring forth new eyes to widen on a rose That could not bear its beauty without praise

8

For thee, the lion and the burning dove,
Earth wears the rose of morning on her brow
With the old iridescent luster Now

The prostrate horizons toward thee move.
Thy rays attach to each pale tranced sense,
In bond to shining, until flowers of pain
Of thee begot, grow in all innocence
Through this intrepid dust to light again.

O fount of mornings, functioning through
time
In dateless ardors, this—before the sea 10
Conceived or rock delivered without cry—
Was in the covenant The awkward slime
Miscarried a long age till in the first eye
The light streamed upward to identity.

9

Is not this April of our brief desire
That stirs the robins to a twittering
But waste vibration of some vaster spring
Which moves the void to utterance This fire
Once babbled on our hills (that have forgot Their fiery accents) when the earth was cleft
And flooding in her canyons, raging hot,
Ere this intricate, fair design was left

Long, long before strange creatures overhead
Cast wheeling shadows on the desert, wings Flamed from out the mountains, radiant things, 11
That stood erect upon each blazing rim
Of horned horizons, shone like seraphim
And shook the earth with their enormous tread

13

To leap and having leapt touch privacy
Of light and reel back from its edge and fall,
This is to be more humbled than a wall
Detowered and left bare before the high-Browed mornings without loophole Thus the quest
Ends and is begun, the new blood flowing
To lift the sagging spirit in the breast
But that which shed upon the dark of knowing

A lucent beam has sped on, as a ray
Of sunlight when the leaf is shorn away 10
That gave it pattern, to be resolved and soar
Where no clipt vision may identify,
Nor fledgling hand assemble any more
Its lambent dust in form before the eye.

I SHALL NOT CARE

WHEN I am dead and over me bright
 April
Shakes out her rain-drenched
hair,
 Tho' you should lean above me broken-hearted,
 I shall not care

I shall have peace, as leafy trees are peaceful
When rain bends down the bough,
 And I shall be more silent and cold-hearted
 Than you are now

THE ANSWER

WHEN I go back to earth
 And all my joyous body
 Puts off the red and white
 That once had been so proud,
 If men should pass above
 With false and feeble pity,
 My dust will find a voice
 To answer them aloud

'Be still, I am content,
 Take back your poor compassion, 10
 Joy was a flame in me
 Too steady to destroy,
 Lithe as a bending reed
 Loving the storm that sways her—
 I found more joy in sorrow
 Than you could find in joy'

MORNING

I WENT out on an April morning
 All alone, for my heart was high,
 I was a child of the shining meadow,
 I was a sister of the sky

There in the windy flood of morning
 Longing lifted its weight from me,
 Lost as a sob in the midst of cheering,
 Swept as a sea-bird out to sea

I REMEMBERED

THERE never was a mood of mine,
 Gay or heart-broken, luminous or dull,
But you could ease me of its fever
 And give it back to me more beautiful.

In many another soul I broke the bread,
 And drank the wine and played the happy guest,
 But I was lonely, I remembered you,
 The heart belongs to him who knew it best

'LET IT BE FORGOTTEN'

LET it be forgotten, as a flower is forgotten,
 Forgotten as a fire that once was singing
 gold,
 Let it be forgotten for ever and ever,
 Time is a kind friend, he will make us old.

If anyone asks, say it was forgotten
 Long and long ago,
 As a flower, as a fire, as a hushed footfall
 In a long forgotten snow.

ARCTURUS IN AUTUMN

WHEN, in the gold October dusk, I saw you
 near to setting,
 Arcturus, bringer of spring,
 Lord of the summer nights, leaving us now
 in autumn,
 Having no pity on our withering,

Oh then I knew at last that my own autumn was upon me,
 I felt it in my blood, Restless as dwindling streams that still remember
 The music of their flood.

There in the thickening dark a wind-bent tree above me
 Loosed its last leaves in flight— 10
 I saw you sink and vanish, pitiless Arcturus,
 You will not stay to share our lengthening
 night

GRENSTONE RIVER

THINGS you heard that blessed be
You shall tell to men like me.

What you heard my lover say
In the golden yesterday,
Leaving me a childish heart,
Glad to revel, quick to start.

And though she awhile is gone
And I come today alone,
'Tis the self-same whisper slips
Through your ripple from her lips 10

Long shall she and I be dead,
While you whisper what she said,
You, when I no word can give her,
Shall forever whisper, river

Things you heard that blessed be,
Telling them to men like me 1905 1907

GRIEVE NOT FOR BEAUTY

GRIEVE not for the invisible transported brow
On which like leaves the dark hair grew,
Nor for the lips of laughter that are now
Laughing inaudibly in sun and dew,
Nor for the limbs that, fallen low
And seeming faint and slow,
Shall alter and renew
Their shape and hue
Like birches white before the moon
Or a young apple-tree 10
In spring or the round sea
And shall pursue
More ways of swiftness than the swallow dips
Among . . . and find more winds than ever blew
The straining sails of unimpeded ships!

A TENT SONG

TILL we watch the last low star,
Let us love and let us take
Of each other all we are

On some morning with that star
One of us shall lie awake,
Lonely for the other's sake

1910 1917

PASSING NEAR

I HAD not till today been sure,
But now I know
Dead men and women come and go
Under the pure
Sequestering snow

And under the autumnal fern
And carmine bush,
Under the shadow of a thrush,
They move and learn,
And in the rush 10

Of all the mountain-brooks that wake
With upward fling,
To brush and break the loosening cling
Of ice, they shake
The air with spring!

I had not till today been sure,
But now I know
Dead youths and maidens come and go Beneath the lure
And undertow 20

Of cities, under every street
Of empty stress,
Or heart of an adulteress—
Each loud retreat
Of lovelessness

For only by the stir we make
In passing near
Are we confused and cannot hear
The ways they take Certain and clear 30

Today I happened in a place
Where all around
Was silence, until, underground,
I heard a pace,
A happy sound—

And people there, whom I could see,
Tenderly smiled,

While under a wood of silent wild Antiquity
Wandered a child,

40

Leading his mother by the hand,
Happy and slow,
Teaching his mother where to go
Under the snow
Not even now I understand
I only know

CHINESE magicians had conjured their
chance,
And they hunted, with their hooded birds
of glee,
The heat that rises from the summer-grass
And shakes against the sea
And when they had caught a wide expanse
In nets of careful wizardry,
They coloured it like molten glass
For roofs, imperially,
With blue from a cavern, green from a morass
And yellow from weeds in the heart of the
sea, 10
And they laid long rows on the dwellings of romance
In perfect alchemy—
And before they ascended like a peal of brass,
They and their tiptoeing hawks of glee
Had topped all China with a roof that slants
And shakes against the sea

Said the young men to the old men,

Said the young men to the old men,

(COCHITI)

You may never see rain, unless you see
A dance for rain at Cochiti,
Never hear thunder in the air
Unless you hear the thunder there,
Nor know the lightning in the sky
If there's no pole to know it by
They dipped the pole just as I came,
And I can never be the same
Since those feathers gave my brow
The touch of wind that's on it now, 10
Bringing over the arid lands
Butterfly gestures from Hopi hands
And holding me, till earth shall fail,
As close to earth as a fox's tail
I saw them, naked, dance in line
Before the candles of a leafy shrine:
Before a saint in a Christian dress
I saw them dance their holiness,
I saw them reminding him all day long
That death is weak and life is strong 20
And urging the fertile earth to yield Seed from the loam and seed from the field.
A feather in the hair and a shell at the throat
Were lifting and falling with every note
Of the chorus-voices and the drum,
Calling for the rain to come
A fox on the back, and shaken on the thigh
Rain-cloth woven from the sky,
And under the knee a turtle-rattle Clacking with the toes of sheep and cattle— 30

These were the men, their bodies painted Earthen, with a white rain slanted,
These were the men, a windy line,
Their elbows green with a growth of pine.
And in among them, close and slow,
Women moved, the way things grow,

<sup>1</sup> 'Cochiti is a village of Pueblo Indians, whose inhabitants perform each summer rituals which we call dances but which are actually stylized religious ceremonies or prayer dances for rain. It is one of these which I have recorded in my poem, and the events recorded actually happened the sudden coming of so much rain in the midst of the dance that it formed a lake in the village plaza, into which the koshares, or delight makers—dancers representing the spirits of the dead who return to encourage and inspire the living—plunged and rolled with frenzied acknowledgment to the gods. Although nominally Catholic, our Indians have been permitted to amalgamate the elements of their old religion with the new, and the old religion would seem, despite their tolerant acceptance of the new, to be far the closer to their marrow.' Author's note

With a mesa-tablet on the head
 And a little grassy creeping tread
 And with sprays of pine moved back and forth,
 While the dance of the men blew from the north,
 Blew from the south and east and west
 Over the field and over the breast
 And the heart was beating in the drum,
 Beating for the rain to come Dead men out of earlier lives,
 Leaving their graves, leaving their wives,
 Were partly flesh and partly clay,
 And their heads were corn that was dry and gray
 They were ghosts of men and once again
 They were dancing like a ghost of rain,
 For the spirits of men, the more they eat,
 Have happier hands and lighter feet,
 And the better they dance the better they know How to make corn and children grow
 And so in Cochiti that day,
 They slowly put the sun away
 And they made a cloud and they made it break
 And they made it rain for the children's sake
 And they never stopped the song or the drum

Pounding for the rain to come
 The rain made many suns to shine,
 Golden bodies in a line
 With leaping feather and swaying pine
 And the brighter the bodies, the brighter the rain
 Where thunder heaped it on the plain.
 Arroyos had been empty, dry,
 But now were running with the sky,
 And the dancers' feet were in a lake,
 Dancing for the people's sake
 And the hands of a ghost had made a cup
 For scooping handfuls of water up,
 And he poured it into a ghostly throat,
 And he leaped and waved with every note
 Of the dancers' feet and the songs of the drum
 That had called the rain and made it come
 For this was not a god of wood,
 This was a god whose touch was good,
 You could lie down in him and roll
 And wet your body and wet your soul,
 For this was not a god in a book,
 This was a god that you tasted and took Into a cup that you made with your hands,
 Into your children and into your lands—
 This was a god that you could see,
 Rain, rain, in Cochiti!

1885-1928

FROM MR. HODGE AND MR. HAZARD

SEPULCHRAL MOTH<sup>1</sup>

Mr Hazard's liveliness had fled away in spectral laughter long before he had cracked a single walnut for the children or refused a single glass of Mr. Hartleigh's port. Annamaria might have forgiven him for not drinking his soup, for then he was talking rather wittily about 'Yarrow Revisited,' but it was impossible to forgive him for not eating his dessert, for then he was silent and listless while Hartleigh chattered about reform. Mr Hazard seemed to have lost his appetite for politics together with his appetite for almonds and raisins. His elegance had fled from him, but it was a graveyard elegance little to Annamaria's florid taste. 'A moth of which a coffin might have been the chrysalis', someone had written that from Venice in a letter to Mr. Peacock. Perhaps the writer had been thinking of gondolas, but to Annamaria's mind the words fitted Mr. Hazard like a long black cloak.

'Bitter,' said Annamaria to herself regretfully, 'bitter as gall.' And I can remember him when he was the most affectionate, open-hearted boy in the world, with such pretty manners too, and so grateful for the little kindnesses we were able to show him when we lived in the Vale of Heath.

'Hazard,' said Mr. Hartleigh, 'my friend, I think you ought to go

Spain; the climate of England does not suit you at all. It never did, my dear fellow.'

Mr. Hazard glanced at Mr. Hartleigh with a quick suspicion that he was being impertinent. An affectionate, open-hearted boy would never have harboured this suspicion for an instant, but perhaps while Mr. Hazard's hair had been changing from bronze into silver, the virgin gold of his heart had been mixed with a sad alloy. If a heart is open, iron may very easily enter it, to alter the first purity of its metal.

But even the new Mr. Hazard, whose heart was sealed and seared with fire, could not long suspect Mr. Hartleigh of impertinence. The looming eyes were shabby brown velvet like a pair of bat's-wings. They were too soft for Mr. Hazard's irritable taste, too kind by half, he called them to himself, yet not so kind as Mr. Hartleigh. Mr. Hazard answered him politely, but his voice was a plucked fiddle-string of impatience.

'I cannot go back to Spain,' said Mr. Hazard, 'until I have seen certain people whom I hope to meet in England.'

Both Annamaria and Mr. Hartleigh jumped to the comfortable conclusion that he meant his father and sisters, and even possibly his daughter. His other daughter was dead, of course, dead long since, in a vanished September, and the eldest boy, the one whom his father had taken, was dead of a decline these seven years. The second boy, he who had been so dear to Mr. Hazard, had lain quietly in his grave for so long that only Mr. Hazard remembered that he would have been seventeen years old had he lived. So, since his wife and Lionel were in San Sebastian, and since he had already seen Mr. Piggott and Mr. Bird, Annamaria and Hartleigh fell back on the soft cushioned thought that Mr. Hazard must mean his father, and thence were lulled to a dream of reconciliation and filial joy.

In spite of the sound but inexpensive port now warming their vitals, their hearts would have withered in their bosoms with pure horror had they suspected the truth. Mr. Hazard had no hope of meeting his father, even the most broadminded of fathers. It was precisely these same children whom Mr. Hazard so improbably hoped to meet before leaving England.

Not all the port and brandy in Annamaria's best cut-glass decanters could have removed the chill from their hearts could they have seen this hope within the secret mind of Mr. Hazard. But, even supposing that his mind had suddenly become transparent to their eyes, they would certainly have been so dazzled and amazed that this flying hope must have escaped them. Against the interwoven and concentric circles of his thought, against the colours of fire and crystal which informed its moons and stars, they would surely in their amazement have mistaken this hope for a darting bird or a dead leaf. It must have escaped them, even as it escaped them now in Mr. Hazard's few and casual words.

Deliberately he veiled his eyes against their wonder, he did not speak again for several long minutes. Annamaria was annoyed; she had taken a great deal of pains with the dinner, and had gone to the trouble of making the trifle herself. Mr. Hazard had eaten nothing to speak of, but that was no reason why he should not speak at all. He might have spoken about politics or literature, or the green April leaves waving like seaweed in the pool of the evening sky.

'Then you had better have a month in the country,' said Mr. Hartleigh, he said it as he might have said 'Then you had better have some hot whisky and water,' and indeed he thought of the country as a medicinal tonic rather than a spring of natural delight, for he was a true Cockney.

'I shall need a month, or even two months,' said Mr. Hazard carelessly, he did not trouble to conceal his secret plan, for he knew that the influenza had done it for him. No one could possibly suspect Mr. Hazard of going to the country to chase wild geese or ghostly swans while he remained so excessively thin. To anyone with an ounce of common sense it must appear that Mr. Hazard was going to the country to eat butter and eggs, or new green peas and ducklings.

'The seaside, I suppose?' asked Annamaria, with kindly interest. 'You wouldn't like Brighton?'

'No,' said Mr. Hazard; the exquisite finality of the word was like a soundless charge of gunpowder to demolish the sea-front and lay the pavilion in ruins.

'The true pastoral country will be your best restorative,' said Mr Hartleigh. 'The valleys and the verdant hills, the apple blossoms and the lilacs' Mr. Hartleigh saw no reason why a medicinal tonic should not be flavoured with honey and the extracted juice of flowers

'Doubtless,' said Mr Hazard, courtesy drove him to a dissyllable, but he would have preferred a shorter word, or, better still, to be silent. It was too much trouble to unravel the spliced ends of the nerves which bound his body to his brain, but he was either very much bored or very much wearied by the Hartleighs' conversation. Already his laziness was cracking almonds instead of walnuts for the children, and now he began to make a neat and idle list of words of one syllable which might be employed in decent society 'Yes', 'no', 'quite'; 'ah', 'oh', 'still' (this might be cleverly prolonged), 'well' (the same rule applied), 'thanks' (that was slightly vulgar), 'so' (that was Germanic), 'good' (excellent), 'but' (French and affected, a shrug was implicit) Really, reflected Mr Hazard above the litter of papery almond shells upon his plate, it was disgraceful, his native tongue's poverty in those polite monosyllables which may save the weariest breath to cool the bitterest porridge.

The room was a cube of hot bright air, moored fast among the thinner airs of twilight. It did not float, as the trees' branches floated and waved visibly in the green element above them, a sky like a lake reversed, grained and patterned like the surface of water, crossed by cool streams of radiance from the west. The room lay heavy and immovable like a drowned hulk at the bottom of this pool of ether, it did not hang suspended like the tree-tops, it was hopelessly weighed down by the soft imponderable air. It lay like a sunken ship, solid, painted with shining phosphorescence. The evening, so light over the tree-tops, was heavy enough to press upon the room, to crush its thick bright atmosphere closer and closer upon Mr Hazard's mind. The flame of the lamp and the more gaseous flame of the fire, the dust spangling the bars of brightness with innumerable golden motes, these were emanations too difficult to breathe, too hot and dense for the delicate rhythm of breathing. Mr. Hazard thought how pleasant it would be if only he might be allowed to lift the black marble clock from the mantelpiece and hurl it through the shut window. The glittering splinters of glass would be neither so thin nor so sharp as the April air rushing in through the broken pane. Of course even to open the window in the old-fashioned way would be better than nothing, but Annamaria would be sure to shut it again. She would remind Mr. Hazard that he ought to be careful, she would pull the shawl about her shoulders and talk about toothache.

'I'll write to you, Hartleigh,' said Mr Hazard. 'I'll send you an address when I write. Annamaria, I do not know how to thank you for your kindness . . .'

BEAUTY

SAY not of Beauty she is good,
Or aught but beautiful,
Or sleek to doves' wings of the wood
Her wild wings of a gull

Call her not wicked, that word's touch
Consumes her like a curse,
But love her not too much, too much,
For that is even worse

O, she is neither good nor bad,
But innocent and wild!
Enshrine her and she dies, who had
The hard heart of a child

THE EAGLE AND THE MOLE

AVOID the reeking herd,
Shun the polluted flock,
Live like that stork bird,
The eagle of the rock

The huddled warmth of crowds
Begets and fosters hate,
He keeps, above the clouds,
His cliff inviolate

When flocks are folded warm,
And herds to shelter run,
He sails above the storm,
He stares into the sun.

10

If in the eagle's track
Your sinews cannot leap,
Avoid the lathered pack,
Turn from the steaming sheep

If you would keep your soul
From spotted sight or sound,
Live like the velvet mole,
Go burrow underground. 20

And there hold intercourse
With roots of trees and stones,
With rivers at their source,
And disembodied bones 1921

WILD PEACHES

I

WHEN the world turns completely upside
down
You say we'll emigrate to the Eastern Shore
Aboard a river-boat from Baltimore, We'll live among wild peach trees, miles from town,
You'll wear a coonskin cap, and I a gown
Homespun, dyed butternut's dark gold colour
Lost, like your lotus-eating ancestor,
We'll swim in milk and honey till we drown

The winter will be short, the summer long,
The autumn amber-hued, sunny and hot,
Tasting of cider and of scuppernong, 11
All seasons sweet, but autumn best of all
The squirrels in their silver fur will fall Like falling leaves, like fruit, before your shot

2

The autumn frosts will lie upon the grass Like bloom on grapes of purple-brown and gold
The misted early mornings will be cold,
The little puddles will be roofed with glass
The sun, which burns from copper into brass,
Melts these at noon, and makes the boys unfold 20
Their knitted mufflers, full as they can hold,
Fat pockets dribble chestnuts as they pass Peaches grow wild, and pigs can live in clover.

A barrel of salted herrings lasts a year,
The spring begins before the winter's over

By February you may find the skins
Of garter snakes and water moccasins Dwindled and harsh, dead-white and cloudy-clear

3

When April pours the colours of a shell
Upon the hills, when every little creek 30
Is shot with silver from the Chesapeake
In shoals new-minted by the ocean swell, When strawberries go begging, and the sleek
Blue plums lie open to the blackbird's beak,
We shall live well—we shall live very well.

The months between the cherries and the peaches
Are brimming cornucopias which spill Fruits red and purple, sombre-bloomed and black,
Then, down rich fields and frosty river beaches
We'll trample bright persimmons, while you kill 40
Bronze partridge, speckled quail, and canvasback

4

Down to the Puritan marrow of my bones There's something in this richness that I hate
I love the look, austere, immaculate,
Of landscapes drawn in pearly monotones.
There's something in my very blood that owns
Bare hills, cold silver on a sky of slate,
A thread of water, churned to milky spate Streaming through slanted pastures fenced with stones

I love those skies, thin blue or snowy
gray,
Those fields sparse-planted, rendering meagre sheaves, 51
That spring, briefer than apple-blossom's
breath,
Summer, so much too beautiful to stay,
Swift autumn, like a bonfire of leaves,
And sleepy winter, like the sleep of death.

ESCAPE

WHEN foxes eat the last gold grape,
And the last white antelope is killed,
I shall stop fighting and escape
Into a little house I'll build.

But first I'll shrink to fairy size,
With a whisper no one understands,
Making blind moons of all your eyes,
And muddy roads of all your hands.

And you may grope for me in vain
In hollows under the mangrove root,
Or where, in apple-scented rain, 11
The silver wasp-nests hang like fruit 1921

VELVET SHOES

LET us walk in the white snow
In a soundless space,
With footsteps quiet and slow,
At a tranquil pace,
Under veils of white lace.

I shall go shod in silk,
And you in wool,
White as a white cow's milk,
More beautiful
Than the breast of a gull. 10

We shall walk through the still town
In a windless peace,
We shall step upon white down,
Upon silver fleece,
Upon softer than these

We shall walk in velvet shoes.
Wherever we go
Silence will fall like dews
On white silence below
We shall walk in the snow 20 1921

LET NO CHARITABLE HOPE

Now let no charitable hope
Confuse my mind with images
Of eagle and of antelope
I am in nature none of these.

I was, being human, born alone,
I am, being woman, hard beset;
I live by squeezing from a stone
The little nourishment I get.

In masks outrageous and austere
The years go by in single file; 10
But none has merited my fear,
And none has quite escaped my smile.
1923

ON A SINGING GIRL <sup>1</sup>

MUSA of the sea-blue eyes,
Silver nightingale, alone
In a little coffin lies
A stone beneath a stone

She, whose song we loved the best,
Is voiceless in a sudden night
On your light limbs, O loveliest,
May the dust be light!
1923

CONFESSION OF FAITH

I LACK the braver mind
That dares to find
The lover friend, and kind.

I fear him to the bone,
I lie alone
By the beloved one,

And, breathless for suspense,
Erect defense
Against love's violence

Whose silences portend 10
A bloody end
For lover never friend

But, in default of faith,
In futile breath,
I dream no ill of Death.

TRUE VINE

THERE is a serpent in perfection tarnished,
The thin shell pierced, the purity grown fainter,

<sup>1</sup> This is paraphrase of Mackail's translation of an epitaph (CJG, 6261), of the same title, from the Greek Anthology. The translation 'Blue-eyed Musa, the sweet-voiced nightingale, suddenly this little grave holds voiceless, and she lies like a stone who was so accomplished and so famous, fair Musa be this dust light over thee' Mackail, Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology (London, 1906), 164

The virgin silver shield no longer burnished,
 The pearly fruit with ruin for its centre.

The thing that sits expectant in our bosoms Contriving heaven out of very little Demands such delicate immaculate blossoms
 As no malicious verity makes brittle.

This wild fastidious hope is quick to languish,
 Its smooth diaphanous escape is swifter 10
 Than the pack of truth, no mortal can distinguish
 Its trace upon the durable hereafter.

Not so the obdurate and savage lovely Whose roots are set profoundly upon trouble,
 This flower grows so fiercely and so bravely
 It does not even know that it is noble

This is the vine to love, whose balsams flourish
 Upon a living soil corrupt and faulty, Whose leaves have drunk the skies, and stooped to nourish
 The earth again with honey sweet and salty 20

PETER AND JOHN

TWELVE good friends
 Walked under the leaves, Binding the ends
 Of the barley sheaves.

Peter and John
 Lay down to sleep
 Pillowed upon
 A haymaker's heap

John and Peter
 Lay down to dream. 10
 The air was sweeter
 Than honey and cream.

Peter was bred
 In the salty cold:
 His hair was red
 And his eyes were gold.

John had a mouth
 Like a wing bent down:

His brow was smooth
 And his eyes were brown 20

Peter to slumber
 Sank like a stone,
 Of all their number
 The bravest one.

John more slowly
 Composed himself, Young and holy
 Among the Twelve.

John as he slept
 Cried out in grief, 30
 Turned and wept
 On the golden leaf.

'Peter, Peter,
 Stretch me your hand
 Across the glitter
 Of the harvest land!

'Peter, Peter,
 Give me a sign!
 This was a bitter
 Dream of mine— 40

'Bitter as aloes
 It parched my tongue.
 Upon the gallows
 My life was hung.

'Sharp it seemed
 As a bloody sword.
 Peter, I dreamed
 I was Christ the Lord!

Peter turned To holy Saint John: 50
 His body burned
 In the falling sun.

In the falling sun
 He burned like flame:
 'John, Saint John,
 I have dreamed the same!

'My bones were hung
 On an elder tree,
 Bells were rung
 Over Galilee. 60

'A silver penny
 Sealed each of my eyes.

Many and many
A cock crew thrice.'

When Peter's word
Was spoken and done,
'Were you Christ the Lord
In your dream?' said John.

'No,' said the other,
'That I was not.
I was our brother
Iscaiot.'

ADDRESS TO MY SOUL

My soul, be not disturbed
By planetary war,
Remain securely orb'd
In this contracted star

Fear not, pathetic flame,
Your sustenance is doubt Glass'd in translucent dream
They cannot snuff you out

Wear water, or a mask
Of unapparent cloud,
Be brave and never ask
A more defunctive shroud.

The universal points
Are shrunk into a flower;
Between its delicate joints
Chaos keeps no power.

The pure integral form,
Austere and silver-dark,
Is balanced on the storm
In its predestined arc

Small as a sphere of rain
It slides along the groove Whose path is furrow'd plain Among the suns that move.

The shapes of April buds
Outlive the phantom year
Upon the void at odds
The dewdrop falls severe.

Five-petalled flame, be cold:
Be firm, dissolving star
Accept the stricter mould
That makes you singular.

ONE PERSON

Although these words are false, none shall prevail

*To prove them in translation less than true
Or overthrow their dignity, or undo
The faith implicit in a fabulous tale;
The ashes of this error shall exhale
Essential verity, and two by two Lovers devout and loyal shall renew
The legend, and refuse to let it fail
Even the betrayer and the fond deceived,
Having put off the body of this death,
Shall testify with one remaining breath,
From sepulchres demand to be believed
These words are true, although at intervals
The unfaithful clay contrive to make them false*

I

Now shall the long homesickness have an end

Upon your heart, which is a part of all
The past no human creature may recall
Save you, who are persuasive to unbend
The brows of death, and name him for a friend

This ecstasy is supernatural,
I have survived to see the heavens fall Into my hands, which on your hands depend

Time has prepared us an enduring bed
Within the earth of this beloved land,
And, lying side by side and hand in hand,
We sleep coeval with the happy dead
Who are ourselves, a little earlier bound
To one another's bosom in the ground

2

What other name had half expressed the whole

Of that incomparable and touching grace Which spells the shape of danger in your face?

It is the very pattern of your soul;
The eagle's home, above the moon's control,

Above the seas, the high precipitate place,
The stairway cut from planetary space,
The crystal steps which climb a steeper goal

The shadow of its light is only this
That all your beauty is the work of wars

Between the upper and the nether stars;
 Its symmetry is perfect and severe 40
 Because the barbarous force of agonies
 Broke it, and mended it, and made it clear.

3

'Children and dogs are subject to my power,'
 You said, and smiled, and I beside you
 smiled,
 Perceiving my unwisdom of a child,
 My courage of a wolf new-taught to cower.
 Upon the grass, beneath the falling flower,
 I saw my spirit silent and beguiled
 Standing at gaze, a brute no longer wild,
 An infant wearied by the difficult hour. 50

And am I not your child who has come home?
 And am I not your hound for faithfulness?
 Put forth your hand, put forth your hand to bless
 A creature stricken timorous and dumb,
 Who now regards you with a lover's eyes
 And knows that you are merciful and wise.

4

Now am I Orson to your Valentine
 Forever, and I choose it shall be so,
 For how should the uncivil brier grow
 Germane in nature to the noble vine? 60
 The savage should be servant to the fine,
 The falcon fly superior to the crow,
 O dear my lord, believe me that I know How far your virtues have outnumbered
 mine

And you have levied final tribute now—
 Your chivalry demanding the pretence—
 You have constrained your vassal to avow
 That we are equals, lest a violence
 Be suffered by our love, and so I must Deny the intrinsic difference in our dust. 70

5

The little beauty that I was allowed—
 The lips new-cut and coloured by my sire,
 The polished hair, the eyes' perceptive
 fire—
 Has never been enough to make me proud:
 For I have moved companioned by a cloud,
 And lived indifferent to the blood's desire
 Of temporal loveliness in vain attire.
 My flesh was but a fresh-embroidered shroud

Now do I grow indignant at the fate
 Which made me so imperfect to compare 80
 With your degree of noble and of fair,
 Our elements are the farthest skies apart,
 And I enjoin you, ere it is too late,
 To stamp your superscription on my heart.

6

I have believed that I prefer to live
 Preoccupied by a Platonic mind;
 I have believed me obdurate and blind
 To those sharp ecstasies the pulses give.
 The clever body five times sensitive
 I never have discovered to be kind 90
 As the poor soul, deceived and half-divined,
 Whose hopes are water in a witch's sieve.

O now both soul and body are unfit
 To apprehend this miracle, my lord!
 Not all my senses, striving in accord
 With my pure essence, are aware of it
 Save as a power remote and exquisite,
 Not seen or known, but fervently adored

7

Would I might make subliminal my flesh
 And so contrive a gentle atmosphere 100
 To comfort you because I am not there,
 Or else incorporate and carve afresh
 A lady, from the chilly heaven and clear
 Which flows around you like a stream of air,
 To warm and wind you in her body's mesh.

So would I cherish you a loving twice,
 Once in a mist made matter, once again
 In my true substance made ethereal:
 And yet I cannot succour you at all Whose letter cries, 'My hands are cold as ice,' 110
 The while I kiss the colder air in vain.

8

O love, how utterly am I bereaved
 By Time, who sucks the honey of our
 days,
 Sets sickle to our Aprils, and betrays
 To killing winter all the sun achieved!
 Our parted spirits are perplexed and grieved Severed by cold, and change that never stays,
 And what the clock, and what the season says
 Is rumour neither valued nor believed.

Thus absence chills us to apparent death 120
 And withers up our virtue, but together
 We grow beyond vagaries of the weather
 And make a summer of our mingled breath
 Wherein we flourish, and forget to know
 We must lie murdered by predestined snow.

9

A subtle spirit has my path attended,
 In likeness not a lion but a pard,
 And when the arrows flew like hail, and hard,
 He licked my wounds, and all my wounds were mended, 129
 And happy I, who walked so well-defended,
 With that translucent presence for a guard,
 Under a sky reversed and evil-starred,
 A woman by an archangel befriended.

Now must I end the knightly servitude Which made him my preserver, and renounce
 That heavenly aid forever and at once,
 For it were neither courteous nor good
 If we, who are but perishable things, Should hang another weight between his wings.

10

When I perceive the sable of your hair 140
 Silvered, and deep within those caverns are Your eyesockets, a double-imaged star,
 And your fine substance fretted down by
 care,

Then do I marvel that a woman dare
 Prattle of mortal matters near and far
 To one so wounded in demonic war Against some prince of Sirius or Altair.

How is it possible that this hand of clay, Though white as porcelain, can contrive a touch

So delicate it shall not hurt too much? 150
 What voice can my invention find to say
 So soft, precise, and scrupulous a word
 You shall not take it for another sword?

11

'Before I die, let me be happy here.'
 The glass of heaven was split, and by that token
 I knew the bubble of my heart had broken;
 The cool and chaste, the iridescent sphere,
 Filled, in that vernal season of the year,

With sapling's blood, the beechen and the oaken
 And the green willow's, when the word was spoken 160
 This innocence did faint and disappear.

So have I lost my only wedding dower,
 The veins of spring, enclosed within my
 heart,
 Traced small in silver like a celestial chart,
 And I am vanished in the leaf and flower, Since, at your voice, my body's core and pith
 Dissolves in air, and is destroyed forthwith.

12

In our content, before the autumn came
 To shower fallow droppings on the mould,
 Sometimes you have permitted me to fold Your grief in swaddling-bands, and smile to name 171
 Yourself my infant, with an infant's claim
 To utmost adoration as of old, Suckled with kindness, fondled from the cold,
 And loved beyond philosophy or shame

I dreamt I was the mother of a son
 Who had deserved a manger for a crib, Torn from your body, furbished from your rib,
 I am the daughter of your skeleton,
 Born of your bitter and excessive pain 180
 I shall not dream you are my child again

13

O, mine is Psyche's heavy doom reversed
 Who meet at noon, part by diminished light,
 But never feel the subtle balm of night
 Fall merciful upon a body pierced
 By extreme love, and I considered first
 That you, a god more prodigally bright
 Than the lesser Eros, had enriched my sight, Made your own morning, and the stars immersed

But secondly I saw my soul arise 190
 And, in the hushed obscure, presume to creep
 Tiptoe upon your spirit laid asleep,
 And slant the impious beam across your
 eyes,
 And I believe I have my just deserts Lacking the shadow of peace upon our hearts

14

My fairer body and perfected spirit,
 Beyond metempsychosis, and beyond
 The faults you must forgive me to be fond,
 Are yours in any death that I may merit;
 Mortality has wearied us who wear it, 200
 And they are wiser creatures who have shunned
 This miry world, this slough of man's despond,
 To fortify the skies we shall inherit

I have entreated you to grant me Time
 To memorize the pure appointed task;
 Today it is Eternity I ask
 In which to learn the lesson of this rhyme.
 Its liberal periods are not too wide
 To educate me fitly for your bride

15

My honoured lord, forgive the unruly
     tongue 210
 That utters blasphemies, forgive the brain
 Borne on a whirlwind of unhallowed pain.
 Remember only the intrepid song,
 The flag defended and the gauntlet flung,
 The love that speech can never render plain,
 The mind's resolve to turn and strive
     again,
 The fortitude that has endured so long

My cherished lord, in charity forgive
 A starveling hope that may at times desire To warm its frozen fingers at your fire; 220
 'Tis by such trifles that your lovers live,
 And so rise up, and in the starlight cold
 Frighten the foxes from your loneliest fold

16

I hereby swear that to uphold your house
 I would lay my bones in quick destroying lime
 Or turn my flesh to timber for all time;
 Cut down my womanhood, lop off the boughs
 Of that perpetual ecstasy that grows
 From the heart's core, condemn it as a crime
 If it be broader than a beam, or climb 230
 Above the stature that your roof allows.

I am not the hearthstone nor the cornerstone
 Within this noble fabric you have builded,

Not by my beauty was its cornice gilded;
 Not on my courage were its arches thrown.
 My lord, adjudge my strength, and set me
     where
 I bear a little more than I can bear.

17

Upon your heart, which is the heart of all
 My late discovered earth and early sky,
 Give me the dearest privilege to die, 240
 Your pity for the velvet of my pall,
 Your patience for my grave's inviolate wall;
 And for my passing bell, in passing by,
 Your voice itself, diminished to a sigh
 Above all other sounds made musical.

Meanwhile I swear to you I am content
 To live without a sorrow to my name,
 To live triumphant, and to die the same,
 Upon the fringes of this continent,
 This map of Paradise, this scrap of earth 250
 Whereon you burn like flame upon a hearth.

18

Let us leave talking of angelic hosts
 Of nebulae, and lunar hemispheres,
 And what the days, and what the Uranian years
 Shall offer us when you and I are ghosts,
 Forget the festivals and pentecosts
 Of metaphysics, and the lesser fears Confound us, and seal up our eyes and ears
 Like little rivers locked below the frosts.

And let us creep into the smallest room 260
 That any hunted exile has desired
 For him and for his love when he was tired,
 And sleep oblivious of any doom
 Which is beyond our reason to conceive,
 And so forget to weep, forget to grieve,
 And wake, and touch each other's hands,
     and turn
 Upon a bed of juniper and fern.

O VIRTUOUS LIGHT

A PRIVATE madness has prevailed
 Over the pure and valiant mind;
 The instrument of reason failed
 And the star-gazing eyes struck blind.

Sudden excess of light has wrought Confusion in the secret place

Where the slow miracles of thought
Take shape through patience into grace.

Mysterious as steel and flint
The birth of this destructive spark 10
Whose inward growth has power to print
Strange suns upon the natural dark

O break the walls of sense in half
And make the spirit fugitive!
This light begotten of itself
Is not a light by which to live!

The fire of farthing tallow dips
Dispels the menace of the skies
So it illuminate the lips
And enter the discerning eyes 20

O virtuous light, if thou be man's
Or matter of the meteor stone,
Prevail against this radiance
Which is engendered of its own!

HYMN TO EARTH

FAREWELL, incomparable element, Whence man arose, where he shall not return,
And hail, imperfect urn
Of his last ashes, and his firstborn fruit;
Farewell, the long pursuit,
And all the adventures of his discontent,
The voyages which sent
His heart averse from home
Metal of clay, permit him that he come
To thy slow-burning fire as to a hearth, 10
Accept him as a particle of earth

Fire, being divided from the other three,
It lives removed, or secret at the core,
Most subtle of the four,
When air flies not, nor water flows,
It disembodied goes,
Being light, elixir of the first decree,
More volatile than he,
With strength and power to pass Through space, where never his least atom was 20

He has no part in it, save as his eyes
Have drawn its emanation from the skies.

A wingless creature heavier than air,
He is rejected of its quintessence,
Coming and going hence,

In the twin minutes of his birth and death,
He may inhale as breath,
As breath relinquish heaven's atmosphere,
Yet in it have no share,
Nor can survive therein 30 Where its outer edge is filtered pure and thin.
It doth but lend its crystal to his lungs
For his early crying, and his final songs.

The element of water has denied
Its child, it is no more his element,
It never will relent,
Its silver harvests are more sparsely given
Than the rewards of heaven,
And he shall drink cold comfort at its side
The water is too wide 40
The seamew and the gull Feather a nest made soft and pitiful Upon its foam, he has not any part
In the long swell of sorrow at its heart.

Hail and farewell, beloved element,
Whence he departed, and his parent once,
See where thy spirit runs Which for so long hath had the moon to wife,
Shall this support his life
Until the arches of the waves be bent 50
And grow shallow and spent?
Wisely it cast him forth
With his dead weight of burdens nothing worth,
Leaving him, for the universal years,
A little seawater to make his tears

Hail, element of earth, receive thy own,
And cherish, at thy charitable breast,
This man, this mongrel beast
He ploughs the sand, and, at his hardest need,
He sows himself for seed, 60
He ploughs the furrow, and in this lies
down
Before the corn is grown,
Between the apple bloom
And the ripe apple is sufficient room
In time, and matter, to consume his love
And make him parcel of a cypress grove.

Receive him as thy lover for an hour
Who will not weary, by a longer stay,
The kind embrace of clay,
Even within thine arms he is dispersed 70
To nothing, as at first;

The air flings downward from its fourquartered tower
 Him whom the flames devour,
 At the full tide, at the flood,
 The sea is mingled with his salty blood.
 The traveller dust, although the dust be vile,
 Sleeps as thy lover for a little while.

THIS CORRUPTIBLE

THE Body, long oppressed
 And pierced, then prayed for rest (Being but apprentice to the other Powers),
 And kneeling in that place
 Implored the thrust of grace Which makes the dust lie level with the flowers

Then did that fellowship
 Of three, the Body strip, Beheld his wounds, and none among them mortal,
 The Mind severe and cool, 10
 The Heart still half a fool,
 The fine-spun Soul, a beam of sun can startle

These three, a thousand years
 Had made adventurers
 Amid all villainies the earth can offer,
 Applied them to resolve
 From the universal gulph
 What pangs the poor material flesh may suffer

'This is a pretty pass;
 To hear the growing grass 20 Complain, the clay cry out to be translated,
 Will not this grosser stuff
 Receive reward enough
 If stabled after labouring, and baited?'

Thus spoke the Mind in scorn
 The Heart, which had outworn
 The Body, and was weary of its fashion,
 Preferring to be dressed
 In skin of bird or beast, Replied more softly, in a feigned compassion 30

'Anatomy most strange
 Crying to chop and change;
 Inferior copy of a higher image;
 While I, the noble guest,
 Sick of your second-best Sigh for embroidered archangelic plumage.

'For shame, thou fustian cloak!'
 And then the Spirit spoke,
 Within the void it swung securely tethered
 By strings composed of cloud; 40
 It spoke both low and loud
 Above a storm no lesser star had weathered

'O lodging for the night!
 O house of my delight!
 O lovely hovel builded for my pleasure!
 Dear tenement of clay
 Endure another day
 As coffin sweetly fitted to my measure.

'Take Heart, and call to Mind
 Although we are unkind, 50
 Although we steal your shelter, strength, and clothing,
 'Tis you who shall escape
 In some enchanting shape
 Or be dissolved to elemental nothing.

'You, the unlucky slave,
 Are the lily on the grave,
 The wave that runs above the bones
 a-whitening,
 You are the new-mown grass,
 And the wheaten bread of the Mass,
 And the fabric of the rain, and the lightning. 60

'If one of us elect
 To leave the poor suspect
 Imperfect bosom of the earth our parent,
 And from the world avert
 The Spirit or the Heart
 Upon a further and essential errand,

'His chain he cannot slough
 Nor cast his substance off,
 He bears himself upon his flying shoulder,
 The Heart, infirm and dull; 70
 The Mind, in any skull,
 Are captive still, and wearier and colder.

' 'Tis you who are the ghost,
 Disintegrated, lost,

The burden shed, the dead who need not bear it,
 O grain of God in power,
 Endure another hour!
 It is but for an hour,' said the Spirit.

FAREWELL, SWEET DUST

Now I have lost you, I must scatter
 All of you on the air henceforth,
 Not that to me it can ever matter
 But it's only fair to the rest of earth.

Now especially, when it is winter
 And the sun's not half so bright as he
     was,
 Who wouldn't be glad to find a splinter
 That once was you, in the frozen grass?

Snowflakes, too, will be softer feathered,
 Clouds, perhaps, will be whiter plumed, 10 Rain, whose brilliance you caught and gathered,
 Purer silver have reassumed.

Farewell, sweet dust, I was never a miser
 Once, for a minute, I made you mine

Now you are gone, I am none the wiser But the leaves of the willow are bright as wine

BIRTHDAY SONNET

TAKE home Thy prodigal child, O Lord of Hosts!
 Protect the sacred from the secular danger,
 Advise her, that Thou never needst avenge
     her,
 Marry her mind neither to man's nor ghost's
 Nor holier domination's, if the costs
 Of such commingling should transport or change her,
 Defend her from familiar and stranger
 And earth's and air's contagions and rusts.

Instruct her strictly to preserve Thy gift
 And alter not its grain in atom sort, 10
 Angels may wed her to their ultimate hurt
 And men embrace a spectre in a shift
 So that no drop of the pure spirit fall
 Into the dust defend Thy prodigal

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

1892—

WHEN THE YEAR GROWS OLD

I CANNOT but remember
     When the year grows old—
 October—November—
     How she disliked the cold!

She used to watch the swallows
     Go down across the sky,
 And turn from the window
     With a little sharp sigh.

And often when the brown leaves 10
     Were brittle on the ground,
 And the wind in the chimney
     Made a melancholy sound.

She had a look about her
     That I wish I could forget—
 The look of a scared thing
     Sitting in a net!

Oh, beautiful at nightfall
     The soft spitting snow!
 And beautiful the bare boughs 20
     Rubbing to and fro!

But the roaring of the fire,
     And the warmth of fur,
 And the boiling of the kettle
     Were beautiful to her!

I cannot but remember
     When the year grows old—
 October—November—
     How she disliked the cold!

1917

I SHALL FORGET YOU
PRESENTLY, MY DEAR

I SHALL forget you presently, my dear,
 So make the most of this, your little day,
 Your little month, your little half a year,

Ere I forget, or die, or move away,
 And we are done forever, by and by
 I shall forget you, as I said, but now,
 If you entreat me with your loveliest lie
 I will protest you with my favorite vow.
 I would indeed that love were longer-lived,
 And vows were not so brittle as they are, 10
 But so it is, and nature has contrived
 To struggle on without a break thus far,— Whether or not we find what we are seeking
 Is idle, biologically speaking.

THE POET AND HIS BOOK

Down, you mongrel, Death!
Back into your kennel!
I have stolen breath
In a stalk of fennel!
You shall scratch and you shall whine
Many a night, and you shall worry
Many a bone, before you bury
One sweet bone of mine!

When shall I be dead?
 When my flesh is withered, 10
 And above my head
 Yellow pollen gathered
 All the empty afterpoo?
 When sweet lovers pause and wonder
 Who am I that lie thereunder, Hidden from the moon?

This my personal death?—
 That my lungs be failing To inhale the breath
 Others are exhaling? 20
 This my subtle spirit's end?—
 Ah, when the thawed winter splashes
 Over these chance dust and ashes,
 Weep not me, my friend!

Me, by no means dead
 In that hour, but surely
 When this book, unread,
 Rots to earth obscurely,
 And no more to any breast,
 Close against the clamorous swelling 30
 Of the thing there is no telling,
 Are these pages pressed!

When this book is mould,
 And a book of many Waiting to be sold
 For a casual penny,

In a little open case,
 In a street unclean and cluttered,
 Where a heavy mud is spattered
 From the passing drays, 40

Stranger, pause and look;
 From the dust of ages
 Lift this little book,
 Turn the tattered pages,
 Read me, do not let me die!
 Search the fading letters, finding Steadfast in the broken binding
 All that once was I!

When these veins are weeds,
 When these hollowed sockets 50
 Watch the rooty seeds
 Bursting down like rockets,
 And surmise the spring again,
 Or, remote in that black cupboard,
 Watch the pink worms writhing upward
 At the smell of rain,

Boys and girls that lie
 Whispering in the hedges,
 Do not let me die,
 Mix me with your pledges, 60
 Boys and girls that slowly walk
 In the woods, and weep, and quarrel,
 Staring past the pink wild laurel,
 Mix me with your talk,

Do not let me die!
 Farmers at your raking,
 When the sun is high,
 While the hay is making,
 When, along the stubble strewn,
 Withering on their stalks uneaten, 70
 Strawberries turn dark and sweeten
 In the lapse of noon,

Shepherds on the hills,
 In the pastures, drowsing
 To the tinkling bells
 Of the brown sheep browsing;
 Sailors crying through the storm;
 Scholars at your study, hunters
 Lost amid the whirling winter's Whiteness uniform, 80

Men that long for sleep;
 Men that wake and revel;—
 If an old song leap
 To your senses' level

At such moments, may it be Sometimes, though a moment only,
 Some forgotten, quaint and homely Vehicle of me!

Women at your toil,
 Women at your leisure 90
 Till the kettle boil,
 Snatch of me your pleasure,
 Where the broom-straw marks the leaf,
 Women quiet with your weeping
 Lest you wake a workman sleeping,
 Mix me with your grief!

Boys and girls that steal
 From the shocking laughter
 Of the old, to kneel
 By a dripping rafter 100
 Under the discoloured eaves,
 Out of trunks with hingeless covers Lifting tales of saints and lovers,
 Travelers, goblins, thieves,

Suns that shine by night,
 Mountains made from valleys,— Bear me to the light,
 Flat upon your bellies
 By the webby window lie,
 Where the little flies are crawling,— 110
 Read me, margin me with scrawling,
 Do not let me die!

Sexton, ply your trade!
In a shower of gravel
Stamp upon your spade!
Many a rose shall ravel,
Many a metal wreath shall rust
In the rain, and I go singing
Through the lots where you are flinging
Yellow clay on dust! 120

AND YOU AS WELL MUST DIE, BELOVED DUST

AND you as well must die, beloved dust,
 And all your beauty stand you in no stead;
 This flawless, vital hand, this perfect head,
 This body of flame and steel, before the gust
 Of Death, or under his autumnal frost,
 Shall be as any leaf, be no less dead
 Than the first leaf that fell,—this wonder fled Altered, estranged, disintegrated, lost

Nor shall my love avail you in your hour.
 In spite of all my love, you will arise 10
 Upon that day and wander down the air
 Obscurely as the unattended flower,
 It mattering not how beautiful you were,
 Or how beloved above all else that dies.

1921

LAMENT

LISTEN, children.
 Your father is dead
 From his old coats
 I'll make you little jackets,
 I'll make you little trousers
 From his old pants
 There'll be in his pockets
 Things he used to put there, Keys and pennies
 Covered with tobacco, 10
 Dan shall have the pennies
 To save in his bank,
 Anne shall have the keys
 To make a pretty noise with Life must go on,
 And the dead be forgotten,
 Life must go on,
 Though good men die,
 Anne, eat your breakfast,
 Dan, take your medicine, 20
 Life must go on,
 I forget just why

FROM MEMORIAL TO D. C.

(VASSAR COLLEGE, 1918)

(1921)

Elegy

LET them bury your big eyes
 In the secret earth securely,
 Your thin fingers, and your fair,
 Soft, indefinite-coloured hair,—
 All of these in some way, surely,
 From the secret earth shall rise,
 Not for these I sit and stare,
 Broken and bereft completely,
 Your young flesh that sat so neatly
 On your little bones will sweetly 10
 Blossom in the air

But your voice,—never the rushing
 Of a river underground,

Not the rising of the wind
 In the trees before the rain,
 Not the woodcock's watery call,
 Not the note the white-throat utters,
 Not the feet of children pushing Yellow leaves along the gutters
 In the blue and bitter fall, 20
 Shall content my musing mind
 For the beauty of that sound
 That in no new way at all Ever will be heard again

Sweetly through the sappy stalk
 Of the vigorous weed,
 Holding all it held before,
 Cherished by the faithful sun,
 On and on eternally Shall your altered fluid run, 30
 Bud and bloom and go to seed,
 But your singing days are done;
 But the music of your talk Never shall the chemistry
 Of the secret earth restore
 All your lovely words are spoken.
 Once the ivory box is broken,
 Beats the golden bird no more 1921

PITY ME NOT BECAUSE THE LIGHT OF DAY

PITY me not because the light of day
 At close of day no longer walks the sky,
 Pity me not for beauties passed away
 From field and thicket as the year goes by,
 Pity me not the waning of the moon,
 Nor that the ebbing tide goes out to sea,
 Nor that a man's desire is hushed so soon,
 And you no longer look with love on me.
 This have I known always Love is no more Than the wide blossom which the wind 10 assaults,
 Than the great tide that treads the shifting shore Strewn fresh wreckage gathered in the gales,
 Pity me that the heart is slow to learn
 What the swift mind beholds at every turn. 1923

EUCLID ALONE HAS LOOKED ON BEAUTY BARE

EUCLID alone has looked on Beauty bare.
 I et all who prate of Beauty hold their peace,

And lay them prone upon the earth and cease
 To ponder on themselves, the while they stare
 At nothing, intricately drawn nowhere
 In shapes of shifting lineage, let geese
 Gabble and hiss, but heroes seek release
 From dusty bondage into luminous air.
 O blinding hour, O holy, terrible day,
 When first the shaft into his vision shone 10
 Of light anatomized! Euclid alone Has looked on Beauty bare. Fortunate they Who, though once only and then but far
 away,
 Have heard her massive sandal set on stone. 1923

DIRGE WITHOUT MUSIC

I AM not resigned to the shutting away of loving hearts in the hard ground
 So it is, and so it will be, for so it has been,
 time out of mind
 Into the darkness they go, the wise and the lovely. Crowned With lilies and with laurel they go, but I am not resigned

Lovers and thinkers, into the earth with
 you
 Be one with the dull, the indiscriminate dust.
 A fragment of what you felt, of what you knew,
 A formula, a phrase remains,—but the best is lost.
 The answers quick and keen, the honest look, the laughter, the love,— They are gone. They are gone to feed the roses Elegant and curled 10 Is the blossom Fragrant is the blossom. I know But I do not approve.
 More precious was the light in your eyes than all the roses of the world.

Down, down, down into the darkness of the grave
 Gently they go, the beautiful, the tender,
 the kind,
 Quietly they go, the intelligent, the witty,
 the brave.
 I know. But I do not approve. And I am not resigned.

THE CAMEO

FOREVER over now, forever, forever gone
 That day Clear and diminished like a scene Carven in cameo, the lighthouse, and the cove between
 The sandy cliffs, and the boat drawn up on the beach,
 And the long skirt of a lady innocent and young,
 Her hand resting on her bosom, her head hung,
 And the figure of a man in earnest speech

 Clear and diminished like a scene cut in cameo
 The lighthouse, and the boat on the beach, and the two shapes
 Of the woman and the man, lost like the lost day 10
 Are the words that passed, and the pain,— discarded, cut away From the stone, as from the memory the heat of the tears escapes

 O troubled forms, O early love unfortunate and hard,
 Time has estranged you into a jewel cold
     and pure,
 From the action of the waves and from the action of sorrow forever secure, White against a ruddy cliff you stand, chalcedony on sard

ON HEARING A SYMPHONY
OF BEETHOVEN

SWEET sounds, oh, beautiful music, do not cease!
 Reject me not into the world again
 With you alone is excellence and peace,
 Mankind made plausible, his purpose plain Enchanted in your air benign and shrewd,
 With limbs a-sprawl and empty faces pale,
 The spiteful and the stingy and the rude
 Sleep like the scullions in the fairy-tale
 This moment is the best the world can give.
 The tranquil blossom on the tortured stem.
 Reject me not, sweet sounds! oh, let me live, 11
 Till Doom espy my towers and scatter
     them,

A city spell-bound under the aging sun,
 Music my rampart, and my only one.

FROM FATAL INTERVIEW

16

I DREAMED I moved among the Elysian fields,
 In converse with sweet women long since dead,
 And out of blossoms which that meadow yields
 I wove a garland for your living head
 Danæ, that was the vessel for a day
 Of golden Jove, I saw, and at her side,
 Whom Jove the Bull desired and bore away, Europa stood, and the Swan's featherless bride
 All these were mortal women, yet all these Above the ground had had a god for guest,
 Freely I walked beside them and at ease, 11
 Addressing them, by them again addressed,
 And marvelled nothing, for remembering
     you,
 Wherefore I was among them well I knew.

52

Oh, sleep forever in the Latmian cave,
 Mortal Endymion, darling of the Moon!
 Her silver garments by the senseless wave Shouldered and dropped and on the shingle strewn,
 Her fluttering hand against her forehead pressed,
 Her scattered looks that trouble all the sky,
 Her rapid footsteps running down the west—
 Of all her altered state, oblivious he!
 Whom earthen you, by deathless lips adored,
 Wild-eyed and stammering to the grasses thrust, 10
 And deep into her crystal body poured
 The hot and sorrowful sweetness of the dust:
 Whereof she wanders mad, being all unfit
 For mortal love, that might not die of it

THE RETURN

EARTH does not understand her child,
 Who from the loud gregarious town
 Returns, depleted and defiled,
 To the still woods, to fling him down.

Earth can not count the sons she bore:
 The wounded lynx, the wounded man
 Come trailing blood unto her door,
 She shelters both as best she can.

But she is early up and out,
 To trim the year or strip its bones; 10
 She has no time to stand about Talking of him in undertones

Who has no aim but to forget,
 Be left in peace, be lying thus
 For days, for years, for centuries yet,
 Unshaven and anonymous,

Who, marked for failure, dulled by grief,
 Has traded in his wife and friend
 For this warm ledge, this alder leaf Comfort that does not comprehend. 20

A SONNET IN MEMORY

(NICOLA SACCO—BARTOLOMEO VANZETTI)
Executed August 23, 1927

WHERE can the heart be hidden in the ground
 And be at peace, and be at peace forever,
 Under the world, untroubled by the sound
 Of mortal tears, that cease from pouring never?
 Well for the heart, by stern compassion
 harried,
 If death be deeper than the churchmen
 say,— Gone from this world indeed what's graveward carried,
 And laid to rest indeed what's laid away.
 Anguish enough while yet the indignant breather
 Have blood to spurt upon the oppressor's hand, 10
 Who would eternal be, and hang in ether
 A stuffless ghost above his struggling land,
 Retching in vain to render up the groan
 That is not there, being aching dust's alone?
 1934

HOW NAKED, HOW WITHOUT A WALL

How naked, how without a wall
 Against the wind and the sharp sleet,
 He fares at night, that fares at all
 Forth from the stove's heat.

Or if the moon be in the sky,
 Or if the stars, and the late moon
 Not rising till an hour goes by,
 And Libra setting soon,

How naked, how without a stitch
 To shut him from the earnest air, 10
 He goes, that by the whispering ditch
 Alone at night will fare.

Nor is it but the rising chill
 From the warm weeds, that strikes him
 cold,
 Nor that the stridulant hedge grows still,
 Like what has breath to hold,

Until his tiny foot go past
 At length, with its enormous sound,
 Nor yet his helpless shadow cast
 To any wolf around 20

Bare to the moon and her cold rays
 He takes the road, who by and by Goes bare beneath the moony gaze
 Of his own awful eye

He sees his motive, like a fox
 Hid in a badger's hole, he sees
 His honour, strangled, in a box,
 Her neck lashed to her knees

The man who ventures forth alone
 When other men are snug within 30
 Walks on his marrow, not his bone,
 And lacks his outer skin.

The draughty caverns of his breath
 Grow visible, his heart shines through:
 Surely a thing which only death
 Can have the right to do.

1934

FROM EPITAPH FOR THE RACE OF MAN

17

ONLY the diamond and the diamond's
 dust
 Can render up the diamond unto Man;
 One and invulnerable as it began
 Had it endured, but for the treacherous thrust
 That laid its hard heart open, as it must,
 And ground it down and fitted it to span
 A turbaned brow or fret an ivory fan,

Lopped of its stature, pared of its proper crust.
So Man, by all the wheels of heaven
unscored,
Man, the stout ego, the exuberant mind 10
No edge could cleave, no acid could consume,
Being split along the vein by his own kind,
Gives over, rolls upon the palm abhorred,
Is set in brass on the swart thumb of Doom

18

Here lies, and none to mourn him but the
sea,
That falls incessant on the empty shore,
Most various Man, cut down to spring no
more,

Before his prime, even in his infancy
Cut down, and all the clamour that was he,
Silenced, and all the riveted pride he wore,
A rusted iron column whose tall core
The rains have tunnelled like an aspen tree
Man, doughty Man, what power has brought you low,
That heaven itself in arms could not persuade 10
To lay aside the lever and the spade
And be as dust among the dusts that blow?
Whence, whence the broadside? whose the heavy blade? . . .
Strive not to speak, poor scattered mouth,
I know.

EZRA POUND

1885-

A RETROSPECT<sup>1</sup>

THERE has been so much scribbling about a new fashion in poetry, that I may perhaps be pardoned this brief recapitulation and retrospect

In the spring or early summer of 1912,
'H D,' Richard Aldington and myself decided that we were agreed upon the three principles following

1 Direct treatment of the 'thing' whether subjective or objective

2 To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation

3 As regarding rhythm to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metronome

Upon many points of taste and of predilection we differed, but agreeing upon these three positions we thought we had as much right to a group name, at least as much right, as a number of French 'schools' proclaimed by Mr Flint in the August number of Harold Munro's magazine for 1911

This school has since been 'joined' or 'followed' by numerous people who, whatever their merits, do not show any signs of agreeing with the second specification. Indeed vers libre has become as prolix and as verbose as any of the flaccid varieties that preceded it. It has brought faults of its own. The actual language and phrasing is often as bad as that of our elders without even the excuse that the words are shoved in to fill a metric pattern or to complete the noise of a rhyme-sound. Whether or no the phrases followed by the followers are musical must be left to the reader's decision. At times I can find a marked metre in 'vers libres,' as stale and hackneyed as any pseudo-Swinburnian, at times the writers seem to follow no musical structure whatever. But it is, on the whole, good that the field should be ploughed. Perhaps a few good poems have come from the new method, and if so it is justified

Criticism is not a circumscription or a set of prohibitions. It provides fixed points of departure. It may startle a dull reader into alertness. That little of it which is good is mostly in stray phrases, or if it be an older artist helping a younger it is in great measure but rules of thumb, cautions gained by experience.

I set together a few phrases on practical working about the time the first remarks on imagisme were published. The first use of the word 'Imagiste' was in my note to <sup>1</sup> The selection is from a group of Pound's early essays grouped together under this title in Pavannes and Divisions (N.Y., 1918)

'F.E. Hulme's five poems, printed at the end of my 'Ripostes' in the autumn of 1912 I reprint my cautions from Poetry for March, 1913

A FEW DON'TS

AN 'Image' is that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time. I use the term 'complex' rather in the technical sense employed by the newer psychologists, such as Hart, though we might not agree absolutely in our application

It is the presentation of such a 'complex' instantaneously which gives that sense of sudden liberation, that sense of freedom from time limits and space limits, that sense of sudden growth, which we experience in the presence of the greatest works of art

It is better to present one Image in a lifetime than to produce voluminous works

All this, however, some may consider open to debate. The immediate necessity is to tabulate A LIST OF DON'TS for those beginning to write verses. I can not put all of them into Mosaic negative

To begin with, consider the three propositions (demanding direct treatment, economy of words, and the sequence of the musical phrase), not as dogma—never consider anything as dogma—but as the result of long contemplation, which, even if it is some one else's contemplation, may be worth consideration

Pay no attention to the criticism of men who have never themselves written a notable work. Consider the discrepancies between the actual writing of the Greek poets and dramatists, and the theories of the Græco-Roman grammarians, concocted to explain their metres

LANGUAGE

USE no superfluous word, no adjective, which does not reveal something

Don't use such an expression as 'dim lands of peace'. It dulls the image. It mixes an abstraction with the concrete. It comes from the writer's not realizing that the natural object is always the adequate symbol

Go in fear of abstractions. Do not retell in mediocre verse what has already been done in good prose. Don't think any intelligent person is going to be deceived when you try to shirk all the difficulties of the unspeakably difficult art of good prose by chopping your composition into line lengths

What the expert is tired of today the public will be tired of tomorrow.

Don't imagine that the art of poetry is any simpler than the art of music, or that you can please the expert before you have spent at least as much effort on the art of verse as the average piano teacher spends on the art of music.

Be influenced by as many great artists as you can, but have the decency either to acknowledge the debt outright, or to try to conceal it

Don't allow 'influence' to mean merely that you mop up the particular decorative vocabulary of some one or two poets whom you happen to admire. A Turkish war correspondent was recently caught red-handed babbling in his dispatches of 'dove-gray' hills, or else it was 'pearl-pale,' I can not remember

Use either no ornament or good ornament

RHYTHM AND RHYME

LET the candidate fill his mind with the finest cadences he can discover, preferably in a foreign language<sup>1</sup> so that the meaning of the words may be less likely to divert his attention from the movement, e.g., Saxon charms, Hebridean Folk Songs, the verse of Dante, and the lyrics of Shakespeare—if he can dissociate the vocabulary from the cadence. Let him dissect the lyrics of Goethe coldly into their component sound values, syllables long and short, stressed and unstressed, into vowels and consonants

It is not necessary that a poem should rely on its music, but if it does rely on its music that music must be such as will delight the expert

Let the neophyte know assonance and alliteration, rhyme immediate and delayed, simple and polyphonic, as a musician would expect to know harmony and counterpoint and all the minutiae of his craft. No time is too great to give to these matters or to any one of them, even if the artist seldom have need of them

Don't imagine that a thing will 'go' in verse just because it's too dull to go in prose

Don't be 'viewy'—leave that to the writers of pretty little philosophic essays
Don't be descriptive, remember that the painter can describe a landscape much better than you can, and that he has to know a deal more about it

When Shakespeare talks of the 'Dawn in russet mantle clad' he presents something which the painter does not present. There is in this line of his nothing that one can call description, he presents.

Consider the way of the scientists rather than the way of an advertising agent for a new soap

The scientist does not expect to be acclaimed as a great scientist until he has discovered something. He begins by learning what has been discovered already. He goes from that point onward. He does not bank on being a charming fellow personally. He does not expect his friends to applaud the results of his freshman class work. Freshmen in poetry are unfortunately not confined to a definite and recognizable class room. They are 'all over the shop.' Is it any wonder 'the public is indifferent to poetry?'

Don't chop your stuff into separate *iamb*s. Don't make each line stop dead at the end, and then begin every next line with a heave. Let the beginning of the next line catch the rise of the rhythm wave, unless you want a definite longish pause.

In short, behave as a musician, a good musician, when dealing with that phase of your art which has exact parallels in music. The same laws govern, and you are bound by no others.

Naturally, your rhythmic structure should not destroy the shape of your words, or their natural sound, or their meaning. It is improbable that, at the start, you will be able to get a rhythm-structure strong enough to affect them very much, though you may fall a victim to all sorts of false stopping due to line ends and cæsurae.

The musician can rely on pitch and the volume of the orchestra. You can not. The term harmony is misapplied to poetry, it refers to simultaneous sounds of different pitch. There is, however, in the best verse a sort of residue of sound which remains in the ear of the hearer and acts more or less as an organ-base.

A rhyme must have in it some slight element of surprise if it is to give pleasure, it need not be bizarre or curious, but it must be well used if used at all.

Vide further Vildrac and Duhamel's notes on rhyme in 'Technique Poétique.'

That part of your poetry which strikes upon the imaginative eye of the reader will lose nothing by translation into a foreign tongue, that which appeals to the ear can reach only those who take it in the original.

Consider the definiteness of Dante's presentation, as compared with Milton's rhetoric. Read as much of Wordsworth as does not seem too unutterably dull.<sup>1</sup>

If you want the gist of the matter go to Sappho, Catullus, Villon, Heine when he is in the vein, Gautier when he is not too frigid, or, if you have not the tongues, seek out the leisurely Chaucer. Good prose will do you no harm, and there is good discipline to be had by trying to write it.

Translation is likewise good training, if you find that your original matter 'wobbles' when you try to rewrite it. The meaning of the poem to be translated can not 'wobble.'

If you are using a symmetrical form, don't put in what you want to say and then fill up the remaining vacuums with slush.

Don't mess up the perception of one sense by trying to define it in terms of another. This is usually only the result of being too lazy to find the exact word. To this clause there are possibly exceptions.

The first three simple proscriptions will throw out nine-tenths of all the bad poetry now accepted as standard and classic, and will prevent you from many a crime of production.

'Mais d'abord il faut être un poète,'<sup>2</sup> as MM. Duhamel and Vildrac have said at the end of their little book, 'Notes sur la Technique Poétique.'

Since March, 1913, Ford Madox Hueffer has pointed out that Wordsworth was so intent on the ordinary or plain word that he never thought of hunting for le mot juste.

John Butler Yeats has handled or handled Wordsworth and the Victorians, and his criticism, contained in letters to his son, is now printed and available.

I do not like writing about art, my first, at least I think it was my first essay on the subject, was a protest against it. . . .

CREDO

Rhythm—I believe in an 'absolute rhythm,' a rhythm, that is, in poetry which corresponds exactly to the emotion or shade of emotion to be expressed. A man's rhythm must be interpretative, it will be, therefore, in the end, his own, uncounterfeiting, uncounterfeitable.

Symbols.—I believe that the proper and perfect symbol is the natural object, that if a man use 'symbols' he must so use them that their symbolic function does not obtrude, so that a sense, and the poetic quality of the passage, is not lost to those who do not understand the symbol as such, to whom, for instance, a hawk is a hawk.

Technique—I believe in technique as the test of a man's sincerity, in law when it is ascertainable, in the trampling down of every convention that impedes or obscures the determination of the law, or the precise rendering of the impulse.

Form—I think there is a 'fluid' as well as a 'solid' content, that some poems may have form as a tree has form, some as water poured into a vase. That most symmetrical forms have certain uses. That a vast number of subjects cannot be precisely, and therefore not properly rendered in symmetrical forms.

'Thinking that alone worthy wherein the whole art is employed,'<sup>1</sup> I think the artist should master all known forms and systems of metric, and I have with some persistence set about doing this, searching particularly into those periods wherein the systems came to birth or attained their maturity. It has been complained, with some justice, that I dump my note-books on the public. I think that only after a long struggle will poetry attain such a degree of development, of, if you will, modernity, that it will vitally concern people who are accustomed, in prose, to Henry James and Anatole France, in music to Debussy. I am constantly contending that it took two centuries of Provence and one of Tuscany to develop the media of Dante's masterwork, that it took the latinists of the Renaissance, and the

Pleiade, and his own age of painted speech to prepare Shakespeare his tools. It is tremendously important that great poetry be written, it makes no jot of difference who writes it. The experimental demonstrations of one man may save the time of many—hence my furore over Arnaut Daniel—if a man's experiments try out one new rime, or dispense conclusively with one iota of currently accepted nonsense, he is merely playing fair with his colleagues when he chalks up his result.

No man ever writes very much poetry that 'matters.' In bulk, that is, no one produces much that is final, and when a man is not doing this highest thing, this saying the thing once for all and perfectly, when he is not matching Ποικιλόθροοι, ἀθανάτ' Ἀφροδίτα,<sup>2</sup> or 'Hist—said Kate the Queen,' he had much better be making the sorts of experiment which may be of use to him in his later work, or to his successors.

'The lyf so short, the craft so long to lerne.' It is a foolish thing for a man to begin his work on a too narrow foundation, it is a disgraceful thing for a man's work not to show steady growth and increasing fineness from first to last.

As for 'adaptations', one finds that all the old masters of painting recommend to their pupils that they begin by copying masterwork, and proceed to their own composition.

As for 'Every man his own poet.' The more every man knows about poetry the better. I believe in every one writing poetry who wants to, most do. I believe in every man knowing enough of music to play 'God bless our home' on the harmonium, but I do not believe in every man giving concerts and printing his sin.

The mastery of any art is the work of a lifetime. I should not discriminate between the 'amateur' and the 'professional,' or rather I should discriminate quite often in favour of the amateur, but I should discriminate between the amateur and the expert. It is certain that the present chaos will endure until the Art of poetry has been preached down the amateur gullet, until there is such a general understanding of the fact that poetry is an art and not a pastime; such a knowledge of technique, of technique of surface and technique of content, that the amateurs will cease to try to drown out the masters

If a certain thing was said once for all in Atlantis or Arcadia, in 450 Before Christ or in 1290 after, it is not for us moderns to go saying it over, or to go obscuring the memory of the dead by saying the same thing with less skill and less conviction.

My pawing over the ancients and semi-ancients has been one struggle to find out what has been done, once for all, better than it can ever be done again, and to find out what remains for us to do, and plenty does remain, for if we still feel the same emotions as those which launched the thousand ships, it is quite certain that we come on these feelings differently, through different nuances, by different intellectual gradations. Each age has its own abounding gifts, yet only some ages transmute them into matter of duration. No good poetry is ever written in a manner twenty years old, for to write in such a manner shows conclusively that the writer thinks from books, convention and chché, and not from life, yet a man feeling the divorce of life and his art may naturally try to resurrect a forgotten mode if he find in that mode some leaven, or if he think he sees in it some element lacking in contemporary art which might unite that art again to its sustenance, life

In the art of Daniel and Cavalcanti, I have seen that precision which I miss in the Victorians—that explicit rendering, be it of external nature, or of emotion. Their testimony is of the eyewitness, their symptoms are first hand

As for the nineteenth century, with all respect to its achievements, I think we shall look back upon it as a rather blurry, messy sort of a period, a rather sentimentalistic, mannerish sort of a period. I say this without any self-righteousness, with no self-satisfaction.

As for there being a 'movement' or my being of it, the conception of poetry as a 'pure art' in the sense in which I use the term, revived with Swinburne. From the puritanical revolt to Swinburne, poetry had been merely the vehicle—yes, definitely, Arthur Symons' scruples and feelings about the word not withholding—the ox-cart and post-chaise for transmitting thoughts poetic or otherwise. And perhaps the 'great Victorians,' though it is doubtful, and assuredly the 'nineties' continued the development of the art, confining their improvements, however, chiefly to sound and to refinements of manner.

Mr Yeats has once and for all stripped English poetry of its perdamnable rhetoric. He has boiled away all that is not poetic—and a good deal that is. He has become a classic in his own lifetime and nel mezzo del cammin<sup>1</sup> He has made our poetic idiom a thing pliable, a speech without inversions

Robert Bridges, Maurice Hewlett and Frederic Manning are<sup>2</sup> in their different ways seriously concerned with overhauling the metric, in testing the language and its adaptability to certain modes. Ford Hueffer is making some sort of experiments in modernity. The Provost of Oriel continues his translation of the Divina Commedia

As to Twentieth century poetry, and the poetry which I expect to see written during the next decade or so, it will, I think, move against poppy-cock, it will be harder and saner, it will be what Mr Hewlett calls 'nearer the bone'. It will be as much like granite as it can be, its force will lie in its truth, its interpretative power (of course, poetic force does always rest there), I mean it will not try to seem forcible by rhetorical din, and luxurious riot. We will have fewer painted adjectives impeding the shock and stroke of it. At least for myself, I want it so, austere, direct, free from emotional slither

<sup>3</sup> This is a free translation into the sestina form of a Provençal poem, 'In Praise of War,' by Bertrams de Born (c. 1140–c. 1207), master of the satirical servantes, who will be most remembered, as Pound says 'for the good of his tongue, and for his voiced scorn of sloth, DAMN it all! all this our South stinks peace.

 You whoreson dog, Papiols, come! Let's to music!
 I have no life save when the swords clash.
 But ah! when I see the standards gold, vair, purple, opposing
 And the broad fields beneath them turn
 crimson,
 Then howls my heart nigh mad with rejoicing

2

In hot summer have I great rejoicing
 When the tempests kill the earth's foul peace,
 And the lightnings from black heav'n flash
 crimson,
 And the fierce thunders roar me their music 10
 And the winds shriek through the clouds mad, opposing,
 And through all the riven skies God's swords clash

3

Hell grant soon we hear again the swords
 clash!
 And the shrill neighs of destriers in battle
 rejoicing,
 Spiked breast to spiked breast opposing!
 Better one hour's stour than a year's peace
 With fat boards, bawds, wine and frail
 music!
 Bah! there's no wine like the blood's crimson!

4

And I love to see the sun rise blood-
 crimson
 And I watch his spears through the dark

 And it fills all my heart with rejoicing
 And pries wide my mouth with fast music
 When I see him so scorn and defy peace,
 His lone might 'gainst all darkness

 Pound, The Spirit of Romance (London, 1910), 40 Pound has called the cult of the Province 'a cult of the emotion,' and described the sestina, which 'like all fine poetry can be well judged only when heard spoken,' as 'a form like a thin sheet of flame folding and unfolding upon itself' Ibid, 18

5

The man who fears war and squats opposing
 My words for stour, hath no blood of crimson
 But is fit only to rot in womanish peace Far from where worth's won and the swords clash
 For the death of such sluts I go rejoicing;
 Yea, I fill all the air with my music. 30

6

Papiols, Papiols, to the music!
 There's no sound like to swords swords
 opposing,
 No cry like the battle's rejoicing
 When our elbows and swords drip the
 crimson
 And our charges 'gainst 'The Leopard's' rush clash
 May God damn for ever all who cry
 'Peace!'

7

And let the music of the swords make them
 crimson!
 Hell grant soon we hear again the swords
 clash!
 Hell blot black for alway the thought
 'Peace!'

FOR E MCC

THAT WAS MY COUNTER-BLADE UNDER LEONARDO TERRONE, MASTER OF FENCE

GONE while your tastes were keen to you,
 Gone where the grey winds call to you,
 By that high fencer, even Death,
 Struck of the blade that no man parrieth;
 Such is your fence, one saith,
 One that hath known you.
 Drew you your sword most gallantly Made you your pass most valiantly
 'Gainst that grey fencer, even Death.

Gone as a gust of breath 10
 Faith! no man tarrieth,
 'Se il cor ti manca,' but it failed thee not!
 'Non ti fidar,' it is the sword that speaks
 'In me.'<sup>1</sup>

1 'Sword-rune "If thy heart fail thee trust not in me"'
 Author's note, Personae (N Y, 1926), 19

Thou trusted'st in thyself and met the blade
'Thout mask or gauntlet, and art laid
As memorable broken blades that be Kept as bold trophies of old pageantry.
As old Toledos past their days of war
Are kept mnemonic of the strokes thy bore, 20
So art thou with us, being good to keep In our heart's sword-rack, though thy sword-arm sleep

Envoi

STRUCK of the blade that no man parrieth,
Pierced of the point that toucheth lastly all,
'Gainst that grey fencer, even Death,
Behold the shield! He shall not take thee all

PROVINCIA DESERTA

At Rochecoart,
Where the hills part in three ways,
And three valleys, full of winding roads,
Fork out to south and north,
There is a place of trees . . . grey with lichen
I have walked there thinking of old days.

At Chalais
is a pleached arbour; 10
Old pensioners and old protected women Have the right there—it is charity
I have crept over old rafters, peering down
Over the Dronne,
over a stream full of lilies.
Eastward the road lies,
Aubeterre is eastward,
With a garrulous old man at the inn. 20
I know the roads in that place.
Mareuil to the north-east,
La Tour,
There are three keeps near Mareuil,
And an old woman,
glad to hear Arnaut,
Glad to lend one dry clothing.

I have walked into Perigord,
I have seen the torch-flames, high-leaping,

Painting the front of that church, 31
Heard, under the dark, whirling laughter.
I have looked back over the stream and seen the high building,
Seen the long minarets, the white shafts
I have gone in Ribeyrac and in Sarlat,
I have climbed rickety stairs, heard talk of Croy,
Walked over En Bertran's old layout, Have seen Narbonne, and Cahors and Chalus, 40
Have seen Excideuil, carefully fashioned.

I have said
'Here such a one walked.
'Here Cœur-de-Lion was slain.
'Here was good singing.
'Here one man hastened his step.
'Here one lay panting'
I have looked south from Hautefort, thinking of Montaignac, southward
I have lain in Rocafixada, 50
level with sunset,
Have seen the copper come down
tingeing the mountains,
I have seen the fields, pale, clear as an emerald,
Sharp peaks, high spurs, distant castles
I have said 'The old roads have lain here.
'Men have gone by such and such valleys
'Where the great halls were closer together'
I have seen Foix on its rock, seen Toulouse,
and
Arles greatly altered, 60
I have seen the ruined 'Dorata'
I have said.
'Riquier! Guido'
I have thought of the second Troy,
Some little prized place in Auvergnat.
Two men tossing a coin, one keeping a castle,
One set on the highway to sing.
He sang a woman
Auvergne rose to the song;
The Dauphin backed him. 70
'The castle to Austors!'
'Pierre kept the singing—
'A fair man and a pleasant'
He won the lady,
Stole her away for himself, kept her against armed force

So ends that story.
 That age is gone,
 Pierre de Mœnsac is gone.
 I have walked over these roads,
 I have thought of them living. 80

THE SEAFARER

(From the Anglo-Saxon)

MAY I for my own self song's truth reckon,
 Journey's jargon, how I in harsh days Hardship endured oft Bitter breast-cares have I abided,
 Known on my keel many a care's hold,
 And dire sea-urge, and there I oft spent Narrow nightwatch nigh the ship's head While she tossed close to cliffs Coldly afflicted,
 My feet were by frost benumbed
 Chill its chains are, chafing sighs 10
 Hew my heart round and hunger begot Mere-weary mood Lest man know not
 That he on dry land loveliest liveth,
 List how I, care-wretched, on ice-cold sea,
 Weathered the winter, wretched outcast
 Deprived of my kinsmen, Hung with hard ice-flakes, where hail-scur flew,
 There I heard naught save the harsh sea
 And ice-cold wave, at whiles the swan
 cries,
 Did for my games the gannet's clamour, 20
 Sea-fowls' loudness was for me laughter,
 The mew's singing all my mead-drink Storms, on the stone-cliffs beaten, fell on the stern
 In icy feathers, full oft the eagle screamed
 With spray on his pinion
 Not any protector
 May make merry man faring needy
 Thus he little believes, who aye in winsome
 life
 Abides 'mid burghers some heavy business,
 Wealthy and wine-flushed, how I weary oft Must bide above brine. 31
 Neareth nightshade, snoweth from north,
 Frost froze the land, hail fell on earth then,
 Corn of the coldest Nathless there knocketh now
 The heart's thought that I on high streams
 The salt-wavy tumult traverse alone
 Moaneth alway my mind's lust
 That I fare forth, that I afar hence Seek out a foreign fastness.

For this there's no mood-lofty man over earth's midst, 40
 Not though he be given his good, but will have in his youth greed, Nor his deed to the daring, nor his king to the faithful
 But shall have his sorrow for sea-fare
 Whatever his lord will He hath not heart for harping, nor in ring-having Nor winsomeness to wife, nor world's delight
 Nor any whit else save the wave's slash,
 Yet longing comes upon him to fare forth on the water Bosque taketh blossom, cometh beauty of berries,
 Fields to fairness, land fares brisker, 50
 All this admonisheth man eager of mood,
 The heart turns to travel so that he then thinks
 On flood-ways to be far departing
 Cuckoo calleth with gloomy crying,
 He singeth summerward, bodeth sorrow,
 The bitter heart's blood Burgher knows not—
 He the prosperous man—what some perform
 Where wandering them widest draweth
 So that but now my heart burst from my breastlock,
 My mood 'mid the mere-flood, 60
 Over the whale's acre, would wander wide
 On earth's shelter cometh oft to me,
 Eager and ready, the crying lone-flyer,
 Whets for the whale-path the heart irresistibly,
 O'er tracks of ocean, seeing that anyhow
 My lord deems to me this dead life
 On loan and on land, I believe not
 That any earth-weal eternal standeth
 Save there be somewhat calamitous
 That, ere a man's tide go, turn it to twain.
 Disease or oldness or sword-hate 71 Beats out the breath from doom-gripped body
 And for this, every earl whatever, for those speaking after—
 Laud of the living, boasteth some last word,
 That he will work ere he pass onward, Frame on the fair earth 'gainst foes his malice,
 Daring ado, . . .
 So that all men shall honour him after

And his laud beyond them remain 'mid the English,

Aye, for ever, a lasting life's-blast, 80
Delight 'mid the doughty

Days little durable,
And all arrogance of earthen riches,
There come now no kings nor Cæsars
Nor gold-giving lords like those gone.
Howe'er in earth most magnified,
Whoe'er lived in life most lordliest, Drear all thus excellence, delights undurable!

Waneth the watch, but the world holdeth.

Tomb hideth trouble The blade is layed low 90

Earthly glory ageth and seareth
No man at all going the earth's gait,
But age fares against him, his face paleth, Grey-haired he groaneth, knows gone companions,

Lordly men, are to earth o'ergiven, Nor may he then the flesh-cover, whose life ceaseth,

Nor eat the sweet nor feel the sorry,
Nor stir hand nor think in mid heart,
And though he strew the grave with gold,
His born brothers, their buried bodies 100
Be an unlikely treasure hoard.

THE RETURN

SEE, they return, ah, see the tentative
Movements, and the slow feet,
The trouble in the pace and the uncertain

Wavering!

See, they return, one, and by one,
With fear, as half-awakened,
As if the snow should hesitate
And murmur in the wind, and half turn back,
These were the 'Wing'd-with-Awe,' 10
Inviolable.

Gods of the winged shoe!
With them the silver hounds, snuffing the trace of air!

Hae! Hae!

These were the swift to harry;
These the keen-scented,
These were the souls of blood.

Slow on the leash,

BALLAD OF THE GOODLY FERE<sup>1</sup>

Simon Zelotes Speaketh It Somewhere after the Crucifixion

HA' we lost the goodliest fere o' all
For the priests and the gallows tree?
Aye lover he was of brawny men,
O' ships and the open sea.

When they came wi' a host to take Our Man

His smile was good to see,
'First let these go' quo' our Goodly Fere,
'Or I'll see ye damned,' says he

Aye he sent us out through the crossed high spears

And the scorn of his laugh rang free, 10
'Why took ye not me when I walked about Alone in the town?' says he

Oh we drunk his 'Hale' in the good red
wine

When we last made company,
No capon priest was the Goodly Fere
But a man o' men was he

I ha' seen him drive a hundred men
Wi' a bundle o' cords swung free,
That they took the high and holy house
For their pawn and treasury 20

They'll no' get him a' in a book I think
Though they write it cunningly,
No mouse of the scrolls was the Goodly
Fere
But aye loved the open sea

If they think they ha' snared our Goodly
Fere

They are fools to the last degree
'I'll go to the feast,' quo' our Goodly Fere,
'Though I go to the gallows tree'

'Ye ha' seen me heal the lame and blind,
And wake the dead,' says he, 30
'Ye shall see one thing to master all
'Tis how a brave man dies on the tree.'

(London, 1920), 43

A son of God was the Goodly Fere
That bade us his brothers be
I ha' seen him cow a thousand men.
I have seen him upon the tree

He cried no cry when they drave the nails
And the blood gushed hot and free,
The hounds of the crimson sky gave tongue
But never a cry cried he. 40

I ha' seen him cow a thousand men
On the hulls o' Galilee,
They whined as he walked out calm between,
Wi' his eyes like the grey o' the sea,

Like the sea that brooks no voyaging
With the winds unleashed and free,
Like the sea that he cowed at Genseret
Wi' twey words spoke' suddenly

A master of men was the Goodly Fere,
A mate of the wind and sea, 50
If they think they ha' slain our Goodly
Fere
They are fools eternally

I ha' seen him eat o' the honey-comb
Sin' they nailed him to the tree 1909

FURTHER INSTRUCTIONS

COME, my songs, let us express our baser
passions,
Let us express our envy of the man with a steady job and no worry about the future

You are very idle, my songs
I fear you will come to a bad end.
You stand about in the streets,
You loiter at the corners and bus-stops,
You do next to nothing at all

You do not even express our inner nobilities,
You will come to a very bad end

And I? 10
I have gone half cracked,
I have talked to you so much that I almost see you about me, Insolent little beasts, shameless, devoid of clothing!

But you, newest song of the lot,
You are not old enough to have done much mischief,
I will get you a green coat out of China
With dragons worked upon it,
I will get you the scarlet silk trousers
From the statue of the infant Christ in Santa Maria Novella, 20
Lest they say we are lacking in taste,
Or that there is no caste in this family.

THE RIVER MERCHANT'S WIFE.

A LETTER <sup>1</sup>

WHILE my hair was still cut straight across my forehead
I played about the front gate, pulling flowers
You came by on bamboo stults, playing
horse,
You walked about my seat, playing with blue plums
And we went on living in the village of Chokan
Two small people, without dislike or suspicion

At fourteen I married My Lord you.
I never laughed, being bashful
Lowering my head, I looked at the wall.
Called to, a thousand times, I never looked back 10

At fifteen I stopped scowling,
I desired my dust to be mingled with yours
For ever and for ever and for ever.
Why should I climb the look out?

At sixteen you departed,
You went into far Ku-to-yen, by the river of swirling eddies,
And you have been gone five months.
The monkeys make sorrowful noise
overhead.
You dragged your feet when you went out.
By the gate now, the moss is grown, the different mosses, 20
Too deep to clear them away!

<sup>1</sup> The poem is a translation from Li Po (701-762), the Japanese form of whose name Pound has Englished Li Po, often called the greatest of Chinese poets, flourished under the Tangs in China's golden age of poetry. With him, Pound says 'the visual art in poetry reached its zenith' Pound, 'The Island of Paris,' The Dial, L.XIX, vi, 636

The leaves fall early this autumn, in wind
The paired butterflies are already yellow with August

Over the grass in the West garden,
They hurt me I grow older If you are coming down through the narrows of the river Kiang,
Please let me know beforehand,
And I will come out to meet you

IN A STATION OF THE METRO <sup>1</sup>

THE apparition of these faces in the crowd,
Petals on a wet, black bough

1916

- <sup>1</sup> "Three years ago in Paris I got out of a "metro" train at La Concorde, and saw suddenly a beautiful face, and then another and another, and then a beautiful child's face, and then another beautiful woman, and I tried all that day to find words for what this had meant to me, and I could not find any words that seemed to me worthy, or as lovely as that sudden emotion. And that evening I was still trying and I found, suddenly, the expression I do not mean that I found words, but there came an equation not in speech, but in little splotches of colour. It was a colour, the beginning, for me, of a language in colour. Any mind that is worth calling a mind must have needs beyond the existing categories of language, just as a painter must have pigments or shades more numerous than the existing names of the colours. Perhaps this is enough to explain the words in my "Vortex" "Every concept, every emotion, presents itself to the vivid consciousness in some primary form. It belongs to the art of this form." That is to say, my experience in Paris should have gone into paint. Colour, was, in that instance, the "primary pigment." The Vorticist uses the "primary pigment." Vorticism is art before it has spread itself into flaccidity, into elaboration and secondary applications. All poetic language is the language of exploration. Since the beginning of bad writing, writers have used images as ornaments. The point of Imagisme is that it does not use images as ornaments. The image is itself the speech. The image is the word beyond formulated language. One is tired of ornamentations, they are all a trick, and any sharp person can learn them. The Japanese have had the sense of exploration. They have understood the beauty of this sort of knowing. A Chinaman said long ago that if a man can't say what he has to say in twelve lines he had better keep quiet. The Japanese have evolved the still shorter form of hokku. The "one image poem" is a form of super-position, that is to say, it is one idea set on top of another. I found it useful in getting out of the impasse in which I had been left by my metro emotion. I wrote a thirty-line poem, and destroyed it because it was what we call work "of second intensity." Six months later I made a poem half that length, a year later I made the following hokku-like sentence [the poem above].

THE GAME OF CHESS <sup>2</sup>

DOGMATIC STATEMENT CONCERNING THE GAME OF CHESS THEME FOR A SERIES OF PICTURES

RED knights, brown bishops, bright queens, Striking the board, falling in strong 'L's of colour.

Reaching and striking in angles, holding lines in one colour.

This board is alive with light,
these pieces are living in form,
Their moves break and reform the pattern luminous green from the rooks, Clashing with 'X's of queens, looped with the knight-leaps

Y' pawns, cleaving, embanking!

Clash, leaping of bands, straight strips of hard colour,
Blocked lights working in Escapes

A VIRGINAL

No, no! Go from me I have left her lately
I will not spoil my sheath with lesser brightness
For my surrounding air hath a new lightness,
Slight are her arms, yet they have bound me straitly
And left me cloaked as with a gauze of æther,
As with sweet leaves, as with subtle clearness.

In a poem of this sort one is trying to record the precise instant when a thing outward and objective transforms itself, or darts into a thing inward and subjective' Pound, Gaudier-Brzeska (London, 1916), 100-03

- <sup>2</sup> "The image is not an idea. It is a radiant node or cluster, it is what I can, and must perforce, call a VORTEX, from which, and through which, and into which, ideas are constantly rushing. It is as true for the painting and sculpture as it is for the poetry. Mr. Wordsworth and Mr. Lewis are not using words, they are using shape and colour. Mr. Brzeska and Mr. Epstein are using "planes in relation", they are dealing with a relation of planes different from the sort of relation of planes dealt with in geometry, hence, what is called "the need of organic forms in sculpture." The organization of forms is a much more energetic and creative action than the copying of light on a haystack. There is undoubtedly a language of form and colour." Ibid., 106-07

Oh, I have picked up magic in her nearness To sheathe me half in half the things that sheathe her No, no! Go from me I have still the flavour,
 Soft as spring wind that's come from birchen bowers 10
 Green come the shoots, aye April in the branches,
 As winter's wound with her sleight hand
     she staunches,
 Hath of the trees a likeness of the savour
 As white their bark, so white this lady's hours.

VILLANELLE THE PSYCHOLOGICAL HOUR

I
 I HAD over-prepared the event, that much was ominous
 With middle-ageing care
     I had laid out just the right books.
 I had almost turned down the pages.

*Beauty is so rare a thing
 So few drink of my fountain.*

So much barren regret,
 So many hours wasted!
 And now I watch, from the window, 10
     the rain, the wandering buses.

'Their little cosmos is shaken'— the air is alive with that fact.
 In their parts of the city they are played on by diverse forces

How do I know?
     Oh, I know well enough.
 For them there is something afoot.
     As for me,
 I had over-prepared the event— 20

*Beauty is so rare a thing
 So few drink of my fountain.*

Two friends a breath of the forest . .
 Friends? Are people less friends because one has just, at last, found
     them?
 Twice they promised to come

'Between the night and morning?'

*Beauty would drink of my mind.
 Youth would awhile forget my youth is gone from me. 30*

2

('Speak up! You have danced so stuffily?
     Some one admired your works,
     And said so frankly.

'Did you talk like a fool,
 The first night?
 The second evening?'

'But they promised again
     "‘To-morrow at tea-time.” ’)

3

Now the third day is here—no word from either; 40
 No word from her nor him,
 Only another man's note
     'Dear Pound, I am leaving England'

HUGH SELWYN MAUBERLEY<sup>1</sup>

(LIFE AND CONTACTS)

Vocat Æstus in Umbram<sup>2</sup>

Nemesianus Ec. IV.

I

E P Ode pour l'Election de son Sepulchre<sup>3</sup>

FOR three years, out of key with his
     time,
 He strove to resuscitate the dead art
 Of poetry, to maintain 'the sublime'
 In the old sense Wrong from the start—

<sup>1</sup> Of 'Hugh Selwyn Mauberley' T S Eliot says 'This seems to me a great poem I know very well that the apparent roughness and naïveté of the verse and rhyming of "Mauberley" are inevitably the result of many years of hard work if you cannot appreciate the dexterity of "Altaforte" you cannot appreciate the dexterity of "Mauberley" On the other side, the poem seems to me, when you have marked the sophistication and the great variety of the verse, verse of a man who knows his way about, to be a positive document of sensibility It is compact of the experience of a certain man in a certain place at a certain time, and it is also a document of an epoch, it is genuine tragedy and comedy; and it is, in the best sense of Arnold's worn phrase, "a criticism of life" ' Eliot, ed., Ezra Pound, Selected Poems (London, 1928), xxxii-iv.

No, hardly, but seeing he had been born
In a half-savage country, out of date, Bent resolutely on wringing lilies from the acorn,
Capaneus, trout for factitious bait,

Ἰδμεν γάρ τοι πάνθ' ὅσ' ἐνὶ Τροίῃ<sup>1</sup>
Caught in the unstopped ear; 10
Giving the rocks small lee-way
The chopped seas held him, therefore, that

His true Penelope was Flaubert,
He fished by obstinate isles,

2
The age demanded an image
Of its accelerated grimace,
Something for the modern stage,
Not, at any rate, an Attic grace,

Not, not certainly, the obscure reveries
Of the inward gaze,
Better mendacities
Than the classics in paraphrase!

The 'age demanded' chiefly a mould in plaster,
Made with no loss of time, 30
A prose kinema, not, not assuredly, alabaster
Or the 'sculpture' of rhyme.

and liars in public places.

1 'For we know all the things which are in Troy'
2 Pound has altered to the third person, Villon's opening line of his Grand Testament 'In the thirtieth year of my life' The phrase has become a contemporary cliché, as a cue for poetic retrospection.

Engaged in perfecting the catalogue,
I found the last scion of the Senatorial families of Strasbourg, Monsieur Verog.

For two hours he talked of Gallifet;
Of Dowson, of the Rhymers' Club;
Told me how Johnson (Lionel) died

Envoi (1919)

Go, dumb-born book, 220
Tell her that sang me once that song of

Lawes

Hadst thou but song
As thou hast subjects known,
Then were there cause in thee that should condone

Even my faults that heavy upon me lie,
And build her glories their longevity

Tell her that sheds
Such treasure in the air,
Recking naught else but that her graces give Life to the moment, 230
I would bid them live
As roses might, in magic amber laid,
Red overwrought with orange and all made
One substance and one colour Braving time

Tell her that goes
With song upon her lips
But sings not out the song, nor knows
The maker of it, some other mouth,
May be as fair as hers, 240
Might, in new ages, gain her worshippers, When our two dusts with Waller's shall be laid,
Siftings on siftings in oblivion,
Till change hath broken down

Scattered Moluccas
Not knowing, day to day,
The first day's end, in the next noon,
The placid water
Unbroken by the Simoon,

Thick foliage
Placid beneath warm suns,
Tawn foreshores
Washed in the cobalt of oblivions,

Or through dawn-mist
The grey and rose
Of the juridical

A consciousness disjunct,

The grand piano
Utters a profane
Protest with her clear soprano

The sleek head emerges
From the gold-yellow frock
As Anadyomene in the opening Pages of Reinach

Honey-red, closing the face-oval,
A basket-work of braids which seem as if they were
Spun in King Minos' hall
From metal, or intractable amber;

The face-oval beneath the glaze,
Bright in its suave bounding-line, as,
Beneath half-watt rays,
The eyes turn topaz.

AND then went down to the ship,
Set keel to breakers, forth on the godly sea,
and
We set up mast and sail on that swart ship, Bore sheep aboard her, and our bodies also Heavy with weeping, and winds from sternward

1 The clearest statement as to the ultimate structure of the Cantos has been made by William Butler Yeats, based on a conversation with Pound at Rapallo 'For the last hour we have sat upon the roof which is also a garden, discussing that immense poem of which but seven and twenty Cantos are already published I have often found there some scene of distinguished beauty but have never discovered why all the suits could not be dealt out in some quite different order Now at last he explains that it will, when the hundredth Canto is finished, display a structure like that of a Bach Fugue There will be no plot, no chronicle of events, no logic of discourse, but two themes, the descent into Hades from Homer, a metamorphosis from Ovid, and mixed with these mediæval or modern historical characters He has tried to produce that picture Porteous commended to Nicholas Poussin in Le Chef-d'œuvre Inconnu where everything rounds or thrusts itself without edges, without contours—conventions of the intellect—from a splash of tints and shades, to achieve a work as characteristic of the art of our time as the paintings of Cézanne, avowedly suggested by Porteous, as Ulysses and its dream association of words and images, a poem in which there is nothing that can be taken out and reasoned over, nothing that is not a part of the poem itself He has scribbled on the back of an envelope certain sets of letters that represent emotions or archetypal events—I cannot find any adequate definition—A B C D and then J K L M, and then each set of letters repeated, and then A B C D inverted and this repeated, and then a new element X Y Z, then certain letters that never recur and then all sorts of combinations of X Y Z and J K L M and A B C D and D C B A and all set whirling together He has shown me upon the wall a photograph of a Cosimo Tura decoration in three compartments, in the upper the Triumph of Love and the Triumph of Chastity, in the middle Zodiacal signs, and in the lower certain events in Cosimo Tura's day The descent and the metamorphosis—A B C D and J K L M—his fixed elements, took the place of the Zodiac, the archetypal persons—X Y Z—that of the Triumphs, and certain modern events—his letters that do not recur—that of those events in Cosimo Tura's day

'I may, now that I have recovered leisure, find that the mathematical structure, when taken up into the imagination, is more than mathematical, that seemingly irrelevant details fit together into a single theme, that here is no batch of tone and colour—Hodos Chameliontos—except for some odd corner where one discovers beautiful detail like that finely modelled foot in Porteous' disastrous picture

'It is almost impossible to understand the art of a generation younger than one's own. I was wrong about Ulysses when I had read but some first frag-

Bore us out onward with bellying canvas,
 Circe's this craft, the trim-coifed goddess Then sat we amidships, wind jamming the tiller,
 Thus with stretched sail, we went over sea till day's end
 Sun to his slumber, shadows o'er all the ocean, 10
 Came we then to the bounds of deepest water,
 To the Kimmerian lands, and peopled cities Covered with close-webbed mist, unpierced ever
 With glitter of sun-rays
 Nor with stars stretched, nor looking back from heaven
 Swartest night stretched over wretched men there.
 The ocean flowing backward, came we then to the place
 Aforesaid by Circe
 Here did they rites, Perumedes and Eurylochus,
 And drawing sword from my hip 20
 I dug the ell-square pitkin,
 Poured we libations unto each the dead,
 First mead and then sweet wine, water mixed with white flour
 Then prayed I many a prayer to the sickly death's-heads,
 As set in Ithaca, sterile bulls of the best
 For sacrifice, heaping the pyre with goods,
 A sheep to Tiresias only, black and a bell-sheep.
 Dark blood flowed in the fosse, Souls out of Erebus, cadaverous dead, of brides
 Of youths and of the old who had borne much, 30
 Souls stained with recent tears, girls tender, Men many, mauled with bronze lance
     heads,
 Battle spoil, bearing yet dreary arms,
 These many crowded about me, with shouting,
 Pallor upon me, cried to my men for more beasts,
 Slaughtered the herds, sheep slain of bronze,
 Poured ointment, cried to the gods,

ments, and I do not want to be wrong again—above all in judging verse. Perhaps when the sudden Italian spring has come I may have discovered what will seem all the more, because it is the opposite of all I have attempted, unique and unforgettable' Yeats, A Packet for Ezra Pound (Dublin, 1929), 2-4

To Pluto the strong, and praised Proserpine,
 Unsheathed the narrow sword,
 I sat to keep off the impetuous impotent
     dead, 40
 Till I should hear Tiresias
 But first Elpenor came, our friend
     Elpenor,
 Unburied, cast on the wide earth,
 Limbs that we left in the house of Circe, Unwept, unwrapped in sepulchre, since toils urged other Pitiul spirit And I cried in hurried speech
 'Elpenor, how art thou come to this dark coast?
 'Cam'st thou afoot, outstripping seamen?'
     And he in heavy speech
 'Ill fate and abundant wine I slept in Circe's ingle 50
 'Going down the long ladder unguarded,
 'I fell against the buttress,
 'Shattered the nape-nerve, the soul sought Avernus
 'But thou, O King, I bid remember me, unwept, unburied,
 'Heap up mine arms, be tomb by sea-board,
     and inscribed
 'A man of no fortune, and with a name to
     come
 'And set my oar up, that I swung mid fellows'

And Anticlea came, whom I beat off, and then Tiresias Theban, Holding his golden wand, knew me, and spoke first
 'A second time? why? man of ill star, 60
 'Facing the sunless dead and this joyless region?
 'Stand from the fosse, leave me my bloody bever
 'For soothsay.'
     And I stepped back,
 And he strong with the blood, said then 'Odysseus
 'Shalt return through spiteful Neptune, over dark seas,
 'Lose all companions' And then Anticlea
     came.
 Lie quiet Divus. I mean, that is Andreas Divus,
 In officina Wechelt, 1538, out of Homer.
 And he sailed, by Sirens and thence outward and away 70

And unto Circe
 Venerandam,<sup>1</sup>
 In the Cretan's phrase, with the golden crown, Aphrodite, Cypri munimenta sortita est,<sup>2</sup> mirthful, oricalchi,<sup>3</sup> with golden Girdles and breast bands, thou with dark eyelids Bearing the golden bough of Argicida. So that.

HANG it all, Robert Browning,
 there can be but the one 'Sordello.'
 But Sordello, and my Sordello? <sup>4</sup>
 Lo Sordels si fo di Mantovana
 So-shu churned in the sea Seal sports in the spray-whited circles of cliff-wash,
 Sleek head, daughter of Lir, eyes of Picasso
 Under black fur-hood, lithe daughter of Ocean,
 And the wave runs in the beach-groove 10
 'Eleanor, ἐλέανς and ἐλέπολις' <sup>5</sup>
 And poor old Homer blind, blind, as a bat,
 Ear, ear for the sea-surge, murmur of old men's voices
 'Let her go back to the ships,
 Back among Grecian faces, lest evil come on our own,
 Evil and further evil, and a curse cursed on our children,
 Moves, yes she moves like a goddess
 And has the face of a god and the voice of Schoeney's daughters,
 And doom goes with her in walking, 20
 Let her go back to the ships,
 back among Grecian voices.'
 And by the beach-run, Tyro,
 Twisted arms of the sea-god,
 Lithe sinews of water, gripping her,
 cross-hold,
 And the blue-gray glass of the wave tents
 them,
 Glare azure of water, cold-welter, close

 689 The epithet was punningly said of Helen.

Quiet sun-tawny sand-stretch,
 The gulls broad out their wings, nipping between the splay feathers, 30
 Snipe come for their bath,
 bend out their wing-joints,
 Spread wet wings to the sun-film,
 And by Scios,
 to left of the Naxos passage, Naviform rock overgrown,
 algæ cling to its edge,
 There is a wine-red glow in the shallows,
 a tin flash in the sun-dazzle.
 The ship landed in Scios, 40 men wanting spring-water,
 And by the rock-pool a young boy loggy with vine-must,
 'To Naxos? Yes, we'll take you to Naxos,
 Cum' along lad 'Not that way!'
 'Aye, that way is Naxos'
 And I said 'It's a straight ship.'
 And an ex-convict out of Italy knocked me into the fore-stays, (He was wanted for manslaughter in Tuscany)
 And the whole twenty against me, 50
 Mad for a little slave money
 And they took her out of Scios
 And off her course . . .
 And the boy came to, again, with the racket,
 And looked out over the bows,
 and to eastward, and to the Naxos passage
 God-sleight then, god-sleight
 Ship stock fast in sea-swirl, Ivy upon the oars, King Pentheus, grapes with no seed but sea-foam, 60
 Ivy in scupper-hole Aye, I, Acœtes, stood there, and the god stood by me,
 Water cutting under the keel,
 Sea-break from stern forrards,
 wake running off from the bow,
 And where was gunwale, there now was vine-trunk,
 And tenthril where cordage had been,
 grape-leaves on the rowlocks,
 Heavy vine on the oarshafts, 70
 And, out of nothing, a breathing, hot breath on my ankles,
 Beasts like shadows in glass,
 a furred tail upon nothingness.

Lynx-purr, and heathery smell of beasts,
     where tar smell had been,
 Snuff and pad-foot of beasts,
     eye-glitter out of black air.
 The sky overshot, dry, with no tempest,
 Snuff and pad-foot of beasts, 80
     fur brushing my knee-skin, Rustle of airy sheaths,
     dry forms in the æther.
 And the ship like a keel in ship-yard,
     slung like an ox in smith's sling, Ribs stuck fast in the ways, grape-cluster over pin-rack, void air taking pelt Lifeless air become sinewed, feline leisure of panthers, 90 Leopards snuffing the grape shoots by scupper-hole,
 Crouched panthers by fore-hatch,
 And the sea blue-deep about us,
     green-ruddy in shadows,
 And Lyæus 'From now, Acœtes, my altars, Fearing no bondage,
     fearing no cat of the wood,
 Safe with my lynxes,
     feeding grapes to my leopards, Olibanum is my incense, 100
     the vines grow in my homage.'

 The back-swell now smooth in the rudder-chains,
 Black snout of a porpoise where Lycabs had been,
 Fish-scales on the oarsmen.
     And I worship
 I have seen what I have seen
     When they brought the boy I said
 'He has a god in him, though I do not know which god' 110
 And they kicked me into the fore-stays
 I have seen what I have seen
     Medon's face like the face of a dory,
 Arms shrunk into fins And you, Pentheus,
 Had as well listen to Tiresias, and to Cadmus,
     or your luck will go out of you.
 Fish-scales over grom muscles,
     lynx-purr amid sea . . .

And of a later year,
     pale in the wine-red algæ, 120
 If you will lean over the rock,
     the coral face under wave-tinge,
 Rose-paleness under water-shift,
     Ileuthyeria, fair Dafne of sea-bords,
 The swimmer's arms turned to branches,
 Who will say in what year,
     fleeing what band of tritons,
 The smooth brows, seen, and half seen,
     now ivory stillness

And So-shu churned in the sea, So-shu also, 130
     using the long moon for a churn-stick . . .
 Lithe turning of water,
     sinews of Poseidon,
 Black azure and hyaline,
     glass wave over Tyro, Close cover, unstillness,
     bright welter of wave-cords,
 Then quiet water,
     quiet in the buff sands,
 Sea-fowl stretching wing-joints, 140 splashing in rock-hollows and sand-hollows
 In the wave-runs by the half-dune, Glass-glint of wave in the tide-rips against sunlight,
     pallor of Hesperus,
 Gray peak of the wave,
     wave, colour of grape's pulp.

Olive gray in the near,
     far, smoke gray of the rock-slide, Salmon-pink wings of the fish-hawk cast gray shadows in water, 150
 The tower like a one-eyed great goose cranes up out of the olive-grove,

And we have heard the fauns chiding Proteus
     in the smell of hay under the olive-trees,
 And the frogs singing against the fauns in the half-light.
 And . . .

A NOTE ON POETRY

GLANCING at random over the sheaf of poems in this selection, I fall on 'Lethe' and 'Song' Those, I know, I wrote in Cornwall, spring-summer 1918 I turn next to 'Fragment 36' and 'The Islands' Those, definitely, were written at Corfe Castle, in 1916, the year conscription came in The season was indefinite—rain beat against a high dormer window in a picturesque cobbled street, under the famous ruins of a castle where a young king was done to death while actually reaching, I believe, for the ceremonial stirrup-cup Anyhow, that town was reputedly haunted, as was the actual house I stayed in, in Cornwall

Poetry? I am to say, why I wrote, when I wrote and how I wrote these fragments I am to state this simply, for people who may not be altogether in sympathy with my own sort of work I wish I could do that I am so afraid I can not But the inner world of imagination, the ivory tower, where poets presumably do live, in memory, does stand stark with the sun-lit isles around it, while battle and din of battle and the whole dreary, tragic spectacle of our times seems blurred and sodden and not to be recalled, save in moments of repudiation, historical necessity I had not the power to repudiate at that time nor to explain But I do so well remember one shock—a letter from Miss Monroe,<sup>1</sup> timed nicely to arrive to greet me when I had staggered home, exhausted and half-asphyxiated (I and my companion had been shoved off the pavements, protesting to a special policeman that we would rather be killed on the pavement than suffocated in the underground) Miss Monroe was one of the first to print and recognize my talent But how strangely, farcically blind to our predicament! The letter suggested with really staggeringly inept solicitude that H D would do so well,—maybe, finally,—if she could get into 'life,' into the rhythm of our time, in touch with events, and so on and so on and so on I don't know what else she said I was laughing too much Ivory tower?

That was and is still, I believe with many, the final indictment of this sort of poetry

We don't live We don't see life And so on

10 In order to speak adequately of my poetry and its aims, I must, you see, drag in a whole deracinated epoch Perhaps specifically, I might say that the house next door was struck one night We came home and simply waded through glass, while wind from now unshuttered windows made the house a barn, an unprotected dug-out What does that sort of shock do to the mind, the imagination—not solely of myself, but 20 of an epoch? One of the group found some pleasure in the sight of the tilted shelves and the books tumbled on the floor He gave a decisive foot-ball kick with his army boot to the fattest volume It happened actually to be Browning He demanded dramatically, 'what is the use of all this—now?' To me, Fortu and the yellow-melon flower answered by existing They were in another space, another dimension, never so 30 clear as at that very moment The unexpected isle in the far seas remained Remains.

Life?

Poetry?

Times and places?

'Leda' was done at the same time as 'Lethe' Lotus-land, all this It is nostalgia for a lost land I call it Hellas I might, psychologically just as well, have listed the Casco Bay islands off the coast of Maine, but I called my islands Rhodes, Samos and 40 Cos They are symbols And, symbolically, the first island of memory was dredged away or lost, like a miniature Atlantis It was a thickly wooded island in the Lehigh river and, believe it or not, was actually named Calypso's island.

I don't know whether I finally shaped 'Lais,' 'Helen' and 'Fragment 113' in London or in Vaud I was back and forth those 50 years, usually tempering my dash across the continent with a day or so in Paris. There I saw a few people, picked up a few threads. Those poems belong to 1923-24, roughly. As to the song from the play 'Hippolytus Temporizes,' that is more difficult. I had made a few rough notes and jotted down a few metres in 1920 in the Ionian island of Corfu. I didn't get the play under way or shaped to my satisfaction till many years later. I think I made a rough outline in Vaud, and finally in London (I remember it was a particularly stuffy, dank, damp summer) I got the play finished. So the actual song might be dated Corfu, spring 1920, or London, summer 1926. The times of publication of this and the others were naturally different.

This leaves the early group, 'O, wind,' 'Orchard,' 'Sea Gods,' 'Oread,' 'The Pool.' I let my pencil run riot in those early days of my apprenticeship, in an old-fashioned school copy-book—when I could get one. Then I would select from many pages of automatic or pseudo-automatic writing the few lines that satisfied me. I was doing this anywhere, my first days in a dark London, autumn 1912, then in Italy where I spent that winter, Capri especially, where I had some time and space and found the actual geographical Greece for the first time—Syren isle of the Odyssey. I can not give actual dates to these early finished fragments, but they would be just pre-war and at latest, early-war period. Finished fragments? Yes, I suppose they are that—stylistic slashings, definitely self-conscious, though, as I say, impelled by some inner conflict.

The 'lost' world of the classics and the neo-classics is the world of childhood. 'What are the islands to me?' They are, I suppose, an inner region of defence, escape, these are the poems of escapism—if there is any such word. And of memory—suppressed memory, maybe. (And what about the mother of the Muses? Mnemosene, if I remember?) Actual memory, repressed memory, desire to escape, desire to create (music), intellectual curiosity, a wish to make real to myself what is most real, the fragmentary pages of the early Greek poets,—to tear, if it be even the barest fragment of vibrant, electric parchment from hands not always worthy to touch, to fingers whose sterile 'intellectuality' is so often a sort of inverted curse of Midas—these are some of the ingredients of my poetry. Times, places, dates don't seem so much to matter. Yet here are the times and places of these fragments, as well as I can time and place them.

And most dramatically, last Sunday I was called to the telephone. 'Your islands were on the air,' I was informed, 'and read beautifully.' 'Where?' I asked. 'Radio City, just a few minutes ago,' was the answer, 'didn't you hear your poem?' No. I did not. I should have liked, in time, in actuality to have heard my 'islands on the air,' here in this island, to have made that link with those other islands, Calypso's island or Catalpa island as some called it, vanished Atlantis in a river in Pennsylvania, sea-islands off the coast of Maine, Aegean islands sensed in passing and the actual Ionian island of Corfu, the early Capri, Syren island of Magna Graecia, and specifically, that island, noted in Phoenician days for its tin (a track ran past the house where I stayed in Cornwall, reputedly first used by the mules carrying tin from the mines to the Phoenician galleys)—England. I should like to have heard my 'islands on the air,' here in this island, the latest in my phantasy of islands, final link and perhaps 'clasp of the white necklace.'

FROM GARDEN

O WIND, rend open the heat,
cut apart the heat,
rend it to tatters

Fruit cannot drop through this thick air—fruit cannot fall into heat that presses up and blunts the points of pears and rounds the grapes.

Cut the heat—
plough through it, turning it on either side of your path

ORCHARD

I SAW the first pear
as it fell—
the honey-seeking, golden-banded, the yellow swarm was not more fleet than I, (spare us from loveliness) and I fell prostrate crying
you have flayed us with your blossoms, spare us the beauty of fruit-trees

10

The honey-seeking paused not,
the air thundered their song,
and I alone was prostrate

O rough-hewn
god of the orchard,
I bring you an offering—do you, alone unbeautiful, son of the god,
spare us from loveliness

20

these fallen hazel-nuts,
stripped late of their green sheaths, grapes, red-purple,
their berries
dripping with wine, pomegranates already broken, and shrunken figs
and quinces untouched,
I bring you as offering

SEA GODS

I

THEY say there is no hope—sand—drift—rocks—rubble of the sea—
the broken hulk of a ship, hung with shreds of rope,
pallid under the cracked pitch

They say there is no hope to conjure you—no whip of the tongue to anger you—no hate of words
you must rise to refute.

10

They say you are twisted by the sea, you are cut apart

by wave-break upon wave-break, that you are misshapen by the sharp rocks,
broken by the rasp and after-rasp.

That you are cut, torn, mangled, torn by the stress and beat,
no stronger than the strips of sand along your ragged beach.

2

But we bring violets, great masses—single, sweet wood-violets, stream-violets, violets from a wet marsh

20

Violets in clumps from hills,
tufts with earth at the roots,
violets tugged from rocks,
blue violets, moss, cliff, river-violets.

Yellow violets' gold, burnt with a rare tint—violets like red ash among tufts of grass

30

We bring deep-purple
bird-foot violets

We bring the hyacinth-violet, sweet, bare, chill to the touch—and violets whiter than the in-rush of your own white surf

3

For you will come,
you will yet haunt men in ships,
you will trail across the fringe of strait and circle the jagged rocks

40

You will trail across the rocks and wash them with your salt, you will curl between sand-hills—you will thunder along the cliff—break—retreat—get fresh strength—gather and pour weight upon the beach.

You will draw back,
and the ripple on the sand-shelf will be witness of your track
O privet-white, you will paint the lintel of wet sand with froth.

50

You will bring myrrh-bark and drift laurel-wood from hot coasts!

when you hurl high—high—we will answer with a shout.

For you will come,
you will come,
you will answer our taut hearts,
you will break the lie of men's thoughts, 60 and cherish and shelter us 1912-1914 1916

OREAD

WHIRL up, sea—
whirl your pointed pines, splash your great pines on our rocks,
hurl your green over us,
cover us with your pools of fir.
1912-1914 1924

THE POOL

ARE you alive?
I touch you
You quiver like a sea-fish
I cover you with my net
What are you—banded one?
1912-1914 1924

LEDA

WHERE the slow river
meets the tide,
a red swan lifts red wings
and darker beak,
and underneath the purple down of his soft breast uncurls his coral feet

Through the deep purple of the dying heat of sun and mist, 10
the level ray of sun-beam has caressed
the lily with dark breast, and flecked with richer gold its golden crest

Where the slow lifting of the tide, floats into the river and slowly drifts among the reeds, 20
and lifts the yellow flags, he floats
where tide and river meet.

Ah kingly kiss—
no more regret nor old deep memories to mar the bliss,
where the low sedge is thick, the gold day-lily outspreads and rests 30 beneath soft fluttering of red swan wings and the warm quivering of the red swan's breast.

THE ISLANDS

I

WHAT are the islands to me,
what is Greece,
what is Rhodes, Samos, Chios,
what is Paros facing west,
what is Crete?

What is Samothrace, rising like a ship,
what is Imbros rending the storm-waves
with its breast?

What is Naxos, Paros, Milos, 10 what the circle about Lycia, what, the Cyclades'
white necklace?

What is Greece—
Sparta, rising like a rock, Thebes, Athens,
what is Corinth?

What is Euboea
with its island violets, what is Euboea, spread with grass, 20 set with swift shoals,
what is Crete?

What are the islands to me,
what is Greece?

2

What can love of land give to me
that you have not—what do the tall Spartans know, and gentler Attic folk?

What has Sparta and her women more than this? 30

What are the islands to me
if you are lost—
what is Naxos, Tinos, Andros, and Delos, the clasp of the white necklace?

3

What can love of land give to me
that you have not,
what can love of strife break in me
that you have not?

Though Sparta enter Athens, 40 Thebes wrack Sparta,
each changes as water,
salt, rising to wreak terror and fall back.

4

'What has love of land given to you that I have not?'

I have questioned Tyrians where they sat on the black ships, weighted with rich stuffs, 50
I have asked the Greeks from the white ships, and Greeks from ships whose hulks lay on the wet sand, scarlet with great beaks
I have asked bright Tyrians and tall Greeks—
'what has love of land given you?'
And they answered—'peace'

5

But beauty is set apart, 60 beauty is cast by the sea,
a barren rock,
beauty is set about with wrecks of ships, upon our coast, death keeps the shallows—death waits clutching toward us from the deeps

Beauty is set apart,
the winds that slash its beach, 70 swirl the coarse sand upward toward the rocks.

Beauty is set apart from the islands and from Greece

6

In my garden
the winds have beaten the ripe lilies,
in my garden, the salt 80 has wilted the first flakes of young narcissus,
and the lesser hyacinth,
and the salt has crept
under the leaves of the white hyacinth.

7

What are the islands to me
if you are lost,
what is Paros to me 90
if your eyes draw back, what is Milos
if you take fright of beauty, terrible, torturous, isolated,
a barren rock?

What is Rhodes, Crete,
what is Paros facing west,
what, white Imbros?

What are the islands to me
if you hesitate, 100 what is Greece if you draw back from the terror and cold splendour of song and its bleak sacrifice?

SAPPHIC FRAGMENTS

36

I know not what to do my mind is divided —Sappho.

I KNOW not what to do,
my mind is reft
is song's gift best?
is love's gift loveliest?
I know not what to do,
now sleep has pressed weight on your eyelids.

Shall I break your rest, devouring, eager?

- is love's gift best?
 nay, song's the loveliest
 yet were you lost, what rapture
 could I take from song?
 what song were left?
- I know not what to do.
 to turn and slake
 the rage that burns, with my breath burn
 and trouble your cool breath?
 so shall I turn and take snow in my arms?
 (is love's gift best?) yet flake on flake
 of snow were comfortless, did you lie wondering,
 wakened yet unawake
- Shall I turn and take comfortless snow within my arms?
 press lips to lips that answer not,
 press lips to flesh
 that shudders not nor breaks?
- Is love's gift best?
 shall I turn and slake
 all the wild longing?
 O I am eager for you!
 as the Pleiads shake white light in whiter water so shall I take you?
- My mind is quite divided,
 my minds hesitate,
 so perfect matched,
 I know not what to do
 each strives with each as two white wrestlers standing for a match, ready to turn and clutch yet never shake muscle nor nerve nor tendon,
 so my mind waits
 to grapple with my mind,
 yet I lie quiet,
 I would seem at rest.
- I know not what to do strain upon strain, sound surging upon sound
 makes my brain blind, as a wave-line may wait to fall
- yet (waiting for its falling) still the wind may take from off its crest,
 white flake on flake of foam,
 that rises,
 seeming to dart and pulse and rend the light, so my mind hesitates
 above the passion quivering yet to break,
 so my mind hesitates
 above my mind,
 listening to song's delight.
- I know not what to do
 will the sound break, rending the night with rift on rift of rose and scattered light?
 will the sound break at last as the wave hesitant, or will the whole night pass and I lie listening awake?

Neither honey nor bee for me
 —Sappho
- Not honey,
 not the plunder of the bee from meadow or sand-flower or mountain bush, from winter-flower or shoot born of the later heat not honey, not the sweet stain on the lips and teeth not honey, not the deep plunge of soft belly and the clinging of the gold-edged pollen-dusted feet,
- Not so —
 though rapture blind my eyes, and hunger crisp
 dark and inert my mouth,
 not honey, not the south,
 not the tall stalk
 of red twin-lilies, nor light branch of fruit tree caught in flexible light branch,
- Not honey, not the south,
 ah flower of purple iris,
 flower of white,

or of the iris, withering the grass—
 for fleck of the sun's fire, gathers such heat and power,
 that shadow-print is light, cast through the petals
 of the yellow iris flower,

Not iris—old desire—old passion— 30 old forgetfulness—old pain—
 not thus, nor any flower,
 but if you turn again,
 seek strength of arm and throat,
 touch as the god,
 neglect the lyre-note, knowing that you shall feel about the frame, no trembling of the string but heat, more passionate 40 of bone and the white shell and fiery tempered steel

1921

You are as gold
 as the half-ripe grain that merges to gold again, as white as the white rain that beats through the half-opened flowers of the great flower tufts thick on the black limbs of an Illyrian apple bough

Can honey distill such fragrance 10 as your bright hair—
 for your face is as fair as rain, yet as rain that lies clear on white honey-comb, lends radiance to the white wax,
 so your hair on your brow casts light for a shadow

LETHE

NOR skin nor hide nor fleece
 Shall cover you,
 Nor curtain of crimson nor fine
 Shelter of cedar-wood be over you,
 Nor the fir-tree
 Nor the pine

Nor sight of whin nor gorse
 Nor river-yew,
 Nor fragrance of flowering bush,

Nor wailing of reed-bird to waken you, 10
 Nor of linnet,
 Nor of thrush.

Nor word nor touch nor sight
 Of lover, you Shall long through the night but for this:
 The roll of the full tide to cover you Without question,
 Without kiss.

LAIS<sup>1</sup>

Let her who walks in Paphos
 take the glass,
 let Paphos take the mirror
 and the work of frosted fruit, gold apples set with silver apple-leaf, white leaf of silver wrought with vein of gilt.

Let Paphos lift the mirror, let her look 10
 into the polished centre of the disk.

Let Paphos take the mirror,
 did she press
 flowerlet of flame-flower to the lustrous white of the white forehead?
 did the dark veins beat a deeper purple than the wine-deep tint of the dark flower? 20

Did she deck black hair one evening, with the winter-white flower of the winter-berry, did she look (reft of her lover) at a face gone white under the chaplet of white virgin-breath?

Lais, exultant, tyrannizing Greece,
 Lais who kept her lovers in the porch, lover on lover waiting, 30 (but to creep where the robe brushed the threshold where still sleeps Lais)
 so she creeps, Lais,

to lay her mirror at the feet of her who reigns in Paphos.

Lais has left her mirror
for she sees no longer in its depth the Lais' self that laughed exultant 40 tyrannizing Greece.

Lais has left her mirror,
for she weeps no longer,
finding in its depth,
a face, but other than dark flame and white feature of perfect marble.

Lais has left her mirror,
(so one wrote)
to her who reigns in Paphos, 50
Lais who laughed a tyrant over Greece,
Lais who turned the lovers from the porch,
that swarm for whom now
Lais has no use,
Lais is now no lover of the glass,
seeing no more the face as once it was,
wishing to see that face and finding this.

HELEN

ALL Greece hates
the still eyes in the white face, the lustre as of olives
where she stands, and the white hands

All Greece reviles
the wan face when she smiles, hating it deeper still when it grows wan and white, remembering past enchantments 10 and past ills.

Greece sees unmoved,
God's daughter, born of love,
the beauty of cool feet
and slenderest knees, could love indeed the maid,
only if she were laid,
white ash amid funereal cypresses.
1923-1924 1924

FROM HIPPOLYTUS TEMPORIZES

WHERE is the nightingale,
in what myrrh-wood and dim?
O let the night come black for we would conjure back
all that enchanted him,
all that enchanted him

Where is the bird of fire, in what packed hedge of rose?
in what roofed ledge of flower?
no other creature knows 10
what magic lurks within,
what magic lurks within.

Bird, bird, bird, bird we cry, hear, pity us in pain,
hearts break in the sunlight, hearts break in daylight rain,
only night heals again,
only night heals again

GREEN SYMPHONY<sup>1</sup>

I

THE glittering leaves of the rhododendrons
Balance and vibrate in the cool air,
While in the sky above them
White clouds chase each other

<sup>1</sup> The material in the "Symphonies" is autobiographic, they were printed in the order as written, with the exception of "Midsummer Dreams" ("Symphony in White and Blue") and "Poppies of the Red Year"

Like scampering rabbits,
Flashes of sunlight sweep the lawn;
They fling in passing Patterns of shadow,
Golden and green

("Symphony in Scarlet") which come from the summer following the year 1914 when all the others were written. Many elements went to their making. The vivid, luminous colour of Gauguin—the vowel-nuances of Mallarmé—the shifting, rhythmic diversity of Debussy—all these I tried to combine with their emotional and tonal patterns. The "Green Symphony"

With long cascades of laughter, 10
The mating birds dart and swoop to the turf
'Mid their mad trillings
Glints the gay sun behind the trees.

Down there are deep blue lakes
Orange blossom droops in the water.

In the tower of the winds,
All the bells are set adrift
Jingling
For the dawn

Thin fluttering streamers 20
Of breeze lash through the swaying boughs,
Palely expectant
The earth receives the slanting rain

I am a glittering raindrop
Hugged close by the cool rhododendron.
I am a daisy starring
The exquisite curves of the close-cropped turf

The glittering leaves of the rhododendron
Are shaken like blue-green blades of grass,
Flickering, cracking, falling 30
Splintering in a million fragments

The wind runs laughing up the slope
Stripping off handfuls of wet green leaves,
To fling in peoples' faces
Wallowing on the daisy-powdered turf,
Clutching at the sunlight,
Cavorting in the shadow

Like baroque pearls,
Like cloudy emeralds,
The clouds and the trees clash together, 40
Whirling and swirling,
In the tumult
Of the spring,
And the wind

2

The trees splash the sky with their fingers,
A restless green rout of stars

With whirling movement
They swing their boughs is peculiarly a poem of spring—spring seen in three aspects morning, noon, and afternoon fading to evening. In general, the "Symphonies" have no meaning beyond the primary statement of the moods they recall. The identification of self and object was, in them, deliberately made as close as possible. Author's note

About their stems
Planes on planes of light and shadow 50
Pass among them,
Opening fan-like to fall.

The trees are like a sea;
Tossing,
Trembling,
Roaring,
Wallowing,
Darting their long green flickering fronds up at the sky,
Spotted with white blossom-spray.

The trees are roofs 60
Hollow caverns of cool blue shadow, Solemn arches
In the afternoons
The whole vast horizon
In terrace beyond terrace,
Pinnacle above pinnacle,
Lifts to the sky
Serrated ranks of green on green.

They caress the roofs with their fingers,
They sprawl about the river to look into it,
Up the hill they come 70
Gesticulating challenge
They cower together
In dark valleys,
They yearn out over the fields.

Enamelled domes
Tumble upon the grass,
Crashing in ruin
Quiet at last

The trees lash the sky with their leaves, 80
Uneasily shaking their dark green manes.

3

Far let the voices of the mad wild birds be calling me,
I will abide in this forest of pines.

When the wind blows
Batting through the forest,
I hear it distantly,
The crash of a perpetual sea.

When the rain falls,
I watch silver spears slanting downwards
From pale river-pools of sky, 90
Enclosed in dark fiends

Heat pressing upon earth with irresistible langour,
 Turns all the solid forest into half-liquid smudge. 20

The heavy clouds like cargo-boats strain slowly against its current,
 And the flickering of the haze is like the thunder of ten thousand paddles Against the heavy wall of the horizon, pale-blue and utterly windless, Whereon the sun hangs motionless, a brassy disc of flame

3

Full Moon

Flinging its arc of silver bubbles, quickly shifts the moon
 From side to side of us as we go down its path,
 I sit on the deck at midnight and watch it slipping and sliding, Under my tilted chair, like a thin film of spilt water

 It is weaving a river of light to take the place of this river,
 A river where we shall drift all night, then come to rest in its shallows, 30
 And then I shall wake from my drowsiness and look down from some dim treetop
 Over white lakes of cotton, like moonfields on every side

4

The Moon's Orchestra

When the moon lights up
 Its dull red campfire through the trees,
 And floats out, like a white balloon,
 Into the blue cup of the night, borne by a casual breeze,
 The moon-orchestra then begins to stir Jiggle of fiddles commence their crazy dance in the darkness
 Crickets churr
 Against the stark reiteration of the rusty flutes which frogs 40
 Puff at from rotted logs
 In the swamp

And then the moon begins her dance of frozen pomp
 Over the lightly quivering floor of the flat and mournful river.
 Her white feet slightly twist and swirl
 She is a mad girl
 In an old unlit ball room Whose walls, half-guessed at through the gloom,
 Are hung with the rusty crape of stark
 black cypress
 Which show, through gaps and tatters, red stains half hidden away 50

5

The Stevedores

Frieze of warm bronze that glides with catlike movements
 Over the gangplank poised and yet awaiting,
 The sinewy thudding rhythm of forty shuffling feet
 Falling like muffled drumbeats on the stillness
 O roll the cotton down,
 Roll, roll the cotton down,
 From the further side of Jordan,
 O roll the cotton down!

And the river waits,
 The river listens, 60
 Chuckling little banjo-notes that break with a flop on the stillness,
 And by the low dark shed that holds the heavy freights,
 Two lonely cypress trees stand up and point with stiffened fingers Far southward where a single chimney stands out aloof in the sky

6

Night Landing

After the whistle's roar has bellowed and shuddered, Shaking the sleeping town and the somnolent river,
 The deep toned floating of the pilot's bell
 Suddenly warns the engines

They stop like heart-beats that abruptly stop,
 The shore glides to us, in a wide low curve. 70

And then—supreme revelation of the river—
The tackle is loosed—the long gangplank swings outwards—
And poised at the end of it, half-naked beneath the searchlight,
A blue-black negro with gleaming teeth waits for his chance to leap.

7

The Silence

There is a silence I carry about with me always,
A silence perpetual, for it is self-created,
A silence of heat, of water, of unchecked fruitfulness
Through which each year the heavy harvests bloom, and burst and fall

Deep, matted green silence of my South, Often within the push and scorn of great cities,
I have seen that mile-wide waste of water swaying out to you,
And on its current glimmering, I am going to the sea

There is a silence I have achieved I have walked beyond its threshold,
I know it is without horizons, boundless, fathomless, perfect
And some day maybe, far away,
I will curl up in it at last and sleep an endless sleep.

A NOTE ON POLYPHONIC PROSE

IN a recent essay on Shelley, the English critic Herbert Read has said, 'Poetry is mainly a function of language—the exploitation of a medium, a vocal and mental material, in the interests of a personal mood or emotion, or of the thoughts evoked by such moods and emotions. I do not think we can say much more about it, according to our sensitivity we recognize its success. The rest of our reasoning about it is either mere prejudice, ethical anxiety, or academic pride.' Earlier, in one of his critical volumes, the same critic pointed out that there is no hard and fast dividing line to be drawn between poetry and prose. The dividing line, if one is to be sought, must be found not in the form employed, but in the quality of the experience conveyed. 'Poetry is intensive experience, prose is extensive experience.' These remarks, with which I am entirely in agreement, will serve, I think, to illuminate much that has happened in the development of poetry in the English language for the last twenty-five years, including the still vexed question as to the place to be occupied by the unusual form known as polyphonic prose.

The period from 1913 to 1929 was, in England, and still more in America, immensely fecund in technical poetic experiment. It has been followed by a period in which the relation of the poets' ideas to tradition, to society, to dogmatic theology, or to schemes for social justice has been the chief topic debated. As a result both English and American poetry have become progressively more and more intellectualized, while the rich repertory of new forms which the poets, notably the Imagists, of the earlier years evolved has been somewhat overlooked. Whether the process of intellectualization has now reached its limit, it is too early as yet to say. But it is still worth while to reflect for a moment on some of the poetic novelties of twenty years ago and to evaluate their potentialities.

Polyphonic prose is an attempt to employ some of the most time-hallowed rhythmic devices of poetry, such as rhyme, refrain, assonance and alliteration, for the sake of rendering more vividly thereby a range of experience that lies halfway between the domain of poetry and that of prose. In order to describe this range of experience clearly and accurately, one has to go back and examine closely the materials out of which most long poems are composed—inasmuch as polyphonic prose is in itself a form more suitable to extended experience than the stricter kind of Imagism. Somewhat over a century ago Poe declared that the long poem, as such, was a contradiction in terms, being composed of long passages of versified prose interspersed with other passages of poetry. Since then other theorists have raised the issue in another form and have debated the question of 'pure poetry,' just how much pure poetry exists in any language, and where may it be found? This question, however, as to whether 'pure poetry' does exist, and if so for how long in poems of an extended type, need not detain us. There is sufficient agreement among the critics of all schools that one of the leading characteristics of poetry as distinguished from prose is its compressed, intensive utterance. Or, as T. S. Eliot once remarked, one of the chief reasons for writing poetry today is that it saves space.

Polyphonic prose represents the first attempt in English to convey intense poetic experience within a form which takes as its basis that which academic critics, to distinguish it from ordinary prose or from the elaborate and subtly varied prose of Sir Thomas Brown and De Quincey, have called 'oratorical prose.' The difference between this type of 'oratorical prose,' intended to be spoken aloud, and ordinary prose is that in the former the cadences are in general more regular and more marked. Anyone who will take the trouble to read aloud some famous oration of the past, such as Webster's reply to Hayne, or Burke's indictment of Warren Hastings, will find therein long passages which scan rhythmically. The New England writers of the last century knew this very well, and continually employed passages which in effect are blank verse written as prose, whenever they wanted to be especially eloquent and poetical. One can find such passages in Melville and Hawthorne, and the famous first preface to Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass could be transposed entirely into an oratorical type of versification, akin to Whitman's own, with practically no loss. The only difference, strictly speaking, between such passages and polyphonic prose is that these earlier attempts to write a more poetical and vocal type of prose tend for the most part to recall English blank verse, while the later form of polyphonic prose admits no such constancy. It attempts to follow as its basis a rhythm that is kept continually shifting between verse and prose.

It is no derogation to the form itself to say that it was discovered entirely by accident. Miss Amy Lowell, to whom the discovery is entirely due, became interested in the form through her admiration for the Ballades Françaises of M. Paul Fort. As she pointed out in her introduction to Can Grande's Castle, M. Fort's work constantly intersperses passages written in prose with others written in the regular classic French measure, the Alexandrine. Inasmuch as the Alexandrine itself is not an easy rhythm for ears attuned to English to sustain over long periods, Miss Lowell realized that some other English rhythm must be devised. Iambic pentameter, the usual alternative, was rejected by Miss Lowell, as she herself stated, because it was difficult to depart from and go back to; so she finally hit upon the expedient of basing her form 'on the long, flowing cadence of oratorical prose.'

The two examples printed in this anthology may give some idea of the possibilities of the range and the flexibility inherent in the form. To take Miss Lowell's contribution, 'The Cross-Roads,' first. Here we have a dramatic narrative, owing something to Browning's dramatic narratives in its mingling of suspense and atmosphere and vivid movement from one episode to another, but owing still more to Miss Lowell's own command over the narrative style, so manifest in many of her other poems, and constantly recalling by its 'recurrence of a dominating thought or image, coming in irregularly and in varying words,' the effect of a ballad. My own 'Clipper-Ships' is somewhat different. It attempts to display a verbal panorama of the whole Clipper-Ship era of New England, with a marked refrain based on the combination of an old sea-chantey and the single dominating image of the ship, 'beautiful as a tiered cloud.' My poem in short is a brief descriptive epic, while Miss Lowell's is a dramatic ballad.

The form of polyphonic prose is thus flexible enough to permit a considerable variety of subject matter. I can see no reason why good polyphonic prose poems should not be written dealing with themes drawn from experiences of love, of personal bereavement, or of religion. But the surcharging of the prose paragraph with all the possible effects of rhyme, assonance, alliteration and refrain which the form itself implies makes it only applicable to poems which deal with states of high emotion rather than intellectual tension. I cannot imagine any ultra-modern intellectualist-poet using this form for his metaphysical cogitations on the meaning of life, death, the Catholic dogma, or the proletarian revolution

Since Miss Lowell and I first began to write in polyphonic prose, not many poets have cared to continue with the experiment. It would seem that there is a considerable and general prejudice against the acceptance as poetical of any form which appears typographically to be prose, even though it may possess in ways capable of great variation so many characteristics of fine poetry. Miss Lowell herself referred to this typographical difficulty in her discussion of the form, but she pointed out that if polyphonic prose is read aloud from the page the difficulty immediately disappears. This is indeed the case, though I also fancy that most poetry when not read aloud from the page similarly loses a considerable part of its effect. Nevertheless, polyphonic prose does demand a special effort on the part of the reader to follow. But so does all fine poetry!

Various prose writers seeking for an extension of prose into realms beyond the naturalistic have recently put into their novels long passages of lyrical and emotional description that recall the devices first discovered by the writers of polyphonic prose. One might cite here Thomas Wolfe and his use of the refrain, 'O lost, and by the wind grieved, ghost, come back again,' throughout his Look Homeward, Angel, or Conrad Aiken's use in his novel, Great Circle, of the 'stream of consciousness' monologue elaborated in a more poetic and rhythmic way than Joyce had allowed himself in Ulysses. These attempts, and some others like them, show that variations of polyphonic prose have by no means been abandoned, and that the vein is very far from being worked out.

I myself, however, feel it necessary to warn the reader that I did not continue my writing in polyphonic prose form beyond the year 1920. The few specimens which I was able to produce, all—with one exception which still remains in manuscript—published in my Breakers and Granite, cost me so much time and effort, and met with such poor response, that I decided after much thinking to abandon the form in favour of a type of verse which more closely approached the familiar stanzaic forms. Whether I was right or wrong in my direction I cannot say. Sufficient for me to assert that I still believe polyphonic prose to be a medium with very remarkable possibilities, sufficient for me to wish with all my heart that more modern poets would some day try their hands at it.

CLIPPER-SHIPS

10 BEAUTIFUL as a tiered cloud, skysails set and shrouds twanging, she emerges from the surges that keep running away before day on the low Pacific shore. With the roar of the wind blowing half a gale after, she heels and lunges, and buries her bows in the smother, lifting them swiftly, and scattering the glistening spray-drops from her jibsails with laughter. Her spars are crack-
20 ing, her royals are half splitting, her lower stunsail booms are bent aside, like bow-strings ready to loose, and the water is roaring into her scuppers, but she still staggers out under a full press of sail, her upper trucks enkindled by the sun into shafts of rosy flame

Oh, the anchor is up and the sails they are set, and it's 'way Rio, 'round Cape Stuff and up to Boston, ninety days hauling at the ropes the decks slope and the stays creak 30 as she lurches into it, sending her jib awash at every thrust, and a handful of dust and a thirst to make you weep, are all we get for being two years away to sea

Topgallant stunsail has carried away! Ease the spanker! The anchor is rusted on the deck. Men in short duck trousers, wide-brimmed straw hats, with brown mahogany faces, pace up and down, spinning the wornout yarns they told a year ago. Some 40 are coiling rope, some smoke, 'Chups' is picking oakum near the boats. Ten thousand miles away lies their last port. In the rigging climbs a hairy monkey, and a green parakeet screams at the masthead. In the dead calm of a boiling noonday near the line, she lifts her spread of shining canvas from heel to truck, from jib o' jib to ring-tail, from moonsails to watersails. Men have hung their washing in the stays so she 50 can get more way on her. She ghosts along before an imperceptible breeze, the sails hanging lump in the cross-trees, and clashing against the masts. She is a proud white albatross skimming across the ocean, beautiful as a tiered cloud. Oh, a Yankee ship comes down the river, blow, boys, blow her masts and yards they shine like silver blow, my bully boys, blow she's a crack ship, a dandy clipper, nine hundred miles from land, she's a down-Easter from Massachusetts, and she's bound to the Rio Grande!

Where are the men who put to sea in her on her first voyage? Some have piled their bones in California among the hides, some died frozen off the Horn in snowstorms, some slipped down between two greybacks, when the yards were joggled suddenly Still she glistens beautifully, her decks snow-white with constant scrubbing as she sweeps into some empty sailless bay which sleeps all day, where the wild deer skip away when she fires her eighteen pounder, the sound reverberating about the empty hills San Francisco? No San Francisco will not be built for a dozen years to come Meanwhile she hums with the tumult of loading The mutineers, even, are let out of their irons and flogged and fed Every day from when the dawn flares up red amid the hills to the hour it drops dead to westward, men walk gawkily, balancing on their heads the burden of heavy, stiff hides Now the anchor is up and the sails they are set and it's 'way, Rio Boston girls are pulling at the ropes only three months of trouble yet time for us to go!

Beautiful as a tiered cloud she flies out seaward, and on her decks loaf and stumble a luckless crowd, and filthy sweepings of the stews In a week, in a day, they have spent a year's wages, swilling it away and letting the waste of it run down among the gutters How were these deadbeats bribed to go? Only the Ann Street runners know.
 Dagos, Dutchmen, Souwegians, niggers, crimp-captured greenhorns, they loaf up on the after deck, some of them already wrecks, so sick they wish they had never been born Before them all the 'old man' calls for a bucket of salt water to wash off his shore face. While he is at it, telling them how he will haze them till they are dead if they try soldiering, but it will be good grub and easy work if they hand, reef and steer and heave the lead, his officers are below, rummaging through the men's dunnage, pulling out heavers, pricklers, rum bottles, sheath knives, and pistols On each grizzled half-cowed face appears something between a sheepish grin, a smurk of fear, a threat of treachery, and the dogged resignation of a brute But the mate—Bucko Dougles is his name—is the very same that booted three men off the masthead when they were shortening sail in the teeth of a Cape Horn snorter Two of them fell into the sea, and the third was tossed still groaning into the water Only last night the captain stuck his cigar butt into one poor swabber's face for not minding the compass, and gave Jim Baines a taste of ratline hash for coming up on deck with dirty hands Meanwhile under a grand spread of canvas, one hundred feet from side to side, the ship rides up the parallels From aloft through the blue stillness of a tropic night, crammed with stars, with thunder brewing in the horizon, a mournful echo rises and swells

Oh, my name is hanging Johnny,
 Hooray, hooray!

Oh, my name is hanging Johnny,
 So hang, boys, hang

The Great Republic, launched before thirty thousand people, her main truck overlooking the highest steeple of the town, the eagle at her bows, and colours flying,
 now in her first and last port, is slowly dying She is a charred hulk, with toppling masts, seared gilding, and blistered sides
 The Alert no more slides pertly through the bergs of the Horn The desolate barrens of Staten Land, where no man was ever born, hold her bones The Black Baller
Lightning, that took eighty thousand dollar-worth of cargo around the world in one quick trip, was hurled and ripped to pieces on some uncharted reef or other The Dreadnought disappeared in a hurricane's smother of foam The Sovereign of the Seas, that never furled her top-sails for ten years, was sheared clean amidships by the bows of an iron steamer as she left her last port The slaver, Bald Eagle, cut an unlucky career short when she parted with her anchor and piled up on the Paracels where the pirate junks are waiting for every ship that swells out over the horizon. The Ante- lope was caught off the Grande Ladrone in the northeast monsoon, she's gone. The Flying Cloud, proud as she was of beating every ship that carried the Stars and Stripes or the St. George's flag, could not race faster than a thunder-bolt that fell one day on her deck and turned her to a cloud of flame—everything burned away but her fame! No more will California hear the little Pilgrim's parting cheer The crew took to an open boat when their ship was scuttled by a privateer So they die out, year after year

Sometimes the lookout on a great steamer wallowing and threshing through the heavy seas by night, sees far off on his lee quarter something like a lofty swinging light Beautiful as a tiered cloud, a ghostly clipper-ship emerges from the surges that keep running away before day on the low Pacific shore Her upper works are enkindled by the sun into shafts of rosy flame Swimming like a duck, steering like a fish, easy yet dry, lively yet stiff, she lifts cloud on cloud of crowded stainless sail She creeps abeam, within hail, she dips, she chases, she outpaces like a mettlesome racer the lumbering tea-kettle that keeps her company Before she fades into the weather quarter, the lookout cries 'Holy Jiggers, are you the Flying Dutchman, that you go two knots to our one?' Hoarsely comes back this answer from the sail 'Challenge is our name America our nation Bully Waterman our master we can beat Creation'

And it's 'way, Rio,
Way—hay—hay, Rio
O, fare you well, my pretty young girl,
For we're bound to the Rio Grande

THE SWAN <sup>1</sup>

UNDER a wall of bronze,
Where beeches dip and trail
Thin branches in the water,
With red-tipped head and wings,
A beaked ship under sail,
There glides a great black swan

Under the autumn trees
He goes The branches quiver,
Dance in the wraith-like water,
Which ripples beneath the sedge <sup>10</sup>
With the slackening furrow that glides
In his wake when he is gone
The beeches bow dark heads.

Into the windless dusk,
Where in mist great towers stand Guarding a lonely strand
That is bodiless and dim,
He speeds with easy stride,
And I would go beside,
Till the low brown hills divide
At last, for me and him

ELEGY ON TINTERN ABBEY

THAT 'something far more deeply interfused
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns'
Has changed direction now And that which woke
In one man's vision, fired by the setting sun
Of faith from these old altars, has gone down Like life-blood trickling from the wounds of Christ Slowly, to the dumb grass And that which stirred
Within the silence of the cemetery
That followed after the proud challenge pealed
From lips that loved America and France,
Was a loud mocking hoot from factories <sup>11</sup> Crying, 'Come out, be filled ' And so the
world Turned backward from its path and followed gold's
False rushlight gleaming from the dismal swamp,
Mocking the prophets always and their creed

And thus the music of humanity,
'Of ample power to chasten and subdue,'

this scene and the mood it evoked that I tried to convey in my verse The mingling of exact rhyme with assonance (for example "sedge" and "heads" in the second stanza), the free stanzaic form, the combination of words denoting colour with vowel sounds suggesting the flow of the river, are all effects that may be found in some of my longer poems, such as the "Symphonies," but here shortened and compressed' Benét, ed., Fifty Poets (N Y, 1933), 72-73

That still sad music breathed from out these stones,
 Was lost amidst the mounting shriek and blare
 Of 'sell quick and buy cheap ' And so the world 20
 Grew one vast Manchester of laisser- faire,
 Low and victorious, 'mong which stranger-folk
 Who clinked the spurs of Cavaliers, or swore
 The oaths of the mad Puritans, went down
 To drink the stream of Lethe with their peers

 God of the world, Who suffers the unjust, Poured out His potent spell It fumed like
 wine,
 In many brains. One merely spelled out words
 In some newspaper, and the morning's sun
 Rose clear to greet them Long as outward
 white 30
 Was inward black, one was content to swear
 That all was well with earth Meanwhile the wheels
 Turned furious, and the little wheels of
 Time
 Beside them, saw they ran the faster as New nations learned the trick to make them turn

 No one can say what happened then, nor how Men had no time to pause and gather thought
 Earth in its furious dance spun one mad
 twirl,
 And then beyond the wheels were sudden
 come
 The lean grey throats of guns uneasily crouching 40
 And searching skies for prey What made the world
 Grow dark, and then the awful echoes start, Rebounding here and echoing there, none
 knew,
 Only the wheels had got at last their way
 Not three hours then, but four years
 Calvary

Meantime the dawn kept to its 'priestlike task'
 Of waking worlds too brutalized to ask, Aught but 'how long?' too agonized to
 know
 Aught but the need of fitting on anew
 One's gas-mask, fixing bayonets again 50
 Against attacks unseen To such a strain
 As this now blew 'the misty mountain-winds'
 That once spoke liberty And to this came Songs of man's triumph in the swelling main
 Full-tide set towards progress Till, at last,
 The sullen guns grew weary riddling earth
 To rubbish-heaps and so withdrew again,
 Leaving the beaten folk to cower there,
 Behind the barrier of an empty word

 And then men saw, as dawn at last released
 The last long trenchline furrowing earth defiled, 61
 That man was fastened hand and foot alike
 To his machines, not as Prometheus now Chained to his sad rock and yet nobler than The god that doomed him but Ixion cursed,
 Who raped great Hera, and hence, self-condemned,
 Must roll through Hell forever on his wheel

 What then can free our fingers or dispel
 The chill delusion of dark crawling thoughts
 That haunt too close the tomb? Can madness save 70
 The sanity of the void? Is there a tune
 Not torn from man's guts by the fiddling bow
 Of greed and ignorance hired each day anew
 To play on them? Well, if there is, not here
 May it be found, where, as a numbing spell,
 Some ancient acquiescence haunts the
 dust,
 But rather where the shells and shards are piled,
 Vain effort, with the souls that strove in vain,
 There you may find some outcast sons of men
 Who see, but will not yield to their despair. 80

ELEGY ON AN EMPTY
SKYSCRAPER<sup>1</sup>

I

AGAINST the wall of this sky, Leaden pall threaded with cardboard boxes, the pale light of the towers Flickers unearthly still,
Long leaden streets between them Against the wall of this sky, the creamwhite faces
Of stone blocks bound in glittering steel gleam high,
Jut to the sky, and break Packed huddled ranks of clouds and roofs apart
Thrusting their own horizon yet a little higher.

Beauty is spread 10
Here over hollow voids, beneath these walls Clamour of traffic slides through corridors,
Long elevator-shafts shoot mountainously downwards
Steel on the surface repels
This drizzling daylight, through the inner core
Vertical darkness spreads,
Extends its empire upwards,
Forces the tower to tremble with dull
sound

Noise of wheels tuned to wheels
Driving the darkness skyward, 20 Forcing the human darkness that should hide

<sup>1</sup> 'The Empire State Building, the tallest in New York and in the world, was finished in the spring of 1931, but thanks to the depression has still remained largely empty on its upper floors. When I first saw it, in July 1931, on a day of threatening thunderstorms to north and coppery sunset to westward, I could not escape the impression that I was standing on the summit of a spot as uninhabited as Everest. I stayed there three or four hours, filling several pages of a notebook with such scattered fragments of impression as "leaden pall threaded with cardboard boxes" to describe the sky, or "noise of wheels tuned to wheels" to describe the traffic. It was not until two months and more had passed, on the return journey to England, that on going over my notebook I found the fragments I had assembled could be shaped into a poem. The form is loosely stanzaic, and the second section aims, by repetition of rhymes from one stanza to another, to give something of the effect of climbing upwards.' Author's note.

The earth in fruitfulness, still bleakly
upward,
In a stark affirmation, Stone flanged to steel here to repel the daylight,
Void affirmation, since the sky goes higher
And men drift past, unseeing, Bowed deeper by the weight of locked-in
stone —

Balancing bodies against the heat that holds
Its swift course vertically downwards, Dragging their heavy feet into its molten pavements, 30
Swaying their shrinking flesh against its reverberant walls,
Noise of wheels tuned to wheels,
Bewildered by the men that move amid
them,
While still the tower lurches
Upwards with its long shadow, Flight of white ripples four-square on the
sky

Here is this drift against the wall of the sky,
Steel arms that lift,
Tackle that rattles,
Torches that sputter, 40
Chattering hammers that shake the empty brain,
The roar and the mutter
Of the swift elevated train,
And the ships at the dockside,
The pencilled lines of the bridges,
The dull green carpet of park,
The wide grey floor of the bay—
Is all this living to-day?
The fuming and looping line of the surly river to westward,
Stained by the sunset to red— 50
Is all this living, or dead?
Dead are the twinkling lights and the sombre reflections
Of the earth-dwellers stretched heavenwards here from below?
Who is there living to know?
Only the wide hollow offices, the corridors empty of light, Tier after tier going downwards here into the night.

2

Thick pencil of shadow stretched across the street,
If I could lift

Your weight and make you write,
 Or if at night 60
 I could make move that fixed and arrogant
 light
 That stands there empty glaring to repeat,
 In higher guise, the street-lamp's signal-
 flight,
 What against all the words that we repeat
 In vain to-day,
 What is the one word I would make you
 say?

'Here where once stared in dumb hope to the sky
 Man by his naked blaze, and saw smoke take away
 In folds of undulating grey His prayer, not knowing walls however high 70
 Here wall on wall is heaped, steel thread to thread
 Is riveted to extend the ever-dead
 Vain flight of shadow where the chasms
 cry '

Is this the word, or is some other thing
 That which I seek, the sky gives no reply,
 Will man grow wise and grow another wing
 As powerful as the one that set on high
 This thing?
 I do not know
 But slow the darkness gathers, echoes bring 80
 Only the wild cries of mechanic woe

3
 Could I but strip you down,
 Tear steel from steel in long peeled strips, and break
 The interlocking blocks of cream-white
 stone,
 Send them like autumn leaves swift spinning down,
 Or level, near and far,
 This city, spread about you greening fields,
 Leave you alone, all empty as you are,
 Gleaming-nerved flower that no grass reveals,

Either I'd do 90
 But it is vain within your walls to go,
 To feel in your dead heart the beat and strain
 Of hopes grown panic-smitten, to and fro
 Millions of meaningless lights,
 When all about you is the soundless night's

There is wide space between Man's topmast and his keel, and in it death Comes without sign or sound or stir of breath
 No one shall fill that room, or take his place
 In it, as stowaway or come-aboard, 100 Nor shall the meagre window-blind be lowered,
 Nor shall the dark be levelled by a face.

FIREWORKS

You hate me and I hate you,
 And we are so polite, we two!

But whenever I see you, I burst apart
 And scatter the sky with my blazing heart.
 It spits and sparkles in stars and balls,
 Buds into roses—and flares, and falls

Scarlet buttons, and pale green disks,
 Silver spirals and asterisks,
 Shoot and tremble in a mist
 Peppered with mauve and amethyst 10

I shine in the windows and light up the trees,
 And all because I hate you, if you please

And when you meet me, you rend asunder
 And go up in a flaming wonder
 Of saffron cubes, and crimson moons,
 And wheels all amaranths and maroons.

Golden lozenges and spades,
 Arrows of malachites and jades,
 Patens of copper, azure sheaves
 As you mount, you flash in the glossy
 leaves 20

Such fireworks as we make, we two!
Because you hate me and I hate you

PATTERNS

I WALK down the garden paths,
And all the daffodils
Are blowing, and the bright blue squills
I walk down the patterned garden-paths
In my stiff, brocaded gown
With my powdered hair and jewelled fan,
I too am a rare
Pattern As I wander down
The garden paths

My dress is richly figured, 10
And the train
Makes a pink and silver stain
On the gravel, and the thrift
Of the borders
Just a plate of current fashion, Tripping by in high-heeled, ribboned shoes

Not a softness anywhere about me,
Only whalebone and brocade
And I sink on a seat in the shade
Of a lime tree For my passion 20
Wars against the stiff brocade
The daffodils and squills
Flutter in the breeze
As they please
And I weep,
For the lime-tree is in blossom
And one small flower has dropped upon my bosom

And the plashing of waterdrops
In the marble fountain
Comes down the garden-paths 30
The dripping never stops
Underneath my stiffened gown
Is the softness of a woman bathing in a marble basin,
A basin in the midst of hedges grown
So thick, she cannot see her lover hiding,
But she guesses he is near,
And the sliding of the water
Seems the stroking of a dear
Hand upon her
What is Summer in a fine brocaded gown!
I should like to see it lying in a heap upon the ground 41
All the pink and silver crumpled up on the ground

I would be the pink and silver as I ran along the paths,
And he would stumble after,
Bewildered by my laughter
I should see the sun flashing from his sword-hilt and the buckles on his shoes
I would choose
To lead him in a maze along the patterned paths,
A bright and laughing maze for my heavy-booted lover
Till he caught me in the shade, 50
And the buttons of his waistcoat bruised
my body as he clasped me,
Aching, melting, unafraid
With the shadows of the leaves and the sundrops,
And the plopping of the waterdrops,
All about us in the open afternoon—
I am very like to swoon
With the weight of this brocade,
For the sun sifts through the shade

Underneath the fallen blossom
In my bosom, 60
Is a letter I have hid
It was brought to me this morning by a rider from the Duke
'Madam, we regret to inform you that Lord
Hartwell
Died in action Thursday se'nnight '
As I read it in the white, morning sunlight,
The letters squirmed like snakes
'Any answer, Madam?' said my footman
'No,' I told him
'See that the messenger takes some refreshment
No, no answer ' 70
And I walked into the garden,
Up and down the patterned paths,
In my stiff, correct brocade
The blue and yellow flowers stood up proudly in the sun,
Each one
I stood upright too,
Held rigid to the pattern
By the stiffness of my gown.
Up and down I walked,
Up and down. 80

In a month he would have been my husband
In a month, here, underneath this lime,
We would have broke the pattern,

He for me, and I for him,
 He as Colonel, I as Lady,
 On this shady seat.
 He had a whim
 That sunlight carried blessing
 And I answered, 'It shall be as you have said'
 Now he is dead 90

 In Summer and in Winter I shall walk
 Up and down
 The patterned garden-paths
 In my stuff, brocaded gown
 The squills and daffodils Will give place to pillared roses, and to asters, and to snow
 I shall go
 Up and down,
 In my gown
 Gorgeously arrayed, 100
 Boned and stayed
 And the softness of my body will be guarded from embrace
 By each button, hook, and lace
 For the man who should loose me is dead,
 Fighting with the Duke in Flanders,
 In a pattern called a war
 Christ! What are patterns for? 1915

LILACS

LILACS,
 False blue,
 White,
 Purple,
 Colour of lilac,
 Your great puffs of flowers
 Are everywhere in this my New England.
 Among your heart-shaped leaves Orange orioles hop like music-box birds and sing
 Their little weak soft songs, 10
 In the crooks of your branches
 The bright eyes of song sparrows sitting on spotted eggs
 Peer restlessly through the light and shadow
 Of all Springs.
 Lilacs in dooryards
 Holding quiet conversations with an early
     moon,
 Lilacs watching a deserted house
 Settling sideways into the grass of an old road,

Lilacs, wind-beaten, staggering under a lopsided shock of bloom
 Above a cellar dug into a hill 20
 You are everywhere
 You were everywhere
 You tapped the window when the preacher preached his sermon,
 And ran along the road beside the boy going to school
 You stood by pasture-bars to give the cows good milking,
 You persuaded the housewife that her dish pan was of silver
 And her husband an image of pure gold.
 You flaunted the fragrance of your blossoms
 Through the wide doors of Custom Houses—
 You, and sandal-wood, and tea, 30
 Charging the noses of quill-driving clerks
 When a ship was in from China.
 You called to them 'Goose-quill men,
     goose-quill men,
 May is a month for fluting,'
 Until they writhed on their high stools
 And wrote poetry on their letter-sheets behind the propped-up ledgers.
 Paradoxical New England clerks, Writing inventories in ledgers, reading the 'Song of Solomon' at night,
 So many verses before bed-time,
 Because it was the Bible 40
 The dead fed you
 Amid the slant stones of graveyards.
 Pale ghosts who planted you Came in the night-time And let their thin hair blow through your clustered stems
 You are of the green sea,
 And of the stone hills which reach a long distance
 You are of elm-shaded streets with little shops where they sell kites and marbles,
 You are of great parks where everyone walks and nobody is at home
 You cover the blind sides of greenhouses 50
 And lean over the top to say a hurry-word through the glass
 To your friends, the grapes, inside.

 Lilacs,
 False blue,
 White,
 Purple,
 Colour of lilac,

You have forgotten your Eastern origin,
The veiled women with eyes like panthers,
The swollen, aggressive turbans of jeweled Pashas

60

Now you are a very decent flower,
A reticent flower,
A curiously clear-cut, candid flower,
Standing beside clean doorways, Friendly to a house-cat and a pair of spectacles,

Making poetry out of a bit of moonlight
And a hundred or two sharp blossoms

Maine knows you,
Has for years and years,
New Hampshire knows you, 70
And Massachusetts
And Vermont

Cape Cod starts you along the beaches to Rhode Island,
Connecticut takes you from a river to the sea

You are brighter than apples,
Sweeter than tulips,
You are the great flood of our souls Bursting above the leaf-shapes of our hearts,

You are the smell of all Summers,
The love of wives and children, 80
The recollection of the gardens of little children,

You are State Houses and Charters
And the familiar treading of the foot to and fro on a road it knows

May is lilac here in New England,
May is a thrush singing 'Sun up' on a tip-top ash-tree,

May is white clouds behind pine-trees
Puffed out and marching upon a blue sky

May is a green as no other,
May is much sun through small leaves,
May is soft earth, 90
And apple-blossoms,

And windows open to a South wind
May is a full light wind of lilac
From Canada to Narragansett Bay.

Lilacs,
False blue,
White,
Purple,
Colour of lilac,
Heart-leaves of lilac all over New England,
Roots of lilac under all the soil of New England, 101

Lilac in me because I am New England,
Because my roots are in it,
Because my leaves are of it,
Because my flowers are for it,
Because it is my country
And I speak to it of itself
And sing of it with my own voice
Since certainly it is mine

THE CROSS-ROADS

A BULLET through his heart at dawn On the table a letter signed with a woman's name.
A wind that goes howling round the house, and weeping as in shame Cold November dawn peeping through the windows, cold dawn creeping over the floor, creeping up his cold legs, creeping over his cold body, creeping across his cold face A glaze of thin yellow sunlight on the staring eyes Wind howling through bent branches A wind which never dies down Howling, wailing The gazing eyes glitter in the sunlight The lids are frozen open and the eyes glitter

The thudding of a pick on hard earth A spade grinding and crunching Overhead, branches writhing, winding, interlacing, unwinding, scattering, tortured twinings, tossings, creakings Wind flinging branches apart, drawing them together, whispering and whining among them A waning, lobsided moon cutting through black clouds A stream of pebbles and earth and the empty spade gleams clear in the moonlight, then is rammed again into the black earth Tramping of feet Men and horses Squeaking of wheels

'Whoa! Ready, Jim?'

'All ready '

Something falls, settles, is still Suicides have no coffin

'Give us the stake, Jim Now.'

Pound! Pound!

'He'll never walk Nailed to the ground '

An ash stick pierces his heart, if it buds the roots will hold him He is a part of the earth now, clay to clay Overhead the branches sway, and writhe, and twist in the wind He'll never walk with a bullet in his heart, and an ash stick nailing him to the cold, black ground

Six months he lay still Six months And the water welled up in his body, and soft blue spots chequered it He lay still, for the ash stick held him in place Six months!
Then her face came out of a mist of green Pink and white and frail like Dresden china, lilies-of-the-valley at her breast, puce-coloured silk sheening about her Under the young green leaves, the horse at a foot-pace, the high yellow wheels of the chaise scarcely turning, her face, rippling like grain a-blowing, under her puce-coloured bonnet, and burning beside her, flaming within his correct blue coat and brass buttons, is someone What has dimmed the sun? The horse steps on a rolling stone, a wind in the branches makes a moan The little leaves tremble and shake, turn and quake, over and over, tearing their stems
There is a shower of young leaves, and a sudden-sprung gale wails in the trees

The yellow-wheeled chaise is rocking—rocking, and all the branches are knocking —knocking The sun in the sky is a flat, red plate, the branches creak and grate
She screams and cowers, for the green foliage is a lowering wave surging to smother her But she sees nothing The stake holds firm The body writhes, the body squirms The blue spots widen, the flesh tears, but the stake wears well in the deep, black ground It holds the body in the still, black ground

Two years! The body has been in the ground two years It is worn away, it is clay to clay Where the heart moulders, a greenish dust, the stake is thrust Late August it is, and night, a night flauntingly jewelled with stars, a night of shooting stars and loud insect noises Down the road to Tilbury, silence—and the slow flapping of large leaves Down the road to Sutton, silence—and the darkness of heavy-foliaged trees Down the road to Wayfleet, silence—and the whirring scrape of insects in the branches Down the road to Edgarstown, silence—and stars like stepping-stones in a pathway overhead It is very quiet at the cross-roads, and the sign-board points the way down the four roads, endlessly points the way where nobody wishes to go

A horse is galloping, galloping up from Sutton Shaking the wide, still leaves as he goes under them Striking sparks with his iron shoes, silencing the katydid. Dr Morgan riding to a child-birth over Tilbury way; riding to deliver a woman of her first-born son One o'clock from Wayfleet bell tower, what a shower of shooting stars!

And a breeze all of a sudden, jarring the big leaves and making them jerk up and down Dr Morgan's hat is blown from his head, the horse swerves, and curves away from the sign-post An oath—spurs—a blurring of grey mist A quick left twist, and the gelding is snorting and racing down the Tilbury road with the wind dropping away behind him

The stake has wrenched, the stake has started, the body, flesh from flesh, has parted But the bones hold tight, socket and ball, and clamping them down in the hard, black ground is the stake, wedged through ribs and spine The bones may twist, and heave, and twine, but the stake holds them still in line The breeze goes down, and the round stars shine, for the stake holds the fleshless bones in line

Twenty years now! Twenty long years!
The body has powdered itself away, it is clay to clay It is brown earth mingled with brown earth Only flaky bones remain, lain together so long they fit, although not one bone is knit to another The stake is there too, rotted through, but upright still, and still piercing down between ribs and spine in a straight line

Yellow stillness is on the cross-roads, yellow stillness is on the trees The leaves hang drooping, wan The four roads point four yellow ways, saffron and gamboge ribbons to the gaze A little swirl of dust blows up Tilbury road, the wind which fans it has not strength to do more, it ceases, and the dust settles down A little whirl of wind comes up Tilbury road It brings a sound of wheels and feet The wind reels a moment and faints to nothing under the signpost Wind again, wheels and feet louder Wind again—again—again A drop of rain, flat into the dust Drop!—Drop!
Thick heavy raindrops, and a shrieking wind bending the great trees and wrenching off their leaves.

Under the black sky, bowed and dripping with rain, up Tilbury road, comes the procession A funeral procession, bound for the graveyard at Wayfleet Feet and wheels—feet and wheels And among them one who is carried

The bones in the deep, still earth shiver and pull There is a quiver through the rotted stake Then stake and bones fall together in a little puffing of dust

Like meshes of linked steel the rain shuts down behind the procession, now well along the Wayfleet road

He wavers like smoke in the buffeting wind His fingers blow out like smoke, his head ripples in the gale. Under the sign-post, in the pouring rain, he stands, and watches another quavering figure drifting down the Wayfleet road Then swiftly he streams after it It flickers among the trees He licks out and winds about them Over, under, blown, contorted Spindrift after spindrift, smoke following smoke There is a wailing through the trees, a wailing of fear, and after it laughter—laughter—laughter, skirling up to the black sky. Lightning jags over the funeral procession A heavy clap of thunder Then darkness and rain, and the sound of feet and wheels

THE DINNER-PARTY

FISH

'So . . ' they said,
With their wine-glasses delicately poised, Mocking at the thing they cannot understand
'So . . ' they said again,
Amused and insolent
The silver on the table glittered,
And the red wine in the glasses Seemed the blood I had wasted
In a foolish cause.

GAME

The gentleman with the grey-and-black whiskers 10
Sneered languidly over his quail
Then my heart flew up and laboured,
And I burst from my own holding
And hurled myself forward
With straight blows I beat upon him, Furiously, with red-hot anger, I thrust against him
But my weapon slithered over his polished surface,

And I recoiled upon myself,
Panting

DRAWING-ROOM

In a dress all softness and half-tones, 20
Indolent and half-reclined,
She lay upon a couch,
With the firelight reflected in her jewels
But her eyes had no reflection,
They swam in a grey smoke,
The smoke of smouldering ashes,
The smoke of her cindered heart

COFFEE

They sat in a circle with their coffee-cups
One dropped in a lump of sugar,
One stirred with a spoon 30
I saw them as a circle of ghosts
Sipping blackness out of beautiful china,
And mildly protesting against my coarseness
In being alive

TALK

They took dead men's souls
And pinned them on their breasts for ornament,
Their cuff-links and tiaras
Were gems dug from a grave,
They were ghouls battenning on exhumed
thoughts,
And I took a green liqueur from a servant 40
So that he might come near me
And give me the comfort of a living thing

ELEVEN O'CLOCK

The front door was hard and heavy,
It shut behind me on the house of ghosts
I flattened my feet on the pavement
To feel it solid under me,
I ran my hand along the railings
And shook them,
And pressed their pointed bars
Into my palms 50
The hurt of it reassured me,
And I did it again and again
Until they were bruised
When I woke in the night
I laughed to find them aching,
For only living flesh can suffer

FROM 1777

2 THE CITY OF FALLING LEAVES

LEAVES fall,
Brown leaves,
Yellow leaves streaked with brown.
They fall,
Flutter,
Fall again
The brown leaves,
And the streaked yellow leaves,
Loosen on their branches
And drift slowly downwards. 10
One,
One, two, three,
One, two, five
All Venice is a falling of autumn leaves—
Brown,
And yellow streaked with brown.

‘That sonnet, Abate, Beautiful,
I am quite exhausted by it
Your phrases turn about my heart 20
And stifle me to swooning
Open the window, I beg Lord! What a strumming of fiddles and mandolins!
’Tis really a shame to stop indoors
Call my maid, or I will make you lace me yourself
Fie, how hot it is, not a breath of air!
See how straight the leaves are falling.
Marianna, I will have the yellow satin caught up with silver fringe,
It peeps out delightfully from under a mantle
Am I well painted to-day, caro Abate mio?
You will be proud of me at the Ridotto, hey? 31
Proud of being Cavalier Servente to such a lady!’
‘Can you doubt it, Bellissima Contessa?
A pinch more rouge on the right cheek,
And Venus herself shines less ‘You bore me, Abate,
I vow I must change you!
A letter, Achmet?
Run and look out of the window, Abate.
I will read my letter in peace ’ 40
The little black slave with the yellow satin turban
Gazes at his mistress with strained eyes
His yellow turban and black skin
Are gorgeous—barbaric

The yellow satin dress with its silver flashings
Lies on a chair
Beside a black mantle and a black mask.
Yellow and black,
Gorgeous—barbaric.
The lady reads her letter, 50
And the leaves drift slowly
Past the long windows
‘How silly you look, my dear Abate,
With that great brown leaf in your wig.
Pluck it off, I beg you,
Or I shall die of laughing ’

A yellow wall,
Aflare in the sunlight,
Chequered with shadows,
Shadows of vine-leaves, 60
Shadows of masks Masks coming, printing themselves for an instant,
Then passing on,
More masks always replacing them
Masks with tricornes and rapiers sticking out behind Pursuing masks with veils and high heels,
The sunlight shining under their insteps.
One,
One, two,
One, two, three, 70
There is a thronging of shadows on the hot
wall,
Filigreed at the top with moving leaves.
Yellow sunlight and black shadows,
Yellow and black,
Gorgeous—barbaric
Two masks stand together,
And the shadow of a leaf falls through
them,
Marking the wall where they are not.
From hat-tip to shoulder-tip,
From elbow to sword-hilt, 80
The leaf falls
The shadows mingle,
Blur together,
Slide along the wall and disappear

Gold of mosaics and candles,
And night blackness lurking in the ceiling beams
Saint Mark’s glitters with flames and reflections
A cloak brushes aside,
And the yellow of satin

Licks out over the coloured inlays of the pavement 90
Under the gold crucifixes
There is a meeting of hands
Reaching from black mantles
Sighing embraces, bold investigations,
Hide in confessionals,
Sheltered by the shuffling of feet
Gorgeous—barbaric
In its mail of jewels and gold, Saint Mark's looks down at the swarm of black masks,
And outside in the palace gardens brown leaves fall, 100
Flutter,
Fall
Brown,
And yellow streaked with brown

Blue-black the sky over Venice,
With a pricking of yellow stars
There is no moon,
And the waves push darkly against the prow
Of the gondola,
Coming from Malamocco 110
And streaming toward Venice
It is black under the gondola hood,
But the yellow of a satin dress
Glares out like the eye of a watching tiger
Yellow compassed about with darkness,
Yellow and black,
Gorgeous—barbaric
The boatman sings,
It is Tasso that he sings,
The lovers seek each other beneath their mantles, 120
And the gondola drifts over the lagoon, aslant to the coming dawn
But at Malamocco in front,
In Venice behind,
Fall the leaves,
Brown,
And yellow streaked with brown.
They fall,
Flutter,
Fall

LITTLE IVORY FIGURES PULLED WITH STRING

Is it the tinkling of mandolins which disturbs you?
Or the dropping of bitter-orange petals
among the coffee-cups?

Or the slow creeping of the moonlight between the olive-trees?

*Drop! drop! the rain
Upon the thin plates of my heart*

String your blood to chord with this music, Stir your heels upon the cobbles to the rhythm of a dance-tune
They have slim thighs and arms of silver,
The moon washes away their garments,
They make a pattern of fleeing feet in the branch shadows, 19
And the green grapes knotted about them
Burst as they press against one another.
*The rain knocks upon the plates of my
heart,
They are crumpled with its beating*

Would you drink only from your brains,
Old Man?
See, the moonlight has reached your knees,
It falls upon your head in an accolade of silver
Rise up on the music, Flung against the moon-drifts in a whorl of young light bodies
Leaping grape-clusters, 20
Vine leaves tearing from a grey wall
You shall run, laughing, in a braid of
women,
And weave flowers with the frosty spines of thorns
Why do you gaze into your glass,
And jar the spoons with your finger-tapping?
*The rain is rigid on the plates of my heart
The murmur of it is loud—loud*

MEETING-HOUSE HILL

I MUST be mad, or very tired,
When the curve of a blue bay beyond a railroad track
Is shrill and sweet to me like the sudden springing of a tune,
And the sight of a white church above thin trees in a city square Amazes my eyes as though it were the Parthenon
Clear, reticent, superbly final,
With the pillars of its portico refined to a cautious elegance,
It dominates the weak trees,
And the shot of its spire

A NOTE ON POETRY

My intention in poetry is to write poetry to reach and express that which, without any particular definition, everyone recognizes to be poetry, and to do this because I feel the need of doing it

There is such a complete freedom now-a-days in respect to technique that I am rather inclined to disregard form so long as I am free and can express myself freely I don't know of anything, respecting form, that makes much difference The essential thing in form is to be free in whatever form is used A free form does not assure freedom As a form, it is just one more form So that it comes to this, I suppose, that I believe in freedom regardless of form

THE WORMS AT HEAVEN'S GATE

OUT of the tomb, we bring Badroulbador,
Within our bellies, we her chariot
Here is an eye And here are, one by one,
The lashes of that eye and its white lid
Here is the cheek on which that lid declined,
And, finger after finger, here, the hand,
The genius of that cheek Here are the lips,
The bundle of the body and the feet

Out of the tomb we bring Badroulbador

THE EMPEROR OF ICE-CREAM <sup>1</sup>

CALL the roller of big cigars,
The muscular one, and bid him whip
In kitchen cups concupiscent curds
Let the wenches dawdle in such dress
As they are used to wear, and let the boys
Bring flowers in last month's newspapers.
Let be be finale of seem
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream

<sup>1</sup> Stevens says of the poem "This wears a deliberately commonplace costume, and yet it seems to contain something of the essential gaudiness of poetry, that is the reason why I like it." Benet, ed., Fifty Poets, (N Y, 1933), 46

Take from the dresser of deal,
Lacking the three glass knobs, that sheet <sup>10</sup>
On which she embroidered fantails once
And spread it so as to cover her face
If her horny feet protrude, they come
To show how cold she is, and dumb
Let the lamp affix its beam
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.

SUNDAY MORNING

I

COMPLACENCIES of the peignoir, and late
Coffee and oranges in a sunny chair,
And the green freedom of a cockatoo
Upon a rug mingle to dissipate
The holy hush of ancient sacrifice
She dreams a little, and she feels the dark Encroachment of that old catastrophe,
As a calm darkens among water-lights.
The pungent oranges and bright, green wings <sup>9</sup>

Seem things in some procession of the dead,
Winding across wide water, without sound.
The day is like wide water, without sound,
Stilled for the passing of her dreaming feet
Over the seas, to silent Palestine,
Dominion of the blood and sepulchre.

2

Why should she give her bounty to the dead?

What is divinity if it can come
Only in silent shadows and in dreams?
Shall she not find in comforts of the sun,
In pungent fruit and bright, green wings, or else <sup>20</sup>

In any balm or beauty of the earth, Things to be cherished like the thought of heaven?

Divinity must live within herself
Passions of rain, or moods in falling snow;
Grievings in loneliness, or unsubdued
Elations when the forest blooms, gusty
Emotions on wet roads on autumn nights,
All pleasures and all pains, remembering
The bough of summer and the winter branch

These are the measures destined for her soul.

3

Jove in the clouds had his inhuman birth
 No mother suckled him, no sweet land gave Large-mannered motions to his mythy mund

He moved among us, as a muttering king,
 Magnificent, would move among his hinds,
 Until our blood, commingling, virginal,
 With heaven, brought such requital to desire

The very hinds discerned it, in a star Shall our blood fail? Or shall it come to be The blood of paradise? And shall the earth
 Seem all of paradise that we shall know? 41
 The sky will be much friendlier then than
 now,

A part of labor and a part of pain,
 And next in glory to enduring love,
 Not thus dividing and indifferent blue

4

She says, 'I am content when wakened birds,
 Before they fly, test the reality
 Of misty fields, by their sweet questionings,
 But when the birds are gone, and their warm fields

Return no more, where, then, is paradise?'
 There is not any haunt of prophecy, 51
 Nor any old chimera of the grave,
 Neither the golden underground, nor isle
 Melodious, where spirits gat them home,
 Nor visionary south, nor cloudy palm Remote on heaven's hull, that has endured
 As April's green endures, or will endure
 Like her remembrance of awakened birds,
 Or her desire for June and evening, tipped
 By the consummation of the swallow's wings 60

5

She says, 'But in contentment I still feel
 The need of some imperishable bliss' Death is the mother of beauty, hence from
 her,
 Alone, shall come fulfilment to our dreams
 And our desires. Although she strews the leaves

Of sure obliteration on our paths,
 The path sick sorrow took, the many paths Where triumph rang its brassy phrase, or love
 Whispered a little out of tenderness,
 She makes the willow shiver in the sun 70

For maidens who were wont to sit and gaze
 Upon the grass, relinquished to their feet.
 She causes boys to pile new plums and pears

On disregarded plate The maidens taste
 And stray impassioned in the littering
 leaves

Is there no change of death in paradise?
 Does ripe fruit never fall? Or do the boughs
 Hang always heavy in that perfect sky,
 Unchanging, yet so like our perishing earth,
 With rivers like our own that seek for seas
 They never find, the same receding shores
 That never touch with inarticulate pang? 82
 Why set the pear upon those river-banks
 Or spice the shores with odors of the plum?
 Alas, that they should wear our colors
 there,

The silken weavings of our afternoons,
 And pick the strings of our insipid lutes!
 Death is the mother of beauty, mystical,
 Within whose burning bosom we devise
 Our earthly mothers waiting, sleeplessly 90

7

Supple and turbulent, a ring of men
 Shall chant in orgy on a summer morn
 Their boisterous devotion to the sun,
 Not as a god, but as a god might be,
 Naked among them, like a savage source
 Their chant shall be a chant of paradise,
 Out of their blood, returning to the sky,
 And in their chant shall enter, voice by voice,

The windy lake wherein their lord delights,
 The trees, like serafin, and echoing hills,
 That choir among themselves long afterward 101

They shall know well the heavenly fellowship
 Of men that perish and of summer morn
 And whence they came and whither they shall go
 The dew upon their feet shall manifest

She hears, upon that water without sound,
 A voice that cries, 'The tomb in Palestine
 Is not the porch of spirits lingering
 It is the grave of Jesus, where he lay'
 We live in an old chaos of the sun, 110
 Or old dependency of day and night,
 Or island solitude, unsponsored, free,

Of that wide water, inescapable Deer walk upon our mountains, and the quail
 Whistle about us their spontaneous cries,
 Sweet berries ripen in the wilderness,
 And, in the isolation of the sky,
 At evening, casual flocks of pigeons make Ambiguous undulations as they sink, Downward to darkness, on extended
     wings

THE BIRD WITH THE COPPERY, KEEN CLAWS

ABOVE the forest of the parakeets,
 A parakeet of parakeets prevails,
 A pip of life amid a mort of tails

 (The rudiments of tropics are around, Aloe of ivory, pear of rusty rind )
 His lids are white because his eyes are blind

He is not paradise of parakeets,
 Of his gold ether, golden alguazil,
 Except because he broods there and is still

Panache upon panache, his tails deploy 10
 Upward and outward, in green-vented forms,
 His tip a drop of water full of storms

But though the turbulent tinges undulate
 As his pure intellect applies its laws,
 He moves not on his coppery, keen claws

He munches a dry shell while he exerts
 His will, yet never ceases, perfect cock,
 To flare, in the sun-pallor of his rock

TO THE ONE OF FICTIVE MUSIC

SISTER and mother and diviner love,
 And of the sisterhood of the living dead
 Most near, most clear, and of the clearest
     bloom,

And of the fragrant mothers the most dear
 And queen, and of diviner love the day
 And flame and summer and sweet fire, no
     thread

Of cloudy silver sprinkles in your gown
 Its venom of renown, and on your head
 No crown is simpler than the simple hair.

Now, of the music summoned by the birth
 That separates us from the wind and sea, 11
 Yet leaves us in them, until earth becomes,
 By being so much of the things we are,
 Gross effigy and simulacrum, none
 Gives motion to perfection more serene Than yours, out of our imperfections wrought,
 Most rare, or ever of more kindred air
 In the laborious weaving that you wear.

For so retentive of themselves are men
 That music is intensest which proclaims 20
 The near, the clear, and vaunts the clearest
     bloom,

And of all vigils musing the obscure,
 That apprehends the most which sees and names,

As in your name, an image that is sure,
 Among the arrant spices of the sun,
 O bough and bush and scented vine, in whom

We give ourselves our likest issuance.

Yet not too like, yet not so like to be Too near, too clear, saving a little to endow
 Our feigning with the strange unlike, whence springs 30

The difference that heavenly pity brings
 For this, musician, in your girdle fixed Bear other perfumes On your pale head wear

A band entwining, set with fatal stones
 Unreal, give back to us what once you gave
 The imagination that we spurned and crave.

PETER QUINCE AT THE CLAVIER

I

Just as my fingers on these keys
 Make music, so the self-same sounds
 On my spirit make a music, too.

Music is feeling, then, not sound,
 And thus it is that what I feel,
 Here in this room, desiring you,

Thinking of your blue-shadowed silk,
 Is music. It is like the strain
 Waked in the elders by Susanna

Of a green evening, clear and warm, 10
 She bathed in her still garden, while
 The red-eyed elders watching, felt

The basses of their beings throb
In witching chords, and their thin
    blood
Pulse pizzicati of Hosanna

2

In the green water, clear and warm, Susanna lay
She searched
The touch of springs,
And found
Concealed imaginings.
She sighed,
For so much melody

Upon the bank, she stood In the cool
Of spent emotions
She felt, among the leaves,
The dew
Of old devotions.

She walked upon the grass,
Still quavering
The winds were like her maids,
On tumid feet,
Fetching her woven scarves,
Yet wavering

A breath upon her hand
Muted the night
She turned—
A cymbal clashed,
And roaring horns

3

Soon, with a noise like tambourines,
Came her attendant Byzantines

They wondered why Susanna cried
Against the elders by her side,

And as they whispered, the refrain
Was like a willow swept by rain

Anon, their lamps' uplifted flame
Revealed Susanna and her shame

And then, the simpering Byzantines Fled, with a noise like tambourines.

4

Beauty is momentary in the mind—
The fitful tracing of a portal,
But in the flesh it is immortal

The body dies, the body's beauty lives
So evenings die, in their green going,
A wave, interminably flowing
So gardens die, their meek breath scenting
The cowl of winter, done repenting
So maidens die to the auroral Celebration of a maiden's choral 60

Susanna's music touched the bawdy
    strings

Of those white elders, but, escaping,
Left only Death's ironic scraping
Now in its immortality, it plays
On the clear viol of her memory,
And makes a constant sacrament of praise

SEA SURFACE FULL OF CLOUDS

1

In that November off Tehuantepec,
The slopping of the sea grew still one night
And in the morning summer hued the deck

And made one think of rosy chocolate
And gilt umbrellas Paradisal green Gave suavity to the perplexed machine

Of ocean, which like limpid water lay
Who, then, in that ambrosial latitude
Out of the light evolved the moving blooms,

Who, then, evolved the sea-blooms from the clouds

10

Diffusing balm in that Pacific calm<sup>2</sup>
C'était mon enfant, mon bijou, mon âme<sup>1</sup>

The sea-clouds whitened far below the calm

And moved, as blooms move, in the swimming green
And in its watery radiance, while the hue

Of heaven in an antique reflection rolled Round those flotillas And sometimes the sea

Poured brilliant iris on the glistening blue.

2

In that November off Tehuantepec
The slopping of the sea grew still one night.
At breakfast jelly yellow streaked the deck

19

30

40

50

And made one think of chop-house
chocolate

And sham umbrellas And a sham-like green

Capped summer-seeming on the tense machine

Of ocean, which in sinister flatness lay
Who, then, beheld the rising of the clouds
That strode submerged in that malevolent sheen,

Who saw the mortal massives of the blooms
Of water moving on the water-floor?
C'était mon frère du ciel, ma vie, mon or <sup>1</sup> 30

The gongs rang loudly as the windy booms
Hoo-hooded it in the darkened ocean-blooms
The gongs grew still And then blue heaven spread

Its crystalline pendentives on the sea
And the macabre of the water-glooms
In an enormous undulation fled

3

In that November off Tehuantepec,
The slopping of the sea grew still one night
And a pale silver patterned on the deck 39

And made one think of porcelain chocolate
And pied umbrellas An uncertain green,
Piano-polished, held the tranced machine

Of ocean, as a prelude holds and holds
Who, seeing silver petals of white blooms
Unfolding in the water, feeling sure

Of the milk within the saltiest spurge, heard, then,
The sea unfolding in the sunken clouds?
Oh! C'était mon extase et mon amour <sup>2</sup>

So deeply sunken were they that the shrouds,
The shrouding shadows, made the petals
black 50
Until the rolling heaven made them blue,

A blue beyond the rainy hyacinth,
And smiting the crevasses of the leaves
Deluged the ocean with a sapphire blue.

<sup>2</sup> 'Oh! It was my ecstasy and my love'

4

In that November off Tehuantepec
The night-long slopping of the sea grew still

A mallow morning dozed upon the deck

And made one think of musky chocolate
And frail umbrellas A too-fluent green
Suggested malice in the dry machine 60

Of ocean, pondering dank stratagem Who then beheld the figures of the clouds
Like blooms secluded in the thick marine?

Like blooms? Like damasks that were shaken off
From the loosed girdles in the spangling must
C'était ma foi, la nonchalance divine <sup>3</sup>

The nakedness would rise and suddenly turn Salt masks of beard and mouths of bellowing,
Would—But more suddenly the heaven
rolled

Its bluest sea-clouds in the thinking green,
And the nakedness became the broadest blooms, 71
Mile-mallows that a mallow sun cajoled.

5

In that November off Tehuantepec Night stilled the slopping of the sea The
day
Came, bowing and voluble, upon the deck,

Good clown . One thought of Chinese chocolate
And large umbrellas And a motley green
Followed the drift of the obese machine

Of ocean, perfected in indolence
What pistache one, ingenious and droll, 80
Beheld the sovereign clouds as jugglery

And the sea as turquoise-turbaned Sambo, neat
At tossing saucers—cloudy-conjuring sea?
C'était mon esprit bâtard, l'ignominie <sup>4</sup>

<sup>3</sup> 'It was my faith, divine nonchalance'
<sup>4</sup> 'It was ignominy, my hybrid mind'

The sovereign clouds came clustering The conch
Of loyal conjuration trumped The wind
Of green blooms turning crisped the motley hue

To clearing opalescence Then the sea 88
And heaven rolled as one and from the two Came fresh transfigurings of freshest blue

THE IDEA OF ORDER AT KEY WEST

SHE sang beyond the genius of the sea
The water never formed to mind or voice,
Like a body wholly body, fluttering Its empty sleeves, and yet its mimic
motion
Made constant cry, caused constantly a cry,
That was not ours although we 4 understood,
Inhuman, of the veritable ocean

The sea was not a mask No more was she
The song and water were not medleyed
sound
Even if what she sang was what she heard, Since what she sang was uttered word by word 11
It may be that in all her phrases stirred
The grinding water and the gasping wind,
But it was she and not the sea we heard

For she was the maker of the song she sang
The ever-hooded, tragic-gestured sea
Was merely a place by which she walked to sing
Whose spirit is this? we said, because we knew
It was the spirit that we sought and knew
That we should ask this often as she sang

If it was only the dark voice of the sea 21
That rose, or even colored by many waves,
If it was only that outer voice of sky
And cloud, of the sunken coral water-walled,
However clear, it would have been deep air,
The heaving speech of air, a summer sound
Repeated in a summer without end
And sound alone But it was more than that,
More even than her voice, and ours, among The meaningless plungings of water and the wind, 30

Theatrical distances, bronze shadows heaped
On high horizons, mountainous atmospheres
Of sky and sea.

It was her voice that made
The sky acutest at its vanishing
She measured to the hour its solitude
She was the single artificer of the world
In which she sang And when she sang, the
sea,
Whatever self it had, became the self
That was her song, for she was the maker
Then we, 40
As we beheld her striding there alone,
Knew that there never was a world for her Except the one she sang and, singing,
made.

Ramon Fernandez, tell me, if you know, Why, when the singing ended and we turned Toward the town, tell why the glassy
lights,
The lights in the fishing boats at anchor
there,
As the night descended, tilting in the air, Mastered the night and portioned out the
sea, 45
Fixing emblazoned zones and fiery poles,
Arranging, deepening, enchanting night.

Oh! Blessed rage for order, pale Ramon,
The maker's rage to order words of the
sea,
Words of the fragrant portals,
dimly-starred,
And of ourselves and of our origins,
In ghostlier demarcations, keener sounds 1935

A POSTCARD FROM THE VOLCANO

CHILDREN picking up our bones
Will never know that these were once
As quick as foxes on the hill,

And that in autumn, when the grapes
Made sharp air sharper by their smell
These had a being, breathing frost,

And least will guess that with our bones
We left much more, left what still is The look of things, left what we felt

At what we saw. The spring clouds blow 10
Above the shuttered mansion-house,
Beyond our gate and the windy sky

Cries out a literate despair
We knew for long the mansion's look
And what we said of it became

A part of what it is Children,
Still weaving budded aureoles,
Will speak our speech and never know,

Will say of the mansion that it seems
As if he that lived there left behind 20
A spirit storming in blank walls,

A dirty house in a gutted world,
A tatter of shadows peaked to white,
Smeared with the gold of the opulent sun

FROM OWL'S CLOVER
V SOMBRE FIGURATION

I

THERE is a man whom rhapsodies of change,
Of which he is the cause, have never changed
And never will, a subman under all The rest, to whom in the end the rest
return,
The man below the man below the man,
Steeped in night's opium, evading day.

2

We have grown weary of the man that thinks.
He thinks and it is not true The man
below
Imagines and it is true, as if he thought
By imagining, anti-logician, quick 10
With a logic of transforming certitudes
It is not that he was born in another land, Powdered with primitive lights, and lives with us
In glimpses, on the edge or at the tip
He was born within us as a second self,
A self of parents who have never died,
Whose lives return, simply, upon our lips,
Their word and ours, in what we see, their hues
Without a season, unstunted in livery,
And ours, of rigid measure, a miser's paint,
And most in what we hear, sound brushed
away, 21

A mumbling at the elbow, turgid tunes,
As of insects or cloud-stricken birds,
away

And away, dialogues between incognitos.
He dwells below, the man below, in less Than body and in less than mind, ogre,
Inhabitant, in less than shape, of shapes
That are dissembled in vague memory
Yet still retain resemblances, remain 20
Remembrances, a place of a field of lights,
As a church is a bell and people are an eye,

A cry, the pallor of a dress, a touch.
He turns us into scholars, studying The masks of music We perceive each mask

To be the musician's own and, thence, become

An audience to mimics glistening
With meanings, doubled by the closest
sound,

Mimics that play on instruments discerned
In the beat of the blood

Green is the path we take 40

Between chimeras and garlanded the way,
The down-descent into November's void.
The spontaneities of rain or snow
Surprise the sterile rationalist who sees Maidens in bloom, bulls under sea, the lark On urns and oak-leaves twisted into rhyme

The man, but not the man below, for whom
The pheasant in a field was pheasant,
field,

Until they changed to eagle in white air,
Lives in a fluid, not on solid rock 50
The solid was an age, a period
With appropriate, largely English, furniture,

Barbers with charts of the only possible modes,

Cities that would not wash away in the mist,

Each man in his asylum maundering, Policed by the hope of Christmas Summer
night,

Night gold, and winter night, night silver,
these

Were the fluid, the cat-eyed atmosphere, in which

The man and the man below were reconciled,

The east wind in the west, order destroyed, 60

The cycle of the solid having turned.

The medium man among other medium
men,
The cloak to be clipped, the night to be re-designed,
Its land-breath to be stifled, its color
changed,
Night and the imagination being one. 140

FROM A THOUGHT REVOLVED

III ROMANESQUE AFFABULATION

He sought an earthly leader who could stand
Without panache, without cockade,
Son only of man and sun of men,
The outer captain, the inner saint,

The pine, the pillar and the priest,
The voice, the book, the hidden well,

The faster's feast and heavy-fruited star,
The father, the beater of the rigid drums,

He that at midnight touches the guitar,
The solitude, the barrier, the Pole 10
In Paris, celui qui chante et pleure,<sup>1</sup>
Winter devising summer in its breast,

Summer assaulted, thundering, illumed,
Shelter yet thrower of the summer spear,
With all his attributes no god but man
Of men whose heaven is in themselves,

Or else whose hell, foamed with their blood
And the long echo of their dying cry,
A fate intoned, a death before they die,
The race that sings and weeps and knows not why. 20

DISCORDANTS<sup>2</sup>

I

MUSIC I heard with you was more than music,
And bread I broke with you was more than bread,
Now that I am without you, all is desolate,
All that was once so beautiful is dead

Your hands once touched this table and this silver,
And I have seen your fingers hold this glass.

<sup>2</sup> "Music I Heard with You," from "Discordants" (1914), the first of a group of five lyrics, is an early and experimental specimen of a form which has since attracted me the presentation of poems in a series or sequence. Other similar series in my later work are "Variations" (1916), "Improvisations Lights and Snow" (1917), "Priapus and the Pool" (1922), and the two recent volumes of preludes, "Preludes for Memnon" and "Time in the Rock." What interested me was the possibility of variation, whether by contrast of tone, theme, or form, within the frame of a unifying reference. As early as these rather rudimentary "Discordants" I had begun to harbor dangerous notions of dividing poetry, as one would divide music, into alternating and contrasting movements. The five symphonic poems which I was to do later—"The Charnel Rose," "The Jig of Forslin," "Senlin," "The House of Dust," and "The Pilgrimage of Festus"—were more elaborate developments of the same idea. Author's note

These things do not remember you, belovèd,—
And yet your touch upon them will not pass.

For it was in my heart you moved among
them,
And blessed them with your hands and with your eyes, 10
And in my heart they will remember always,—
They knew you once, O beautiful and wise

THE HOUSE OF DUST<sup>3</sup>

IV

III

WELL, as you say, we live for small horizons
We move in crowds, we flow and talk
together, 101

<sup>3</sup> The theme of "The House of Dust" might be described as an extended analogy between the multicellular activity and nature of a great city, and the multicellular activity and nature of the human consciousness. The approach to it—as in the other symphonies also—might be said to be spiral by a series of contrasted narrative or lyric or analytic sections, moving slowly forward, but now and again looping back, the juxtaposition of the different modes being as care-

Seeing so many eyes and hands and faces,
 So many mouths, and all the secret meanings,—
 Yet know so little of them, only seeing The small bright circle of our consciousness,
 Beyond which lies the dark Some few we know—
 Or think we know . . . Once, on a sun-bright morning,
 I walked in a certain hallway, trying to find
 A certain door I found one, tried it, opened,
 And there in a spacious chamber, brightly lighted, 110
 A hundred men played music, loudly,
     swiftly,
 While one tall woman sent her voice above
     them
 In powerful sweetness Closing then the door
 I heard it die behind me, fade to whisper,—
 And walked in a quiet hallway as before Just such a glimpse, as through that opened door,
 Is all we know of those we call our friends
 We hear a sudden music, see a playing Of ordered thoughts—and all again is silence
 The music, we suppose, (as in ourselves) 120
 Goes on forever there, behind shut doors,—
 As it continues after our departure,
 So, we divine, it played before we came
 What do you know of me, or I of you? . . .
 Little enough We set these doors ajar

fully calculated as possible to produce an effect as of contrapuntal richness in music. In the circumstances, many sections of the symphonies must suffer greatly if detached from their context, to which they are bound affectively rather than logically their own tone is partly the overtone (the remembered emotion-mass) of the preceding section, and this too will change in retrospect when the next section has been read. That, at any rate, was my theory. The present selection from "The House of Dust" stands better by itself than most, simply because it is the climax and arcanum of the poem, in the attempt of consciousness to be, as it were, conscious of itself. But even here it may be interesting to notice that it is set, for better effect, between a rather hard little narrative movement and an elegiac section. The reflective blank verse, too, perhaps gains something in character from its contrast with the rhymed and stanzaed movements—the one rapid, the other slow—which precede and follow it. Author's note

Only for chosen movements of the music:
 This passage, (so I think—yet this is guesswork)
 Will please him,—it is in a strain he fancies,—
 More brilliant, though, than his, and while he likes it
 He will be piqued . . . He looks at me bewildered 130
 And thinks (to judge from self—this too is guesswork)
 The music strangely subtle, deep in meaning,
 Perplexed with implications, he suspects
     me
 Of hidden riches, unexpected wisdom . . .
 Or else I let him hear a lyric passage,— Simple and clear, and all the while he listens
 I make pretence to think my doors are closed
 This too bewilders him. He eyes me sidelong
 Wondering 'Is he such a fool as this?
 Or only mocking?'—There I let it end 140
 Sometimes, of course, and when we least suspect it—
 When we pursue our thoughts with too much passion,
 Talking with too great zeal—our doors fly open
 Without intention, and the hungry watcher
 Stares at the feast, carries away our secrets,
 And laughs but this, for many counts, is seldom
 And for the most part we vouchsafe our friends,
 Our lovers too, only such few clear notes
 As we shall deem them likely to admire
 'Praise me for this' we say, or 'laugh at this,' 150
 Or 'marvel at my candor' all the while Withholding what's most precious to ourselves,—
 Some sinister depth of lust or fear or hatred,
 The sombre note that gives the chord its power,
 Or a white loveliness—if such we know—Too much like fire to speak of without shame

FROM PRIAPUS AND THE POOL

III <sup>1</sup>

WHEN trout swim down Great Ormond
Street,
And sea-gulls cry above them lightly,
And hawthorns heave cold flagstones up
To blossom whitely,

Against old walls of houses there,
Gustily shaking out in moonlight
Their country sweetness on sweet air,
And in the sunlight,

By the green margin of that water,
Children dip white feet and shout, 10
Casting nets in the braided water
To catch the trout

Then I shall hold my breath and die,
Swearing I never loved you, no,
'You are not lovely!' I shall cry,
'I never loved you so'

IV <sup>2</sup>

THIS is the shape of the leaf, and thus of the flower,
And thus the pale bole of the tree Which watches its bough in a pool of unwavering water
In a land we never shall see

The thrush on the bough is silent, the dew falls softly,
In the evening is hardly a sound
And the three beautiful pilgrims who come here together
Touch lightly the dust of the ground,

Touch it with feet that trouble the dust but as wings do,
Come shyly together, are still, 10

1 'This is perhaps interesting for the shift after the second stanza from masculine-feminine endings to feminine-masculine, and then in the final stanza, wholly masculine. An effect as of modulation from minor to major.' Author's note

2 'This, originally called "Portrait of a Girl," when published out of series, may be compared with number IX of 'Priapus and the Pool,' of which it is the companion-piece. The latter was originally called "Portrait of a Man," and both are whole-poem analogies, the one envisaging the girl as a meeting of three pilgrims under a tree, the other envisaging the man as a desert over which blows a fragrant wind from another land.' Author's note

Like dancers who wait, in a pause of the music, for music
The exquisite silence to fill.

This is the thought of the first, and thus of the second,
And thus the grave thought of the third 'Linger we thus for a moment, palely expectant,
And silence will end, and the bird

'Sing the pure phrase, sweet phrase, clear phrase in the twilight
To fill the blue bell of the world,
And we, who on music so leaflike have drifted together,
Leaflike apart shall be whirled' 20

XVI <sup>3</sup>

SEE, as the carver carves a rose,
A wing, a toad, a serpent's eye,
In cruel granite, to disclose
The soft things that in hardness lie,

So this one, taking up his heart,
Which time and change had made a stone,
Carved out of it with dolorous art,
Labouring yearlong and alone,

The thing there hidden—rose, toad, wing?
A frog's hand on a lily pad? 10
Bees in a cobweb—? No such thing!
A girl's head was the thing he had,

Small, shapely, richly crowned with hair, Drowsy, with eyes half closed, as they Looked through you and beyond you,
clear

To something farther than Cathay

Saw you, yet counted you not worth
The seeing, thinking all the while
How, flower-like, beauty comes to birth,
And thinking this, began to smile 20

Medusa! For she could not see
The world she turned to stone and ash
Only herself she saw, a tree
That flowered beneath a lightning-flash.

3 'It may be worth noting in this how the theme of the 'carver' is reinforced by the introduction of a series of small concrete objects, without qualifications, and all monosyllabic: rose, wing, toad, serpent's eye, and soon.' Author's note

Thus dreamed her face—a lovely thing,
 To worship, weep for, or to break
 Better to carve a claw, a wing,
 Or, if the heart provide, a snake.

SEA HOLLY <sup>1</sup>

BEGOTTEN by the meeting of rock with rock,
 The mating of rock and rock, rocks gnashing together,
 Created so, and yet forgetful, walks
 The seaward path, puts up her left hand, shades
 Blue eyes, the eyes of rock, to see better In slanting light the ancient sheep (which kneels
 Biting the grass) the while her other hand,
 Hooking the wicker handle, turns the basket
Of eggs The sea is high to-day The eggs
Are cheaper The sea is blown from the southwest, 10
 Confused, taking up sand and mud in waves,
 The waves break, sluggish, in brown foam,
     the wind
 Disperses (on the sheep and hawthorn) spray,—
 And on her cheeks, the cheeks engendered of rock,
 And eyes, the colour of rock The left hand
 Falls from the eyes, and undecided slides
 Over the left breast on which muslin lightly
 Rests, touching the nipple, and then down
 The hollow side, virgin as rock, and bitterly
 Caresses the blue hip. 20

<sup>1</sup> "Sea Holly" is a curiosity in the technique of mere repetition. In forty-eight lines, the word "rock" is repeated twenty-two times. Not a method wholly to be recommended, but here perhaps excusable, in conjunction with the harshness and staccato qualities of the verse, for its obvious contribution of bleakness and monotony to the theme of barrenness. This poem, together with "The Room" and "Sound of Breaking" and ten others, constituted a series of experiments in blank verse. The great flexibility of the form attracted me, with its range all the way from lyric or narrative to contemplative or analytic, and in addition to seeking a medium somewhat hard on the surface, metallic and ironic, I was also interested in using a "parable" form, a thing that might be called a narrative symbol, or symbolic narrative. It was my idea to keep the terms as simple as possible, and merely to let the chosen theme act itself a mere reporting of a thing done and seen. In "The Room," for example, the statement is of the barest, and in "Sound of Breaking" little more so. Author's note

It was for this,
 This obtuse taking of the seaward path,
 This stupid hearing of larks, this hooking
 Of wicker, this absent observation of sheep Kneeling in harsh sea-grass, the cool hand shading
 The spray-stung eyes—it was for this the rock
 Smote itself The sea is higher to-day,
 And eggs are cheaper The eyes of rock take in
 The seaward path that winds toward the
     sea,
 The thistle-prodder, old woman under a bonnet, 30
 Forking the thistles, her back against the
     sea,
 Pausing, with hard hands on the handle, peering
 With rock eyes from her bonnet

It was for this,
 This rock-lipped facing of brown waves, half sand
 And half water, this tentative hand that slides
 Over the breast of rock, and into the hollow
 Soft side of muslin rock, and then fiercely
 Almost as rock against the hip of rock—
 It was for this in midnight the rocks met, 40
 And dithered together, cracking and smoking

It was for this Barren beauty, barrenness of rock that aches
 On the seaward path, seeing the fruitful
     sea,
 Hearing the lark of rock that sings, smelling
 The rock-flower of hawthorn, sweetness of rock—
 It was for this, stone pain in the stony
     heart,
 The rock loved and laboured, and all is lost.

THE ROOM

THROUGH that window—all else being extinct
 Except itself and me—I saw the struggle Of darkness against darkness Within the room
 It turned and turned, dived downward.
     Then I saw

How order might—if chaos wished—become
 And saw the darkness crush upon itself, Contracting powerfully, it was as if
 It killed itself: slowly and with much pain.
 Pain. The scene was pain, and nothing but
 pain
 What else, when chaos draws all forces inward 10
 To shape a single leaf?

For the leaf came,
 Alone and shining in the empty room,
 After a while the twig shot downward from
 it,
 And from the twig a bough, and then the trunk,
 Massive and coarse, and last the one black root
 The black root cracked the walls Boughs burst the window
 The great tree took possession

Tree of trees!
 Remember (when time comes) how chaos
 died 20
 To shape the shining leaf Then turn, have courage,
 Wrap arms and roots together, be convulsed
 With grief, and bring back chaos out of shape
 I will be watching then as I watch now I will praise darkness now, but then the leaf

SOUND OF BREAKING

WHY do you cry out, why do I like to hear
 you
 Cry out, here in the dewless evening, sitting Close, close together, so close that the heart stops beating
 And the brain its thought? Wordless, worthless mortals
 Stumbling, exhausted, in this wilderness Of our conjoint destruction! Hear the grass
 Raging about us! Hear the worms applaud!
 Hear how the ripples make a sound of chaos!
 Hear now, in these and the other sounds of evening,
 The first brute step of God! 10

About your elbow,
 Making a ring of thumb and finger, I Slide the walled blood against the less-walled blood,
 Move down your arm, surmount the wrist-bone, shut
 Your long slim hand in mine Each finger-tip
 Is then saluted by a finger-tip,
 The hands meet back to back, then face to face,
 Then lock together And we, with eyes averted,
 Smile at the evening sky of alabaster, See nothing, lose our souls in the maelstrom, turning 20
 Downward in rapid circles

Bitter woman,
 Bitter of heart and brain and blood, bitter as I
 Who drink your bitterness—can this be beauty?
 Do you cry out because the beauty is cruel?
 Terror, because we downward sweep so swiftly?
 Terror of darkness?

It is a sound of breaking,
 The world is breaking, the world is a sound of breaking,
 Many-harmonied, diverse, profound, 30
 A shattering beauty See, how together we break,
 Hear what a crashing of disordered chords and discords Fills the world with falling, when we thus lean
 Our two mad bodies together!

It is a sound
 Of everlasting grief, the sound of weeping,
 The sound of disaster and misery, the
 sound
 Of passionate heartbreak at the centre of the world

THE POMEACITRON TREE <sup>1</sup>

HERE the skeleton leaf, between Eglantine and celandine,
 Harries an hour (that seems an age)

<sup>1</sup> "The Pomeacitron Tree" is an extension of the same notion in more lyric terms, and in the strict form of

The snail's deliberate pilgrimage
And in that same stupendous hour,
While royally unfolds the flower Magniloquent in the sunlight, She Dreams by the pomecitron tree.

Not lust alone is in her mind,
Nor the sad shapes of humankind 10
What ant is this, with horns, who comes Exploring huge geraniums?
Up the green-jointed column stalks,
And into halls of scarlet walks,
Boldly intrudes, partakes, then goes —Alas!—to eat her favorite rose

Not lust alone, yet this was lust,
And lust was that deliberate gust
That warmly roused the leaves, caressed 20
The lawn, and on her open breast
Blew, from the pomecitron tree,
One ravished petal, and a bee .
Into her bosom flew, from this,
The fiery-winged wounding kiss.

Into her bosom Deeper then,
It startles to that world of men,
Who, in the kingdom of her mind,
Awake, arise, begin to wind
Along the subterranean road
That leads from their abhorred abode . . .
They move and murmur, while the ant 31
Climbs an enormous rhubarb plant

And then it is her voice that cries,
While still beneath the tree she lies Maker of gardens, let me be Turned to a pomecitron tree!
Within his veins no longings rise,
He turns no concupiscent eyes,
Nor hears, in the infernal mind,
The lustful army wake and wind 40

He, though his roots are in the grave,
Is placid and unconscious, save an eight line stanza The theme, as will be seen, is a metaphysical one, but is presented dramatically, is acted and spoken To bring the abstractions alive there is a continuous emphasis on the sensory aspects of the situation, and all the more because as the theme is itself in part a questioning of the nature of the senses and of sensory experience The light formality of the octasyllabic couplets is intended as a further aid in giving a note as of almost gaiety to a mood of tragic self-analysis Both the form and the word "pomecitron" were suggested by George Sandys' verse translation of the "Song of Solomon" in the seventeenth century Author's note

Of burning light, or rain, that slides
On dripping leaves and down his sides.
In his cool thought the sparrow nests,
A leaf, among more leaves she rests,
Or, if she sings, her watery voice
Is joined with countless that rejoice.

What bliss is his! what deep delight!
To face, with his own dark, the night! 50
With his own sunrise meet the sun!
Or whistle with the wind, and run!
Why, Lord, was it ordained that I Must turn an inward-roving eye?
Why must I know, unlike this tree,
What lusts and murders nourish me?

To him, no doubt, most innocent
Seems, in this sunlight, my intent
No primrose ever lightlier breathed
Than my tall body, flower-enwreathed 60
Soft as lilies the sunlight rests Upon my pollen-powdered breasts
My two hands, of their own sweet will,
Can stir like leaves, or stand as still

What stems can match this throat of gold
And ivory? What stalks uphold So lightly, in this garden, such Delirious flowers to taste and touch?
What pistilled mouth can rival here
My mouth, what leaves outvie my hair 70
In mindless beauty? Yet, behind
This mindless beauty lurks a mind

Ah, while the rhubarb leaf is spread Broad as a salver by my head
And the green aphid pastures on This tall green tower of Solomon
The mind, within my flower's bell,
Conceals its black concentric hell
There at this minute swarms the host,
And lewd ghost speaks with furious
ghost

There the sad shapes of humankind 81
Through brown defiles in sorrow wind,
And, if they speak, their arid speech
Is of that land they cannot reach
There the defeated warrior lies,
And westward turns defrauded eyes
Deformed and monstrous are those men:
They climb, and do not turn again.

It is to me each lifts his face!
It is to me, with footsore pace, 90

Summoned once more, they creep and
 come,
 Pointing toward me as to home
 What love is in their eyes! Alas,
 That love so soon to lust should pass!
 The hands they lift are stumps, they stir
 The rank leaves where their faces were.

Maker of gardens, let me be
 Turned to a pomecitron tree,
 Or let me be this rhubarb plant,
 Whose lavish love is ignorant, 100
 Or let me be this daffodil,
 Which lusts and murders, yet is still
 All-in-itself, a golden All Concentred in one burning ball!

She sighs, and it is in her thought
 That grief so desperate may be fraught With tears, and tears were sweet, displayed
 Here, in the pomecitron shade,
 And grief is pleasant, when beguiled
 By mindless garden, or a child, 110
 But the few tears are thought, not shed,
 She claps her hands, and laughs, instead

FROM PRELUDES FOR MEMNON <sup>1</sup>XLV <sup>2</sup>

THE dead man spoke to me and begged a penny,
 For god's sake, and for yours and mine, he
 said,

<sup>1</sup> The two selections from "Preludes for Memnon" and three from "Time in the Rock" are really, in effect, all parts of one poem, or one such "series" as mentioned earlier in these notes. Originally, I planned to entitle the two companion groups "Preludes to Attitude" ("Memnon") and "Preludes to Definition" ("Time in the Rock"), and I have always regarded them as belonging together and as constituting one unit. Together, they form the most extended use of "series" I have attempted, and the most complex. The range offered by the theme—with its paired questions of "what attitude shall we take towards the world, external and internal, which we see, and what definitions can we find for a world of experience so fluid"—was naturally much greater than that available in the earlier series, where usually a single tone prevailed throughout, though of course with variations (Viz, "autumn" in "Variations", "winter" in "Improvisations Lights and Snow"). Here, as in the symphonies, I was free to rove farther afield, but without so much check of symphonic form, such check as was necessary lay in the relative freedom of the theme and, of course, as in the earlier use of "series," in the play of one movement or idea against another, repetition in elaboration, repetition by inversion, cross reference, and so on. The majority of

Slowly under the streetlamp turned his
 head,
 I saw his eyes wide open and he stared Through me as if my bones and flesh were nothing,
 Through me and through the earth and through the void,
 His eyes were dark and wide and cold and empty
 As if his vision had become a grave
 Larger than bones of any world could fill,
 But crystal clear and deep and deeply still.

Poor devil—why, he wants to close his eyes,
 He wants a charity to close his eyes, 12
 And follows me with outstretched palm, from world to world
 And from house to house and street to street,
 Under the streetlamps and along dark
 alleys,
 And sits beside me in my room, and sleeps Upright with eyes wide open by my bed,
 Circles the Pleiades with a glance, returns From cold Orion with a slow turn of the head,
 Looks north and south at once, and all the while 20
 Holds, in that void of an unfocused stare,
 My own poor footsteps, saying

I have read
 Time in the rock and in the human heart, Space in the bloodstream, and those lesser works Written by rose and windflower on the summer, sung
 By water and snow, deciphered by the eye,
 Translated by the slaves of memory,
 And all that you be you, and I be I,
 Or all that by imagination, aping 30
 God, the supreme poet of despair,
 I may be you, you me, before our time
 Knowing the rank intolerable taste of death,
 And walking dead on the still living earth

the movements are in blank verse, but as in the symphonies there is occasional recourse to stanza or rhyme or other formal device. For the most part, the tone is kept down to what is almost a conversational level, and a quiet type of poetry is aimed at, such as will move readily from the barest of statement or directest of analysis to the more obviously "poetic." Author's note

. I rose and dressed and descended the stair
 Into the sunlight, and he came with me,
 Staring the skeleton from the daffodil, Freezing the snowflake in the blackbird's whistle,
 And with that cold profound unhating
 eye
 He moved the universe from east to west, Slowly, disastrously,—but with such splendor 41
 As god, the supreme poet of delight, might envy,—
 To the magnificent sepulchre of sleep

RIMBAUD and Verlaine, precious pair of poets,
 Genius in both (but what is genius?) playing
 Chess on a marble table at an inn
 With chestnut blossom falling in blond beer
 And on their hair and between knight and bishop—Sunlight squared between them on the chess-board
 Cirrus in heaven, and a squeal of music
 Blown from the leathern door of Sainte Sulpice—Discussing, between moves, iamb and spondee
 Anacoluthon and the open vowel 10
 God the great peacock with his angel peacocks
 And his dependent peacocks the bright stars
 Disputing too of fate as Plato loved it,
 Or Sophocles, who hated and admired,
 Or Socrates, who loved and was amused
 Verlaine puts down his pawn upon a leaf And closes his long eyes, which are dishonest,
 And says 'Rimbaud, there is one thing to do

<sup>1</sup> "Rimbaud and Verlaine" is one of several sections in the two series which deal with the problem of communication itself, and may be compared with the section which follows it. It is something of an oddity of form, each stanza being a line shorter than that preceding it, and the end falling into couplets, by way of ironic comment on the accompanying dismissal of "rhetoric." Author's note

We must take rhetoric, and wring its neck! . . .
 Rimbaud considers gravely, moves his Queen, 20
 And then removes himself to Timbuctoo.
 And Verlaine dead,—with all his jades and mauves,
 And Rimbaud dead in Marseilles with a vision,
 His leg cut off, as once before his heart,
 And all reported by a later lackey,
 Whose virtue is his tardiness in time.

Let us describe the evening as it is —
 The stars disposed in heaven as they are:
 Verlaine and Shakspeare rotting, where they rot,
 Rimbaud remembered, and too soon forgot, 30

Order in all things, logic in the dark,
 Arrangement in the atom and the spark;
 Time in the heart and sequence in the brain—

Such as destroyed Rimbaud and fooled
 Verlaine
 And let us then take godhead by the neck—
 And strangle it, and with it, rhetoric.

FROM TIME IN THE ROCK <sup>2</sup>

XXII

IF man, that angel of bright consciousness, that wingless mind and brief epitome of god's forgetfulness, will be going forth into the treacherous envelope of sunlight—why, the poor fool, does he expect, does he expect to return at evening? or to return the same?
 Those who have put on, in the morning,
 that cloak of light, that sheath of air, wrapped themselves suddenly, on the exit,
 in the wild wave of daybreak, which has
 come 10

<sup>2</sup> Two of the sections from "Time in the Rock"—"If man, that angel" and "What without speech"—again touch on the problem of communication, which indeed is one of the recurring themes of the two books of preludes. Author's note from cruel Alpha,—what has become of

them?
They will return as the sons of darkness.

If woman, that demon of unconsciousness, that wingèd body of delightful chaos,
that quick embodied treason and deceit, will go forth sinuously from the opening
door
and take to herself the garment of daylight—
who will vouch for her, go her surety, who will her bondsman be, or swear by the cloud that she, who thus went forth, will thus come back? 20
If she took darkness with her, will she return
with luminous heart, and a soft light within?
For that which goes forth comes back changed or dead

If the child, that frail mirror of the sky, that little room of foolish laughter and grief,
transient toucher and taster of the surface, assembler and scatterer of light,—if he go forth
into the simple street to count its stones, its walls, its houses, its weeds and grassblades,
so, in the numbered, to sum the infinite—infant compendium of the terrible— 31 will the changed man, and the changed
woman,
await him, with full knowledge, in the evening—
salute him gravely, with a kiss or handshake, oblique embrace of the young wingless
shoulders—
will they, unknowing, unknown, know this Unknown?

All three at evening, when they return once more from the black ocean of dark Omega, by those wild waves washed up with stars and hours,
brought home at last from nowhere to nothing— 40
all three will pause in the simple light, and speak to each other, slowly, with such queer speech

as dead men use among the asphodels, nor know each other, nor understand each other,
but tread apart on the wind, like dancers borne by unearthly music to unearthly
peace.

The house of evening, the house of clouds, vast hall
of which the walls are walls of everywhere, enfolds them, like a wind which blows out lights
And they are there, lying apart, lying alone, 50
those three who went forth suddenly in the morning
and now return, estranged and changed, each is alone, with his extinguished lamp;
each one would weep, if he had time to weep, but, before tears can fall, they are asleep

XLVI

WHAT without speech we knew and could not say what without thought we did and could not change violence of the hand which the mind thought strange let us take these things into another world,
another dream
what without love we touched pronouncing good what without touch we loved and gave no sign violence of spirit which only spirit knew divine
let us take these things into another world,
another sleep 10

walk with me heliotrope fly with me sparrow come beating of my heart and learn how life is narrow how little, and ill, will be remembered by tomorrow
let us give our lives into another world another hand

where like old rocks we shall be heaped forgetful,
or waste away like stars in fiery stullness,

no clock with mortal cry to speak our illness;
 let us take our deaths into another time another god 20

come girl, come golden-breasted girl, and walk on the so silent and sun-sandalled path between the foremath and the aftermath let us hurl our joy into another chaos, another wrath
 and make it love

what without speech we know we then shall say
 and all our violence will there be gay what without thought we do will be but play
 and our unspoken love as bright as day and we shall live 30

LXXXIV

WHAT face she put on it, we will not discuss
 she went hence an hour since Where she went,
 is another matter To the north, to the south,
 as the man whistled, or the whim bade, she went,
 or even—who can say—following a star
 Her heart is like an hourglass, from which the sand runs—
 no sooner run than tilted to run again, her mind, a mirror, which reflects always the last moment,

her face, you would know it anywhere, it gives you back your own light, like the moon. Tell her a lie, 10
 threefold she reflects it, tell her the truth, and its returned brilliance will strike you
 dead.
 She is of quicksilver. You might as well pillow your head on a cloud, as on that breast,
 or strive to sleep with a meteor when you wake,
 she is gone, your own hand is under your cheek

Yet she is of the material that earth is made of will breed as quick as a fly bloom like the cherry,
 fearless of frost and has a nimble fancy as tropic in pattern as a fernleaf She walks as naturally as a young tree might walk 21 with no pretence picks up her roots and goes out of your world, and into the secret
 darkness,
 as a lady with lifted train will leave a ballroom,
 and who knows why

Wherefor do you love her, gentlemen?
 Because, like the spring earth, she is fruitfulness?
 and you are seed? you need no other reason?
 and she no other than her perpetual season

All in green went my love riding on a great horse of gold into the silver dawn

four lean hounds crouched low and smiling
 the merry deer ran before.

Fleeter be they than dappled dreams the swift sweet deer
 the red rare deer.

gee I like to think of dead it means nearer because deeper firmer since darker than little round water at one end of the well it's too cool to be crooked and it's too firm to be hard but it's sharp and thick and it loves, every old thing falls in rosebugs and jackknives and kittens and pennies they all sit there looking at each other having the fastest time because they've never met before

dead's more even than how many ways of sitting on your head your unnatural hair has in the morning

10

dead's clever too like POF goes the alarm off and the little striker having the best time tickling away everybody's brain so everybody just puts out their finger and they stuff the poor thung all full of fingers dead has a smile like the nicest man you've never met who maybe winks at you in a streetcar and you pretend you don't but really you do see and you are My how glad he winked and hope he'll do it again or if it talks about you somewhere behind your back it makes your neck feel pleasant and stoopid and if dead says may i have this one and was never introduced you say Yes because you know you want it to dance with you and it wants to and it can dance and Whocares

20

dead's fine like hands do you see that water flowerpots

you so that's all you see but you don't want to dead's happy like the way underclothes All so differ-ently solemn and intu and sitting on one string dead never says my dear, Time for your musiclesson and you like music and to have somebody play who can but you know you never can and why have to?

30

dead's nice like a dance where you danced simple hours and you take all your prickley-clothes off and squeeze-into-largeness without one word and you lie still as anything in largeness and this largeness begins to give you, the dance all over again and you, feel all again all over the way men you liked made you feel when they touched you (but that's not all) because largeness tells you so you can feel what you made, men feel when, you touched, them

dead's sorry like a thistlefluff-thing which goes land-

FROM THE WOMAN OF ANDROS

AEGEAN MOODS<sup>1</sup>

BRYNOS rose with the dawn, and it was not many hours later that the morning's work was over. Pamphilus, having helped his father in the warehouse and being in no mood for exercising in the field, started out to walk to the highest point on the island. It was early Spring. A strong wind had blown every cloud from the sky and the sea lay covered with flying white-tipped waves. His garments leapt and billowed about him and his very hair tugged at his head. The gulls themselves, leaning upon the gusts, were caught unawares from time to time and blown with ruffled feathers and scandalized cries towards the violet-blue zenith. Pamphilus led his life with much worry and self-examination and all the exhilaration of wind and sun could not drive from his mind the anxious affection with which he now turned over his thoughts of Chrysis and Philumena and of the four members of his family. He was straying among the rocks and the lizards and the neglected dwarfed olive-trees, when his attention was suddenly caught by an incident on the hillside to his left. A group of boys from the town was engaged in tormenting a young girl. She was retreating backwards up the slope through a disused orchard, shouting haughtily back at her pursuers. The boys' malice had turned to anger, they were retorting hotly and letting fly about her a few harmless stones. Pamphilus strode over to the group and with a gesture ordered the boys down the hill. The girl, her face still flushed and distrustful, stood with her back against a tree and waited for him to come towards her. They looked at one another for a moment in silence. Finally Pamphilus said

10

'What is the matter?'

'They're just country fools, that's all. They've never seen anyone before who didn't come from their wretched Brynos.' And then from rage and disappointment she began to cry uncontrollably and despairingly.

<sup>1</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from The Woman of Andros (N.Y., 1930), 62-81. In a prefatory note, the author says: 'The first part of this novel is based upon the Andria, a comedy of Terence who in turn based his work upon two Greek plays, now lost to us, by Menander.' The section used above is one of Wilder's amplifications.

Pamphilus watched her for a time and then asked her where she had been going.

'Nowhere. I was just going for a walk and they followed me from the town. I can't do anything. I can't go anywhere . . . I wasn't hurting them. I was just going for a walk alone and they called names after me. They followed me way up here, I called names at them and then they started throwing things at me. That's all.'

'I thought I knew everyone on the island,' said Pamphilus thoughtfully, 'but I have never seen you before. Have you been here long?'

'Yes, I've been here almost a year,' she replied, adding indistinctly, '. . . but I hardly ever go out or anything.'

'You hardly ever go out?'

'No,' and she fumbled with her dress and stared at the sea, frowning.

'You should try to know some of the other girls and go out for walks with them.'

This time she turned and looked into his face. 'I don't know any of the other girls.

I live at home and they don't let me go out of the house, except when I go out for walks nights with . . . well, with Mysis.' She continued to be shaken with sobs, but she was adjusting her hair and the folds of her dress. 'I don't see why they have to throw stones at me,' she added.

Pamphilus looked at her in silence, gravely. Presently he collected himself and said, 'There's a big smooth stone over there. Will you go over there and sit down?'

She followed him to the stone, still busy with her hair and drawing her fingers across her eyes and cheeks.

'I have a sister just about your age,' said Pamphilus. 'You can begin by knowing her. You can go for walks with her and then you wouldn't be a stranger any more. Her name is Argo. You'd like one another, I know. My sister is weaving a large mantle for my mother and she'd like you to help her with it and she could help you with yours. Are you making a mantle?'

'Yes.'

'That would be fine,' said Pamphilus, and from that moment Glycerium loved him forever.

'I probably know your father, don't I?' he asked.

'I have no father,' she replied, looking up at him weakly, 'I am the sister of the woman from Andros.'

'Oh . . . oh . . .,' said Pamphilus, more astonished than he had ever been in his life. 'I know your sister well.'

'Yes,' said Glycerium. Her bright wet eyes strayed over the streaked sea and the blown birds. 'She doesn't want anyone to know that I'm there. All day I stay up on the top of the house or work in the court. Only at night I'm allowed to go for a walk with Mysis. Even now I'm supposed to be in the house, but I broke my promise. She has gone to the market and so I broke my promise. I wanted to see what the island and the sea look like by day. And I wanted to look across to Andros where I come from. But the boys followed me here and threw stones at me and I can never come again.'

Here she fell to weeping even more despairingly than before and Pamphilus could do nothing but say 'Well' several times and 'Yes.' At last he asked her what her name was.

'Glycerium. Chrysis went away from home a long time ago and I was living with my brother and he died and I couldn't live with him any more. And I had nowhere to go or anything, and one day she came back and took me to live with her. That's all.'

'Have you any brothers or sisters?'

'Oh, no.'

'Who is Mysis?'

'Mysis isn't Greek. She is from Alexandria. Chrysis found her. All of them in the house,—she just found them somewhere. That's what she does. Mysis was a slave in the cloth mills. Sometimes she tells me about it.'

Pamphilus still gazed at her, and bringing back her wandering evasive glance from the sea she looked at him from her thin face and enormous hungry eyes. Even a long glance did not now embarrass them.

'Do you want me to ask Chrysis to let you go about the island by day?' he asked.

'If she doesn't want it, we mustn't change her. Chrysis knows best.' She turned away from him and said in a lower voice, dreamy and embittered, 'But what can become of me? Am I always to stay locked up? I am fifteen already. The world is full of wonderful things and people that I might never know about. I know it was wrong of me to break my promise, but to live for years without ever knowing new people,—to hear them passing the door all day, and to see them a long ways off. Do you think I did very wrong?’

‘No.’

‘I don’t know anyone I don’t know anyone’

‘Well well, you’ll come to know my sister That will be a beginning,’ he said, taking her fingertips thoughtfully and wonderingly in his

‘Yes,’ she said

‘Everything is beginning over again I’m your friend Then my sister Soon you will have a great many. You’ll see’

‘But where will I be five years from now and ten years from now,’ she cried, staring about her wildly ‘I don’t know I’m afraid I’m unhappy Everyone in the world is happy except me’

The caress of the hands in first love, and never so simply again, seems to be a sharing of courage, an alliance of two courages against a confusing world As his hand passed from her hair to her shoulder, she turned to him with parted lips and hesitant eyes, then suddenly bound both her arms about his neck Into his ears her lips wildly and all but meaninglessly repeated ‘Yes Yes Yes I can’t stay there forever I should never know anyone I should never see anybody’

‘She will let you come to see me,’ he said

‘No,’ said Glycerium ‘But I’ll come by myself I mustn’t ask her She would not let me come She always knows best And the boys can throw their stones I don’t mind if you’re here What . what is your name?’

‘My name is Pamphilus, Glycerium’

‘Can . . . can I call you by it?’

It was not at this meeting, nor at their next, but at the third, beneath the dwarfed olive-trees, that those caresses that seemed to be for courage, for pity and for admiration, were turned by Nature to her own uses

These conversations took place in the early Spring One afternoon in the late Summer Chrysis slipped out of her house and climbed the hill behind it She was filled with a great desire to be alone and to think She looked out over the glittering sea. The winds were moderate on that afternoon and before them the innumerable neat waves hurried towards the shore, running up the sands with a long whisper, or discreetly lifting against the rocks a scarf of foam In the distance a school of dolphins engaged at their eternal games led the long procession of curving backs The water was marbled at intervals with the strange fields and roadways of a lighter blue, and behind all she beheld with love the violet profile of Andros For a time she strayed about upon the crest of the hill, making sure that no one was watching or following her, then descending the further side she sought out her favorite retreats, a point of rock that projected into the sea and a sheltered cove beside it As she drew near the place, she stumbled forward, almost running, and as she went she murmured soothingly to herself ‘We are almost there Look, we are almost there now’ At last, climbing over the boulders she let herself down into an amphitheatre of hot dry sand She started unbinding her hair, but stopped herself abruptly ‘No, no I must think I should fall asleep here I must think first I shall come back soon,’ she muttered to the amphitheatre, and continuing her journey she reached the furthestmost heap of stones and sat down She rested her chin upon her hand and fixing her eyes upon the horizon she waited for the thoughts to come.

The first thing to think about was her new illness Several times she had been awakened by a wild fluttering in her left side that continued, deepening, until it seemed to her as though a great stake were being driven into her heart And all the day the sensation would remain with her as of a heavy object burdening the place where this trouble lay ‘Probably very likely,’ she said to herself, ‘the next time I shall die of it’ At the thought a wave of anticipation passed over her ‘I shall probably die of it,’ she repeated cheerfully and became interested in some crayfish in the pool at her feet She plucked some grasses behind her and started dragging them before the eyes of the indignant animals ‘Nothing in life could make me abandon my sheep, but if I die they will have to fall back on Circumstance as I did Glycerium, what will become of you? Apraxine, Mysis ? There are times when we cannot see one step ahead of us, but five years later we are eating and sleeping somewhere' (It was humorous, pretending that one's heart was as hard as that) 'Yes,' she said aloud, to the pain that trembled within her, 'only come quickly' She leaned forward still dragging the stems before the shell-fish 'I have lived thirty-five years I have lived enough Stranger, near this spot lies Chrysis, daughter of Arches of Andros the ewe that has strayed from the flock lives many years in one day and dies at a great age when the sun sets' She laughed at the deceptive comforts of self-pity and taking off a sandal put her foot into the water She drew herself up for a moment, asking herself what there was left in the house for the colony's supper, then recollecting some fish and some salad on the shelf, she returned to her thoughts She repeated her epitaph, making it a song and emphasizing, for self-mockery, its false sentiment 'O Andros, O Poseidon, how happy I am. I have no right to be happy like this . . .'

And she knew as she gazed at the frieze of dolphins still playing in the distance that her mind was avoiding another problem that awaited her 'I am happy because I love this Pamphilus,—Pamphilus the anxious, Pamphilus the stupid Why cannot someone tell him that it is not necessary to suffer so about living' And the low exasperated sigh escaped her, the protest we make at the preposterous, the incorrigible beloved 'He thinks he is failing He thinks he is inadequate to life at every turn Let him rest some day, O ye Olympians, from pitying those who suffer Let him learn to look the other way This is something new in the world, this concern for the unfit and the broken Once he begins that, there's no end to it, only madness It leads nowhere That is some god's business' Whereupon she discovered that she was weeping, but when she had dried her eyes she was still thinking about him 'Oh, such people are unconscious of their goodness They strike their foreheads with their hands because of their failure, and yet the rest of us are made glad when we remember their faces Pamphilus, you are another herald from the future. Some day men will be like you. Do not frown so . . .'

But these thoughts were very fatiguing. She arose and, returning to the amphitheatre, laid herself down upon the sand She murmured some fragments from the Euripidean choruses and fell asleep She had always been an islander and this hot and impersonal sun playing upon a cold and impersonal sea was not unfriendly to her And now for two hours the monotony of sun and sea played about her and wove itself into the mood of her sleeping mind As once the gray-eyed Athena stood guarding Ulysses—she leaning upon her spear, her great heart full of concern and of those long divine thoughts that are her property—even so, now, the hour and the place all but gathered itself into a presence and shed its influence upon her When her eyes finally opened she listened for a time to the calm in her heart 'Some day,' she said, 'we shall understand why we suffer I shall be among the shades underground and some wonderful hand, some Alcestis, will touch me and will show me the meaning of all these things, and I shall laugh softly for hours as I do now as I do now'

She arose and binding up her hair prepared to ascend the slope But just as she turned to leave the place, there visited her the desire to do something ceremonial, to mark the hour She stood up straightly and held out her arms to the setting sun 'If you still hear prayers from the lips of mortals, if our longings touch you at all, hear me now Give to this Pamphilus some assurance—even some assurance such as you have given to me, unstable though I am—that he is right And oh! (but I do not say this from vanity or pride, O Apollo,—but perhaps this is weak, this is childish of me, perhaps this renders the whole prayer powerless!) if it is possible, let the thought of me or of something I have said be comforting to him some day And . . . and . . .'

But her arms fell to her side The world seemed empty The sun went down. The sea and sky became suddenly remote and she was left with only the tears in her eyes and the longing in her heart. She closed her lips and turned her head aside. 'I suppose there is no god,' she whispered 'We must do these things ourselves We must drag ourselves through life as best we can'

THE TOWER BEYOND TRAGEDY<sup>1</sup>

from Sparta, the beautiful sea-flower Cut in clear stone, crowned with the fragrant golden mane, she the ageless, the uncontaminable—

This Clytemnestra was her sister, low-

<sup>1</sup> The poem is based on the Agamemnon and the Libation Bearers of Aeschylus. In a letter to Alberts, 13 May 1929, Jeffers says "We turn to the classic stories, I suppose, as to Greek sculpture, for a more ideal and also more normal beauty, because the myths of our own race were never developed, and have been alienated from us." Alberts, A Bibliography of Jeffers (N.Y., 1933), 24.

Of the symbolism, Jeffers wrote, n.d., to Louis Adamic: "In 'Tamar' a little and vaguely, in 'The Tower Beyond Tragedy' and 'The Women at Point Sur' consciously and definitely, incest is symbolized racial introversion—man regarding man exclusively—founding his values, desires, his picture of the universe, all on his own humanity. With the thickening of civilization, science reforms the picture of the universe and makes it inhuman, but the values and desires are ever more fixed inward. People living in cities hardly look at or think of anything but each other and each other's amusements and works." Adamic, Robinson Jeffers (Seattle, 1929), 28.

Of his metrical intention, Jeffers wrote, n.d., in a letter to Klein: "People talked about my 'free verse' and I never protested, but now I am quite touched that someone has at last discovered the metrical intention in it. Of course you have noticed that (chiefly in my narrative poems) many lines are of irregular length—"free" no doubt, as are many lines in Elizabethan dramatic verse—but it seems to me that there is a metrical pattern, if only, and most irregular, as a background from which to measure departures from the pattern. It seems to me that the counting of stresses is not enough, without some regard to the quantities of the unstressed syllables, to make well-sounding lines. But there I can't propose any rule, it is more a matter of ear and rhythmic sense. A line made up of syllables like "many" or "easy" couldn't balance rhythmically with a line made up of syllables like "storm-bent," "oak-trees," though the number of syllables were the same. Several modern poets have caught Coleridge's and Bridges' thought, or found it out for themselves, but it seems to me that there remains an infinite field of rhythm as yet untouched or hardly touched. English as a language of very diverse and tolerably stable quantities, beside being a strongly accented language, great and new things might be done in it if we had time and ear." Quoted, Alberts, A Bibliography of Jeffers (N.Y., 1933), 150-51.

statured, fierce-lipped, not dark nor blond, greenish-gray-eyed, Sinewed with strength, you saw, under the purple folds of the queen-cloak, but craftier than queenly, Standing between the gilded wooden porch-pillars, great steps of stone above the steep street,
Awaiting the King.

Most of his men were quartered on the town, he, clanking bronze, with fifty
And certain captives, came to the stair
The Queen's men were a hundred in the street and a hundred Lining the ramp, eighty on the great flags of the porch, she raising her white arms the spear-butts
Thundered on the stone, and the shields clashed, eight shining clarions<sup>10</sup> Let fly from the wide window over the entrance the wild-birds of their metal throats, air-cleaving Over the King come home. He raised his thick burnt-colored beard and smiled,
then Clytemnestra,
Gathering the robe, setting the golden-sandaled feet carefully, stone by stone, descended
One half the stair. But one of the captives marred the comeliness of that embrace with a cry
Gull-shrill, blade-sharp, cutting between the purple cloak and the bronze plates,
then Clytemnestra
Who was it? The King answered. A piece of our goods out of the snatch of Asia, a daughter of the king,
So treat her kindly and she may come into her wits again
Eh, you keep state here my queen
You've not been the poorer for me—
In heart, in the widowed chamber, dear, she pale replied, though the slaves Toiled, the spearmen were faithful. What's her name, the slave-girl's?
AGAMEMNON Come up the stair. They tell me my kinsman's<sup>20</sup> Lodged himself on you CLYTEMNESTRA Your cousin Ægisthus? He was out of refuge, flits between here and Tiryns

Dear the girl's name?

AGAMEMNON                      Cassandra We've a hundred or so other captives, besides two hundred

Rotted in the hulls,—they tell odd stories about you and your guest eh? no matter
—the ships

Ooze pitch and the August road smokes dirt, I smell like an old shepherd's goatskin, you'll have bath-water?

CLYTEMNESTRA

They're making it hot Come, my lord. My hands will pour it

(They enter the palace)

CASSANDRA

In the holy city,

In Troy, when the stone was standing walls and the ash

Was painted and carved wood and pictured curtains, 30

And those lived that are dead, they had caged a den

Of wolves out of the mountain, and I a maiden

Was led to see them it stank and snarled,

The smell was the smell here, the eyes were the eyes

Of steep Mycenæ O God guardian of wanderers

Let me die easily

So cried Cassandra the daughter of King
Priam, treading the steps of the palace at Mycenæ,

Swaying like a drunken woman, drunk with the rolling of the ship, and with tears, and with prophecy

The stair may yet be seen, among the old stones that are Mycenæ, tall dark Cassandra, the prophetess,

The beautiful girl with whom a God bargained for love, high-nurtured, captive, shamefully stained 40

With the ship's filth and the sea's, rolled her dark head upon her shoulders like a drunken woman

And trod the great stones of the stair The captives, she among them, were ranked into a file

On the flagged porch, between the parapet and the spearmen The people below
shouted for the King,

King Agamemnon, returned conqueror,

after the ten years of battle and death in Asia

Then cried Cassandra

Good spearmen you did not kill my father, not you

Violated my mother with the piercing

That makes no life in the womb, not you defiled

My tall blond brothers with the masculine lust

That strikes its loved one standing, 50
And leaves him what no man again nor a girl

Ever will gaze upon with the eyes of desire
Therefore you'll tell me

Whether it's an old custom in the Greek country

The cow goring the bull, break the inner door back

And see in what red water how cloaked your King

Bathes, and my brothers are avenged a little One said Captive be quiet And she What have I to be quiet for, you will not believe me

Such wings my heart spreads when the red runs out of any Greek, I must let the bird fly O soldiers

He that mishandled me dies! The first, one of your two brute Ajaxes, that threw me backward 60

On the temple flagstones, a hard bride-bed,
I enduring him heard the roofs of my city breaking,

The roar of flames and spearmen what came to Ajax? Out of a cloud the loud-winged falcon lightning

Came on him shipwrecked, clapped its wings about him, clung to him, the violent flesh burned and the bones

Broke from each other in that passion, and now this one, returned safe, the Queen is his lightning

While she yet spoke a slave with haggard eyes darted from the door, there were hushed cries and motions

In the inner dark of the great hall Then the Queen Clytemnestra issued, smiling
She drew

Her cloak up, for the brooch on the left shoulder was broken, the fillet of her hair had come unbound,

Yet now she was queenly at length, and standing at the stair-head spoke Men of Mycenæ, I have made

Sacrifice for the joy this day has brought to us, the King come home, the enemy fallen, fallen,

In the ashes of Asia. I have made sacrifice
I made the prayer with my own lips, and struck the bullock 70

With my own hand The people murmured together, She's not a priestess, the Queen is not a priestess,

What has she done there, what wild sayings
Make wing in the Queen's throat?

CLYTEMNESTRA I have something to tell you Too much joy is a message-bearer of misery

A little is good, but come too much and it devours us Therefore we give of a great harvest

Sheaves to the smiling Gods, and therefore out of a full cup we pour the quarter No man

Dare take all that God sends him, whom God favors, or destruction

Rides into the house in the last basket I have been twelve years your shepherdess,

I the Queen have ruled you
And I am accountable for you

CASSANDRA

Why should a man kill his own mother? 80

The cub of the lion being grown

Will fight with the lion, but neither lion nor wolf

Nor the unclean jackal

Bares tooth against the womb that he dropped out of

Yet I have seen—

CLYTEMNESTRA

Strike that captive woman with your hand, spearman, and then if the spirit

Of the she-wolf in her will not quiet, with the butt of the spear

CASSANDRA

—the blade in the child's hand

Enter the breast that the child sucked—that woman's—

The left breast that the robe has dropped from, for the brooch is broken, 90

That very hillock of whiteness, and she crying, she kneeling—

(The spearman who is nearest CASSANDRA covers her mouth with his hand.)

CLYTEMNESTRA

My sister's beauty entered Troy with too much gladness They forgot to make sacrifice

Therefore destruction entered, therefore the daughters of Troy cry out in strange dispersals, and this one

Grief has turned mad I will not have that horror march under the lion-gate of Mycenæ

That split the citadel of Priam Therefore I say I have made sacrifice, I have subtracted

A fraction from immoderate joy For consider, my people,

How unaccountably God has favored the city and brought home the army King Agamemnon,

My dear, my husband, my lord and yours, Is yet not such a man as the Gods love, but insolent, fierce, overbearing, whose folly Brought many times many great evils 100

On all the heads and fighting hopes of the Greek force Why, even before the fleet made sail,

While yet it gathered on Bæotian Aulis, this man offended He slew one of the deer

Of the sacred herd of Artemis, out of pure impudence, hunter's pride that froths in a young boy

Laying nock to string of his first bow this man, grown, a grave king, leader of the Greeks

The angry Goddess

Blew therefore from the horn of the Trojan shore storm without end, no slackening, no turn, no slumber

Of the eagle bound to break the oars of the fleet and split the hulls venturing you know what answer

Calchas the priest gave his flesh must pay whose hand did the evil—his flesh! mine also His? My daughter

They knew that of my three there was one that I loved

Blameless white maid, my Iphigenia, whose throat the knife, 110

Whose delicate soft throat the thing that cuts sheep open was drawn across by a priest's hand

And the soft-colored lips drained bloodless That had clung here—here—Oh!

(Drawing the robe from her breasts)

These feel soft, townsmen, these are red at the tips, they have neither blackened nor turned marble.

King Agamemnon hoped to pillow his black-haired breast upon them, my husband, that mighty conqueror,

Come home with glory He thought they were still a woman's, they appear a woman's I'll tell you something

Since fawn slaughtered for slaughtered fawn evened the debt these that feel soft and warm are wounding ice,

They ache with their hardness

Shall I go on and count the other follies of the King? The insolences to God and man

That brought down plague, and brought Achilles' anger against the army? Yet
God brought home a remnant 120

Against all hope therefore rejoice

But lest too much rejoicing slay us I have made sacrifice A little girl's brought you over the sea

What could be great enough for safe return?
A sheep's death? A bull's? What thank-offering?

All these captives, battered from the ships, bruised with captivity, damaged flesh and forlorn minds?

God requires wholeness in the victim You dare not think what he demands I dared
I, I,

Dared

Men of the Argolis, you that went over the sea and you that guarded the home coasts

And high stone war-belts of the cities remember how many spearmen these twelve years have called me

Queen, and have loved me, and been faithful, and remain faithful What I bring you is accomplished

VOICES

King Agamemnon The King We will hear the King 130

CLYTEMNESTRA What I bring you
is accomplished

Accept it, the cities are at peace, the ways are safe between them, the Gods favor us Refuse it

You will not refuse it .

VOICES

The King We will hear the King. Let us see the King

CLYTEMNESTRA

You will not refuse it, I have my faithful
They would run, the red rivers,

From the gate and by the graves through every crooked street of the great city, they would run in the pasture

Outside the walls and on this stair:
stemmed at this entrance—

CASSANDRA

Ah, sister, do you also behold visions? I was watching red water—

CLYTEMNESTRA

Be wise, townsmen As for the King slaves will bring him to you when he has bathed, you will see him

The slaves will carry him on a litter, he has learned Asian ways in Asia, too great a ruler 140

To walk, like common spearmen

CASSANDRA Who is that, standing behind you, Clytemnestra?
What God

Dark in the doorway?

CLYTEMNESTRA Deal you with your own demons You know what I have done, captive You know

I am holding lions with my two eyes if I turn and loose them .

CASSANDRA It is . the King There!
There! Ah!

CLYTEMNESTRA

Or if I should make any move to increase confusion If I should say for example, Spearman

Kill that woman I cannot say it this moment, so little as from one spear wound in your body

A trickle would loose them on us

CASSANDRA Yet he stands behind you A-ah! I can bear it
I have seen much lately 150

Worse

A CAPTAIN (down the stair, standing forward from his men) O Queen, there is no man in the world, but one (if that one lives), may ask you to speak

Otherwise than you will You have spoken in riddles to the people

CASSANDRA Not me!
Why will you choose

Me! I submitted to you living, I was forced, you entered me

THE CAPTAIN Also there was a slave here,

Whose eyes stood out from his chalk face, came buzzing from the palace postern gate, whimpering

A horrible thing. I killed him But the men have heard it.

CASSANDRA You were the king, I was your slave.

Here you see, here, I took the black-haired

Rest forever in the sacred rock; honored; a conqueror. . . Slaves, bring the King out of the house

Alas my husband! she cried, clutching the brown strands of her hair in both her hands, you have left me

A woman among lions! Ah the King's power, ah the King's victories! Weep for me, Mycenæ!

Widowed of the King!

The people stood amazed, like sheep that snuff at their dead shepherd, some hunter's

Ill-handled arrow having struck him from the covert, all by mischance, he is fallen on the hillside

Between the oak-shadow and the stream, the sun burns his dead face, his staff lies by him, his dog

Licks his hand, whining So, like sheep, the people 210

Regarded that dead majesty whom the slaves brought out of the house on a gold bed, and set it

Between the pillars of the porch His royal robe covered his wounds, there was no stain

Nor discomposure

Then that captain who had spoken before O Queen, before the mourning

The punishment tell us who has done this.
She raised her head, and not a woman but a lioness

Blazed at him from her eyes Dog, she answered, dog of the army,

Who said Speak dog, and you dared speak?
Justice is mine Then he was silent, but Cassandra's

Body standing tall among the spears, over the parapet, her body but not her spirit

Cried with a man's voice Shall not even the stones of the stair, shall not the stories under the columns

Speak, and the towers of the great wall of my city come down against the murder-ess? O Mycenæ 220

I yearned to night and day under the tents by Troy, O Tiryns, O Mycenæ, the
door

Of death, and the gate before the door!

CLYTEMNESTRA That woman lies, or the spirit of a lie cries from her Spearman,
Kill that woman!

But Cassandra's body set its back against the parapet, its face Terribly fronting the raised knife, and called the soldier by his name, in the King's voice, saying,

Sheathe it, and the knife lowered, and the soldier

Fell on his knees before the King in the woman's body, and the body of Cassandra cried from the parapet.

Horrible things, horrible things this house has witnessed but here is the most vile, that hundreds

Of spears are idle while the murderess, Clytemnestra the murderess, the snake that came upon me 230

Naked and bathing, the death that lay with me in bed, the death that has borne children to me,

Stands there unslain

CLYTEMNESTRA Cowards, if the bawling of that bewildered heifer from Troy fields has frightened you

How did you bear the horns of her brothers? Bring her to me

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA

Let no man

doubt, men of Mycenæ,

She has yet the knife hid in her clothes, the very blade that stabbed her husband and the blood is on it

Look, she handles it now Look, fellows.
The hand under the robe Slay her not easily, that she-wolf

Do her no honor with a spear! Ah! If I could find the word, if I could find it,

The name of her, to say husband-slayer and bed-defiler, bitch and wolf-bitch, king's assassin

And beast, beast, beast, all in one breath, in one word spearmen 240

You would heap your shields over this woman and crush her slowly, slowly, while she choked and screamed,

No, you would peel her bare and on the pavement for a bride-bed with a spear-butt for husband

Dig the lewd womb until it burst: thus for Agamemnon, thus for Ægisthus—Agh, cowards of the city

Do you stand quiet?

CLYTEMNESTRA Truly, soldiers,

I think it is he verily No one could invent the abominable voice, the unspeakable gesture,

The actual raging insolence of the tyrant I am the hand ridded the Argolis of him.

I here, I killed him, I, justly

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA      You have heard her, you have heard her, she has made confession.

Now if she'll show you the knife too— 250
CLYTEMNESTRA      Here

I kept it for safety

And, as that beast said, his blood's yet on it Look at it, with so little a key I unlocked the kingdom of destruction Stand firm, till a God

Lead home this ghost to the dark country
So many Greeks have peopled, through his crimes, his violence, his insolence, stand firm till that moment

And through the act of this hand and of this point no man shall suffer anything again
forever

Of Agamemnon

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA

I say if you let this woman live, this crime go unpunished, what man among you

Will be safe in his bed? The woman ever envies the man, his strength, his freedom, his loves

Her envy is like a snake beside him, all his life through, her envy and hatred law tames that viper 260

Law dies if the Queen die not the viper is free then,

It will be poison in your meat or a knife to bleed you sleeping They fawn and slaver over us

And then we are slain

CLYTEMNESTRA (to one of the slaves that carried the King's body)

Is my lord Ægisthus Slain on the way? How long? How long?

(To the people) He came, fat with his crimes.

Greek valor broke down Troy, your valor, soldiers, and the brain of Odysseus, the battle-fury of Achilles,

The stubborn strength of Menelaus, the excellence of you all this dead man here, his pride

Ruined you a hundred times he helped nowise, he brought bitter destruction but he gathered your glory

For the cloak of his shoulders I saw him come up the stair, I saw my child Iphigenia 270

Killed for his crime, I saw his harlot, the captive woman there, crying out behind him, I saw

I saw . . . I saw . . . how can I speak what crowd of the dead faces of the faithful Greeks,

Your brothers, dead of his crimes, those that perished of plague and those that died in the lost battles

After he had soured the help of Achilles—for another harlot—those dead faces of your brothers,

Some black with the death-blood, many trampled under the hooves of horses, many spotted with pestilence,

Flew all about him, all lamenting, all crying out against him,—horrible—horrible—I gave them

Vengeance, and you freedom

(To the slave) Go up and look, for God's sake, go up to the parapets,

Look toward the mountain Bring me word quickly, my strength breaks,

How can I hold all the Argolis with my eyes forever? I alone? Hell cannot hold her dead men, 280

Keep watch there—send me word by others—go, go!

(To the people) He came triumphing

Magnificent, abominable, all in bronze

I brought him to the bath, my hands undid
the armor,

My hands poured out the water,

Dead faces like flies buzzed all about
us,

He stripped himself before me, loathsome,
unclean, with laughter,

The labors of the Greeks had made him fat, the deaths of the faithful had swelled his belly,

I threw a cloak over him for a net and struck, struck, struck,

Blindly, in the steam of the bath, he bel-lowed, netted, 290

And bubbled in the water,

All the stone vault asweat with steam bel-lowed,

And I undid the net and the beast was dead, and the broad vessel

Stank with his blood

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA

The word! the word!

O burning mind of God,

If ever I gave you bulls teach me that word,
the name for her, the name for her!

A SLAVE (running from the door, to CLYTEMNESTRA)

My lord Ægisthus has come down the mountain, Queen, he approaches the Lion-gate

CLYTEMNESTRA It is time I am tired now Meet him and tell him to come in the postern doorway

THE CAPTAIN (on the stair addressing the soldiers and the people below)

Companions before God, hating the smell of crimes, crushes the city into gray ashes
We must make haste Judge now and act
For the husband-slayer 301

I say she must die, let her pay forfeit And for the great ghost of the King, let all these captives,

But chiefly the woman Cassandra, the crier in a man's voice there, be slain upon his pyre to quiet him

He will go down to his dark place and God will spare the city

(To the soldiers above, on the ramp and the porch)

Comrades Mycenæ is greater

Than the Queen of Mycenæ The King is dead let the Queen die let the city live.
Comrades,

We suffered something in Asia, on the stranger's coast, laboring for you We dreamed of home there

In the bleak wind and drift of battle, we continued ten years, laboring and dying, we accomplished

The task set us, we gathered what will make all the Greek cities glorious, a name
forever,

We shared the spoil, taking our share to enrich Mycenæ O but our hearts burned then, O comrades 310

But our hearts melted when the great oars moved the ships, the water carried us, the blue sea-waves

Slid under the black keel, I could not see them, I was blind with tears, thinking of Mycenæ

We have come home Behold the dear streets of our longing,

The stones that we desired, the steep ways of the city and the sacred doorsteps

Reek and steam with pollution, the accursed vessel

Spills a red flood over the floors

The fountain of it stands there and calls herself the Queen No queen, no queen, that husband-slayer,

A common murderess Comrades join us
We will make clean the city and sweeten it before God We will mourn together at the King's burying,

And a good year will come, we will rejoice
together 320

CLYTEMNESTRA Dog, you dare something Fling no spear, soldiers,

He has a few fools back of him would attempt the stair if the dog were slain I will have no one

Killed out of need

ONE OF HER MEN ON THE PORCH (flinging his spear)

Not at him at you Murderess!

But some God, no lover of justice, turned it, the great bronze tip grazing her shoulder

Clanged on the stone behind the gong of a change in the dance now Clytemnestra, none to help her,

One against all, swayed raging by the King's corpse, over the golden bed it is said that a fire

Stood visibly over her head, mixed in the hair, pale flames and radiance

CLYTEMNESTRA Here am I, thieves, thieves,

Drunkards, here is my breast, a deep white mark for cowards to aim at kings have lain on it 330

No spear yet, heroes, heroes?

See, I have no blemish, the arms are white, the breasts are deep and white, the whole body is blemishless

You are tired of your brown wives, draw lots for me, rabble, thieves, there is loot here, shake the dice, thieves, a game yet!

One of you will take the bronze and one the silver,

One the gold, and one me,

Me Clytemnestra a spoil worth having Kings have kissed me, this dead dog was a king, there is another

King at the gate thieves, thieves, would not this shining

Breast brighten a sad thief's hut, roll in his bed's filth

Shiningly? You could teach me to draw water at the fountain, 340

A dirty child on the other hip where are the dice? Let me throw first, if I throw sixes

I choose my masters closer you rabble, let me smell you

Don't fear the knife, it has king's blood on it, I keep it for an ornament,

It has shot its sting

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA                Fools, fools, strike!

Are your hands dead?

CLYTEMNESTRA                You would see all of me

Before you choose whether to kill or dirtily cherish? If what the King's used needs commending

To the eyes of thieves for thieves' use give me room, give me room, fellows, you'll see it is faultless

The dress                there                350

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA    Fools this wide whore played wife

When she was going about to murder me
the King, you, will you let her trip you

With the harlot's trick? Strike! Make an end!

CLYTEMNESTRA                I have not my sister's, Troy's flame's beauty, but I have something

This arm, round, firm, skin without hair, polished like marble. the supple-jointed
shoulders

Men have praised the smooth neck, too,
The strong clear throat over the deep wide breasts

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA                She is buying an hour sheep. it may be Ægisthus

Is at the Lion-gate

CLYTEMNESTRA    If he were here, Ægisthus, I'd not be the peddler of what trifling charms I have for an hour of life yet
You have wolves' eyes                361

Yet there is something kindly about the blue ones there—yours, young soldier, young soldier . . . The last,

The under-garment? You won't buy me yet? This dead dog,

The King here, never saw me naked I had the night for nurse. turn his head sideways, the eyes

Are only half shut If I should touch him, and the blood came, you'd say I had killed him Nobody, nobody,

Killed him his pride burst.

Ah, no one has pity!

I can serve well, I have always envied your women, the public ones

Who takes me first? Tip that burnt log onto the flagstones,

This will be in a king's bed then. Your eyes are wolves' eyes                370

So many, so many, so famishing—

I will undo it, handle me not yet, I can undo it

Or I will tear it

And when it is off me then I will be delivered to you beasts . . .

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA

Then strip her and use her to the bones, wear her through, kill her with it.

CLYTEMNESTRA

When it is torn

You'll say I am lovely, no one has seen before . . .

It won't tear I'll slit it with this knife—

(ÆGISTHUS, with many spearmen, issues from the great door CLYTEMNESTRA stabs right and left with the knife; the men are too close to strike her with their long spears)

CLYTEMNESTRA

It's time Cowards, goats, goats Here!
Ægisthus!

ÆGISTHUS

I am here What have they done?                380

CLYTEMNESTRA

Nothing clear the porch I have done something Drive them on the stair!

Three of them I've scarred for life a rough bridegroom, the rabble, met a fierce bride                (She catches up her robe)

I held them with my eyes, hours, hours I am not tired . . . My lord, my lover

I have killed a twelve-point stag for a present for you with my own hands look, on the golden litter.

You arrive timely

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA    Tricked, stabbed, shamed, mocked at, the spoil of a lewd woman, despised

I lie there ready for her back-stairs darling to spit on Tricked, stabbed, sunk in the drain

And gutter of time I that thundered the assault, I that mustered the Achæans Cast out of my kingdom,

Cast out of time, out of the light

CLYTEMNESTRA

One of the captives, dear It left its poor wits                390

Over the sea If it annoys you I'll quiet it
But post your sentinels All's not safe yet, though I am burning with joy now.

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA                      O single-eyed glare of the sky

Flying southwest to the mountain. sun,
through a slave's eyes,
My own broken, I see you this last day, my own darkened, no dawn forever, the adulterers

Will swim in your warm gold, day after day, the eyes of the murderess will possess you,

And I have gone away down knowing that no God in the earth nor sky loves justice, and having tasted

The toad that serves women for heart.
From now on may all bridegrooms

Marry them with swords Those that have borne children

Their sons rape them with spears                      400

CLYTEMNESTRA                      More yet, more, more, more, while my hand's in? It's not a little

You easily living lords of the sky require of who'd be like you, who'd take time in the triumph,

Build joy solid Do we have to do everything? I have killed what I hated

Kill what I love? The prophetess said it, this dead man says it my little son, the small soft image

That squirmed in my arms be an avenger?
—Love, from your loins

Seed I begin new, I will be childless for you The child my son, the child my daughter!

Though I cry I feel nothing.

ÆGISTHUS                      O strongest spirit in the world We have dared enough, there is an end to it

We may pass nature a little, an arrow-flight,
But two shots over the wall you come in a cloud upon the feasting Gods, lightning and madness                      410

CLYTEMNESTRA

Dear make them safe They may try to run away, the children. Set spears to watch them no harm, no harm,

But stab the nurse if they go near a door Watch them, keep the gates, order the sentinels,

While I make myself queen over this people again. I can do it.

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA The sun's gone;
that glimmer's

The moon of the dead. The dark God calls me Yes, God,

I'll come in a moment

CLYTEMNESTRA (at the head of the great stairs)

Soldiers townsmen it seems

I am not at the end delivered to you dogs, for the lion came the poor brown and spotted women

Will have to suffice you But is it nothing to have come within handling distance of the clear heaven

This dead man knew when he was young and God endured him? Is it nothing to
you?                      420

It is something to me to have felt the fury
And concentration of you I will not say I am grateful I am not angry to be desired

Is wine even to a queen You bathed me in it, from brow to foot-sole, I had nearly enough

But now remember that the dream is over I am the Queen Mycenæ is my city If you grin at me

I have spears also Tiryns and all the country people of the Argolis will come against you and swallow you,

Empty out these ways and walls, stock them with better subjects A rock nest for new birds here, townfolk

You are not essential

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA I hear him calling through the she-wolf's noise, Aga-memnon, Agamemnon,

The dark God calls Some old king in a fable is it?

CLYTEMNESTRA                      So choose.

What choices? To reenter my service                      430 Unpunished, no thought of things past, free of conditions

Or—dine at this man's table, have new mouths made in you to eat bronze with

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA Who is Agamem-non?

CLYTEMNESTRA

You letting go of the sun' is it dark the land you are running away to?

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA It is dark

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Is it sorrowful?

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA

There is nothing but misery

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Has any man ever come back thence? Hear me, not the dark God

THE BODY OF CASSANDRA No man has ever
CLYTEMNESTRA

Go then, go, go down You will not choose to follow him, people of the rock-city?

No one

Will choose to follow him I have killed it is easy it may be I shall kill nearer than this yet

But not you, townsfolk, you will give me no cause, I want security, I want service, not blood

I have been desired of the whole city, publicly, I want service, not lust You will make no sign

Of your submission, you will not give up your weapons, neither shall your leaders be slain,

And he that flung the spear, I have forgotten his face

ÆGISTHUS (entering) Dearest, they have gone, the nurse and the children,

No one knows where

CLYTEMNESTRA I am taming this people send men after them If any harm comes to the children

Bring me tokens I will not be in doubt, I will not have the arch fall on us I dare

What no one dares I envy a little the dirty mothers of the city O, O!

Nothing in me hurts I have animal waters in my eyes, but the spirit is not wounded Electra and Orestes

Are not to live when they are caught Bring me sure tokens

CASSANDRA Who is this woman like a beacon

Lit on the stair, who are these men with dogs' heads?

I have ranged time and seen no sight like this one

CLYTEMNESTRA

Have you returned, Cassandra? The dead king has gone down to his place, we may bury his leavings

CASSANDRA

I have witnessed all the wars to be, I am not sorrowful

For one drop from the pail of desolation

Spilt on my father's city, they were carrying it forward

To water the world under the latter starlight.

460

CLYTEMNESTRA (to her slaves)

Take up the poles of the bed; reverently; careful on the stair; give him to the people (To the people) O soldiers

This was your leader, lay him with honor in the burial-chapel, guard him with the spears of victory,

Mourn him until to-morrow, when the pyre shall be built.

Ah, King of men, sleep, sleep, sleep!

But when shall I? . . . They are after their corpse, like dogs after the butcher's cart Cleomenes, that captain

With the big voice Neobulus was the boy who flung the spear and missed I shall not miss

When spear-flinging-time comes .

Captive woman, you have seen the future, tell me my fortune

(ÆGISTHUS comes from the doorway)

Ægisthus,

Have your hounds got them?

ÆGISTHUS I've covered every escape with men, they'll not slip through me But commanded

To bring them here living

CLYTEMNESTRA That's hard tigers don't do it I have some strength yet don't speak of it

And I shall do it

ÆGISTHUS It is a thing not to be done we'll guard them closely but mere madness

Lies over the wall of too-much

CLYTEMNESTRA King of Mycenæ, new-crowned king, who was your mother?

ÆGISTHUS Pelopia

What mark do you aim at?

CLYTEMNESTRA And your father?

ÆGISTHUS Thyestes

CLYTEMNESTRA And her father?

ÆGISTHUS The same man, Thyestes.

CLYTEMNESTRA

See, dearest, dearest? They love what men call crime, they have taken her crime to be the king of Mycenæ

Here is the stone garden of the plants that pass nature there is no too-much here: the monstrous

Old rocks want monstrous roots to serpent among them I will have security I'd burn the standing world

Up to this hour and begin new. You think

I am too much used for a new brood? Ah,
lover,
I have fountains in me I had a fondness for the brown cheek of that boy, the curl of his lip,
The widening blue of the doomed eyes
. . . I will be spared nothing Come in, come in, they'll have news for us

CASSANDRA

If anywhere in the world
Were a tower with foundations, or a treasure-chamber
With a firm vault, or a walled fortress 490
That stood on the years, not staggering, not moving
As the mortar were mixed with wine for water
And poppy for lime they reel, they are all drunkards,
The piled strengths of the world no pyramid

In bitter Egypt in the desert
But skips at moonrise, no mountain
Over the Black Sea in awful Caucasus But whirls like a young kid, like a bud of the herd,
Under the hundredth star I am sick after steadfastness

Watching the world cataractlike 500 Pour screaming onto steep ruins for the wings of prophecy

God once my lover give me stone sandals Planted on stone he hates me, the God, he will never

Take home the gift of the bridleless horse
The stallion, the unbitted stallion the bed
Naked to the sky on Mount Ida,
The soft clear grass there,
Be blackened forever, may vipers and Greeks

In that glen breed
Twisting together, where the God 510
Come golden from the sun

Gave me for a bride-gift prophecy and I took it for a treasure

I a fool, I a maiden,
I would not let him touch me though love of him maddened me

Till he fed me that poison, till he planted that fire in me,

The girdle flew loose then

The Queen considered this rock, she gazed on the great stone blocks of Mycenæ's acropolis,

Monstrous they seemed to her, solid they appeared to her, safe roitage for monstrous deeds Ah fierce one

Who knows who laid them for a snare?
What people in the world's dawn breathed on chill air and the vapor

Of their breath seemed stone and has stood and you dream it is established? These also are a foam on the stream 520

Of the falling of the world there is nothing to lay hold on

No crime is a crime, the slaying of the King was a meeting of two bubbles on the lip of the cataract,

One winked and the killing of your children would be nothing I tell you for a marvel that the earth is a dancer,

The grave dark earth is less quiet than a fool's fingers,

That old one, spinning in the emptiness, blown by no wind in vain circles, light-witted and a dancer

CLYTEMNESTRA (entering)

You are prophesying prophecy to a purpose, captive woman My children, the boy and the girl,

Have wandered astray, no one can find
them

CASSANDRA Shall I tell the lioness Where meat is, or the she-wolf where the lambs wander astray?

CLYTEMNESTRA But look into the darkness 530

And foam of the world the boy has great tender blue eyes, brown hair, disdainful lips, you'll know him

By the gold stripe bordering his garments, the girl's eyes are my color, white her clothing—

CASSANDRA Millions
Of shining bubbles burst and wander

On the stream of the world falling .

CLYTEMNESTRA These are my children!

CASSANDRA I see mountains, I see no faces

CLYTEMNESTRA

Tell me and I make you free, conceal it from me and a soldier's spear finishes the matter

CASSANDRA

I am the spear's bride, I have been waiting, waiting for that ecstasy—

CLYTEMNESTRA (striking her) Live then It will not be unpainful 540

(CLYTEMNESTRA goes in.)

CASSANDRA

O fair roads north where the land narrows
 Over the mountains between the great gulfs,
 O that I too with the King's children
 Might wander northward hand in hand
 Mine are worse wanderings
 They will shelter on Mount Parnassus,
 For me there is no mountain firm enough,
 The storms of light beating on the headlands,
 The storms of music undermine the mountains, they stumble and fall inward,
 Such music the stars 550
 Make in their courses, the vast vibration Plucks the iron heart of the earth like a harp-string Iron and stone core, O stubborn axle of the earth, you also Dissolving in a little time like salt in water,
 What does it matter that I have seen Macedon Roll all the Greek cities into one billow and strand in Asia
 The anthers and bracts of the flower of the world?
 That I have seen Egypt and Nineveh
 Crumble, and a Latian village Plant the earth with javelins? It made laws for all men, it dissolved like a cloud 560
 I have also stood watching a storm of wild swans
 Rise from one river-mouth O force of the earth rising,
 O fallings of the earth forever no rest, not forever
 From the wave and the trough, from the stream and the slack, from growth and decay: O vulture-Pinioned, my spirit, one flight yet, last,
 longest, unguided,
 Try into the gulf,
 Over Greece, over Rome, you have space
 O my spirit for the years

II

Are not few of captivity how many have I stood here
 Among the great stones, while the Queen's people
 Go in and out of the gate, wearing light linen 570
 For summer and the wet spoils of wild beasts
 In the season of storms and the stars have changed, I have watched

The grievous and unprayed-to constellations
 Pile steaming spring and patient autumn Over the enduring walls: but you over the walls of the world, Over the unquieted centuries, over the darkness-hearted Millenniums wailing thinly to be born, O vulture-pinioned
 Try into the dark,
 Watch the north spawn white bodies and red-gold hair,
 Race after race of beastlike warriors, and the cities 580
 Burn, and the cities build, and new lands be uncovered
 In the way of the sun to his setting . go on farther, what profit
 In the wars and the toils? but I say Where are prosperous people my enemies are, as you pass them O my spirit Curse Athens for the joy and the marble, curse Corinth
 For the wine and the purple, and Syracuse
 For the gold and the ships, but Rome,
 Rome,
 With many destructions for the corn and the laws and the javelins, the insolence, the threefold
 Abominable power pass the humble
 And the lordships of darkness, but far
 down 590
 Smute Spain for the blood on the sunset gold, curse France
 For the fields abounding and the running rivers, the lights in the cities, the laughter, curse England
 For the meat on the tables and the terrible gray ships, for old laws, far dominions, there remains
 A mightier to be cursed and a higher for malediction
 When America has eaten Europe and takes tribute of Asia, when the ends of the world grow aware of each other
 And are dogs in one kennel, they will tear
 The master of the hunt with the mouths of the pack new fallings, new risings, O winged one No end of the fallings and risings? An end shall be surely,
 Though unnatural things are accomplished,
 they breathe in the sea's depth, 599
 They swim in the air, they bridle the cloud leaper lightning to carry their messages

Though the eagles of the east and the west and the falcons of the north were not quieted, you have seen a white cloth Cover the lands from the north and the eyes of the lands and the claws of the hunters,
 The mouths of the hungry with snow
 Were filled, and their claws Took hold upon ice in the pasture, a morsel of ice was their catch in the rivers,
 That pure white quietness Waits on the heads of the mountains, not sleep but death, will the fire Of burnt cities and ships in that year warm you my enemies? The frost, the old frost, Like a cat with a broken-winged bird it will play with you,
 It will nip and let go, you will say it is gone, but the next 610

Season it increases O clean, clean,
 White and most clean, colorless quietness,
 Without trace, without trail, without stain in the garment, drawn down From the poles to the girdle . I have known one Godhead

To my sore hurt I am growing to come to another O grave and kindly Last of the lords of the earth, I pray you lead my substance

Speedily into another shape, make me grass, Death, make me stone, Make me air to wander free between the stars and the peaks, but cut humanity

Out of my being, that is the wound that festers in me,

Not captivity, not my enemies you will heal the earth also, 620

Death, in your time, but speedily Cassandra

You rock-fleas hopping in the clefts of Mycenæ,

Suckers of blood, you carrying the scepter
 farther, Persian, Emathian, Roman and Mongol and American, and you half-gods

Indian and Syrian and the third, emperors of peace, I have seen on what stage

You sing the little tragedy, the column of the ice that was before on one side flanks
 it,

The column of the ice to come closes it up on the other' audience nor author

I have never seen yet I have heard the silence it is I Cassandra,

Eight years the bitter watch-dog of these doors, 630

Have watched a vision

And now approach to my end. Eight years have I seen the phantoms

Walk up and down this stair, and the rocks groan in the night, the great stones move when no man sees them.

And I have forgotten the fine ashlar masonry of the courts of my father. I am not Cassandra

But a counter of sunrises, permitted to live because I am crying to die, three thousand,

Pale and red, have flowed over the towers in the wall since I was here watching, the deep east widens,

The cold wind blows, the deep earth sighs, the dim gray finger of light crooks at the morning star

The palace feasted late and sleeps with its locked doors, the last drunkard from the alleys of the city

Long has reeled home Whose foot is this then, what phantom

Toils on the stair?

A VOICE BELOW Is someone watching above? Good sentinel I am only a girl beggar 640

I would sit on the stair and hold my bowl
 CASSANDRA I here eight years have begged for a thing and not received it

THE VOICE

You are not a sentinel? You have been asking some great boon, out of all reason

CASSANDRA No what the meanest Beggar disdains to take

THE GIRL BEGGAR Beggars disdain nothing what is it that they refuse you?

CASSANDRA What's given
 Even to the sheep and to the bullock

THE GIRL Men give them salt, grass they find out for themselves

CASSANDRA Men give them 650

The gift that you though a beggar have brought down from the north to give my mistress

THE GIRL You speak riddles

I am starving, a crust is my desire

CASSANDRA Your voice is young though winds have hoars-ened it, your body appears

Flexible under the rags have you some hidden sickness, the young men will not give you silver?

THE GIRL

I have a sickness I will hide it until I am cured You are not a Greek woman?

CASSANDRA But you
Born in Mycenæ return home And you bring gifts from Phocis for my once master who's dead

Vengeance, and for my mistress peace, for my master the King peace, and, by-shot of the doom's day, 659

Peace for me also But I have prayed for it
THE GIRL I know you, I knew you before you spoke to me, captive
woman,

And I unarmed will kill you with my hands
if you babble prophecies That peace you have prayed for, I will bring it to you

If you utter warnings

CASSANDRA To-day I shall have peace, you cannot tempt me, daughter of the Queen, Electra

Eight years ago I watched you and your brother going north to Phocis the Queen saw knowledge of you

Move in my eyes I would not tell her where you were when she commanded me I will not betray you

To-day either it is not doleful to me
To see before I die generations of destruction enter the doors of Agamemnon

Where is your brother? 670

ELECTRA Prophetess you see all I will tell you nothing

CASSANDRA He has well chosen his ambush,

It is true Ægisthus passes under that house to-day, to hunt in the mountain

ELECTRA Now I remember
Your name Cassandra

CASSANDRA Hush the gray has turned yellow, the standing beacons

Stream up from the east, they stir there in the palace, strange, is it not, the dawn of one's last day's

Like all the others? Your brother would be fortunate if to-day were also

The last of his

ELECTRA He will endure his destinies, and Cassandra hers, and Electra
mine 680

He has been for years like one tortured with fire this day will quench it

CASSANDRA They are opening the gates beg now

To your trade, beggar-woman

THE PORTER (coming out) Eh, pillar of miseries,

You still on guard there? Like a mare in a tight stall, never lying down What's this then?

A second ragged one? This at least can bend in the middle and sit on a stone

ELECTRA Dear gentleman
I am not used to it, my father is dead and hunger forces me to beg, a crust or a penny

THE PORTER
This tall one's licensed in a manner I think they'll not let two bundles of rag

Camp on the stair but if you'd come to the back door and please me nicely with a little washing 690

It'd do for a pastime

ELECTRA I was reared gently:
I will sit here, the King will see me,
And none mishandle me

THE PORTER I bear no blame
for you

I have not seen you you came after the gates were opened (He goes in)

CASSANDRA
O blossom of fire, bitter to men,
Watchdog of the woeful days,
How many sleepers
Bathing in peace, dreaming themselves de-
light,

All over the city, all over the Argolid plain,
all over the dark earth, 700

(Not me, a deeper draught of peace And darker waters alone may wash me)

Do you, terrible star, star without pity,
Wolf of the east, waken to misery

To the wants unaccomplished, to the eating desires,

To unanswered love, to hunger, to the hard edges

And mold of reality, to the whips of their masters

They had flown away home to the happy
darkness,

They were safe until sunrise (KING ÆGISTHUS, with his retinue, comes from the great door)

ÆGISTHUS

Even here, in the midst of the city, the early day 710

Has a clear savor (To ELECTRA) What, are you miserable, holding the bowl out?

We'll hear the lark to-day in the wide hills and smell the mountain I'd share happiness with you What's your best wish, girl beggar?

ELECTRA It is covered, my lord, how should a beggar know what to wish for beyond a crust and a dark corner and a little kindness?

ÆGISTHUS Why do you tremble?

ELECTRA

I was reared gently, my father is dead

ÆGISTHUS Stand up will you take service here in the house? What country bred you gently and proved ungentle to you?

ELECTRA I have wandered north from the Eurotas, my lord, 720

Begging at farmsteads

ÆGISTHUS The Queen's countrywoman then, she'll use you kindly She'll be coming

In a moment, then I'll speak for you —Did you bid them yoke the roans into my chariot, Menalcas,

The two from Orchomenus?

ONE OF THE RETINUE Yesterday evening, my lord,

I sent to the stable

ÆGISTHUS They cost a pretty penny, we'll see how they carry it —
She's coming hold up your head, girl

(CLYTEMNESTRA, with two serving-women, comes from the door)

CLYTEMNESTRA

Good hunt, dearest Here's a long idle day for me to look to Kill early, come home early

ÆGISTHUS

There's a poor creature on the step who's been reared nicely and slipped into misery I said you'd feed her,

And maybe find her a service Farewell, sweet one 730

CLYTEMNESTRA Where did she come from? How long have you been here?

ÆGISTHUS She says she has begged her way up from Sparta The horses are stamping on the cobbles, good-by, good-by

(He goes down the stair with his huntsmen)

CLYTEMNESTRA Good-by, dearest Well Let me see your face.

ELECTRA It is filthy to look at I am ashamed

CLYTEMNESTRA (to one of her serving-women) Leucippe do you think this is a gayety of my lord's, he's not used to be so kindly to beggars?

—Let me see your face

LEUCIPPE She is very dirty, my lady It is possible one of the house-boys .

CLYTEMNESTRA I say draw that rag back, let me see your face I'd have him whipped then

ELECTRA It was only in hope that someone would put a crust in the bowl, your majesty, for I am starving I didn't think your majesty would see me

CLYTEMNESTRA Draw back the rag 740

ELECTRA I am very faint and starving but I will go down, I am ashamed

CLYTEMNESTRA Stop her, Corinna Fetch the porter, Leucippe You will not go so easily (ELECTRA sinks down on the steps and lies prone, her head covered) I am aging out of queenship indeed, when even the beggars refuse my bidding (LEUCIPPE comes in with the porter) You have a dirty stair, porter How long has this been here?

THE PORTER O my lady it has crept up since I opened the doors, it was not here when I opened the doors

CLYTEMNESTRA Lift it up and uncover its face What is that cry in the city? Stop silent I heard a cry

Prophetess, your nostrils move like a dog's, what is that shouting?

I have grown weak, I am exhausted, things frighten me

Tell her to be gone, Leucippe, I don't wish to see her, I don't wish to see her

(ELECTRA rises)

ELECTRA Ah, Queen, I will show you my face

CLYTEMNESTRA No no . be gone

ELECTRA (uncovering her face)

Mother I have come home I am humbled. This house keeps a dark welcome 750 For those coming home out of far countries

CLYTEMNESTRA I won't look how could I know anyone? I am old and shaking

He said, Over the wall beyond nature Lightning, and the laughter of the Gods. I did not cross it, I will not kill what I gave life to

Whoever you are, go, go, let me grow downward to the grave quietly now

ELECTRA I cannot

Go I have no other refuge Mother! Will you not kiss me, will you not take me into the house,

Your child once, long a wanderer? Electra my name I have begged my way from Phocis, my brother is dead there,

Who used to care for me.

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Who is dead, who? 760

ELECTRA                      My brother Orestes, Killed in a court quarrel

CLYTEMNESTRA (weeping) Oh, you lie! The widening blue blue eyes,

The little voice of the child                      Liar ELECTRA                      It is true I have wept long, on every mountain You, mother,

Have only begun weeping Far off, in a far country, no fit burial

CLYTEMNESTRA And do you bringing Bitterness . or lies look for a welcome? I have only loved two

The priest killed my daughter for a lamb on a stone and now you say the boy too dead, dead?

The world's full of it, a shoreless lake of lies and floating rumors pack up your wares, peddler, 770

Too false for a queen Why, no, if I believed you Beast, treacherous beast, that shouting comes nearer,

What's in the City?

ELECTRA                      I am a stranger, I know nothing of the city, I know only My mother hates me, and Orestes my brother

Died pitifully, far off

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Too many things, too many things call me, what shall I do?
Electra,

Electra help me This comes of living softly, I had a lion's strength

Once

ELECTRA Me for help? I am utterly helpless, I had help in my brother and he is dead in Phocis

Give me refuge but each of us two must weep for herself, one sorrow An end of the world were on us 780

What would it matter to us weeping? Do you remember him,

Mother, mother?

CLYTEMNESTRA I have dared too much never dare anything, Electra, the ache is afterward,

At the hour it hurts nothing Prophetess, you lied

You said he would come with vengeance on me but now he is dead, this girl says and because he was lovely, blue-eyed,
And born in a most unhappy house I will believe it But the world's fogged with the breath of liars,

And if she has laid a net for me .

I'll call up the old lioness lives yet in my body, I have dared, I have dared, and tooth and talon

Carve a way through Lie to me?

ELECTRA                      Have I endured for months, with feet bleeding, among the mountains, 790

Between the great gulfs alone and starving, to bring you a lie now? I know the worst of you, I looked for the worst,

Mother, mother, and have expected nothing but to die of this home-coming but
Orestes

Has entered the cave before, he is gathered up in a lonely mountain quietness, he is guarded from angers

In the tough cloud that spears fall back from

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Was he still beautiful? The brown mothers down in the city

Keep their brats about them, what it is to live high! Oh!

Tell them down there, tell them in Tiryns,
Tell them in Sparta,

That water drips through the Queen's fingers and trickles down her wrists, for the boy, for the boy

Born of her body, whom she, fool, fool, fool, 800

Drove out of the world Electra,

Make peace with me

Oh, Oh, Oh!

I have labored violently all the days of my life for nothing—nothing—worse than anything—this death

Was a thing I wished See how they make fools of us

Amusement for them, to watch us labor after the thing that will tear us in pieces

. Well, strength's good

I am the Queen, I will gather up my fragments

And not go mad now

ELECTRA                      Mother, what are the men

With spears gathering at the stair's foot?
 Not of Mycenæ by their armor, have you mercenaries 810
 Wanting pay? Do they serve . . . Ægis-thus?

CLYTEMNESTRA                      What men? I seem not to know

Who has laid a net for me, what fool
 For me, me? Porter, by me Leucippe, my guards, into the house, rouse them I am sorry for him,
 I am best in storm You, Electra?
 The death you'll die, my daughter Guards, out! Was it a lie? No matter, no matter,
 no matter,

Here's peace Spears, out, out! They bungled the job making me a woman. Here's youth come back to me,

And all the days of gladness

LEUCIPPE (running back from the door) O,
 Queen, strangers 820

ORESTES (a sword in his hand, with spearmen following, comes from the door) Where is that woman

The Gods utterly hate?

ELECTRA                      Brother let her not speak, kill quickly Is the other one safe now?

ORESTES                      That dog Fell under his chariot, we made sure of him between the wheels and the hooves, squealing Now for this one

CLYTEMNESTRA

Wait I was weeping, Electra will tell you, my hands are wet still,
 For your blue eyes that death had closed
 she said away up in Phocis I die now, justly or not

Is out of the story, before I die I'd tell you —wait, child, wait Did I quiver

Or pale at the blade? I say, caught in a net, netted in by my enemies, my husband murdered,

Myself to die, I am joyful knowing she lied, you live, the only creature 830

Under all the spread and arch of daylight
 That I love, lives

ELECTRA                      The great fangs drawn fear craftiness now, kill quickly.

CLYTEMNESTRA                      As for her, the wife of the shepherd Suckled her, but you

These very breasts nourished rather one of your northern spearmen do what's needful, not you

Draw blood where you drew milk. The Gods endure much, but beware them
 ORESTES                      This, a God in his temple Openly commanded.

CLYTEMNESTRA                      Ah, child, child, who has mustaught you and who has betrayed you? What voice had the God? 840
 How was it different from a man's and did you see him? Who sent the priest presents? They fool us,

And the Gods let them No doubt also the envious King of Phocis has lent you counsel as he lent you

Men let one of them do it Life's not jewel enough

That I should plead for it this much I pray, for your sake, not with your hand, not with your hand, or the memory

Will so mother you, so glue to you, so embracing you,

Not the deep sea's green day, no cleft of a rock in the bed of the deep sea, no ocean of darkness

Outside the stars, will hide nor wash you What is it to me that I have rejoiced knowing you alive,

O child, O precious to me, O alone loved,
 if now dying by my manner of death

I make nightmare the heir, nightmare, horror, in all I have of you,

And you haunted forever, never to sleep dreamless again, never to see blue cloth 850

But the red runs over it, fugitive of dreams, madman at length, the memory of a scream following you houndlike,

Inherit Mycenæ? Child, for this has not been done before, there is no old fable, no whisper

Out of the foundation, among the people that were before our people, no echo has ever

Moved among these most ancient stones, the monsters here, nor stirred under any mountain, nor fluttered

Under any sky, of a man slaying his mother
 Sons have killed fathers—

ORESTES                      And a woman her son's father—

CLYTEMNESTRA

O many times and these old stones have seen horrors, a house of madness and blood

I married into and worse was done on this rock among the older people before but not this,

Not the son his mother, this the silent ones,
The old hard ones, the great bearers of burden have not seen yet, 860

Nor shall, to-day nor yet to-morrow, nor ever in the world Let her do it, it is not unnatural,

The daughter the mother, the little har
there,

Electra do it Lend her the blade

ELECTRA Brother though the great house is silent hark the city,

That buzzes like the hive one has dipped a wand in End this Then look to our safety.

ORESTES Dip in my sword Into my fountain? Did I truly, little and helpless,

Lie in the arms, feed on the breast there?

ELECTRA Another, a greater, lay in them, another kissed the breast
there,

You forget easily, the breaker of Asia, the over-shadower, the great memory, under whose greatness 870

We have hung like hawks under a storm, from the beginning,—and he when this poison destroyed him

Was given no room to plead in.

ORESTES Dip my wand into my fountain?

CLYTEMNESTRA Men do not kill the meanest

Without defence heard—

ELECTRA Him—Agamemnon?

CLYTEMNESTRA But you, O
my son, my son,

Molded in me, made of me, made of my flesh, built with my blood, fed with my milk, my child

I here, I and no other, labored to bear, groaning—

ELECTRA This that makes beastlike
lamentation 880

Hunted us to slay us, we starving in the thicket above the stream three days and nights watched always

Her hunters with spears beating the field prophetess was it for love that she looked after us?

CASSANDRA That love
The King had tasted, that was her love

ELECTRA And
mourning for our father on the mountain
we judged her,

And the Gods condemned her, what more,
what more? Strike.

ORESTES If they'd give me time, the pack
there—how can I think,

And all the whelps of Mycenæ yelling at the stair-foot? Decision a thing to be decided The arm's lame, dip in, dip in? Shut your mouths, rabble.

CLYTEMNESTRA There is one thing no man can do 890

ORESTES What, enter his fountain?

ELECTRA

O coward!

ORESTES I will be passive, I'm blunted
She's not this fellow's mother

ELECTRA O spearman, spearman, do it!

One stroke it is just

THE SPEARMAN As for me, my lord .

CLYTEMNESTRA (calling loudly) Help, help, men of Mycenæ, to your Queen Break them

Rush the stair, there are only ten hold it.
Up, up, kill

ORESTES I will kill 899

CLYTEMNESTRA (falling on her knees) Child, Spare me, let me live! Child! Al!

ELECTRA You have done well

ORESTES I have done I have done .

Who ever saw such a flow was I made out of this, I'm not red, am I?

See, father?

It was someone else did it but I told him to Drink, drink, dog Drink dog

He reaches up a tongue between the stones, lapping it So thirsty old dog, uh?

Rich and sticky

CLYTEMNESTRA (raising herself a little) Sleep
. for me yes

Not you any more . . Orestes
I shall be there You will beg death vainly as I have begged . . . life

Ah beast that I unkenelled! 910
(She dies)

ORESTES (crouching by her) Ooh . . .
ooh

ELECTRA

The face is lean and terrible Orestes!

They are fighting on the stair Man yourself Come. Pick up the sword

Let her be, two of ours are down, they yield on the stair Stand up, speak or fight, speak to the people

Or we go where she is

ORESTES                    There's a red and sticky sky that you can touch here

And though it's unpleasant we are at peace

ELECTRA (catching up the sword) Agamem-non failed here. Not in me Hear, Mycenæans

I am Agamemnon's daughter, we have avenged him, the crime's paid utterly

You have not forgotten the great King—what, in eight years? I am Electra, I am his daughter 920

My brother is Orestes My brother is your king and has killed his murderers The dog Ægisthus is dead,

And the Queen is dead. the city is at peace

ORESTES (standing up)                    Must I dip my wand into my fountain, give it to
me.

The male plaything

(He catches ELECTRA's arm, snatching at the sword)

ELECTRA                    For what? Be quiet, they have heard me

ORESTES You said I must do it, I will do it

ELECTRA                    It is done!

Brother, brother? (ORESTES takes the sword from her by force) O Mycenæ

With this sword he did justice, he let it fall, he has retaken it,

He is your King. 930

ORESTES                    Whom must I pierce, the girl that plotted with me in the mountain? There was someone to kill . . .

Sweet Electra?

ELECTRA                    It is done, it is finished!

CASSANDRA                    The nearest, the most loved, her, truly Strike!—Electra,

My father has wanted vengeance longer

THE PEOPLE BELOW Orestes, Orestes!

ELECTRA (pointing to CASSANDRA)                    Her —your mother—she killed him.

ORESTES (turning and striking) How tall you have grown, mother.

CASSANDRA (falling) I . . . waited long for it . . .

ORESTES

I have killed my mother and my mother—two mothers—see, there they lie—I have gone home twice You put it in 940

And the flesh yields to it . . . (He goes down the stair) Now, to find her again

All through the forest

ELECTRA                    Let him pass,

Mycenæans Avoid his sword Let him pass, pass. The madness of the house

Perches on him

A LEADER OF THE MYCENÆANS Daughter of Agamemnon,

You with constancy and force

In the issueless thing have found an issue

Now it is for us the kingless city

To find a ruler Rest in the house As for the young man,

Though he has done justice, and no hand in Mycenæ is raised against him, for him there is no issue

We let him go on, and if he does not slay himself with the red sword he will die in the mountain 950

With us be peace Rest in the house, daughter of Agamemnon The old madness, with your brother,

Go out of our gates

ELECTRA                    A house to rest in!
. Gather up the dead I will go in, I have learned strength

III

They carried the dead down the great stair, the slaves with pails of water and sand scoured the dark stains

The people meeting in another place to settle the troubled city the stair was left vacant,

The porch untrampled, and about twilight one of the great stones The world is younger than we are,

Yet now drawing to an end, now that the seasons falter Then another, that had been spared the blood-bath

What way do they falter?—There fell warm rain, the first answered, in the midst of summer A little afterward

Cold rain came down, and sand was rubbed over me as when the winds blow This in the midst of summer

—I did not feel it, said the second sleepily
And a third The noisy and very mobile creatures 960

Will be quieted long before the world's end —What creatures?—The active ones, that have two ends let downward,

A mongrel race, mixed of soft stone with fugitive water The night deepened, the dull old stones

Droned at each other, the summer stars wheeled over above them. Before dawn the son of Agamemnon

Came to the stair-foot in the darkness

ORESTES                    O stones of the house
I entreat hardness I did not live with
you

Long enough in my youth . . . I will go up to where I killed her . . . We must face things down, mother,

Or they'd devour us . . . Nobody? . .
Even the stones have been scrubbed. A keen housekeeper, sweet Electra

. . . It would be childish to forget it, the woman has certainly been killed, and I think it was I

Her son did it Something not done before in the world Here is the penalty

You gather up all your forces to the act, and afterward 970

Silence, no voice, no ghost, vacancy, but all's not expended Those powers want bitter action No object

Deeds are too easy Our victims are too fragile, they ought to have thousands of lives, you strike out once only

The sky breaks like a bubble . No, wife of Ægisthus,—Why should I mask
it?—mother, my mother,

The one soft fiber that went mad yesterday's

Burnt out of me now, there is nothing you could touch if you should come, but you have no power, you dead

Are a weak people This is the very spot: I was here, she here and I walk over it not trembling,

Over the scrubbed stones to the door. (He knocks with the sword-hilt) They sleep well But my sister having all her desire

Better than any (He knocks again)

THE PORTER (through the door) Who is there?

ORESTES The owner of the house. Orestes

THE PORTER Go away, drunkard 981

ORESTES Shall I tell my servants to break in the door and whip the porter?

THE PORTER Oh, Oh! You men from Phocis, stand by me while I speak to the door. (Having opened the door, holding a torch) Is it you truly, my lord? We thought, we thought . . . we pray you to enter the house, my lord Orestes.

ORESTES You are to waken my sister

I'll speak with her here

ELECTRA (at the door) Oh! You are safe, you are well! Did you think I could be sleeping? But it is true,

I have slept soundly. Come, come

ORESTES                    A fellow in the forest

Told me you'd had the stone scrubbed
. . . I mean, that you'd entered the house, received as Agamemnon's daughter

In the honor of the city So I free to go traveling have come with—what's the word, Electra?—farewell 990

Have come to bid you farewell.

ELECTRA                    It means —you are going somewhere? Come into the house, Orestes, tell me . . .

ORESTES

The cape's rounded. I have not shipwrecked

ELECTRA Around the rock we have passed safely is the hall of this house,
The throne in the hall, the shining lordship of Mycenæ.

ORESTES No the open world, the sea and its wonders

You thought the oars raked the headland in the great storm—what, for Mycenæ?

ELECTRA Not meanest of the Greek cities
Whose king captained the world into Asia
Have you suddenly become . . . a God, brother, to over-vault

Agamemnon's royalty? O come in, come in I am cold, cold I pray you 1000

ORESTES Fetch a cloak, porter
If I have outgrown the city a little—I have earned it Did you notice, Electra, she caught at the sword

As the point entered the palm of her right hand was slashed to the bone before the mercy of the point

Slept in her breast the laid-open palm it was that undermined me . . . Oh, the cloak It's a blond night,

We'll walk on the stones no chill, the stars are mellow If I dare remember

Yesterday . . . because I have conquered, the soft fiber's burnt out

ELECTRA You have conquered possess.
enter the house,

Take up the royalty

ORESTES                    You were in my vision to-night in the forest, Electra, I thought I embraced you 1009

More than brotherwise . . . possessed, you call it entered the fountain—

ELECTRA                    Oh, hush.
Therefore you would not kill her!

ORESTES

I killed It is foolish to darken things with words I was here, she there, screaming Who if not I?

ELECTRA

The hidden reason the bitter kernel of your mind that has made you mad I that learned strength

Yesterday, I have no fear

ORESTES

Fear? The city is friendly and took you home with honor, they'll pay

Phocis his wage, you will be quiet.

ELECTRA

Are you
resolved to understand nothing, Orestes?
I am not Agamemnon, only his daughter You are Agamemnon Beggars and the sons of beggars

May wander at will over the world, but Agamemnon has his honor and high Mycenæ

Is not to be cast

1020

ORESTES

Mycenæ for a ship who will buy kingdom

And sell me a ship with oars?

ELECTRA

Dear listen
Come to the parapet where it hangs over
the night

The ears at the door hunder me Now, let the arrow-eyed stars hear, the night, not men, as for the Gods

No one can know them, whether they be angry or pleased, tall and terrible, standing apart,

When they make signs out of the darkness.

I cannot tell you . . . You will stay here, brother?

ORESTES

I'll go
To the edge and over it Sweet sister, if you've got a message for them, the dark ones?

ELECTRA

You do not mean
Death, but a wandering, what does it matter what you mean? I know two ways and one will quiet you 1030

You shall choose either

ORESTES

But I am quiet,
It is more regular than a sleeping child's be untroubled,

Yours burns, it is you trembling

ELECTRA

Should
I not tremble? It is only a little to offer,
But all that I have

ORESTES

Offer?

ELECTRA

It is accomplished, my father is avenged, the fates and the body of Electra

Are nothing But for Agamemnon to rule in Mycenæ, that is not nothing. O my brother

You are Agamemnon rule take all you will nothing is denied you. The Gods have redressed evil

And clamped the balance

1040

ORESTES

No doubt they have done what they desired.

ELECTRA

And yours,
yours? I will not suffer her Justly punished to dog you over the end of the world. Your desire? Speak it openly,
Orestes

She is to be conquered if her ghost were present on the stones—let it hear you I will make war on her

With my life, or with my body

ORESTES

What strange martyrdom, Electra, what madness for sacrifice

Makes your eyes burn like two fires on a watch-tower, though the night darkens?

ELECTRA

What you want you shall have
And rule in Mycenæ Nothing, nothing is denied you If I knew which of the two choices

Would quiet you, I would do and not speak, not ask you Tell me, tell me Must I bear all the burden,

1050

I weaker, and a woman? You and I were two hawks quartering the field for living flesh, Orestes,

Under the storm of the memory

Of Agamemnon we struck we tore the prey, that dog and that woman Suddenly since yesterday

You have shot up over me and left me,

You are Agamemnon, you are the storm of the living presence, the very King, and I, lost wings

Under the storm, would die for you. .

You do not speak yet? . . . Mine to say it all? . . . You know me a maiden,
Orestes,

You have always been with me, no man has even touched my cheek. It is not easy for one unmarried

And chaste, to name both choices. The first is easy That terrible dream in the forest if fear of desire

Drives you away it is easy for me not to be.

I never have known

Sweetness in life all my young days were given— 1060

ORESTES I thought to be silent was better,
And understand you. afterwards I'll speak

ELECTRA —to the noise of blood crying for blood, a crime to be punished,

A house to be emptied these things are done and now I am lonely, and what becomes of me is not important

There's water, and there are points and edges, pain's only a moment I'd do it and not speak, but nobody knows

Whether it would give you peace or madden you again, I'd not be leagued with that bad woman against you,

And these great walls sit by the crater, terrible desires blow through them O brother, I'll never blame you,

I share the motherhood and the fatherhood, I can conceive the madness, if you desire too near

The fountain tell me I also love you not that way, but enough to suffer What needs to be done

To make peace for you, tell me I shall so gladly die to make it for you or so gladly yield you 1070

What you know is maiden You are the King, have all your will only remain in steep Mycenæ,

In the honor of our father Not yet do not speak yet You have said it is not

Remorse drives you away monsters require monsters, to have let her live a moment longer

Would have been the crime therefore it cannot be but desire drives you or the fear of desire, dearest,

It is known horror unlocks the heart, a shower of things hidden if that which happened yesterday unmasked

A beautiful brother's love and showed more awful eyes in it all that our Gods require is courage.

Let me see the face, let the eyes pierce me What, dearest? Here in the stiff cloth of the sacred darkness

Fold over fold hidden, above the sleeping city,

By the great stones of the door, under the little golden falcons that swarm before dawn up yonder,

In the silence . . . must I dare to woo
you, 1080

I whom man never wooed? to let my hand glide under the cloak. . . . O you will stay! these arms

Making so soft and white a bond around you . . . I also begin to love—that way.
Orestes,

Feeling the hot hard flesh move under the loose cloth, shudder against me. . . .

Ah, your mouth, Ah,
The burning—kiss me—

ORESTES We shall never ascend this mountain So it might come true we have to be tough against them,
Our dreams and visions, or they true themselves into flesh It is sweet I faint for it the old stones here

Have seen more and not moved A custom of the house To accept you, little Electra, and go my journey

To-morrow you'd call cheating Therefore we shall not go up this mountain dearest, dearest,

To-night nor ever. It's Clytemnestra in you But the dead are a weak tribe If I had Agamemnon's

We'd live happily sister and lord it in Mycenæ—be a king like the others—royalty and incest 1090

Run both in the stream of the blood Who scrubbed the stones there?

ELECTRA Slaves O
fire burn me! Enter and lay waste, Deflower, trample, break down, pillage the little city,

Make what breach you will, with flesh or a spear, give it to the spoiler See, as I tear the garment

What if I called it cheating? Be cruel and treacherous I'll run my chances

On the bitter mercies of to-morrow

ORESTES Bitter they would be No

ELECTRA It's clear that for this reason

You'd sneak out of Mycenæ and be lost outward Taste first, bite the apple, once dared and tried

Desire will be not terrible It's doglike to run off whining Remember it was I that urged 1100

Yesterday's triumph You' life was enough let them live. I drove on, burning, your mind, reluctant metal,

I dipped it in fire and forged it sharp, day after day I beat and burned against you, and forged

A sword. I the arm Are you sorry it's done?
Now again with hammer and burning heat I beat against you,

You will not be sorry We two of all the world, we alone,

Are fit for each other, we have so wrought
. . . O eyes scorning the world, storm-feathered hawk my hands

Caught out of the air and made you a king over this rock, O axe with the gold helve, O star

Alone over the storm, beacon to men over blown seas, you will not flee fate, you will take

What the Gods give What is a man not ruling? An ant in the hill ruler or slave the choice is,

—Or a runaway slave, your pilgrim portion, buffeted over the borders of the lands, publicly

Whipped in the cities But you, you will bind the north-star on your forehead, you will stand up in Mycenæ 1110

Stone, and a king

ORESTES I am stone enough not to be changed by words, nor by the sweet and burning flame of you,

Beautiful Electra

ELECTRA Well then we've wasted our night See, there's the morning star

I might have draggled into a metaphor of you A fool a boy no king

ORESTES It would have been better

To have parted kindlier, for it is likely

We shall have no future meeting

ELECTRA You will let this crime (the God commanded) that dirtied the old stones here

Make division forever? 1120

ORESTES Not the crime, the wakening. That deed is past, it is finished, things past

Make no division afterward, they have no power, they have become nothing at all:
this much

I have learned at a crime's knees

ELECTRA Yet we are divided.

ORESTES Because I have suddenly awakened, I will not waste inward

Upon humanity, having found a fairer object.

ELECTRA Some nymph of the field? I knew this coldness

Had a sick root a girl in the north told me about the hill-shepherds who living in solitude

Turn beast with the ewes, their oreads baa to them through the matted fleece and they run mad, what madness

Met you in the night and sticks to you? 1130 ORESTES I left the madness of the house, to-night in the dark, with you it walks yet

How shall I tell you what I have learned?

Your mind is like a hawk's or like a lion's,
this knowledge

Is out of the order of your mind, a stranger language To wild beasts and the blood of kings

A verse blind in the book.

ELECTRA At least my eyes can see dawn graying tell and not mock me, our moment

Dies in a moment.

ORESTES Here is the last labor
To spend on humanity I saw a vision of us move in the dark all that we did or dreamed of

Regarded each other, the man pursued the woman, the woman clung to the man, warriors and kings

Strained at each other in the darkness, all loved or fought inward, each one of the lost people 1140

Sought the eyes of another that another should praise him, sought never his own but another's, the net of desire

Had every nerve drawn to the center, so that they writhed like a full draught of fishes, all matted

In the one mesh, when they look backward they see only a man standing at the beginning,

Or forward, a man at the end, or if upward, men in the shining bitter sky striding and feasting,

Whom you call Gods . . .

It is all turned inward, all your desires incestuous, the woman the serpent, the man the rose-red cavern,

Both human, worship forever . . .

ELECTRA You have dreamed wretchedly.

ORESTES I have seen the dreams of the people and not dreamed them.

As for me, I have slain my mother 1150

ELECTRA No more?

ORESTES                      And the gate's open, the gray boils over the mountain,
 I have greater Kindred than dwell under a roof Didn't I say this would be dark to you? I have cut the meshes
 And fly like a freed falcon. To-night, lying on the hillside, sick with those visions,
 I remembered
 The knife in the stalk of my humanity, I drew and it broke, I entered the life of the brown forest
 And the great life of the ancient peaks, the patience of stone, I felt the changes in the veins
 In the throat of the mountain, a grain in many centuries, we have our own time, not yours, and I was the stream Draining the mountain wood, and I the stag drinking, and I was the stars, Boiling with light, wandering alone, each one the lord of his own summit, and I was the darkness Outside the stars, I included them, they were a part of me I was mankind also, a moving lichen 1160
 On the cheek of the round stone . they have not made words for it, to go behind things, beyond hours and ages,
 And be all things in all time, in their returns and passages, in the motionless and timeless center,
 In the white of the fire . how can I express the excellence I have found, that has no color but clearness,
 No honey but ecstasy, nothing wrought nor remembered, no undertone nor silver second murmur
 That rings in love's voice, I and my loved are one, no desire but fulfilled, no passion but peace,
 The pure flame and the white, fierier than any passion, no time but spherul eternity Electra,
 Was that your name before this life dawned—
 ELECTRA                      Here is mere death. Death like a triumph I'd have paid to keep
 you
 A king in high Mycenæ but here is shameful death, to die because I have lost you.
 They'll say
Having done justice Agamemnon's son ran mad and was lost in the mountain, but Agamemnon's daughter 1170

*Hanged herself from a beam of the house. O bountiful hands of justice! This horror draws upon me
 Like stone walking.*

ORESTES                      What fills men's mouths is nothing, and your threat is nothing, I have fallen in love outward
 If I believed you—it is I that am like stone walking

ELECTRA                      I can endure even to hate
 you,
 But that's no matter Strength's good. You are lost I here remember the honor of the house, and Agamemnon's

She turned and entered the ancient house Orestes walked in the clear dawn, men say that a serpent

Killed him in high Arcadia But young or old, few years or many, signified less than nothing

To him who had climbed the tower beyond time, consciously, and cast humanity, entered the earlier fountain

NOON

THE pure air trembles, O pitiless God,
 The air aches with flame on these gaunt
 rocks

Over the flat sea's face, the forest
 Shakes in gales of piercing light.

But the altars are behind and higher
 Where the great hills raise naked heads,
 Pale agonists in the reverberance
 Of the pure air and the pitiless God

On the domed skull of every hill
 Who stand blazing with spread vans, 10
 The arms uplifted, the eyes in ecstasy?

What wine has the God drunk, to sing Violently in heaven, what wine his worshippers

Whose silence blazes? The light that is over

Light, the terror of noon, the eyes
 That the eagles die at, have thrown down

Me and my pride, here I lie naked
 In a hollow of the shadowless rocks,
 Full of the God, having drunk fire

NIGHT

THE ebb slips from the rock, the sunken
Tide-rocks lift streaming shoulders
Out of the slack, the slow west
Sombering its torch, a ship's light Shows faintly, far out,
Over the weight of the prone ocean
On the low cloud

Over the dark mountain, over the dark pinewood,
Down the long dark valley along the shrunk river,
Returns the splendor without rays, the shining of shadow, 10
Peace-bringer, the matrix of all shining and quieter of shining
Where the shore widens on the bay she opens dark wings
And the ocean accepts her glory O soul worshipful of her
You like the ocean have grave depths where she dwells always,
And the film of waves above that takes the sun takes also Her, with more love The sun-lovers have a blond favorite,
A father of lights and noises, wars, weeping and laughter,
Hot labor, lust and delight and the other blemishes Quietness Flows from her deeper fountain, and he will die, and she is immortal

Far off from here the slender 20
Flocks of the mountain forest
Move among stems like towers
Of the old redwoods to the stream,
No twig crackling, dip shy
Wild muzzles into the mountain water
Among the dark ferns

O passionately at peace you being secure will pardon
The blasphemies of glowworms, the lamp in my tower, the fretfulness Of cities, the crescents of the planets, the pride of the stars
This August night in a rift of cloud Antares reddens, 30
The great one, the ancient torch, a lord
    among lost children,
The earth's orbit doubled would not girdle his greatness. one fire

Globed, out of grasp of the mind enormous;
    but to you O Night
What? Not a spark? What flicker of a spark in the faint far glimmer
Of a lost fire dying in the desert, dim coals of a sand-pit the Bedouins Wandered from at dawn . Ah singing prayer to what gulfs tempted Suddenly are you more lost? To us the near-hand mountain
Be a measure of height, the tide-worn cliff at the sea-gate a measure of continuance

The tide, moving the night's Vastness with lonely voices, 40
Turns, the deep dark-shining Pacific leans on the land,
Feeling his cold strength
To the outmost margins you Night will resume
The stars in your time

O passionately at peace when will that tide draw shoreward?
Truly the spouting fountains of light,
    Antares, Arcturus, Tire of their flow, they sing one song but they think silence
The striding winter giant Orion shines, and dreams darkness
And life, the flicker of men and moths and the wolf on the hull, 50 Though furious for continuance, passionately feeding, passionately Remaking itself upon its mates, remembers deep inward
The calm mother, the quietness of the womb and the egg,
The primal and the latter silences dear Night it is memory Prophecies, prophecy that remembers, the charm of the dark
And I and my people, we are willing to love the four-score years Heartily, but as a sailor loves the sea, when the helm is for harbor

Have men's minds changed,
Or the rock hidden in the deep of the waters of the soul
Broken the surface? A few centuries 60
Gone by, was none dared not to people
The darkness beyond the stars with harps and habitations

But now, dear is the truth Life is grown sweeter and lonelier,
And death is no evil

INVOCATION <sup>1</sup>

v

O SWIFTNESS of the swallow and strength
Of the stone shore, brave beauty of falcons,
Beauty of the blue heron that flies
Opposite the color of evening
From the Carmel River's reed-grown mouth

To her nest in the deep wood of the deer
Cliffs of peninsular granite engirdle,
O beauty of the fountains of the sun
I pray you enter a little chamber,
I have given you bodies, I have made you puppets, 10

I have made idols for God to enter
And tiny cells to hold your honey
I have given you a dotard and an idiot,
An old woman puffed with vanity, youth
but botched with incest,

O blower of music through the crooked bugles,

You that make signs of sins and choose the lame for angels,

Enter and possess Being light you have chosen the dark lamps,

A hawk the sluggish bodies therefore God you chose

Me, and therefore I have made you idols like these idols

To enter and possess 20

ANTE MORTEM

It is likely enough that lions and scorpions Guard the end, life never was bonded to be endurable nor the act of dying

Unpainful, the brain burning too often Earns, though it held itself detached from the object, often a burnt age

No matter, I shall not shorten it by hand Incapable of body or unmoved of brain is no evil, one always went envying

The quietness of stones But if the striped blossom

<sup>1</sup> The title is given by the editors

Insanity spread lewd splendors and lightning terrors at the end of the forest,

Or intolerable pain work is known miracle,

Exile the monarch soul, set a sick monkey in the office remember me 10

Entire and balanced when I was younger,

And could lift stones, and comprehend in the praises the cruelties of life

TOR HOUSE

If you should look for this place after a handful of lifetimes

Perhaps of my planted forest a few May stand yet, dark-leaved Australians or the coast cypress, haggard

With storm-drift, but fire and the axe are devils

Look for foundations of sea-worn granite, my fingers had the art

To make stone love stone, you will find some remnant

But if you should look in your idleness after ten thousand years

It is the granite knoll on the granite And lava tongue in the midst of the bay, by the mouth of the Carmel

River-valley, these four will remain 10

In the change of names You will know it by the wild sea-fragrance of wind

Though the ocean may have climbed or retired a little,

You will know it by the valley inland that our sun and our moon were born
from

Before the poles changed, and Orion in December

Evenings was strung in the throat of the valley like a lamp-light bridge

Come in the morning you will see white gulls Weaving a dance over blue water, the wane of the moon

Their dance-companion, a ghost walking By daylight, but wider and whiter than any bird in the world

My ghost you needn't look for, it is probably 20

Here, but a dark one, deep in the granite, not dancing on wind

With the mad wings and the day moon

FROM CAWDOR

THE DEATH OF THE EAGLE <sup>1</sup>

XV

WHILE George went to the house
 For his revolver, Michal climbed up the hill
 Weeping, but when he came with death in his hand
 She'd not go away, but watched At the one shot
 The great dark bird leaped at the roof of the cage <sup>70</sup>
 In silence and struck the wood, it fell, then suddenly Looked small and soft, muffled in its folded
 wings

The nerves of men after they die dream
 dimly
 And dwindle into their peace, they are not very passionate,
 And what they had was mostly spent while they lived
 They are sieves for leaking desire, they have many pleasures
 And conversations, their dreams too are like that
 The unsocial birds are a greater race, Cold-eyed, and their blood burns What leaped up to death,
 The extension of one storm-dark wing filling its world, <sup>80</sup>
 Was more than the soft garment that fell Something had flown away Oh cage-hoarded desire, Like the blade of a breaking wave reaped by the wind, or flame rising from fire, or cloud-coiled lightning Suddenly unfurled in the cave of heaven I that am stationed, and cold at heart, incapable of burning,
 My blood like standing sea-water lapped in a stone pool, my desire to the rock,
 how can I speak of you?
 Mine will go down to the deep rock.

Thus rose,
 Possessing the air over its emptied prison,
 The eager powers at its shoulders waving shadowless Unwound the ever-widened spirals of flight

As a star light, it spins the night-stabbing threads <sup>90</sup>
 From its own strength and substance so the aquiline desire Burned itself into meteor freedom and spired
 Higher still, and saw the mountaindividing Canyon of its captivity (that was to Cawdor Almost his world) like an old crack in a wall, Violet-shadowed and gold-lighted, the little stain Spilt on the floor of the crack was the strong forest,
 The grain of sand was the Rock A speck, an atomic
 Center of power clouded in its own smoke
 Ran and cried in the crack, it was Cawdor, the other <sup>100</sup> Points of humanity had neither weight nor shining
 To prick the eyes of even an eagle's passion

 This burned and soared The shining ocean below lay on the shore
 Like the great shield of the moon come down, rolling bright rim to rim with the earth Against it the multiform And many-canyoned coast-range hills were gathered into one carven mountain, one modulated
 Eagle's cry made stone, stopping the strength of the sea The beaked and winged effluence
 Felt the air foam under its throat and saw The mountain sun-cup Tassajara, where fawns
 Dance in the steam of the hot fountains at dawn,
 Smoothed out, and the high strained ridges beyond Cachagua, <sup>110</sup> Where the rivers are born and the last condor is dead,
 Flatten, and a hundred miles toward morning the Sierras Dawn with their peaks of snow, and dwindle and smooth down
 On the globed earth

It saw from the height and desert space of unbreathable air Where meteors make green fire and die, the ocean dropping westward to the girdle of the pearls of dawn
 And the hinder edge of the night sliding toward Asia, it saw far under eastward the April-delighted Continent, and time relaxing about it now, abstracted from being, it saw the eagles destroyed,

 Mean generations of gulls and crows taking their world turn for turn in the air, as on earth
 The white faces drove out the brown It saw the white decayed and the brown from Asia returning, 120
 It saw men learn to outfly the hawk's brood and forget it again, it saw men cover the earth and again Devour each other and hide in caverns, be scarce as wolves It neither wondered nor cared, and it saw Growth and decay alternate forever, and the tides returning

 It saw, according to the sight of its kind, the archetype
 Body of life a beaked carnivorous desire Self-upheld on storm-broad wings but the
 eyes
 Were spouts of blood, the eyes were gashed out, dark blood
 Ran from the ruinous eye-pits to the hook of the beak
 And rained on the waste spaces of empty heaven
 Yet the great Life continued, yet the great Life 130
 Was beautiful, and she drank her defeat, and devoured
 Her famine for food

There the eagle's phantom perceived Its prison and its wound were not its peculiar wretchedness,
 All that lives was maimed and bleeding,
 caged or in blindness, Lopped at the ends with death and conception, and shrewd Caution of pain on the stumps to stifle the blood, but not Refrains for all that, life was more than its functions
 And accidents, more important than its pains and pleasures,
 A torch to burn in with pride, a necessary
 Ecstasy in the run of the cold substance, 141
 And scape-goat of the greater world (But
 as for me,

I have heard the summer dust crying to be born
 As much as ever flesh cried to be quiet ) Pouring itself on fulfilment the eagle's passion
 Left life behind and flew at the sun, its father
 The great unreal talons took peace for prey Exultantly, their death beyond death, stooped upward, and struck Peace like a white fawn in a dell of fire

LOVE THE WILD SWAN

'I HATE my verses, every line, every word
 Oh pale and brittle pencils ever to try One grass-blade's curve, or the throat of one bird
 That clings to twig, ruffled against white sky Oh cracked and twilight mirrors ever to catch
 One color, one glinting flash, of the splendor of things
 Unlucky hunter, Oh bullets of wax,
 The lion beauty, the wild-swan wings, the storm of the wings '
 —Thus wild swan of a world is no hunter's game Better bullets than yours would miss the white breast, 10
 Better mirrors than yours would crack in the flame
 Does it matter whether you hate your self? At least Love your eyes that can see, your mind that can Hear the music, the thunder of the wings
 Love the wild swan

SELF CRITICISM IN FEBRUARY

THE bay is not blue but somber yellow With wrack from the battered valley, it is speckled with violent foam-heads And tiger-striped with long lovely storm-shadows
 You love this better than the other mask, better eyes than yours
 Would feel the equal beauty in the blue.
 It is certain you have loved the beauty of storm disproportionately
 But the present time is not pastoral, but founded

On violence, pointed for more massive violence perhaps it is not Perversity but need that perceives the storm-beauty
Well, bite on this your poems are too full of ghosts and demons, <sup>10</sup>
And people like phantoms—how often life's
are—
And passion so strained that the clay mouths
go praying for destruction—
 Alas, it is not unusual in life,
 To every soul at some time But why insist on it? And now

For the worst fault you have never mistaken
Demon nor passion nor idealism for the real
God.
 Then what is most disliked in those verses Remains most true Unfortunately If only you could sing
That God is love, or perhaps that social

<sup>1</sup> To Arthur Quinn, O'Neill wrote, May 1927, concerning the theme of Lazarus Laughed "The fear of death is the root of all evil, the cause of all man's blundering unhappiness. Lazarus knows there is no death, there is only change. He is reborn without that fear. Therefore he is the first and only man who is able to laugh affirmatively. His laughter is a triumphant Yes to life in its entirety and its eternity. His laughter affirms God, it is too noble to desire personal immortality, it wills its own extinction, it gives its life for the sake of Eternal Life (patriotism carried to its logical ultimate). His laughter is the direct expression of joy in the Dionysian sense, the joy of a celebrant who is at the same time a sacrifice in the eternal process of change and growth and transmutation which is life, of which his life is an insignificant manifestation, soon to be reabsorbed. And life itself is the self-affirmative joyous laughter of God." Quinn, A History of the American Drama (N.Y., 1936), 252-53.

SCENE ONE

SCENE Exterior and interior of LAZARUS'

home at Bethany The main room at the front end of the house is shown—a long, low-ceilinged, sparsely furnished chamber, with white walls gray in the fading daylight that enters from three small windows at the left To the left of center several long tables placed lengthwise to the width of the room, around which many chairs for guests have been placed In the rear wall, right, a door leading into the rest of the house On the left, a doorway opening on a road where a crowd of men has gathered On the right, another doorway leading to the yard where there is a crowd of women

Inside the house, on the men's side, seven male Guests are grouped by the door, watching LAZARUS with frightened awe, talking hesitantly in low whispers The Chorus of Old Men, seven in number, is drawn up in a crescent, in the far corner, right, facing LAZARUS

[All of these people are masked in accordance with the following scheme There are seven periods of life shown Boyhood (or Girlhood), Youth, Young Manhood (or Womanhood), Manhood (or Womanhood), Middle Age, Maturity and Old Age, and each of these periods is represented by seven different masks of general types of character as follows The Simple, Ignorant, the Happy, Eager, the Self-Tortured, Introspective, the Proud, Self-Reliant, the Servile, Hypocritical, the Revengeful, Cruel, the Sorrowful, Resigned Thus in each crowd (this includes among the men the Seven Guests who are composed of one male of each period-type as period one—type one, period two—type two, and so on up to period seven—type seven) there are forty-nine different combinations of period and type Each type has a distinct predominant color for its costumes which varies in kind according to its period The masks of the Chorus of Old Men are double the size of the others They are all seven in the Sorrowful, Resigned type of Old Age]

On a raised platform at the middle of the one table placed lengthwise at center sits LAZARUS, his head haloed and his body illumined by a soft radiance as of tiny phosphorescent flames

LAZARUS, freed now from the fear of death, wears no mask

In appearance LAZARUS is tall and powerful, about fifty years of age, with a mass of gray-black hair and a heavy beard His face recalls that of a statue of a divinity of Ancient Greece in its general structure and particularly in its quality of detached serenity It is dark-complected, ruddy and brown, the color of rich earth upturned by the plow, calm but furrowed deep with the marks of former suffering endured with a grim fortitude that had never softened into resignation His forehead is broad and noble, his eyes black and deep-set Just now he is staring straight before him as if his vision were still fixed beyond life

Kneeling beside him with bowed heads are his wife, MIRIAM, his sisters, MARTHA and MARY, and his FATHER and MOTHER

MIRIAM is a slender, delicate woman of thirty-five, dressed in deep black, who holds one of his hands in both of hers, and keeps her lips pressed to it The upper part of her face is covered by a mask which conceals her forehead, eyes and nose, but leaves her mouth revealed The mask is the pure pallor of marble, the expression that of a statue of Woman, of her eternal acceptance of the compulsion of motherhood, the inevitable cycle of love into pain into joy and new love into separation and pain again and the loneliness of age The eyes of the mask are almost closed Their gaze turns within, oblivious to the life outside, as they dream down on the child forever in memory at her breast The mouth of MIRIAM is sensitive and sad, tender with an eager, understanding smile of self-forgetful love, the lips still fresh and young Her skin, in contrast to the mask, is sunburned and earth-colored like that of LAZARUS MARTHA, MARY and the two parents all wear full masks which broadly reproduce their own characters MARTHA is a buxom middle-aged housewife, plain and pleasant MARY is young and pretty, nervous and high-strung The FATHER is a small, thin, feeble old man of over eighty, meek and pious. The MOTHER is tall and stout, over sixty-five, a gentle, simple woman

All the masks of these Jews of the first two scenes of the play are pronouncedly Semitic A background of twilight sky A dissolving touch of sunset still lingers on the horizon.

It is some time after the miracle and Jesus has gone away

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

*[In a quavering rising and falling chant —their arms outstretched toward
LAZARUS]*

Jesus wept!
Behold how he loved him!
He that liveth,
He that believeth,
Shall never die!

CROWD

[On either side of house, echo the chant]

He that believeth
Shall never die!
Lazarus, come forth!

FIRST GUEST

[A Simple Boy—in a frightened whisper after a pause of dead silence]

That strange light seems to come from within him!

Think of it! For four days he lay in the tomb! 20

[Turns away with a shudder]

SECOND GUEST

[A Happy Youth—with reassuring conviction]

It is a holy light. It came from Jesus

FIFTH GUEST

[An Envious, Middle-Aged Man]

Maybe if the truth were known, our friend there never really died at all! 30

FOURTH GUEST

[A Defiant Man, indignantly]

Do you doubt the miracle? I tell you I was here in this house when Lazarus died!

SEVENTH GUEST

[An Aged, Sorrowful Man]

And I used to visit him every day. He knew himself his hour was near.

FOURTH GUEST

He wished for death! He said to me one day 'I have known my fill of life and the sorrow of living. Soon I shall know peace.'
And he smiled. It was the first time I had seen him smile in years.

THIRD GUEST

[A Self-Tortured Man—gloomily]

Yes, of late years his life had been one long misfortune. One after another his children died—

SIXTH GUEST

[A Mature Man with a cruel face—with a harsh laugh]

They were all girls. Lazarus had no luck

SEVENTH GUEST

The last was a boy, the one that died at birth. You are forgetting him

THIRD GUEST

Lazarus could never forget. Not only did his son die but Miriam could never bear him more children

FIFTH GUEST

[Practically]

But he could not blame bad luck for everything. Take the loss of his father's wealth since he took over the management. That was his own doing. He was a bad farmer, a poor breeder of sheep, and a bargainer so easy to cheat it hurt one's conscience to trade with him!

SIXTH GUEST

[With a sneer—maliciously]

You should know best about that!

*[A suppressed laugh from those around
him]*

FIRST GUEST

[Who has been gazing at LAZARUS—softly]

Ssssh! Look at his face!

[They all stare. A pause]

SECOND GUEST

[With wondering awe]

Do you remember him, neighbors, before he died? He used to be pale even when he worked in the fields. Now he seems as brown as one who has labored in the earth all day in a vineyard beneath the hot sun!

[A pause]

FOURTH GUEST

The whole look of his face has changed. He is like a stranger from a far land. There is no longer any sorrow in his eyes. They must have forgotten sorrow in the grave.

FIFTH GUEST

[Grumblingly]

I thought we were invited here to eat—and all we do is stand and gape at him!

FOURTH GUEST

[Sternly]

Be silent! We are waiting for him to speak.

THIRD GUEST

[Impressively]

He did speak once. And he laughed!

ALL THE GUESTS

[Amazed and incredulous]

Laughed?

THIRD GUEST

[Importantly]

Laughed! I heard him! It was a moment after the miracle—

MIRIAM

[Her voice, rich with sorrow, exultant now]

Jesus cried, 'Lazarus, come forth!'

[She kisses his hand. He makes a slight movement, a stirring in his vision. The GUESTS stare. A frightened pause.]

FIFTH GUEST

[Nudging the SECOND—uneasily]

Go on with your story!

THIRD GUEST

Just as he appeared in the opening of the tomb, wrapped in his shroud—

SECOND GUEST

[Excitedly—interrupting]

My heart stopped! I fell on my face! And all the women screamed!

[Sceptically]

You must have sharp ears to have heard him laugh in that uproar!

THIRD GUEST

I helped to pry away the stone so I was right beside him. I found myself kneeling, but between my fingers I watched Jesus and Lazarus. Jesus looked into his face for what seemed a long time and suddenly Lazarus said 'Yes' as if he were answering a question in Jesus' eyes.

ALL THE GUESTS

[Mystified]

Yes? What could he mean by yes?

THIRD GUEST

Then Jesus smiled sadly but with tenderness, as one who from a distance of years of sorrow remembers happiness. And then Lazarus knelt and kissed Jesus' feet and both of them smiled and Jesus blessed him and called him 'My Brother' and went away, and Lazarus, looking after Him, began to laugh softly like a man in love with God! Such a laugh I never heard! It made my ears drunk! It was like wine! And though I was half-dead with fright I found myself laughing, too!

MIRIAM

[With a beseeching summons]

Lazarus, come forth!

CHORUS

[Chanting]

Lazarus! Come forth!

CROWD

[On either side of the house—echoing the chant]

Come forth! Come forth!

LAZARUS

[Suddenly in a deep voice—with a wonderful exultant acceptance in it]

Yes!

[The GUESTS in the room, the CROWDS outside all cry out in fear and joy and fall on their knees]

CHORUS

[Chanting exultantly]

The stone is taken away!
 The spirit is loosed!
 The soul let go!

LAZARUS

[Rising and looking around him at everyone and everything—with an all-embracing love—gently]

Yes!

[His family and the GUESTS in the room now throng about LAZARUS to embrace him The CROWDS of men and women on each side push into the room to stare at him He is in the arms of his MOTHER and MIRIAM while his SISTERS and FATHER kiss and press his hands The five are half hysterical with relief and joy, sobbing and laughing]

FATHER

My son is reborn to me!

CHORUS

Hosannah!

ALL

[With a great shout]

Hosannah!

FATHER

Let us rejoice! Eat and drink! Draw up your chairs, friends! Music! Bring wine!

[Music begins in the room off right, rear—a festive dance tune The company sit down in their places, the FATHER and MOTHER at LAZARUS' right and left, MIRIAM next to the MOTHER, MARTHA and MARY beside the FATHER But LAZARUS remains standing And the CHORUS OF OLD MEN remain in their formation at the rear Wine is poured and all raise their goblets toward LAZARUS—then suddenly they stop, the music dies out, and an awed and frightened stillness prevails, for LAZARUS is a strange, majestic figure whose understanding smile seems terrible and enigmatic to them]

FATHER

[Pathetically uneasy]

You frighten us, my son You are strange—standing there—

[In the midst of a silence more awkward than before he rises to his feet, goblet in hand—forcing his voice, falteringly]

A toast, neighbors!

CHORUS

[In a forced echo]

A toast!

ALL

[Echoing them]

A toast!

FATHER

To my son, Lazarus, whom a blessed miracle has brought back from death!

LAZARUS

[Suddenly laughing softly out of his vision, as if to himself, and speaking with a strange unearthly calm in a voice that is like a loving whisper of hope and confidence]

No! There is no death!

[A moment's pause The people remain with goblets uplifted, staring at him Then all repeat after him questioningly and frightenedly]

ALL

There—is—no—death?

SIXTH GUEST

[Suddenly blurts out the question which is in the minds of all]

What did you find beyond there, Lazarus?
[A pause of silence]

LAZARUS

[Smiles gently and speaks as if to a group of inquisitive children]

O Curious Greedy Ones, is not one world in which you know not how to live enough 10
for you?

SIXTH GUEST

[Emboldened]

Why did you say yes, Lazarus?

FOURTH GUEST

Why did you laugh?

ALL THE GUESTS

[With insistent curiosity but in low awed tones]

What is beyond there, Lazarus?

CHORUS

[In a low murmur]

What is beyond there? What is beyond?

CROWD

[Carrying the question falteringly back into silence]

What is beyond?

LAZARUS

[Suddenly again—now in a voice of loving exaltation]

There is only life! I heard the heart of Jesus laughing in my heart; 'There is Eternal Life in No,' it said, 'and there is the same Eternal Life in Yes! Death is the fear between!' And my heart reborn to love of life cried 'Yes!' and I laughed in the laughter of God!

[He begins to laugh, softly at first—a laugh so full of a complete acceptance of life, a profound assertion of joy in living, so devoid of all self-consciousness or fear, that it is like a great bird song triumphant in depths of sky, proud and powerful, infectious with love, casting on the listener an enthralling spell The crowd in the room are caught by it Glancing sideways at one another, smiling foolishly and self-consciously, at first they hesitate, plainly holding themselves in for fear of what the next one will think]

CHORUS

[In a chanting murmur]

Lazarus laughs!
Our hearts grow happy!
Laughter like music!
The wind laughs!
The sea laughs!
Spring laughs from the earth!
Summer laughs in the air!
Lazarus laughs!

LAZARUS

[On a final note of compelling exultation]

20 Laugh! Laugh with me! Death is dead!
Fear is no more! There is only life! There is only laughter!

CHORUS

[Chanting exultingly now]

Laugh! Laugh!
Laugh with Lazarus!
Fear is no more!
There is no death!

[They laugh in a rhythmic cadence dominated by the laughter of LAZ-ARUS]

CROWD

[Who, gradually, joining in by groups or one by one—including LAZARUS' fam- ily with the exception of MIRIAM, who does not laugh but watches and listens to his laughter with a tender smile of being happy in his happiness—have now all begun to laugh in rhythm with the CHORUS—in a great, full-throated pæan as the laughter of LAZARUS rises higher and higher]

Laugh! Laugh!
Fear is no more!
There is no death!

CHORUS

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only life!
There is only laughter!
Fear is no more!
Death is dead!

CROWD

[In a rhythmic echo]

Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!
There is only laughter!

[The room rocks, the air outside throbs with the rhythmic beat of their liberated laughter—still a bit uncertain of its freedom, harsh, discordant, frenzied, desperate and drunken, but dominated and inspired by the high, free, aspiring, exulting laughter of LAZARUS]

CURTAIN

ACT ONE

SCENE TWO

SCENE Some months later. Exterior of LAZARUS' home in Bethany, now known as the House of Laughter. It is a clear bright night, the sky sparkling with stars. At the extreme front is a road. Between this and the house is a small raised terrace. The house is low, of one story only, its walls white. Four windows are visible with a closed door in the middle of the wall. Steps lead up to this door, and to the left of door a flight of stairs goes up to the balustraded roof. The windows shine brilliantly with the flickering light of many candles which gives them a throbbing star-like effect. From within comes the sound of flutes and dance music. The dancers can be seen whirling swiftly by the windows. There is continually an overtone of singing laughter emphasizing the pulsing rhythm of the dance.

On the road in the foreground, at left and right, two separate groups of Jews are gathered. They are not divided according to sex as in the previous scene. Each is composed about equally of men and women, forty-nine in each, masked and costumed as before. It is religious belief that now divides them. The adherents of Jesus, the Nazarenes, among whom may be noted MARTHA and MARY, are on the left, the Orthodox, among whom are LAZARUS' FATHER and MOTHER and a PRIEST, are at right. Between the two hostile groups is the same CHORUS of OLD MEN, in a formation like a spearhead, whose point is placed at the foot of the steps leading to the terrace. All these people are staring fascinatedly at the house, listening entranced, their feet moving, their bodies swaying to the music's beat, stiffly, constrainedly, compelled against their wills. Then the music suddenly stops and the chant of youthful voices is heard.

FOLLOWERS OF LAZARUS

[From within the house]

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only life!
There is only laughter!

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[As if they were subjects moved by hypnotic suggestion—miserably and discordantly]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!
There is only laughter!
Ha-ha—

CROWD

[In the same manner]

Ha-ha—

MARY

Ha—
[Then frantically—half-weeping with indignant rage—to the Nazarenes]

Stop! Oh, how can we laugh! We are betraying Jesus! My brother Lazarus has become a devil!

THE ORTHODOX PRIEST

*[His mask is that of a religious fanatic
He is sixty or so]*

Ha—ha—

[Tearing his beard and stamping with rage]

Stop it, you fools! It is a foul sin in the sight of Jehovah! Why do you come here every night to listen and watch their abominations? The Lord God will punish you!

MARY

[Echoing him—to her people]

Jesus will never forgive you!

THE PRIEST

[Angrily]

Jesus?

[He turns to look at the Nazarenes disdainfully and spits on the ground insultingly]

[The members of the two groups begin to glare at each other. The CHORUS falls back, three on each side, leaving one neutral figure before the steps. The PRIEST goes on tauntingly]

Did you hear her, friends? These renegade Nazarenes will soon deny they are Jews at all! They will begin to worship in filthy idolatry the sun and stars and man's body—as Lazarus in there,

[Points to the house]

the disciple of their Jesus, has so well set them the example!

[This is followed by an outburst of insulting shouts of accusation and demoralization from both sides]

A NAZARENE

[The FOURTH GUEST of Scene One]

You lie! Lazarus is no disciple! He is a traitor to Jesus! We scorn him!

PRIEST

[Sneeringly]

But your pretended Messiah did not scorn

him. According to your stupid lies, he raised him from the dead! And answer me, has your Jesus ever denied Lazarus, or denounced his laughter? No! No doubt he is laughing, too, at all you credulous fools—for if Lazarus is not his disciple, in the matter of the false miracle he was his accomplice!

[This provokes a furious protest from the Nazarenes and insulting hoots and jeers from the Orthodox, penetrated by a piercing scream from LAZARUS' MOTHER, who, crushed in the crowd, sinks fainting to the ground. The FATHER bends over her. The group of the Orthodox falls back from them. With frightened cries MARTHA and MARY run from the group of Nazarenes and kneel beside her]

FATHER

[Pitifully]

Rachel! Darling! Speak to me!

MARTHA

[Practically]

She has only fainted

MARY

She is opening her eyes! Mother, dear!

MOTHER

[Weakly]

Did I fall?

[Recognizing MARTHA and MARY]

Martha—and Mary—my dear ones!

[They embrace her, weeping]

I have not kissed you since you left home to follow that Jesus—Oh, if we were only at home again—and if, also, my poor boy, Lazarus—

[She sobs]

FATHER

[Gruffly]

You must not speak of him!

MARTHA

Do not worry your head about Lazarus. He is not worth it!

MARY

[With surprising vindictiveness]

He is accursed! He has betrayed our Lord!

PRIEST

[To those around him—mockingly]

Do you hear? They already call the Nazarene 'Lord!' A Lord who is in the common prison at Jerusalem, I heard today!
A fine Lord whom our High Priests have had arrested like a thief!

MARY

[With fanatic fervor]

He is a king! Whenever He chooses He will gather a great army and He will seize His kingdom and all who deny Him shall be crucified!

PRIEST

[Tauntingly]

Now their jail-bird is a king, no less! Soon they will make him a god, as the Romans do their Cæsars!

MARY

[Her eyes flashing]

He is the Messiah!

PRIEST

[Furiously]

The Messiah! May Jehovah smite you in your lies! Step back among your kind!
You defile us!

[As she stands defiantly he appeals to the FATHER]

Have you no authority? She called him the Messiah—that common beggar, that tramp! 20
Curse her!

FATHER

[Confused, pitifully harried, collecting his forces]

Wait! Go back, Mary! You chose to follow that impostor—

MARY

[Defiantly]

The Messiah!

MARTHA

[Trying to calm her]

Ssssh! Remember he is our father!

MARY

[Fanatically]

I deny him! I deny all who deny Jesus!

MOTHER

[Tearfully]

And me, darling?

MARY

You must come to us, Mother! You must believe in Jesus and leave all to follow Him!

FATHER

[Enraged]

So! You want to steal your mother away, to leave me lonely in my old age! You are an unnatural daughter! I disown you! Go, before I curse—

MOTHER

[Beseechingly]

Father!

MARTHA

[Pulling MARY away]

Mary! Jesus teaches to be kind.

MARY

[Hysterically]

He teaches to give up all and follow Him! I want to give Him everything! I want my father to curse me!

FATHER

[Frenziedly]

Then I do curse you! No—not you—but the devil in you! And the devil in Martha!
And the great mocking devil that dwells in Lazarus and laughs from his mouth! I curse these devils and that Prince of Devils, that false prophet, Jesus! It is he who has brought division to my home and many homes that were happy before I curse him!

 I curse the day he called my good son, Lazarus, from the grave to walk again with a devil inside him! It was not my son who came back but a devil! My son is dead!
 And you, my daughters, are dead! I am the father only of devils!

[His voice has risen to a wailing lament]
 My children are dead!

LAZARUS

[His voice rings from within the house in exultant denial]

Death is dead! There is only laughter!

[He laughs]

[*The voices of all his FOLLOWERS echo his laughter They pour in a laughing rout from the doorway onto the terrace
 At the same moment the CHORUS
 OF FOLLOWERS appears on the roof and forms along the balustrade, facing front*]

[These FOLLOWERS OF LAZARUS, forty-nine in number, composed about equally of both sexes, wear a mask that, while recognizably Jewish, is a LAZARUS mask, resembling him in its expression of fearless faith in life, the mouth shaped by laughter The CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS, seven in number, all men, have identical masks of double size, as before The Period of all these masks is anywhere between Youth and Manhood (or Womanhood)]

[The music continues to come from within Laughing, the FOLLOWERS dance to it in weaving patterns on the terrace They are dressed in bright-colored diaphanous robes Their chorused laughter, now high and clear, now dying to a humming murmur, stresses the rhythmic flow of the dance]

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

Laugh! Laugh!
 There is no death!
 There is only laughter!

FOLLOWERS

There is only laughter!
 Death is dead!
 Laugh! Laugh!

CROWD

[The two groups of Nazarenes and Orthodox, on the appearance of the FOLLOWERS, immediately forget their differences and form into one mob, led by their CHORUS OF OLD MEN, whose jeering howls they echo as one voice]

Yaah! Yaah! Yaah!

[*But they cannot keep it up The music and laughter rise above their hooting.
 They fall into silence Then they again begin to feel impelled by the rhythm and laughter, their feet move, their bodies sway Their lips quiver, their mouths open as if to laugh Their CHORUS OF OLD MEN are the first to be affected It is as if this reaction were transmitted through the CHORUS to the CROWD*]

PRIEST

[His mouth twitching—fighting against the compulsion in him—stammers]

Brothers—listen—we must unite—in one cause—to—stamp out—this abomination!

[It is as if he can no longer control his speech He presses his hand over his mouth convulsively]

AN AGED ORTHODOX JEW

[The SEVENTH GUEST of Scene One—starts to harangue the crowd He fights the spell but cannot control his jerking body nor his ghastly, spasmodic laughter]

Neighbors! Our young people are corrupted! They are leaving our farms—to dance and sing! To laugh! Ha—! Laugh at everything! Ha-ha—!

[He struggles desperately to control himself]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[A barking laugh forced from them]

Ha-ha—!

CROWD

[Echoing this]

Ha-ha—!

THE AGED JEW

They have no respect for life! When I said in kindness, 'You must go back to work,' they laughed at me! Ha—! 'We desire joy We go to Lazarus,' they said—and left my fields! I begged them to stay—with tears in my eyes! I even offered them more money! They laughed! 'What is money? Can the heart eat gold?' They laughed at money! Ha-ha—!

[He chokes with exasperated rage]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[Echoing him]

Ha-ha—!

CROWD

[Echoing the CHORUS]

Ha-ha—!

AGED JEW

[Shaking his fist at LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS]

That loafer taught them that! They come to him and work for nothing! For nothing! And they are glad, these undutiful ones! While they sow, they dance! They sing to the earth when they are plowing! They tend his flocks and laugh toward the sun! Ha-ha-ha—!

[He struggles again]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[As before]

Ha-ha-ha—

CROWD

[As before]

Ha-ha-ha—

AGED JEW

How can we compete with labor for laughter! We will have no harvest. There will be no food! Our children will starve! Our race will perish! And he will laugh! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[He howls with furious, uncontained laughter]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[Echoing his tone]

Our children will starve!

Our race will perish!

Lazarus laughs!

Ha-ha-ha-ha! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CROWD

10 Ha-ha-ha-ha! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[Their former distinctions of Nazarenes and Orthodox are now entirely forgotten The members of LAZARUS' family are grouped in the center as if nothing had ever happened to separate them The CHORUS OF OLD MEN is again joined in its spearhead formation at the stairs Apparent first in this CHORUS, a queer excitement begins to pervade this mob They begin to weave in and out, clasping each other's hands now and then, moving mechanically in jerky steps to the music in a grotesque sort of marionettes' country dance At first this is slow but it momentarily becomes more hectic and peculiar They raise clenched fists or hands distended into threatening talons Their voices sound thick and harsh and animal-like with anger as they mutter and growl, each one aloud to himself or herself]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

20 [Threateningly, gradually rising to hatred]

Hear them laugh!

See them dance!

Shameless! Wanton!

Dirty! Evil!

Infamous! Bestial!

Madness! Blood!

Adultery! Murder!

We burn!

We kill!

30 We crucify!

Death! Death!

Beware, Lazarus!

[This last in a wild frenzy]

CROWD

[Frenziedly]

Beware, Lazarus!
 We burn! We kill!
 We crucify!
 Death! Death!

[They crowd toward the gateway, their arms stretched out as if demanding LAZARUS for a sacrificial victim. Meanwhile they never cease to hop up and down, to mill around, to twist their bodies toward and away from each other in bestial parody of the dance of the FOLLOWERS]

[The tall figure of LAZARUS, dressed in a white robe, suddenly appears on the roof of the house. He stands at the balustrade in the middle of the CHORUS. Beside him, a little behind, MIRIAM appears dressed in black, her face upturned, her lips praying. She appears to have grown older, to be forty now. LAZARUS' body is softly illumined by its inner light. The change in him is marked. He seems ten years younger, at the prime of forty. His body has become less angular and stiff. His movements are graceful and phant. The change is even more noticeable in his face, which has filled out, become purer in outline, more distinctly Grecian. His complexion is the red-brown of rich earth, the gray in his black, curly beard has almost disappeared]

[He makes a sign and the music ceases. His FOLLOWERS remain fixed in their dancing attitudes like figures in a frieze. Each member of the mob remains frozen in a distorted posture. He stares down at the mob pityingly, his face calm]

LAZARUS

[Speaks amid a profound silence. His voice releases his own dancers and the mob from their fixed attitudes. The music begins to play again within the house, very soft and barely audible, swelling up and down like the sound of an organ from a distant church]

You laugh, but your laughter is guilty! It laughs a hyena laughter, spotted, howling its hungry fear of life! That day I returned did I not tell you your fear was no more, that there is no death? You believed then—for a moment! You laughed—discordantly, hoarsely, but with a groping toward joy. What! Have you so soon forgotten, that now your laughter curses life again as of old?

[He pauses—then sadly]

That is your tragedy! You forget! You forget the God in you! You wish to forget! Remembrance would imply the high duty to live as a son of God—generously!—with love!—with pride!—with laughter! This is too glorious a victory for you, too terrible a loneliness! Easier to forget, to become only a man, the son of a woman, to hide from life against her breast, to whimper your fear to her resigned heart and be comforted by her resignation! To live by denying life!

[Then exhortingly]

Why are your eyes always either fixed on the ground in weariness of thought, or watching one another with suspicion? Throw your gaze upward! To Eternal Life! To the fearless and deathless! The everlasting! To the stars!

[He stretches out his arms to the sky—then suddenly points]

See! A new star has appeared! It is the one that shone over Bethlehem!

[His voice becomes a little bitter and mocking]

The Master of Peace and Love has departed this earth. Let all stars be for you henceforth symbols of Saviors—Sons of God who appeared on worlds like ours to tell the saving truth to ears like yours, inexorably deaf!

[Then exaltedly]

But the greatness of Saviors is that they may not save! The greatness of Man is that no god can save him—until he becomes a god!

[He stares up at the stars, rapt in contemplation, oblivious to all around him now][Rapidly approaching from the left a man's voice jarring in high-pitched cruel laughter is heard. They all listen, huddled together like sheep]

MESSENGER

[The THIRD GUEST of Scene One rushes in breathlessly, shouting]

The Nazarene has been crucified!

PRIEST

[With fierce triumph]

Jehovah is avenged! Hosannah!

ORTHODOX

Hosannah! The false prophet is dead! The pretended Messiah is dead!

MARY

[In a frenzy of grief]

Do not believe him! Jesus could not die!

MESSENGER

[SECOND GUEST of Scene One]

Jesus is dead! Our Lord is murdered!

[He sinks on his knees sobbing. All the NAZARENES do likewise, wailing, rending their garments, tearing their hair, some even beating their heads on the ground in the agony of their despair]

MARY

[Insane with rage now]

They have murdered Him!

[To her followers—savagely]

An eye for an eye! Avenge the Master!

[Their frenzy of grief turned into rage, the NAZARENES leap to their feet threateningly. Concealed swords and knives are brought out by both sides]

MIRIAM

[Leaning over the balustrade—in a voice of entreaty]

Mary! Brothers!

[But none heed her or seem to see her. LAZARUS and his FOLLOWERS remain oblivious to men, arms upstretched toward the stars, their heads thrown back]

MARY

[Wildly]

Vengeance! Death to His murderers!

PRIEST

[Fiercely to his followers]

Death to the Nazarenes!

[With cries of rage the two groups rush on one another. There is a confused tumult of yells, groans, curses, the shrieks of women, the sounds of blows as they meet in a pushing, whirling, struggling mass in which individual figures are indistinguishable. Knives and swords flash above the heads of the mass, hands in every tense attitude of striking, clutching, tearing are seen upraised. As the fight is at its height a ROMAN CENTURION and a squad of eight SOLDIERS come tramping up at the double-quick. They all are masked. These Roman masks now and henceforth in the play are carried out according to the same formula of Seven Periods, Seven Types, as those of the Jews seen previously, except that the basis of each face is Roman—heavy, domineering, self-complacent, the face of a confident dominant race. The CENTURION differs from his soldiers only in being more individualized. He is middle-aged, his soldiers belong to the Period of Manhood—All are of the Simple, Ignorant Type]

CENTURION

[Shouts commandingly]

Disperse!

[But no one hears him—with angry disgust to his SOLDIERS]

Charge! Cut them down!

[The SOLDIERS form a wedge and charge with a shout. They soon find it necessary to use their swords, and strike down everyone in their way]

MIRIAM

Mercy, Romans!

[As they pay no attention to her, in desperation she embraces LAZARUS beseechingly, forcing his attention back to earth]

10 Lazarus! Mercy!

LAZARUS

[Looks down upon the struggling mass and cries in a ringing voice]

Hold!

[Each person stands transfixed, frozen in the last movement, even the Roman soldiers and the CENTURION himself.
Ten dead and mortally wounded lie on the ground, trampled by the feet of friend and foe alike. LAZARUS looks at the CROWD To each he seems to look at him or her alone His eyes are accusing and stern As one head, the heads of all are averted Even the CENTURION stares at the ground humbly, in spite of himself. Finally LAZARUS speaks in a voice of infinite disdain]

Sometimes it is hard to laugh—even at men!

[He turns his eyes from them, staring straight before him This seems to release them from their fixed positions
The NAZARENES and the ORTHODOX separate and sink guiltily apart
The CHORUS OF OLD MEN forms again, the apex at the center of the steps as before A low wail of lamentation arises from them The two crowds of Nazarenes and Orthodox echo this]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[In a wailing chant]

Woe unto Israel!
Woe unto thee, Jerusalem!
O divided house,
Thou shalt crumble to dust,
And swine shall root
Where thy Temple stood!
Woe unto us!

CROWD

[In a great echoing cry]

Woe unto us!

CENTURION

[Gruffly to hide his embarrassment at being awed by LAZARUS]

Here, you! Drag your carcasses away!

[From each side men and women come forward to identify and mourn their dead The wail of lamentation rises and falls The CENTURION looks up at LAZARUS—harshly]

You, there! Are you he whom they call the Laugher?

LAZARUS

[Without looking at him—his voice seeming to come from some dream
within him]

I am Lazarus.

CENTURION

Who was brought back from death by enchantment?

LAZARUS

[Looking down at him now—with a smile, simply]

No There is no death!

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

[Chanting joyously]

There is no death!

FOLLOWERS

[Echoing]

There is no death!

AN ORTHODOX MAN

10 [Bending beside the body of LAZARUS'
FATHER]

Here is your father, Lazarus He is dead.

AN ORTHODOX WOMAN

This is your mother, Lazarus. She is dead.

A NAZARENE

Here is your sister, Martha, Lazarus. She is dead

A NAZARENE WOMAN

20 And this is Mary, Lazarus She is dead.

MIRIAM

[Suddenly—with deep grief]

And Jesus who was the Son of Man, who loved you and gave you life again has died, Lazarus—has died!

LAZARUS

[In a great triumphant voice]

Yes! Yes! Yes!!! Men die! Even a Son of Man must die to show men that Man may live! But there is no death!

CENTURION

[At first in a tone of great awe—to his SOLDIERS]

Is he a god?

[Then gruffly, ashamed of his question]

Come down, Jew! I have orders to bring 10 you to Rome to Cæsar!

LAZARUS

[As if he were answering not the CEN-TURION but the command of his fate from the sky]

Yes!

*[He walks down the narrow stairs and,
MIRIAM following him, comes down the path to the road. He goes and kneels for a moment each beside the bodies of his FATHER, MOTHER, and SISTERS and kisses each in turn on the forehead. For a moment the struggle with his grief can be seen in his face. Then he looks up to the stars and, as if answering a question, again says simply and acceptingly]*

Yes!

[Then exultantly]

Yes!!

[And begins to laugh from the depths of his exalted spirit. The laughter of his CHORUS and then of his FOLLOW-ERS echoes his. The music and dancing begin again]

[The CENTURION grins sheepishly. The SOLDIERS chuckle. The CENTURION laughs awkwardly. The SOLDIERS laugh. The music from the house and the laughter of the FOLLOWERS grow louder. The infection spreads to the CHORUS OF OLD MEN whose swaying grief falls into the rhythm of the laughter and music as does that of the mourners]

LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS

[Led by their CHORUS]

Laugh! Laugh!

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[Torn by the conflict—torturedly]

Ha-ha-ha—

Woe to us, woe!

CROWD

[Beside the bodies]

Woe to us, woe!

Ha-ha—!

CENTURION

[Laughingly]

You are brave, you Laughter! Remember Tiberius never laughs! And boast not to Cæsar there is no death, or he will invent a new one for you!

LAZARUS

[With a smile]

But all death is men's invention! So laugh!
[He laughs and the CENTURION and SOLDIERS laugh with him, half dancing clumsily now to the beat of the music]

CHORUS OF LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS

Laugh! Laugh!

Fear is no more!

20 There is no death!

There is only life!

There is only laughter!

FOLLOWERS

[Dancing]

Laugh! Laugh!

Fear is no more!

Death is dead!

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

[Forgetting their grief—their eyes on LAZARUS now, their arms outstretched to him as are those of the crowd]

grouped around the bodies but forgetting them]

Death is no more!
Death is dead!
Laugh!

CROWD

Laugh! Laugh!
Death is no more!

CENTURION

[Laughing, to his laughing SOLDIERS]

Forward!

[They tramp, dancing, off]

[LAZARUS and MIRIAM start to follow]

MIRIAM

[Suddenly pointing to his FOLLOWERS who are dancing and laughing obliviously—pityingly]

But your faithful ones who love you, Lazarus?

LAZARUS

[Simply, with a trace of a sad sternness]

This is their test Their love must remember—or it must forget Come!

[With a last gesture back like a blessing on all he is leaving, he goes The laughter of the SOLDIERS recedes That of the CHORUS OF OLD MEN and of the CROWD falters and breaks into lamenting grief again, guilt-ridden because of its laughter]

CHORUS OF OLD MEN

Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!
Laugh!—But woe!
There lie our dead!
Oh shame and guilt!
We forget our dead!

CROWD

[With fierce remorseful grief]

Woe to us, woe!
There lie our dead!

CHORUS OF LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS

[Their voices and the music growing more and more hesitating and faint]

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only life!
There is only—
Laugh—

[Their dance is faltering and slow now]

Fear is no—Death is—
Laugh—

[The music and dancing and voices cease The lights in the windows, which have been growing dim, go out There is a second of complete, death-like silence The mourning folk in the foreground are frozen figures of grief Then a sudden swelling chorus of forlorn bewilderment, a cry of lost children comes from the CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS and the FOLLOWERS themselves They huddle into groups on the roof and on the terrace They stretch their arms out in every direction supplicatingly]

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

Oh, Lazarus, laugh!
Do not forsake us!
We forget!
Where is thy love fled?
Give back thy laughter,
Thy fearless laughter!
We forget!

FOLLOWERS

Give back thy laughter!
20 We forget!

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

[With dull, resigned terror now]

Death slinks out
Of his grave in the heart!
Ghosts of fear
Creep back in the brain!
We remember fear!
We remember death!

FOLLOWERS

Death in the heart!
30 Fear in the brain!

We remember fear!
We remember death!

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

[Wailing hopelessly now]

Forgotten is laughter!
We remember
Only death!
Fear is God!
Forgotten is laughter!
Life is death!

FOLLOWERS

Forgotten is laughter!
Life is death!

10

ALL

[The CHORUS OF OLD MEN and the CROWD joining in]

Life is a fearing,
A long dying,
From birth to death!
God is a slayer!
Life is death!

CURTAIN

ACT TWO

SCENE ONE

SCENE Some months later A square in Athens about ten o'clock at night In the rear, pure and beautiful in the light of a full moon, is the façade of a temple An excited crowd of Greeks of both sexes is gathered in the square as if for some public festival They are masked according to the scheme of Seven Periods in Seven Types of Character for each sex Here, of course, the foundation of the mask is the Grecian type of face

On the left, the CHORUS OF GREEKS is grouped, seven in number, facing front, in the spearhead formation. As before the CHORUS wears masks double the life size of the CROWD masks They are all of the Proud Self-Reliant type, in the period of Young Manhood.

These seven are clad in goat skins, their tanned bodies and masks daubed and stained with wine lees, in imitation of the old followers of DIONYSUS Rumor has led them to hope and believe that LAZARUS may be the reincarnation of this deity The people in the crowd are holding themselves in restraint with difficulty; they stir and push about restlessly with an eager curiosity and impatience. All eyes are fixed off left A buzz of voices hums in the air

Acting as police, a number of Roman legionaries (masked like the soldiers of Scene Two) armed with staves, keep back the crowd from the line of the street that runs from left to right, front They resent this duty, which has already kept them there a long time, and are surly and quick-tempered with the Greeks

At front, pacing impatiently up and down, is a young Roman noble of twenty-one, clad richly, wearing beautifully wrought armor and helmet This is GAIUS, the heir of Tiberius Caesar, nicknamed CALIGULA by the soldiers in whose encampments he was born and where he spent his childhood His body is bony and angular, almost malformed, with wide, powerful shoulders and long arms and hands, and short, skinny, hairy legs like an ape's He wears a half-mask of crimson, dark with a purplish tinge, that covers the upper part of his face to below the nose This mask accentuates his bulging, prematurely wrinkled forehead, his hollow temples and his bulbous, sensual nose His large troubled eyes, of a glazed greenish-blue, glare out with a shifty feverish suspicion at everyone Below his mask his own skin is of an ænemic transparent pallor Above it, his hair is the curly blond hair of a child of six or seven His mouth also is childish, the red lips soft and feminine in outline Their expression is spoiled, petulant and self-obsessed, weak but domineering In combination with the rest of the face there is an appalling morbid significance to his mouth. One feels that its boyish cruelty, encouraged as a manly attribute in the coarse brutality of camps, has long ago become naively insensitive to any human suffering but its own

Walking with CALIGULA is CNEIUS CRASSUS, a Roman general—a squat, muscular man of sixty, his mask that of a heavy battered face full of coarse humor.

CHORUS OF GREEKS

[Intoning solemnly]

Soon the God comes!
 Redeemer and Savior!
 Dionysus, Son of Man and a God!

GREEK CROWD

[Echoing]

Soon the God comes Redeemer and Savior!
 Dionysus!

FIRST GREEK

They say an unearthly flame burns in this
 Lazarus!

SECOND GREEK

The sacred fire! He must be the Fire-born, the son of Zeus!

THIRD GREEK

Many who have seen him swear he is Dionysus, risen from Hades!

FOURTH GREEK

[Importantly]

I saw Lazarus at Antioch where the galley on which they were taking him to Rome had been thrice blown back by a storm Fear of this warning omen is why they now march with him by land.

FIRST GREEK

Does he truly resemble a god?

FOURTH GREEK

[Impressively]

One look in his eyes while his laughter sings in your ears and you forget sorrow! You dance! You laugh! It is as if a heavy weight you had been carrying all your life without knowing it suddenly were lifted. You are like a cloud, you can fly, your mind reels with laughter, you are drunk with joy!

[Solemnly]

Take my word for it, he is indeed a god.
 Everywhere the people have acclaimed him He heals the sick, he raises the dead, by laughter

SEVENTH GREEK

But I have heard that when he has gone people cannot remember his laughter, that the dead are dead again and the sick die, and the sad grow more sorrowful

FIFTH GREEK

10

Well, we shall soon see with our own eyes
 But why should the God return in the body of a Jew?

SIXTH GREEK

What better disguise if he wishes to remain unknown? The fools of Romans will never suspect him!

20

[Laughing]

Never! They are beginning to claim he is a Roman!

FIFTH GREEK

So much the better! He will be in their confidence!

FOURTH GREEK

He will lead us against Rome! He will laugh our tyrants into the sea! Ha!

30

[He turns toward the Romans and laughs sneeringly This is taken up by the CROWD—unpleasant, resentful laughter They push forward aggressively and almost sweep the soldiers from their feet]

CRASSUS

[Angrily]

Drive them back!

CALIGULA

[Suddenly with a distorted warped
 smile]

Order them to use their swords, Cnetus
 Let the scum look at their dead and learn respect for us!

40

SOLDIERS

[Shoving and whacking]

Back! Step back! Back there!

[The crowd push back to their former line. There are muttered curses, groans, protests, which subside into the former hum of expectancy]

CALIGULA

[With the same smile]

The sword, my old hyena! Corpses are so educational!

CRASSUS

[Surhly]

I would like to, I promise you! When I see how they hate us—!

CALIGULA

[Carelessly]

Let them hate—so long as they fear us! We must keep death dangling

[He makes the gesture of doing so] before their eyes![He gives a soft, cruel laugh]
Will you not sacrifice in my honor? What are a few Greeks?[Queerly]
I like to watch men die.

CRASSUS

I dare not, Caligula. Cæsar has forbidden bloodshed

CALIGULA

Tiberius is a miser. He wants to hoard all of death for his own pleasure!

[He laughs again]

CRASSUS

[With rough familiarity]

I wager no one will make that complaint against you when you are Cæsar!

[He chuckles]

CALIGULA

[With the sudden grandiose posturing ofa bad actor unintentionally burlesquing grandeur]

When I, Gaius Caligula, am Cæsar, I—

[Then superstitiously looking up at the sky with cringing foreboding]

But it brings bad luck to anticipate fate

[He takes off his helmet and spits in it—then with a grim smile]

The heirs of a Cæsar take sick so mysteriously! Even with you who used to ride me on your knee, I do not eat nor drink until you have tasted first

CRASSUS

*[Nodding approvingly]*You are sensible. I suppose I, too, have my price—if they were only clever enough
10 to discover it![He laughs hoarsely]

CALIGULA

[Steps back from him with an uneasy shudder]

You are honest, at least—too honest, Cneius!

[Grimly]

If my father Germanicus had had you for his counselor, he might have escaped their poison

*[Then gloomily]*I must fear everyone. The world is my 20 enemy.

CRASSUS

Kill it then!

[He laughs again]

CHORUS

[Stretching out their arms in the direction from which LAZARUS is expected—supplicatingly]

Son of the Lightning!

Deadly thy vengeance!

Swift thy deliverance!

Beholding thy Mother,

30 Greece, our Mother,

Her beauty in bondage,

Her pride in chains!

Hasten, Redeemer!

CROWD

[As before—echoing the chant]

Hasten, Redeemer!
 Son of the Lightning!
 Deadly thy vengeance!
 Swift thy deliverance!

CALIGULA

[Disdainfully]

What clods! Mob is the same everywhere, eager to worship any new charlatan! They have already convinced themselves this 10 Lazarus is a reincarnation of Dionysus! A Jew become a god! By the breasts of Venus that is a miracle!
[He laughs]

CRASSUS

[Seriously]

But he must be expert in magic He was buried four days and came out unharmed Maybe he is not a Jew Some say his father was really a legionary of our garrison in Judea And he teaches people to laugh at death That smacks of Roman blood! 20

CALIGULA

[Ironically]

Better still! He tells them there is no death at all! Hence the multitude of fools who have acclaimed him everywhere since he left his own country—and why Tiberius has begun to fear his influence

CRASSUS

[Sententiously]

Whom Cæsar fears—disappears!

CALIGULA

Yes, the dupes who follow Lazarus will be killed But Tiberius believes this Lazarus may know a cure for death or for renewing youth, and the old lecher hopes he can worm the secret out of him—before he kills
 him

[He laughs ironically, then disgustedly]

That is why I must escort this Jew to Rome—as a special honor!

[With fierce, haughty resentment]

I, the heir of Cæsar!

[Savagely]

Oh, if I were Cæsar—!

CRASSUS

[With a coarse, meaning smirk]

Patience Tiberius is old.

CALIGULA

[Suddenly becoming terribly uneasy at some thought]

Cneius! What if this Lazarus has really discovered a cure for old age and should reveal it to Tiberius!

[His lips tremble, his eyes are terrified, he shrinks against CRASSUS for protection—with boyish pleading]

Oh, Cneius, what could I do then?

CRASSUS

[Matter-of-factly]

Kill him before Cæsar can talk to him.

CALIGULA

[Almost in tears]

But if he knows a charm against death how could he be slain, old fool?

CRASSUS

[Gruffly]

Bah!

[Then with grim humor]

Death in bed I suspect, but when men are killed I know they stay dead!

[Disgustedly]

30 A moment ago you were laughing at him!

[Scornfully]

Do you fear him now?

CALIGULA

[Rather shamefacedly pulls himself together—then broodingly]

I fear everyone who lives Even you. As you advised me

[He turns away]

CRASSUS

[Contemptuously]

Well, maybe he can teach you to laugh at fear You would welcome him then, eh, cry baby?

CALIGULA

[With sudden passionate intensity but only half aloud as if to himself]

I would love him, Cneius! As a father! As a god!

*[He stands staring before him strangely.
There is a new stir from the crowd who again push forward]*

CRASSUS

[Pointing off right]

Look! I see a great crowd! Your Lazarus must be coming at last!

CHORUS

[Chanting in a deep, rhythmic monotone like the rising and falling cadences of waves on a beach]

He comes, the Redeemer and Savior!
Laughing along the mountains!
To give back our lost laughter
To raise from the dead our freedom
To free us from Rome!

CROWD

[Echoing this chant]

Fire-born! Redeemer! Savior!
Raise from the dead our freedom!
Give back our lost laughter!
Free us from Rome!

[They have been pushing forward, more and more fiercely and defiantly. The ROMAN SOLDIERS in spite of their efforts are pushed backward step by step]

SOLDIERS

[Angrily]

Back! Back!

[The SOLDIERS work with a will, dealing out blows with their staves at everyone in reach. But now these blows seem only to infuriate the CROWD which steadily pushes them back into the street. At the same time the distant sound of exultant music, singing and laughter becomes steadily louder.]

Both SOLDIERS and CROWD are inspired to battle by these strains without their knowing it. CALIGULA is listening spell-bound, his mouth open, his body swaying and twitching. Even CRASSUS stares off at the oncomers, forgetful of the growing plight of his SOLDIERS]

CROWD

[Led by their CHORUS—angrily]

Cowards! Pigs!
Strike! Hit!
Stones! Knives!
Stab! Kill!
Death to the Romans!
Death!

A SOLDIER

[Alarmed, calls to CRASSUS]
General! Let us use our swords!

SOLDIERS

[Enraged—eagerly]
Yes! Swords!

CROWD

Death!

CRASSUS

[Turning—uneasy but afraid to give any drastic order]
Bah! Staves are enough. Crack their skulls!

CROWD

[Led by the CHORUS—defiantly]

Death to Crassus!
Drunkard! Coward!
Death to him!
[They continue to push forward, hooting and jeering]

CRASSUS

[Exploding for a second]
By the gods—!
[To the SOLDIERS]
Draw your swords!
[The troops do so eagerly. The CROWD]

sag back momentarily with exclamations of fear]

CALIGULA

[Listening as in a trance to the music and what is going on behind him—in a queer whisper]

Kill, Cneius! Let me dance! Let me sing!

[The music and crashing of cymbals and the ferment of passions around him cause him to lose all control over himself. He gives a crazy leap in the air and begins to dance grotesquely and chant in a thick voice]

He is coming! Death, the Deliverer! Kill, soldiers! I command you! I, Caligula! I will be Cæsar! Death!

CROWD

[Led by the CHORUS—savage now]

Beast! Cur!

Death to Caligula!

[They crowd forward]

CALIGULA

[Drawing his sword and flourishing it drunkenly—his eyes glazed]

Death!

CRASSUS

[Drawing his own sword in a frenzy]

Strike! Death!

[His SOLDIERS raise their swords. The CROWD have raised whatever weapons they have found—knives, clubs, daggers, stones, bare fists]

CHORUS

[Chanting fiercely]

Death!

ALL

[ROMANS and GREEKS alike as one great voice]

Death!

[The chorused word beats down all sound into a stricken silence. The wild joyous music ceases. The Romans and Greeks seem to lean back from one another and collect strength to leap forward. At this moment the voice of LAZARUS comes ringing through the air like a command from the sky]

LAZARUS

There is no death!

[The SOLDIERS and GREEKS remain frozen in their attitudes of murderous hate. Following his words the laughter of LAZARUS is heard, exultant and gaily mocking, filling them with the sheepish shame of children caught in mischief. Their hands hang, their arms sink to their sides. The music starts once more with a triumphant clash of cymbals, LAZARUS' laughter is echoed from the throats of the multitude of his FOLLOWERS who now come dancing into the square, preceded by a band of masked musicians and by their CHORUS]

[This CHORUS wears, in double size, the laughing mask of LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS in the same Period and Type as in the preceding scene, except that here the mask of each member of the CHORUS has a different racial basis—Egyptian, Syrian, Cappadocian, Lydian, Phrygian, Cilician, Parthian. The FOLLOWERS are costumed and masked as in the preceding scene, seven Types in seven Periods, except that, as in the CHORUS, racially there are many nations represented. All have wreathes of ivy in their hair and flowers in their hands which they scatter about. They whirl in between the SOLDIERS and CROWD, forcing them back from each other, teasing them, sifting into the CROWD, their CHORUS in a half circle, confronting the CHORUS OF GREEKS]

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

Laugh! Laugh!

There is no death!

There is only life!

There is only laughter!

FOLLOWERS

[Echoing]

Laugh! Laugh!

There is no death!

[CALIGULA and CRASSUS are swept to one side, left. Then the cries and laughter of all become mingled into one exclamation.]

ALL

Lazarus! Lazarus!

[The squad of ROMAN SOLDIERS led by the CENTURION, who had taken LAZARUS prisoner, march in with dancers' steps, like a proud guard of honor now, laughing, pulling a chariot in which LAZARUS stands dressed in a tunic of white and gold, his bronzed face and limbs radiant in the halo of his own glowing light]

[LAZARUS now looks less than thirty-five. His countenance now might well be that of the positive masculine Dionysus, closest to the soil of the Grecian Gods, a Son of Man, born of a mortal. Not the coarse, drunken Dionysus, nor the effeminate God, but Dionysus in his middle period, more comprehensive in his symbolism, the soul of the recurring seasons, of living and dying as processes in eternal growth, of the wine of life stirring forever in the sap and blood and loam of things. MIRIAM is beside him, dressed in black, smiling the same sad tender smile, holding LAZARUS' arm as if for protection and in protection. She appears older, a woman over forty-five]

CHORUS OF GREEKS

[Rushing to LAZARUS' car]

Hail, Dionysus!

Iacchus!

Lazarus!

Hail!

[They surround him, throw over his shoulders and head the finely dressed hide of a bull with great gilded horns, force into his right hand the mystic rod of Dionysus with a pine cone on top, then prostrate themselves]

Hail, Savior!

Redeemer!

Conqueror of Death!

ALL

[In a repeated chorus which finally in cludes even the ROMAN SOLDIERS, raising their arms to him]

Hail, Lazarus!

Redeemer!

Hail!

[They are silent. LAZARUS looks at them, seeming to see each and all at the same time, and his laughter, as if in answer to their greetings, is heard rising from his lips like a song]

CRASSUS

[Awed]

Look! He is more than man!

CALIGULA

[Trembling, in a queer agitation]

I dare not look!

CRASSUS

Do you hear his laughter?

CALIGULA

[Chokingly—puts his hands over his ears]

I will not hear!

CRASSUS

10 But you must welcome him in Cæsar's name!

CALIGULA

[His teeth chattering]

I must kill him!

LAZARUS

[Looking directly at him—gaily mocking]

Death is dead, Caligula!

[He begins to laugh again softly]

CALIGULA

[With an hysterical cry of defiant terror]

You lie!

[Sword in hand he whirls to confront LAZARUS, but at the first sight of his face he stops in his tracks, trembling,

held fascinated by LAZARUS' eyes, mumbling with a last pitiful remainder of defiance]

But—you lie—whatever you are! I say there must be death!

*[The sword has fallen to his side He stares open-mouthed at LAZARUS
There is something of a shy, wondering child about his attitude now LAZARUS looks at him, laughing with gentle understanding CALIGULA suddenly drops his sword and covering his face with his hands weeps like a boy who has been hurt]*

You have murdered my only friend, Lazarus! Death would have been my slave when I am Cæsar He would have been my jester and made me laugh at fear!

[He weeps bitterly]

LAZARUS

[Gaily]

Be your own jester instead, O Caligula! 20 Laugh at yourself, O Cæsar-to-be!

[He laughs The CROWD now all join in with him]

[CALIGULA suddenly uncovers his face, grins his warped grin, gives a harsh cackle which cracks through the other laughter with a splitting discord, cuts a hopping caper like some grotesque cripple which takes him to the side of LAZARUS' chariot where he squats on his hams and, stretching out his hand, fingers LAZARUS' robe inquisitively and stares up into his face in the attitude of a chained monkey]

CALIGULA

[With a childish, mischievous curiosity]

Then if there is no death, O Teacher, tell me why I love to kill?

LAZARUS

Because you fear to die!

[Then gaily mocking]

But what do you matter, O Deathly-Important One? Put yourself that question—as a jester!

[Exultantly]

Are you a speck of dust danced in the wind?
Then laugh, dancing! Laugh yes to your insignificance! Thereby will be born your new greatness! As Man, Petty Tyrant of Earth, you are a bubble pricked by death into a void and a mocking silence! But as dust, you are eternal change, and everlasting growth, and a high note of laughter soaring through chaos from the deep heart of God! Be proud, O Dust! Then you may love the stars as equals!

[Then mockingly again]

And then perhaps you may be brave enough to love even your fellow men without fear of their vengeance!

CALIGULA

[Dully]

I cannot understand I hate men I am afraid of their poison and their swords and the cringing envy in their eyes that only yields to fear!

LAZARUS

[Gaily mocking]

Tragic is the plight of the tragedian whose only audience is himself! Life is for each man a solitary cell whose walls are mirrors Terrified is Caligula by the faces he makes!
But I tell you to laugh in the mirror, that seeing your life gay, you may begin to live as a guest, and not as a condemned one!

[Raising his hands for silence—with a playful smile]

Listen! In the dark peace of the grave the man called Lazarus rested He was still weak, as one who recovers from a long illness—for, living, he had believed his life a sad one!

[He laughs softly, and softly they all echo his laughter]

He lay dreaming to the croon of silence, feeling as the flow of blood in his own veins
the past reenter the heart of God to be renewed by faith into the future He thought 'Men call this death'—for he had been dead only a little while and he still remembered Then, of a sudden, a strange gay laughter trembled from his heart as though his life, so long repressed in him by fear, had found at last its voice and a song for singing 'Men call this death,' it sang 'Men call life death and fear it They hide from it in horror Their lives are spent in hiding Their fear becomes their living They worship life as
death!'

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

[In a chanting echo]

Men call life death and fear it
They hide from it in horror
Their lives are spent in hiding
Their fear becomes their living
They worship life as death!

LAZARUS

And here the song of Lazarus' life grew pitiful 'Men must learn to live,' it mourned
'Before their fear invented death they knew, but now they have forgotten They must be taught to laugh again!' And Lazarus answered 'Yes!'

[He now addresses the crowd—especially CALIGULA, directly, laughingly]

Thus sang his life to Lazarus while he lay dead! Man must learn to live by laughter!

[He laughs]

CHORUS OF FOLLOWERS

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only life!
There is only laughter!
Fear is no more!
Death is dead!

CHORUS OF GREEKS

Laugh! Laugh!
Hail, Dionysus!
Fear is no more!
Thou hast conquered death!

ALL

[Laughing—in a great laughing chorus]

Laugh! Laugh!
Fear is no more!
Death is dead!

LAZARUS

[As to a crowd of children—laughingly]

Out with you! Out into the woods! Upon the hills! Cities are prisons wherein man locks himself from life Out with you under the sky! Are the stars too pure for your sick passions? Is the warm earth smelling of right too desirous of love for your pale introspective lusts? Out! Let laughter be your new clean lust and sanity! So far man has only learned to snicker meanly at his neighbor! Let a laughing away of self be your new right to live forever! Cry in your pride, 'I am Laughter, which is Life, which is the Child of God!'

[He laughs and again his voice leads and dominates the rhythmic chorus of theirs The music and dancing begin again]

THE TWO CHORUSES

[Chanting in unison]

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only God!
We are His Laughter!

ALL

[Echoing]

There is only God!
We are His Laughter!
Laugh! Laugh!

[They take hold of his chariot traces, and as he had come, in the midst of a happy multitude, now augmented by all the GREEKS, and the ROMAN SOLDIERS who had awaited him, dancing, playing, singing, laughing, he is escorted off The noise of their passing recedes CALIGULA and CRASSUS are left in the empty square, the former squatting on his hams, monkey-wise, and brooding somberly]

CRASSUS

[Is swaying and staggering, like a man in a drunken stupor, in a bewildered, stubborn struggle to control himself. He stammers after the SOLDIERS]

Ha-ha-ha—Halt! Halt, I say! No use—they are gone—mutiny—Halt!

[He continues to stumble toward left]

Ha-ha—Stop it, curse you! Am I laughing? Where am I going? After Lazarus? Thirty years of discipline and I—Halt, traitor! Remember Cæsar! Remember Rome! Halt, traitor!

[He faints with the violence of his struggle and falls in a lump heap]

CALIGULA

[Startled by his fall, terrified, hops to his feet and snatches up his sword defensively, glancing over his shoulder and whirling around as if he expected someone to stab him in the back Then, forcing a twisted grin of self-contempt—harshly]

Coward! What do I fear—if there is no death?

[As if he had to cut something, he snatches up a handful of flowers—desperately]

You must laugh, Caligula!

[He starts to lop off the flowers from their stems with a savage intentness]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!

[Finally, impatiently, he cuts off all the remaining with one stroke]

Laugh!

[He grinds the petals under his feet and breaks out into a terrible hysterical giggle]

Ha-ha—

CURTAIN

SCENE TWO

SCENE A midnight, months later Immediately inside the walls of Rome In the foreground is the portico of a temple between whose massive columns one looks across a street on a lower level to the high wall of Rome at the extreme rear In the center of the wall is a great metal gate The night is thick and oppressive In the sky overhead lightning flashes and thunder rumbles and crashes but there is no rain Within the portico on rows of chairs placed on a series of wide steps which are on each side, members of the Senate are seated in their white robes High hanging lamps cast a wan light over their faces They are all masked in the Roman mask, refined in them by nobility of blood but at the same time with strength degenerated, corrupted by tyranny and debauchery to an exhausted cynicism The three periods of Middle Age, Maturity and Old Age are represented in the types of the Self-Tortured, Introspective, Proud, Self-Reliant, the Servile, Hypocritical, the Cruel, Revengeful, and the Resigned, Sorrowful The SENATORS are divided into two groups on each side, thirty in each Seated in the middle of the lower of the three high broad stairs that lead to the level from which the columns rise is the CHORUS OF SENATORS, seven in number, facing front, in double-sized masks of the Servile, Hypocritical type of Old Age

LAZARUS, in his robe of white and gold, the aura of light surrounding his body seeming to glow more brightly than ever, stands in the rear at the edge of the portico, center, gazing upward into the pall of sky beyond the wall His figure appears in its immobility to be the statue of the god of the temple Near him, but to the rear and to the left of him, facing right, MIRIAM is kneeling in her black robes, swaying backward and forward, praying silently with moving lips like a nun who asks mercy for the sins of the world She has grown much older, her hair is gray, her shoulders are bowed

On the other side, placed similarly in relation to LAZARUS and facing MIRIAM, CALIGULA is squatting on his hams on a sort of throne-chair of ivory and gold He is dressed with foppish richness in extreme bright colors, a victory wreath around his head He stares blinkingly and inquisitively at LAZARUS, then at MIRIAM He is half-drunk A large figured goblet of gold is in his hand A slave with an amphora of wine crouches on the steps by his chair The slave wears a black negroid mask At the opening of the scene there is heard the steady tramp of departing troops, whose masks, helmets and armored shoulders can be seen as they pass through the street before LAZARUS to the gate beyond Finally with a metallic clash the gate is shut behind them and there is a heavy and oppressive silence in which only the murmured prayers of MIRIAM are heard.

CHORUS OF THE SENATE

[Intones wearily, as if under a boring compulsion]

The Roman Senate
Is the Roman Senate
The Mighty Voice
Of the Roman People
As long as Rome is Rome.

CALIGULA

[As if he hadn't heard—sings hoarsely]

an old camp song of the Punic Wars, pounding with his goblet]

A bold legionary am I!
March, oh march on!
A Roman eagle was my daddy,
My mother was a drunken drabby
Oh, march on to the wars!

Since lived that Lady Leda
March, oh march on!
Women have loved high-fliers
And we are eagles of Rome!
Oh march on to the wars!

Comrades, march to the wars!
There's pretty girls in Carthage
And wine to swill in Carthage,
So we must capture Carthage
And fight for Mother Rome!

[Holds out his goblet to be refilled. There is silence again. He stares at LAZARUS with a somber intentness. He says thickly]

The legions have gone, Lazarus [LAZARUS gives no evidence of having heard him. CALIGULA gulps at his wine. The SENATORS begin to talk to each other in low voices]

FIRST SENATOR

How does that Jew make that light come from him, I wonder? It is a well-contrived bit of magic

SECOND SENATOR

What are we waiting for? A messenger came to me with Cæsar's command that the Senate meet here at midnight

THIRD SENATOR

[Bored]

Some new whim of Tiberius, naturally—[With a meaning titter]
—or rather I should say, unnaturally!

FOURTH SENATOR

Perhaps Cæsar has decided to abolish our august body by a massacre in mass!

THIRD SENATOR

[Yawning]

There was a feast at Cinna's last night that lasted until this evening. I could welcome my own murder as an excuse for sleeping!

FIFTH SENATOR

[Pompously]

Tiberius would not dare harm the Senate.
He may mistreat individual Senators, but the Roman Senate is the Roman Senate!

10

CHORUS OF THE SENATE

[As before—wearily as if under a boring compulsion—intones]

While Rome is Rome
The Senate is the Senate
The Mighty Voice of the Roman People

FIRST SENATOR

[With the ghost of a laugh—wearily]

20

The Senate is an empty name—a pack of degenerate cowards with no trace of their ancient nobility or courage remaining—that and no more!

THIRD SENATOR

[Flippantly]

You are too severe with yourself, Lucius!
[A titter of laughter]

FIRST SENATOR

[Wearily]

A degenerate coward I am, I confess it.
So are you too, Sulpicius—a hundred fold!
—whether you admit it or not 30

[SULPICIUS laughs weakly without taking offense]

SIXTH SENATOR

[After a pause—sighing]

In truth, the Senate is not what it used to be. I can remember—

FIRST SENATOR

Let us forget, if we can!

[Then impatiently]

What are we doing here?

SECOND SENATOR

I imagine it has something to do with the followers of this Lazarus encamped outside the wall Probably the legions are to butcher them in their sleep.

SEVENTH SENATOR

And what part do we play—official witnesses? But how can we witness at night and through a wall?

[With bored resignation]

Ah well, the moods of Tiberius are strange, 10 to say the least But Cæsar is Cæsar.

CHORUS

[Again with bored weariness as before]

Hail!
Cæsar is Cæsar
The August One
Prince of the Senate
Tribune over Tribunes Consul of Consuls
Supreme Pontiff
Emperor of Rome
God among Gods
Hail!

FIRST SENATOR

[After a pause of silence—dryly]

Cæsar is a beast—and a madman!

FIFTH SENATOR

[Pompously]

Respect, sir! More respect for Cæsar!

THIRD SENATOR

[Mockingly]

Or caution, Lucius One of us might repeat your opinion to him

FIRST SENATOR

You would if it would pay you But all my money is squandered My death is worthless to Tiberius He would not reward you Moreover, you would not be revenged on me, for I long for death

THIRD SENATOR

[Dryly]

Your stomach must be out of order

FIRST SENATOR

The times are out of order But let us change the subject Is it true Tiberius has fled to Capri?

FOURTH SENATOR

Yes He was terrified by the multitude of laughing idiots who appeared today with that charlatan

[He points to LAZARUS]

SECOND SENATOR

There are thousands of them outside the wall Cæsar refused to let them enter the city The story is, this Lazarus was dead four days and then restored himself to life by magic

FIRST SENATOR

20 I have a mind to question him

[Calls as to a slave]

You, there! Jew, turn round! In the name of the Senate!

[LAZARUS seems not to hear him.

LUCIUS remarks with a weary smile]

So much for our authority!

SIXTH SENATOR

[With injured dignity]

What insolence!

[In a rage]

Ho, barbarian cur, turn round! The Senate commands you!

[LAZARUS does not seem to hear, but

CALIGULA turns on them fiercely]

CALIGULA

Silence! Leave him alone!

[With insulting scorn]

I, Caligula, command you!

[The SENATORS seem to shrink back from him in fear, all but LUCIUS, who answers with a mocking servility]

FIRST SENATOR

At least, grant us the boon to see this corpse's face, O Gracious Gaius!

CALIGULA

[Fixing his cruel, burning eyes on him—softly]

I heard you wish for death, Lucius When I am Cæsar you shall scream and pray for it!

FIRST SENATOR

[Dryly and haughtily]

You were bred in camp, Gaius You should have learned more courage there along with your coarseness But accept my gratitude for your warning I shall take care to die before you become Cæsar—and life becomes too idiotic!

CALIGULA

[His grin becoming ferocious with cruelty]

No You are too weak to kill yourself Look at me, Lucius! I am imagining what I shall have done to you!

[The SENATORS are now trembling Even LUCIUS cannot repress a shudder of horror at the face glaring at him Suddenly CALIGULA throws the cup from him and springs to his feet]

What good is wine if it cannot kill thought? Lazarus! It is time I must give the signal! The legions are waiting It is Cæsar's command that they spare none of your followers

[He has walked toward LAZARUS]

MIRIAM

[Stretches out her hands to CALIGULA imploringly]

Mercy! Spare them who are so full of life and joy!

CALIGULA

[Harshly]

For their joy I will revenge myself upon them! Mercy? If there is no death, then death is a mercy! Ask that man!

[He points accusingly to LAZARUS]
And why should you plead for them, Jewess? There are few Jews among them They are mostly those whom your people call idolaters and would gladly see murdered

MIRIAM

[With deep grief]

I am a mother of dead children. I plead for the mothers of those about to die.

CALIGULA

[Contemptuously]

Pah!

[He turns from her and puts his hand on LAZARUS' shoulder]

Lazarus! Do you hear? I must signal to the legions!

LAZARUS

[Turns He has grown more youthful. He seems no more than thirty His face is exalted and calm and beautiful His eyes shine with an unearthly glory The SENATORS lean forward in their seats, fascinated by his face A low murmur of admiration comes from them LAZARUS speaks commandingly]

Wait! I will awaken my beloved ones that their passing may be a symbol to the world that there is no death!

[He turns, throwing back his head and stretching up his arms, and begins to laugh low and tenderly, like caressing music at first but gradually gaining in volume, becoming more and more intense and insistent, finally ending up on a triumphant, blood-stirring call to that ultimate attainment in which all prepossession with self is lost in an ecstatic affirmation of Life The voices of his FOLLOWERS from beyond the wall, at first one by one, then several at a time, then multitudes, join in his laughter Even the SENATORS are drawn into it Now every one of these is standing up, stretching out his arms toward LAZARUS, laughing harshly and discordantly and awkwardly in his attempt to laugh Terrific flashes of lightning and crashes of thunder seem a responsive accompaniment from the heavens to this laughter of thousands which throbs in beating waves of sound in the air Mingled with the laughing from beyond the wall comes the sound of singing and the music of flutes and cymbals MIRIAM has crawled on her knees to the edge of the portico where her black figure of grief is outlined below and to the left of LAZARUS, her arms raised outward like the arms of a cross]

FOLLOWERS OF LAZARUS

[In a great chanting singing chorus]

Laugh! Laugh!
There is only God!
Life is His Laughter!
We are His Laughter!
Fear is no more!
Death is dead!

CHORUS OF SENATORS

[Taking it up in a tone between chanting and their old solemn intoning]

Laugh! Laugh!
Fear is no more!
Death is dead!

ALL

[The multitude beyond the wall, all the SENATORS, everyone except the never-laughing MIRIAM and CALIGULA and the MEN OF THE LEGIONS]

Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!

CALIGULA

[In a queer state of mingled exaltation and fear—hopping restlessly about from foot to foot—shouting]

The signal! Shall I give the signal to kill, Lazarus?

MEN OF THE LEGIONS

[Following a brazen trumpet call, are suddenly heard from beyond the wall beginning to laugh their hoarse, bass laughter, a deeper note than all the others]

Laugh! Laugh!

CALIGULA

[Listening—with dismay]

I hear the legions, Lazarus! They are laughing with them!

[He cries with a strange pitifulness and beseeching]

You are playing me false, Lazarus! You are trying to evade death! You are trying to spare your people! You are small and weak like other men when the test comes! You give way to pity! Your great laughter becomes pitiful!

[Working himself into a rage]

10 You are a traitor, Lazarus! You betray Cæsar! Have you forgotten I will be Cæsar? You betray me, Lazarus!

[He rushes to the edge and, making a megaphone of his hands, bellows]

You on the wall! Sentry! It is I, Caligula! Kill!

[The brazen trumpets of the LEGIONS sound from beyond the wall He springs near LAZARUS again, in a fiendish ecstasy, dancing a hopping grotesque sword dance behind him, chanting as he does so]

Kill! Kill laughter! Kill those who deny 20 Cæsar! I will be Cæsar! Kill those who deny Death! I will be Death! My face will be bright with blood! My laughing face, Lazarus! Laughing because men fear me! My face of victorious Fear! Look at me! I am laughing, Lazarus! My laughter! Laughter of Gods and Cæsars! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[He laughs, his laughter fanatically cruel and savage, forced from his lips with a desperate, destroying abandon For a moment, above all the chorus of other sounds, his voice fights to overcome that of LAZARUS, whose laughter seems now to have attained the most exultant heights of spiritual affirmation Then CALIGULA's breaks into a cry of fear and a sob, and, casting his sword aside, he hides his face in his hands and cries beseechingly]

30 Forgive me! I love you, Lazarus! Forgive me!

[At this second the blaring trumpets of the LEGIONS are heard approaching and their great bass chorus of marching tramping laughter]

MEN OF THE LEGIONS

[Chanting]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
 Fear, no more!
 Death, no more!
 Death is dead!

[There is now no sound of the singing or the laughter or music of LAZARUS' FOLLOWERS MIRIAM rocks to and fro and raises a low wail of lamentation. The SENATORS cheer and shout as at a triumph]

CHORUS OF SENATORS

[Saluting LAZARUS]

Hail, Victor!
 Hail, Divine One!
 Thou hast slain fear!
 Thou hast slain death!
 Hail! Triumph!

SENATORS

Hail! Hail!
 Slayer of Fear!
 Slayer of Death!

[The gate in the wall is clanged open. The returning LEGIONS burst through and gather in a dense mob in the street below LAZARUS, who looks down upon them, silent but smiling gently now. They stare at him with admiration. Only a sea of their masks can be seen, their eyes shining exultantly. CRASSUS, their general, ascends the steps until he stands a little below LAZARUS. Their CHORUS OF LEGIONARIES in double-sized masks climb to the step below CRASSUS, forming behind him. They are in the Period of Manhood, of the Simple, Ignorant Type. No weapons can be seen—only their masks and helmets and armor gleaming in the lightning flashes and in the flickering light of torches. Their laughter seems to shake the walls and make the pillars of the temple dance]

CHORUS OF THE LEGIONS

Fear, no more!
 Death, no more!
 Death is dead!

LEGIONARIES

[Echoing]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
 Death is dead!

CRASSUS

[Raising his hand]

Silence!

[They obey. He turns to LAZARUS and bows his head, falling on one knee, raising his right arm]

Hail!

LEGIONARIES

[As one man—raising their arms]

Hail!

CALIGULA

[Suddenly pushes forward impudently and strikes a grandiose attitude]

I am here, my brave ones!

[There is a roar of mocking laughter from the LEGIONARIES]

CRASSUS

[Not unkindly]

Not you, Little Killer! We hail the Great Laughter!

CALIGULA

[Harshly]

Have you killed all his followers?

CRASSUS

No. They died. They did not wait for our attack. They charged upon us, laughing! They tore our swords away from us, laughing, and we laughed with them! They stabbed themselves, dancing as though it were a festival! They died, laughing, in one another's arms! We laughed, too, with joy because it seemed it was not they who died but death itself they killed!

[He stops uncertainly, bowing to LAZARUS, awkwardly]

I do not understand this. I am a soldier. But there is a god in it somewhere! For I know they were drunk, and so were we, with a happiness no mortal ever felt on earth before! And death was dead!

[In a sudden outburst as if he were drunk with excitement, he takes off his helmet and waves it]

Hail, Deliverer! Death is dead! We left our swords with them! What virtue in killing when there is no death? Your foe laughs. The joke is on you. What a fool's game, eh? One can only laugh! Now we want peace to laugh in—to laugh at war! Let Cæsars fight—that is all they are good for—and not much good for that! 10

CALIGULA

[Frenziedly]

Silence, impious traitor!

CRASSUS

[Smiling drunkenly]

Shut up, yourself, camp-brat! Though you were Cæsar this minute I would laugh at you! Your death is dead! We will make Lazarus Cæsar! What say you?

[He appeals to the SOLDIERS]

CALIGULA

No!

CHORUS OF THE LEGIONS

[With laughing intoxication]

Hail, Lazarus Cæsar! Hail!

LEGIONARIES

Lazarus Cæsar, hail!

CRASSUS

[Appealing to SENATE]

And you, Senators!

CHORUS OF SENATORS

[With the same joyous intoxication as the SOLDIERS] 30

Hail, Lazarus Cæsar! Hail!

SENATORS

Lazarus Cæsar, hail!

CALIGULA

[Piteously]

No, Lazarus! Say no for my sake!

LAZARUS

[With gay mockery]

What is—Cæsar?

[He begins to laugh with mockery. All except CALIGULA and MIRIAM join in this laughter]

CRASSUS

Ha-ha! What is Cæsar? You are right! You deserve better from us. A god? How is that? We will build you a temple, Lazarus, and make you a god!

LAZARUS

[Laughingly]

When men make gods, there is no God!

[He laughs. They all laugh]

CRASSUS

[With puzzled good-nature] 20

I do not understand. But there is a god in it somewhere—a god of peace—a god of happiness! Perhaps you are already he, eh? Are you? Well, never mind now, remember our offer. Give us your answer tomorrow. Good night to you!

LAZARUS

[As the SOLDIERS start to march away behind CRASSUS, and the SENATORS turn to retire, he stops them all for a moment with a gesture—with a deep earnestness]

Wait! When you awake tomorrow, try to remember! Remember that death is dead! Remember to laugh!

ALL

[As if taking an oath with one voice]

We will remember. Lazarus!

CRASSUS

[Making a sign to the regimental musicians jovially]

And we will laugh! Play there!

[The bands crash out. The LEGIONS tramp away]

CHORUS OF THE LEGIONS

[Chanting to the music]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!

Cæsar, no more!

War, no more!

Wounds, no more!

Death is dead!

Dead! Dead! Dead!

LEGIONARIES

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!

Death is dead!

Dead! Dead! Dead!

CHORUS OF SENATORS

[Following them]

Cæsar, no more!

Fear, no more!

Death, no more!

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!

SENATE

[Elated, excited as a crowd of school-boys going on a vacation Marching after them]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!

Death is dead!

[LAZARUS, MIRIAM and CALIGULA remain]

LAZARUS

[With a great yearning]

If men would remember! If they could!

[He stares after them compassionately]

CALIGULA

[Crouching beside LAZARUS. Plucks at his robe humbly]

You will not laugh at Cæsar, Lazarus, will you—when I am Cæsar? You will not laugh at gods when they make me a god?

[LAZARUS does not answer. CALIGULA forces a cruel vindictive smile]

I swear you shall not laugh at death when I am Death! Ha-ha—

[He starts to laugh harshly—then suddenly, terrified, slinks away and sidles off at right]

MIRIAM

[From where she kneels bowed with grief—brokenly]

Those who have just died were like your children, Lazarus. They believed in you and loved you

LAZARUS

10 And I loved them!

MIRIAM

Then how could you laugh when they were dying?

LAZARUS

[Exultingly]

Did they not laugh? That was their victory and glory!

[With more and more of a passionate, proud exultation]

Eye to eye with the Fear of Death, did they not laugh with scorn? 'Death to old Death,' they laughed! 'Once as squirming specks we crept from the tides of the sea Now we return to the sea! Once as quivering flecks of rhythm we beat down from the sun Now we reenter the sun! Cast aside is our pitiable pretense, our immortal egohood, the holy lantern behind which cringed our Fear of the Dark! Flung off is that impudent insult to life's nobility which gibbers "I, this Jew, this Roman, this noble or this slave, must survive in my pettiness forever!" Away with such cowardice of spirit! We will to die! We will to change! Laughing we lived with our gift, now with laughter give we back that gift to become again the Essence of the Giver! Dying we laugh with the Infinite. We are the Giver and the Gift! Laughing, we will our own annihilation! Laughing, we give our lives for Life's sake!"

[He laughs up to heaven ecstatically]

This must Man will as his end and his new beginning! He must conceive and desire his own passing as a mood of eternal laughter and cry with pride, 'Take back, O God, and accept in turn a gift from me, my grateful blessing for Your gift—and see, O God, now I am laughing with You! I am Your laughter—and You are mine!'

[He laughs again, his laughter dying lingeringly and tenderly on his lips like a strain of music receding into the silence over still waters]

MIRIAM

[With a sigh—meekly]

I cannot understand, Lazarus

[Sadly]

They were like your children—and they have died Must you not mourn for them? 10

LAZARUS

[Gently]

Mourn? When they laughed?

MIRIAM

[Sadly]

They are gone from us And their mothers weep

LAZARUS

[Puts his arm around her and raises her to her feet—tenderly]

But God, their Father, laughs!

[He kisses her on the forehead]

CURTAIN

ACT THREE

SCENE ONE

SCENE Some days later—exterior of TIBERIUS' villa-palace at Capri It is about two in the morning of a clear black night In the rear, the walls of the villa, which is built entirely of marble on the brow of a cliff, loom up with a startling clarity against the sky The rear foreground is a marble terrace at the middle of which is a triumphal arch On each side, leading up to it, are massive marble columns standing like the mummes of legionaries at attention. In the exact centre of the arch itself a cross is set up on which a full grown male lion has been crucified. A lamp reflecting downward has been fixed at the top of the cross to light up an inscription placed over the lion's head Below the steps to the terrace, in a line facing front, on each side of the cross, is the CHORUS OF THE GUARD in their double masks and gorgeous uniforms and armor. Their masks are the same as the LEGIONARY CHORUS of the previous scene

The windows of the palace glow crimson-purple with the reflection of many shaded lamps The sound of music in a strained theme of that joyless abandon which is vice is heard above a confused drunken clamor of voices, punctuated by the high, staccato laughter of women and youths A squad of the GUARD in the same uniforms as the CHORUS, masked as all the ROMAN SOLDIERS previously, enter from the left, front, climbing up from the beach below They are commanded by a Centurion, FLAVIUS His mask is that of a typical young patrician officer They are followed by LAZARUS and MIRIAM CALIGULA walks behind, his drawn sword in his hand He is in a state of queer conflicting emotion, seeming to be filled with a nervous dread and terror of everything about him, while at the same time perversely excited and elated by his own morbid tension LAZARUS, looking no more than twenty-five, haloed in his own mystic light, walks in a deep, detached serenity MIRIAM, in black, her hair almost white now, her figure bowed and feeble, seems more than ever a figure of a sad, resigned mother of the dead The soldiers form in line with the columns

FLAVIUS

[Saluting CALIGULA—with an awed glance at LAZARUS]

I will announce your coming—

[As if in spite of himself he bows awkwardly to LAZARUS]

—and that of this man Cæsar was not expecting you so soon, I think

CALIGULA

[Forcing a light tone]

Lazarus laughed and the galley slaves forgot their fetters and made their oars fly as if they were bound for the Blessed Isles of Liberty!

[Then with an ironic smile]

But you need not tell Tiberius that, good Flavius Say it was due to my extreme zeal

FLAVIUS

[Smiles with respectful understanding.

CALIGULA nods in dismissal FLAVIUS turns to go—apologetically]

You may have to wait I dare not speak before he questions me

[FLAVIUS salutes and hastens to the villa, walking under an arm of the cross unconcernedly without an upward glance As they follow him with their eyes CALIGULA and MIRIAM see the lion for the first time He steps back with a startled exclamation She gives a cry of horror and covers her eyes with her hands to shut out the sight]

LAZARUS

[Immediately puts his arms around her protectingly]

What is it, Beloved?

[She hides her face on his breast, pointing toward the lion with a trembling hand]

CALIGULA

[Pointing—curiously now, but with entire callousness]

This lion they have crucified Are you frightened, Jewess?

[With a cruel laugh]

My grandfather frequently plants whole orchards of such trees, but usually they bear human fruit!

MIRIAM

[With a shudder]

Monster!

CALIGULA

[With genuine surprise—turning to her]

Who? Why?

[He approaches the cross and stares at it moodily]

But why did he have it placed here where he knew you must pass? Tiberius does not go to such pains to frighten women

[His eyes fasten on the inscription above the lion's head]

Aha! I see!

[He reads]

'From the East, land of false gods and superstition, this lion was brought to Rome to amuse Cæsar'

[A silence CALIGULA shrugs his shoulders, turning away—lightly]

A lesson for you, Lazarus An example for other lions—not to roar—or laugh—at Cæsar!

[He gives a harsh laugh]

Tiberius must be terribly afraid of you

[Then sombrely]

You should never have come here I would have advised you not to—but what are you to me? My duty, if I wish to become Cæsar, is to Cæsar Besides, you are no fool Evidently you must desire your own death Last night you might have been Cæsar The legions were yours

LAZARUS

[Smiling without bitterness—with a sad comprehension]

But this morning the legions had forgotten They only remembered—to go out and pick up their swords They also pillaged the bodies a little, as their right, believing now that they had slain them!

[This last a bit bitterly]

CALIGULA

[Tauntingly]

The legions did slay them! It was only by some magician's trick you made them think your followers killed themselves

LAZARUS

[Not answering him—ironically to himself]

It is too soon Men still need their swords to slash at ghosts in the dark Men, those haunted heroes!

[He laughs softly]

CALIGULA

[Irritably]

What are you laughing at?

LAZARUS

At Lazarus when I find him feeling wronged because men are men!

[He laughs again, softly and musically]

CALIGULA

[Again taunting brutally]

You may be in his place soon!

[He points to the lion]

Will you laugh then?

[MIRIAM gives a cry of terror]

LAZARUS

[Calmly]

Yes

[Then humbly, bowing his head]

I will laugh with the pride of a beggar set upon the throne of Man!

CALIGULA

[Sneeringly]

You boast

[Then as LAZARUS does not answer, touching the lion with intentional provoking brutality]

This one from Africa seems almost gone.
They do not last as long as men

LAZARUS

[Walks up the steps to the cross and, 20 stretching to his full height, gently pushes the lion's hair out of its eyes—tenderly]

Poor brother! Cæsar avenges himself on you because of me Forgive me your suffering!

CALIGULA

[With a start backward—with frightened awe]

Gods! He licks your hand! I could swear he smiles—with his last breath!

[Then with relief]

Now he is dead!

LAZARUS

[Gently]

There is no death

CALIGULA

[Pointing to the lion]

What is that then?

LAZARUS

Your fear of life

CALIGULA

[Impatiently]

Bah!

[Then sombrely]

A little fear is useful even for lions—or teachers of laughter if they wish to laugh
10 long!

[Then with a sudden exasperation]

Escape now, you fool, while there is still time!

LAZARUS

[Laughing softly]

Escape—what?

CALIGULA

[In a frenzy]

You know, you ass, you lunatic! Escape death! Death! Death!

[To MIRIAM]

You, woman! Talk to him! Do you want him nailed up like that?

MIRIAM

[With a pitiful cry]

Lazarus! Come! Caligula will help us!

CALIGULA

[Harshly]

You presume, Jewess! I have no wish to die!

[Then with his wry smile]

But I will turn my back—and shut my
eyes—

[He walks away to left]

MIRIAM

[Beseechingly]

Lazarus! I could not bear that aching hunger of my empty heart if you should die again!

LAZARUS

[Coming to her—tenderly]

I will not leave you! Believe in me!
[He kisses her forehead tenderly]

MIRIAM

[After a pause—slowly and lamentingly]

I wish we were home, Lazarus This Roman world is full of evil These skies threaten These hearts are heavy with hatred There is a taint of blood in the air that poisons the breath of the sea These columns and arches and thick walls seem waiting to fall, to crush these rotten men and then to crumble over the bones that raised them until both are dust It is a world deadly to your joy, Lazarus Its pleasure is a gorging of dirt, its fulfilled desire a snoring in a sty in the mud among swine Its will is so sick that it must kill in order to be aware of life at all I wish we were home, Lazarus I begin to feel horror gnawing at my breast I begin to know the torture of the fear of death, Lazarus—not of my death but of yours—not of the passing of your man's body but of the going away from me of your laughter which is to me as my son, my little boy!

LAZARUS

[Soothing her]

Be comforted, Beloved Your fear shall never be!

MIRIAM

On the hills near Bethany you might pray at noon and laugh your boy's laughter in the sun and there would be echoing laughter from the sky and up from the grass and distantly from the shining sea We would adopt children whose parents the Romans had butchered, and their laughter would be around me in my home where I cooked and weaved and sang And in the dawn at your going out, and in the evening on your return, I would hear in the hushed air the bleating of sheep and the tinkling of many little bells and your voice. And my heart would know peace.

LAZARUS

[Tenderly]

Only a little longer! There is God's laughter on the hills of space, and the happiness of children, and the soft healing of innumerable dawns and evenings, and the blessing of peace!

CALIGULA

[Looks around at LAZARUS impatiently Then he makes a beckoning gesture to MIRIAM]

Ssst!

[Wonderingly she leaves LAZARUS' side and follows him LAZARUS remains, his eyes fixed on the cross, directly in front of it CALIGULA speaks gruffly to MIRIAM with a sneer]

Jewess, your Lazarus is mad, I begin to think

[Then confusedly but helplessly inquisitive and confiding—bursting out]

What is it troubles me about him? What makes me dream of him? Why should I—love him, Jewess? Tell me! You love him, too I do not understand this Why, wherever he goes, is there joy? You heard even the galley slaves laugh and clank time with their chains!

[Then with exasperation]

And yet why can I not laugh, Jewess?

MIRIAM

[In a tone of hushed grief]

I may not laugh either My heart remains a little dead with Lazarus in Bethany The miracle could not revive all his old husband's life in my wife's heart.

CALIGULA

[Disgustedly]

What answer is that to me?

[Then brusquely]

But I called you to put you on your guard.
[He points]

There is death in there—Tiberius' death, a kind from which no miracles can recall
one!

[He smiles his twisted smile]

Since Lazarus will not help himself, you must protect him I will not, for once in there I am

[Mockingly]

the heir of Cæsar, and you are scum whom I will kill at his order as I would two beetles! So keep watch! Taste first of what he eats—even were I the one to give it to him! 10

LAZARUS

[Suddenly laughs softly]

Why do you delight in believing evil of yourself, Caligula?

CALIGULA

[Flying into a queer rage]

You lie! I am what I am!

[With grandiose pride]

What could you know of a Cæsar?

LAZARUS

[Still laughing with an affectionate understanding]

What—I know!

[As he finishes speaking all the sound of music and voices from the house ceases abruptly and there is a heavy silence]

MIRIAM

*[Shaking her head and turning away
sadly]*

That is too far, Lazarus Let us go home

CALIGULA

[Harshly]

Sst! Do you hear? Flavius has told Cæsar [Grumly forcing a harsh snicker]

Now we will soon know—

[There is the sudden blaring of a trumpet from within the palace A wide door is flung open and a stream of reddish light comes out against which the black figures of several men are outlined The door is shut again quickly Several SLAVES bearing lamps on poles escort the patrician,

MARCELLUS, forward to the arch He passes under the crucified lion without a glance—then stands, cool and disdainful, to look about him He is a man of about thirty-five, wearing the type mask of a Roman patrician to which are added the dissipated courtier's characteristics of one who leans to evil more through weakness than any instinctive urge. He is dressed richly His smile is hypocritical and his eyes are hard and cold but when they come to rest on LAZARUS he gives a start of genuine astonishment]

CALIGULA

[Who has moved to LAZARUS' side defensively—in a quick whisper]

Beware of this man, Lazarus!

[Then advancing—with a condescending hauteur]

Greeting, Marcellus!

MARCELLUS

[In an ingratiating tone]

Greeting, Gaius I have a message from Cæsar for the man called Lazarus

LAZARUS

[Calmly]

I am Lazarus

MARCELLUS

[Makes a deep bow—flatteringly]

20 I had surmised it, sir Although I cannot pretend to virtue in myself at least I may claim the merit of recognizing it in others [He advances toward LAZARUS, smiling, with one hand kept hidden beneath his cloak]

CALIGULA

[Stepping between them—sharply]

What is your message?

MARCELLUS

[Surprised—placatingly]

I am sorry, Gaius, but it was Cæsar's command I speak to Lazarus alone

CALIGULA

[Fiercely]

And then, Marcellus?

[MARCELLUS shrugs his shoulders and smiles deprecatingly]

LAZARUS

[With a compelling dignity]

Let him speak

[Inclining his head to MARCELLUS—strangely]

Over here where it is dark you will not be seen—nor see yourself

[He walks to the darkness at right]

CALIGULA

[Turning his back on them, with angry boyish resentfulness that is close to tears]

Idiot! Go and die, then!

MIRIAM

[With a terrified cry]

Lazarus!

[She starts to go to him]

10

LAZARUS

[Motioning her to remain where she is—gently]

Believe, Beloved!

[He turns his back on them all and stands waiting]

MARCELLUS

[Stares at LAZARUS—then over his shoulder at CALIGULA—uncertainly]

What does he mean, Gaius?

[Then suddenly putting on a brave front, he strides up behind LAZARUS]

Cæsar wished me to bid you welcome, to tell you how much regard he has for you, but he desired me to ask whether you propose to laugh here—in Cæsar's palace? He has heard that you laugh at death—that you have caused others to laugh—even his legionsaries

20

[A pause, MARCELLUS remains behind LAZARUS' back, the latter standing like a victim]

Briefly, Cæsar requires your pledge that you will not laugh. Will you give it?

[He frees his dagger from under his robe A pause Arrogantly]

I am waiting! Answer when Cæsar commands!

[Then angrily, baffled]

I will give you while I count three—or take your silence as a refusal! One! Two! Three!

[He raises his hand to stab LAZARUS in the back MIRIAM stifles a scream. At the same instant, LAZARUS begins to laugh, softly and affectionately. MARCELLUS stops, frozen in mid-action, the dagger upraised CALIGULA has whirled around and stands staring, a smile gradually coming to his face LAZARUS turns, his laughter grown a trifle louder, and faces MARCELLUS The latter steps back from him, staring open-mouthed, fascinated His arm sinks to his side. The dagger falls from his fingers. He smiles back at LAZARUS—the curious, sheepish, bashful smile of one who has fallen in love and been discovered]

LAZARUS

[Going to him, puts both hands on his shoulders and looks in his eyes, laughing affectionately—then quizzically]

Here is another one who believes in death! But soon you will laugh with life! I see it in your eyes Farewell, Marcellus!

[He turns away from him and walks, laughing, toward the arch in rear With bowed head the black-robed figure of MIRIAM follows him MARCELLUS hides his face in his hands, half-sobbing, and half-laughing hysterically LAZARUS pauses before the cross for a moment—raises his hand as if blessing the dead lion, then passes below it, moving slowly on toward the palace in the rear. His laughter rises with more and more summoning power. The files of the GUARD, as he passes them, two by two join in his laughter, saluting him as if in spite of themselves]

CALIGULA

[Sidling up to MARCELLUS, cruel and mocking]

Are you weeping, Marcellus? Laugh at that blundering fool, yourself! What will Cæsar say? Will he laugh when he has your body broken one bone at a time with hammers? Why did you not kill? For shame! A patrician exposed to laughter by a Jew! Poor craven! Why could you not strike? There must be death! Coward! Why did you not stab?

[Then in a queer awed whisper]
I know! Was it not because of a sudden you loved him and could not?

MARCELLUS

[Suddenly—eagerly]

Yes! That was it! I loved him!

CALIGULA

[Craftily and cruelly]

You were about to murder him!

MARCELLUS

[Tortured with remorse]

No! No! How could I? What infamy!
[Cries tearfully]
Forgive me, Lazarus!

CALIGULA

[With vindictive insistence]

Judge yourself!

[He takes up the dagger]

Here is your dagger! Avenge him on yourself!

MARCELLUS

[Trying to laugh]

Ha-ha—Yes!

[He stabs himself and falls Suddenly his laughter is released]

I laugh! You are a fool, Caligula! There is no death!

[He dies, laughing up at the sky]

CALIGULA

[Kicks his body with savage cruelty]

You lie!

[Then suddenly kneels and bends over it imploringly]

Tell me you lie, Marcellus! Do me that mercy!—and when I am Cæsar, I—

[He begins to weep like a frightened boy, his head in his hands Meanwhile LAZARUS has arrived with MIRIAM at the steps before the door of the palace As he starts to ascend these, the crimson-purple lights of the many windows of the palace go out one by one as if fleeing in terror from the laughter which now beats at the walls]

CHORUS OF THE GUARD

Fear, no more!
Death, no more!
Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!

ALL THE GUARDS

[Now all in a great chorus, raising their spears aloft and saluting LAZARUS as if they were his own triumphal bodyguard]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!

[LAZARUS has ascended the steps He walks into the black archway of the darkened palace, his figure radiant and unearthly in his own light MIRIAM follows him They disappear in the darkness There is a pause of dead silence]

CALIGULA

[Raises his head uneasily, looks back toward the palace, jumps to his feet in a panic of terror, and runs toward the palace door, calling]

Lazarus! Wait! I will defend you! There is death inside there—death! Beware, Lazarus!

CHORUS OF THE GUARD

[As the laughter of LAZARUS is heard again from the dark palace]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!

ALL THE GUARDS

Dead! Dead! Dead!
Death is dead!

CURTAIN

SCENE TWO

SCENE: The banquet hall in the palace of TIBERIUS—an immense high-ceilinged room. In the rear, center, is a great arched doorway. Smaller arches in the middle of the side walls lead into other rooms. Long couches are placed along the walls at right and left, and along the rear wall on either side of the arch. Before these couches, a series of narrow tables is set. In the center of the room on a high dais is the ivory and gold chair of CÆSAR, a table in front of it, couches for him to recline on at either side. On this table, and on all the tables for his guests, gold lamps with shades of crimson-purple are placed.

Reclining on the couches on the right are young women and girls, on the left, youths of an equal number

[The masks are based on the Roman masks of the periods of Boyhood (or Girlhood), Youth, and Young Manhood (or Womanhood) and there are seven individuals of each period and sex in each of the three types of the Introspective, Self-Tortured, the Servile, Hypocritical, and the Cruel, Revengeful—a crowd of forty-two in all. There is a distinctive character to the masks of each sex, the stamp of an effeminate corruption on all the male, while the female have a bold, masculine expression. The male masks are a blotched heliotrope in shade. These youths wear female wigs of curled wire like frizzed hair of a yellow gold. They are dressed in women's robes of pale heliotrope, they wear anklets and bracelets and necklaces. The women are dressed as males in crimson or deep purple. They also wear wire wigs but of straight hair cut in short boyish mode, dyed either deep purple or crimson. Those with crimson hair are dressed in purple, and vice versa. The female voices are harsh, strident, mannish—those of the youths affected, lisping, effeminate. The whole effect of these two groups is of sex corrupted and warped, of unvented lusts and artificial vices.]

The CHORUS in this scene and the next is composed of three males and four females—the males in the period of Youth, one in each of the types represented, and three of the females in similar type-period masks.

She wears a half-mask on the upper part of her face, olive-colored with the red of blood smoldering through, with great, dark, cruel eyes—a dissipated mask of intense evil beauty, of lust and perverted passion. Beneath the mask, her own complexion is pale, her gentle, girlish mouth is set in an expression of agonized self-loathing and weariness of spirit. Her body is strong and beautiful. Her wig and dress are purple.

TIBERIUS CÆSAR stands on the dais, dressed in deep purple, fringed and ornamented with crimson and gold. An old man of seventy-six, tall, broad and corpulent but of great muscular strength still despite his age, his shiny white cranium rises like a polished shell above his half-masked face. This mask is a pallid purple blotched with darker color, as if the imperial blood in his veins had been sickened by age and debauchery. The eyes are protuberant, leering, cynical slits, the long nose, once finely modeled, now gross and thickened, the forehead lowering and grim. Beneath the mask, his own mouth looks as incongruous as CALIGULA'S. The lips are thin and stern and self-contained—the lips of an able soldier-statesman of rigid probity. His chin is forceful and severe. The complexion of his own skin is that of a healthy old campaigner.

As the curtain rises, slaves are hurriedly putting out the many lamps. From outside, the laughter of LAZARUS rises on the deep ground swell of the GUARD'S laughter. The walls and massive columns seem to reverberate with the sound. In the banquet room all are hystering fascinatedly. Every reaction, from the extreme of panic fear or hypnotized ecstasy to a feigned cynical amusement or a pretended supercilious indifference, is represented in their frozen attitudes. TIBERIUS stands, shrinking back, staring at the doorway in the rear with superstitious dread. A squad of the GUARD surround the dais, commanded by FLAVIUS.

TIBERIUS

[In a strained voice shaken by apprehension and awe]

Marcellus! Strike him down! Stab him!

SOLDIERS OF THE GUARD

[From without]

Laugh! Laugh! Laugh!
Death is dead!

TIBERIUS

[As he suddenly sees the shining figure of LAZARUS appear at the end of the dark hall beyond the archway]

Gods! Flavius, look!

[He points with a shaking finger FLAVIUS has leaped up to his side]

FLAVIUS

[Not without dread himself]

That is the man, Cæsar.

TIBERIUS

Man? Say a dæmon!

[To the slaves who are turning out the few remaining lamps]

Quick! Darkness!

[He puts out the lamp on his table himself Then as nothing is seen but the light from the approaching LAZARUS]

Flavius! Stand here in my place! It will think you are Cæsar!

[He clumps heavily down the steps of the dais]

Guards! Here! Cover me with your shields!

[He goes to the extreme right corner, front, and crouches there His GUARDS follow him They hold their shields so that they form a wall around him and half over him. Then CALIGULA's voice is heard screaming above the chorus of laughter as he enters the hall behind LAZARUS]

CALIGULA

Beware of death! I will defend you, Lazarus!

[He is seen to rush past LAZARUS, flourishing his sword and comes running into the room, shouting]

Cæsar! Dare not to murder Lazarus!

[He leaps to the dais and up its steps in a frenzy]

Dare not, I say!

[He stabs FLAVIUS with a savage cry]

Ah!

[Then, as the body of FLAVIUS falls heavily and rolls down the steps at right, he begins to laugh, at first a clear laughter of selfless joy, sounding startlingly incongruous from him]

I have saved you, Lazarus—at the risk of my own life—and now, hear me, I can laugh!

[LAZARUS appears in the archway, MIRIAM behind him He stops laughing and immediately there is silence, except for CALIGULA LAZARUS casts a luminous glow over the whole room in which the masked faces appear distorted and livid CALIGULA stands with upraised sword by the chair of CÆSAR Suddenly his laughter cracks, changes, becomes full of his old fear and blood-lust]

CALIGULA

Ha-ha-ha! See, Lazarus!

[He points to the body of FLAVIUS with his sword]

Welcome in the name of Cæsar, now Cæsar is slain and I am Cæsar!

[He assumes the absurd grandiose posture of his imperial posing No one looks at him or hears him Their eyes are on LAZARUS as he moves directly to where TIBERIUS crouches behind the shields of the GUARDS MIRIAM follows him CALIGULA turns and stares toward him, and then down at the body of FLAVIUS and back, in a petrified, bewildered stupor LAZARUS steps up beside TIBERIUS The GUARDS make way for him fearfully]

TIBERIUS

[Feeling his nearness—straightening himself with a certain dignity]

Strike! I have been a soldier. Thou canst not make me fear death, Dæmon!

[He draws his toga over his face]

LAZARUS

[Smiling gently]

20 Then fear not fear, Tiberius!

[He reaches out and pulls back the toga from his face TIBERIUS looks into his eyes, at first shrinkingly, then with growing reassurance, his own masked face clearly revealed now in the light from LAZARUS]

TIBERIUS

[At first falteringly]

So—thou art not evil? Thou art not come to contrive my murder?

[As LAZARUS smilingly shakes his head, TIBERIUS frowns]

Then why dost thou laugh against Cæsar?

[Then bitterly—with a twisted attempt at a smile]

Yet I like thy laughter It is young Once I laughed somewhat like that—so I pardon thee I will even laugh at thee in return 10
Ha-ha!

[His laughter is cold, cruel and merciless as the grin of a skeleton]

CALIGULA

[Who has been staring in a bewildered stupor from TIBERIUS, whom he thought he had killed, to the body of FLAVIUS—quaking with terror now as if this laugh was meant for him, drops to his knees, his sword clattering down the steps to the floor]

Mercy, Tiberius! I implore you forgive your Caligula! 20

TIBERIUS

[Not understanding Fixing his eyes on CALIGULA with a malevolent irony]

Come down from my throne, Caligula.

[CALIGULA slinks down warily]

You are too impatient But I must pardon you, too—for where could I find another heir so perfect for serving my spite upon mankind?

[He has walked toward the throne while he is speaking, CALIGULA backing away from him LAZARUS remains where he is, MIRIAM beside and to the rear of him TIBERIUS, his eyes fixed on CALIGULA, stumbles against the body of FLAVIUS He gives a startled gasp and shrinks back, calling]

Lights! A light here!

[A crowd of masked slaves obey his orders One runs to him with a lantern He looks down at FLAVIUS' corpse—half to himself]

I did wisely to stand him in my place

[To CALIGULA—with sinister emphasis]

Too impatient, my loving grandchild! Take care lest I become impatient also—with your impatience!

[CALIGULA shudders and backs away to the extreme left corner, front, where he crouches on his haunches as inconspicuously as possible TIBERIUS suddenly whirls around as if he felt a dagger at his back]

TIBERIUS

Where—?

[Seeing LAZARUS where he had been—with relief—staring at his face now that the room is flooded with the purplish-crimson glow from all the lamps]

Ah, you are there More lights! Darkness leads men into error My heir mistakes a man for Cæsar and Cæsar, it appears, has mistaken a man for a dæmon!

[Scrutinizing him—with sinister finality]

I can deal with men I know them well. Too well!

[He laughs grimly]

Therefore I hate them

[He mounts the steps of the dais and sits on the couch at left of table—staring at LAZARUS, wonderingly]

But you seem—something other than man! That light!

[Then he forces a harsh laugh]

A trick! I had forgotten you are a magician.

[Arrogantly]

Stand there, Jew I would question you about your magic

30 They say you died and have returned from death?

LAZARUS

[Smiling—as if he were correcting a child]

There is no death, Cæsar

TIBERIUS

[With a sneer of scepticism but with an underlying eagerness]

I have heard you teach that folly.

[Then threateningly]

You shall be given full opportunity to prove it!

[A pause—then in a low voice, bending down toward LAZARUS]

Do you foretell the future?

[Trembling but with a pretense of carelessness]

Must I die soon?

LAZARUS

[Simply]

Yes, Cæsar

TIBERIUS

[Jumping up with a shuddering start]

Soon? Soon?

[Then his fear turning to rage]

What do you say? Vile Jew, do you dare threaten me with death!

[LAZARUS, looking into his eyes, begins to laugh softly TIBERIUS sinks back on his couch, fighting to control himself—confusedly]

Laugh not, I ask you I am old. It is not seemly

[LAZARUS ceases his low laughter A pause. TIBERIUS broods—then suddenly]

And you were really dead?

[He shudders]

Come nearer. I need to watch your face I have learned to read the lies in faces A Cæsar gets much practice—from childhood on—too much!

[With awe]

Your eyes are dark with death While I watch them, answer me, what cured thee of death?

LAZARUS

[Gently]

There is only life, Cæsar

[Then gaily mocking but compellingly]

And laughter! Look! Look well into my eyes, old Reader of Lies, and see if you can find aught in them that is not life—and laughter!

[He laughs softly A ripple of soft laughter from the motionless figures about the room echoes his TIBERIUS stares into his eyes. In the silence that ensues POMPEIA gets up and walks over to the dais. She stops to stare for a moment with cruel contempt at MIRIAM, then stands and looks up at LAZARUS, trying in vain to attract his or CÆSAR's attention Failing in this, she passes over and sits beside CALIGULA, whose attention is concentrated on LAZARUS]

POMPEIA

I admire your strange magician, Caligula.

CALIGULA

[Without looking at her]

He is no magician He is something like a god

POMPEIA

[Longingly]

His laughter is like a god's He is strong. I love him

CALIGULA

[Turning to her—coarsely]

Do not waste your lust He is faithful to his wife, I warn you

POMPEIA

[She points to MIRIAM]

Not that ugly slave?

CALIGULA

Yes And yet, on our journey, whole herds of women—and many as beautiful as you, Pompeia—threw themselves on him and begged for his love.

POMPEIA

[Her voice hardening]

And he?

CALIGULA

He laughed—and passed on

[She starts. CALIGULA goes on wonderingly]

But they seemed as happy as if his laughter had possessed them! You are a woman.
Tell me, how could that be?

POMPEIA

[Her voice cruel]

He shall not laugh at me!

CALIGULA

[Tauntingly]

I will bet a string of pearls against your body for a night that he does

POMPEIA

[Defiantly]

Done!

[Then she laughs—a low, cruel laugh—staring at MIRIAM]

So he loves that woman?

CALIGULA

[Curiously]

What are you planning?

POMPEIA

I shall offer her the fruit Cæsar preserves for those he fears

CALIGULA

[With a careless shrug]

You will not win his love by killing her

POMPEIA

I no longer want his love I want to see him suffer, to hear his laughter choke in his throat with pain!

[She speaks with more and more voluptuous satisfaction]

Then I shall laugh!

[She laughs softly and steps forward]

CALIGULA

[Concernedly]

Stop I am his protector.

[Then suddenly]

But what is the Jewess to me?

[With more and more of a spirit of perverse cruelty]

Do it, Pompeia! His laughter is too cruel to us! We must save death from him!

POMPEIA

[Walks to the dais which she ascends slowly until she stands by CÆSAR'S couch behind him, confronting LAZARUS But the two men remain unmindful of her presence. TIBERIUS continues to stare into LAZARUS' eyes His whole body is now relaxed, at rest, a dreamy smile softens his thin, compressed mouth POMPEIA leans over and takes a peach from the bowl of fruit on CÆSAR'S table and, taking TIBERIUS' hand in her other, she kisses it and calls insistently]

Cæsar It is I, Pompeia

[LAZARUS does not look at her She stares at him defiantly TIBERIUS blinks his eyes in a daze]

TIBERIUS

[Dreamily]

10 Yes! A cloud came from a depth of sky—around me, softly, warmly, and the cloud dissolved into the sky, and the sky into
peace!

[Suddenly springing to his feet and staring about him in a confused rage—clutching POMPEIA by the shoulder and forcing her to her knees]

What are you doing here?

POMPEIA

Forgive your loving slave! I grew afraid this magician had put you under a spell.

[She stares at LAZARUS, her words challenging him]

TIBERIUS

[Confusedly, sinking back on his couch and releasing her]

A spell? Could it be he laid a dream of death upon me, leading me to death?

[He trembles timorously—appealing to LAZARUS]

Whatever magic thou didst to me, Dæmon,
I beseech thee undo it!

LAZARUS

[Smiling]

30 Do you fear peace?

POMPEIA

[Harshly and insolently]

Mock not at Cæsar, dog!

[LAZARUS continues to smile His eyes remain on CÆSAR He seems absolutely unaware of POMPEIA This enrages her the more against him She speaks tauntingly to TIBERIUS]

Surely, Cæsar, this magician must have powerful charms since he dares to mock Tiberius to his face!

TIBERIUS

[Stung]

Be still!

[Then in a low tone to her]

Do you not know this Lazarus died and then by his magic rose from his tomb?

POMPEIA

[Scornfully]

To believe that, I must have seen it, Cæsar!

TIBERIUS

[Impatiently]

Do you think I would believe without good evidence? I have had them take the statements of many witnesses The miracle was done in conjunction with another Jew acting as this man's tool This other Jew, the report states, could not possibly have possessed any magic power Himself, for Pilate crucified Him a short time after and He died in pain and weakness within a few hours But this Lazarus laughs at death!

LAZARUS

[Looks up, smiling with ironical bitterness]

Couldst Thou but hear, Jesus! And men shall keep on in panic nailing Man's soul to the cross of their fear until in the end they do it to avenge Thee, for Thine Honor and Glory!

[He sighs sadly—then after a struggle overcoming himself—with exultance]

Yes!

[His eyes fall again to TIBERIUS and he smiles]

Yes! Yes to the stupid as to the wise! To what is understood and to what cannot be understood! Known and unknown! Over and over! Forever and ever! Yes!

[He laughs softly to himself]

TIBERIUS

[With superstitious dread]

What dost thou mean, Dæmon?

POMPEIA

[With indignant scorn]

Let him prove there is no death, Cæsar!

[She appeals to the company who straighten up on their couches with interest]

CHORUS

[Chant demandingly]

Let him prove there is no death!
We are bored!

CROWD

[Echoing]

Prove there is no death!
We are bored, Cæsar!

TIBERIUS

[Waits to see what LAZARUS will say—then as he says nothing, plucking up his courage—his cruelty aroused]

Do you hear, Lazarus?

POMPEIA

Make him perform his miracle again!

CHORUS

[As before]

Let him perform a miracle!
We are bored, Cæsar!

CROWD

[They now stand up and coming from behind their tables, move forward toward the dais]

A miracle!
We are bored!

POMPEIA

Let him raise someone from the dead!

CHORUS

*[Chanting with a pettish insistence]*Raise the dead!
We are bored!

CROWD

*[Echoing—grouping in a big semicircle as of spectators in a theatre, around and to the sides of the dais, one sex on each side CALIGULA moves in from the left in front of them. They form in three ranks, the first squatting on their hams like savages (as CALIGULA does), the second rank crouching over them, the third leaning over the second, all with a hectic, morbid interest]*We are bored!
Raise the dead!

POMPEIA

*[With a cruel smile]I have thought of a special test for him, Cæsar[She whispers in CÆSAR'S ear and points to MIRIAM and the fruit in her hand]*
And he must laugh! 20

TIBERIUS

[With a harsh, cruel chuckle]

Yes, I shall command him to laugh!

*[Then disgustedly]*But she is sad and old. I will be only doing him a favor

CALIGULA

[Rocking back and forth on his haunches—looking at LAZARUS with taunting cruelty] 30

No, Cæsar! I know he loves her!

LAZARUS

Yes!

[He steps down from the dais to MIRIAM'S side and taking her head inboth his hands, he kisses her on the lips]

TIBERIUS

[With a malignant grin]

Give her the fruit!

POMPEIA

[Advances and offers the peach to MIRIAM—with a hard, cruel little laugh]

Cæsar invites you to eat!

MIRIAM

[To LAZARUS—requesting meekly but longingly]

May I accept, Lazarus? Is it time at last?
My love has followed you over long roads among strangers and each league we came from home my heart has grown older. Now it is too old for you, a heart too weary for your loving laughter. Ever your laughter has grown younger, Lazarus! Upward it springs like a lark from a field, and sings!
Once I knew your laughter was my child, my son of Lazarus, but then it grew younger and I felt at last it had returned to my womb—and ever younger and younger —until, tonight, when I spoke to you of home, I felt new birth-pains as your laughter, grown too young for me, flew back to the unborn—a birth so like a death!

[She sobs and wipes her eyes with her sleeve—then humbly, reaching out for the fruit]

May I accept it, Lazarus? You should have newborn laughing hearts to love you. My old one labors with memories and its blood is sluggish with the past. Your home on the hills of space is too far away. My heart longs for the warmth of close walls of earth baked in the sun. Our home in Bethany, Lazarus, where you and my children lived and died. Our tomb near our home, Lazarus, in which you and my children wait for me. Is it time at last?

LAZARUS

[Deeply moved]

Poor lonely heart! It has been crueler for you than I remembered. Go in peace—to peace!
[His voice trembles in spite of himself]

I shall be lonely, dear one.

[With a note of pleading]

You have never laughed with my laughter
Will you call back—Yes!—when you know —to tell me you understand and laugh with me at last?

MIRIAM

[Not answering him, to POMPEIA, taking the peach and making a humble courtesy before her]

I thank you, pretty lady

[She raises the peach toward her mouth Involuntarily one of LAZARUS' hands half-reaches out as if to stop her]

POMPEIA

[With savage triumph, pointing]

See! He would stop her! He is afraid of death!

CHORUS

[Pointing—jeeringly]

He is afraid of death! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CROWD

[Jeeringly]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!

MIRIAM

[Bites into the peach and, chewing, begins, as if immediately affected, to talk like a garrulous old woman, her words coming quicker and quicker as her voice becomes fainter and fainter]

Say what you like, it is much better I should go home first, Lazarus We have been away so long, there will be so much to attend to about the house And all the children will be waiting You would be as helpless as a child, Lazarus Between you and the children, things would soon be in a fine state!

[More and more confused]

No, no! You cannot help me, dearest one.
You are only in my way No, I will make the fire When you laid it the last time, we all had to run for our lives, choking, the smoke poured from the windows, the neighbors thought the house was burning!

[She laughs—a queer, vague little inward laugh]

You are so impractical. The neighbors all get the best of you. Money slips through your fingers If it was not for me—

[She sighs—then brightly and lovingly]

But, dearest husband, why do you take it so to heart? Why do you feel guilty because you are not like other men? That is why I love you so much Is it a sin to be born a dreamer? But God, He must be a dreamer, too, or how would we be on earth? Do not keep saying to yourself so bitterly, you are a failure in life! Do not sit brooding on the hilltop in the evening like a black figure of Job against the sky!

[Her voice trembling]

Even if God has taken our little ones—yes, in spite of sorrow—have you not a good home I make for you, and a wife who loves
you?

[She forces a chuckle]

Be grateful, then—for me! Smile, my sad one! Laugh a little once in a while! Come home, bringing me laughter of the wind from the hills!

[Swaying, looking at the peach in her hand]

What a mellow, sweet fruit! Did you bring it home for me?

[She falls back into his arms Gently he lets her body sink until it rests against the steps of the dais TIBERIUS rises from his couch to bend over with cruel gloating POMPEIA steps nearer to LAZARUS, staring at him mockingly CALIGULA hops to her side, looking from LAZARUS to MIRIAM The half-circle of masked figures moves closer, straining forward and downward as if to overwhelm the two figures at the foot of the dais with their concentrated death wish]

TIBERIUS

[Thickly]

She is dead, and I do not hear you laugh!

LAZARUS

[Bending down—supplicatingly]

Miriam! Call back to me! Laugh!

[*He pauses A second of dead silence
Then, with a sound that is very like a sob, he kisses her on the lips*]

40 I am lonely!

POMPEIA

[With savage malice—jeeringly]

See! He weeps, Cæsar!

[She bursts into strident laughter]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CHORUS

[Echoing her laughter]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!

There is fear!

There is death!

CROWD

There is death!

Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CALIGULA

[In a frenzy of despairing rage, hopping up and down]

Liar! Charlatan! Weaking! How you have cheated Caligula!

[He suddenly slaps LAZARUS viciously across the face]

There is death! Laugh, if you dare!

to

TIBERIUS

[Standing—in a sinister cold rage, the crueler because his dream of a cure for death is baffled, yet feeling his power as CÆSAR triumphant nevertheless]

And I thought you might be a dæmon I thought you might have a magic cure—

[With revengeful fury]

But death is, and death is mine! I shall make you pray for death! And I shall make Death laugh at you! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[In a frenzy as LAZARUS neither makes a sound nor looks up]

Laugh, Lazarus! Laugh at yourself! Laugh with me!

20

[Then to his soldiers]

Scourge him! Make him laugh!

CALIGULA

[Running to soldiers—fiercely]

Give me a scourge!

POMPEIA

[Running to the soldiers—hysterically]

Ha-ha-ha-ha! Let me beat him, Cæsar!

[They group behind him. The rods and scourges are uplifted over his back to strike, when in the dead expectant silence, MIRIAM's body is seen to rise in a writhing tortured last effort]

MIRIAM

[In a voice of unearthly sweetness]

Yes! There is only life! Lazarus, be not lonely!

[She laughs and sinks back and is still]

[A shuddering murmur of superstitious fear comes from them as they shrink back swiftly from LAZARUS, remaining huddled one against the other. POMPEIA runs to the feet of TIBERIUS and crouches down on the steps below him, as if for protection, her terrified eyes on MIRIAM. CALIGULA runs to her and crouches beside and beneath her]

LAZARUS

[Kisses MIRIAM again and raises his head. His face is radiant with new faith and joy. He smiles with happiness and speaks to himself with a mocking affection as if to an amusing child]

That much remained hidden in me of the sad old Lazarus who died of self-pity—his loneliness! Lonely no more! Man's loneliness is but his fear of life! Lonely no more! Millions of laughing stars there are around me! And laughing dust, born once of woman on this earth, now freed to dance! New stars are born of dust eternally! The old, grown mellow with God, burst into flaming seed! The fields of infinite space are sown—and grass for sheep springs up on the hills of earth! But there is no death, nor fear, nor loneliness! There is only God's Eternal Laughter! His Laughter flows into the lonely heart!

[He begins to laugh, his laughter clear and ringing—the laughter of a conqueror arrogant with happiness and the pride of a new triumph. He bends and picks up the body of MIRIAM in his arms and, his head thrown back, laughing, he ascends the dais and places her on the table as on a bier. He touches one hand on her breast, as] if he were taking an oath to life on her heart, looks upward and laughs, his voice ringing more and more with a terrible unbearable power and beauty that beats those in the room into an abject submissive panic]

[TIBERIUS grovels half under the table, his hands covering his ears, his face on the floor, he is laughing with the agony and terror of death POMPEIA lies face down on the first step and beats it with her fists, she is laughing with horror and self-loathing CALIGULA, his hands clutching his head, pounds it against the edge of the steps, he is laughing with grief and remorse The rest, soldiers, slaves and the prostitutes of both sexes, writhe and twist distractedly, seeking to hide their heads against each other, beating each other and the floor with clenched hands An agonized moan of supplicating laughter comes from them all]

ALL

Ha-ha-ha-ha! Ha-ha-ha-ha!
Let us die, Lazarus!
Mercy, Laughing One!
Mercy of death!
Ha-ha-ha-ha! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[But the laughter of LAZARUS is as remote now as the laughter of a god]

CURTAIN

ACT FOUR

SCENE ONE

SCENE The same as previous Scene—the same night a short while later. All the lamps are out except the one on the table on the dais which, placed beside the head of MIRIAM, shines down upon the white mask of her face In the half-darkness, the walls are lost in shadow, the room seems immense, the dais nearer.

LAZARUS sits on the couch at the right on the dais His face is strong and proud although his eyes are fixed down on the face of MIRIAM He seems more youthful still now, like a young son who keeps watch by the body of his mother, but at the same time retaining the aloof serenity of the statue of a god His face expresses sorrow and a happiness that transcends sorrow.

On the other side of the table, at the end of the couch, TIBERIUS sits facing front, his elbows on his knees, his large hands with bloated veins hanging loosely He keeps his gaze averted from the corpse He talks to LAZARUS half over his shoulder

On the top step, POMPEIA sits, facing right, her hands clasped about one knee, the other leg stretched down to the lower step Her head is thrown back and she is gazing up into LAZARUS' face

On the step below her, CALIGULA squats on his haunches, his arms on his knees, his fists pressed to his temples He is staring straight before him

Only these four people are in the room now.

TIBERIUS

[Gloomily]

Was she dead, Dæmon, and was it thy power that recalled life to her body for that moment? Or was she still living and her words only the last desire of her love to comfort you, Lazarus?

[LAZARUS does not reply]

If thou dost not tell me, I must always doubt thee, Dæmon

POMPEIA

[With a sigh of bewildered happiness, turns to CALIGULA]

10 I am glad he laughed, Caligula! Did I say I loved him before? Then it was only my body that wanted a slave Now it is my heart that desires a master! Now I know love for the first time in my life!

CALIGULA

[Bitterly]

Fool! What does he care for love?

[Somerly]

He loves everyone—but no one—not even me!

[He broods frowningly]

POMPEIA

[Following her own thought:]

And now that hag is dead he will need a woman, young and beautiful, to protect and comfort him, to make him a home and bear his children!

[She dreams, her eyes again fixed on LAZARUS—then suddenly turning to CALIGULA]

I am glad I lost our bet But you must accept some other payment Now I know love, I may not give myself to any man save him!

CALIGULA

I do not want you! What are you but another animal! Faugh!

[With a grimace of disgust]
Pleasure is dirty and joyless! Or we who seek it are, which comes to the same thing
[Then grimly]

But our bet can rest This is not the end. There may still be a chance for you to laugh at him!

POMPEIA

No! Now I could not! I should weep for his defeat!

TIBERIUS

[Gloomily arguing, half to himself]

His laughter triumphed over me, but he has not brought her back to life I think he knows no cure for another's death, as I had hoped And I must always doubt that it was not some trick—

[Harshly]

until I have tested him with his own life! He cannot cheat me then!

[A pause—arguing to himself]

But he was dead—that much has been proved—and before he died he was old and sad What did he find beyond there?

[Suddenly—turning to LAZARUS now]

What did you find beyond death, Lazarus?

LAZARUS

[Exaltedly]

Life! God's Eternal Laughter!

TIBERIUS

[Shaking his head]

I want hope—for me, Tiberius Cæsar.

LAZARUS

What is—you? But there is hope for Man! Love is Man's hope—love for his life on earth, a noble love above suspicion and distrust! Hitherto Man has always suspected his life, and in revenge and self-torture his love has been faithless! He has even betrayed Eternity, his mother, with his slave he calls Immortal Soul!

[He laughs softly, gaily, mockingly—then to TIBERIUS directly]

Hope for you, Tiberius Cæsar? Then dare
10 to love Eternity without your fear desiring to possess her! Be brave enough to be possessed!

TIBERIUS

[Strangely]

My mother was the wife of Cæsar.

[Then dully]

I do not understand.

LAZARUS

Men are too cowardly to understand! And 20 so the worms of their little fears eat them and grow fat and terrible and become their jealous gods they must appease with lies!

TIBERIUS

[Wearily]

Your words are meaningless, Lazarus You are a fool. All laughter is malice, all gods are dead, and life is a sickness

LAZARUS

[Laughs pityingly]

30 So say the race of men, whose lives are long dyings! They evade their fear of death by becoming so sick of life that by the time death comes they are too lifeless to fear it! Their disease triumphs over death—a noble victory called resignation! 'We are sick,' they say, 'therefore there is no God in us, therefore there is no God!' Oh, if men would but interpret that first cry of man fresh from the womb as the laughter
40 of one who even then says to his heart, 'It is my pride as God to become Man. Then let it be my pride as Man to recreate the God in me!'

[He laughs softly but with exultant pride]

POMPEIA

[Laughing with him—proudly]

He will create a god in me! I shall be proud!

CALIGULA

[Pounding his temples with his fists—tortured]

I am Caligula I was born in a camp among soldiers My father was Germanicus, a hero, as all men know. But I do not understand this—and though I burst with pride,
I cannot laugh with joy!

TIBERIUS

[Gloomily]

Obscurities! I have found nothing in life that merits pride I am not proud of being Cæsar—and what is a god but a Cæsar over Cæsars? If fools kneel and worship me because they fear me, should I be proud? But Cæsar is a fact, and Tiberius, a man, is one, and I cling to these certainties—and I do not wish to die! If I were sure of eternal sleep beyond there, deep rest and forgetfulness of all I have ever seen or heard or hated or loved on earth, I would gladly die!
But surely, Lazarus, nothing is sure—peace the least sure of all—and I fear there is no rest beyond there, that one remembers there as here and cannot sleep, that the mind goes on eternally the same—a long insomnia of memories and regrets and the ghosts of dreams one has poisoned to death passing with white bodies sported by the leprous fingers of one's lusts

[Butterfly]

I fear the long nights now in which I lie awake and listen to Death dancing round me in the darkness, prancing to the drum beat of my heart!

[He shudders]

And I am afraid, Lazarus—afraid that there is no sleep beyond there, either!

LAZARUS

There is peace!

[His words are like a benediction he pronounces upon them Soothed in a mysterious, childlike way, they repeat the word after him, wondering]

POMPEIA

Peace?

CALIGULA

Peace?

TIBERIUS

Peace?

[*For a long moment there is complete silence. Then TIBERIUS sighs heavily,
shaking his head*]

Peace! Another word blurred into a senseless sigh by men's longing! A bubble of froth blown from the lips of the dying toward the stars! No!

[He grins bitterly—then looks at LAZ-ARUS—somerly contemptuous and threatening]

You are pleased to act the mysterious, Jew, but I shall solve you!

[Then with a lawyer-like incisiveness]

10 There is one certainty about you and I must know the cause—for there must be a cause and a rational explanation! You were fifty when you died—

LAZARUS

[Smiling mockingly]

Yes When I died

TIBERIUS

[Unheeding]

And now your appearance is of one younger by a score Not alone your appearance!
You are young I see the fact, the effect
And I demand an explanation of the cause without mystic nonsense or evasion

[Threateningly]

And I warn you to answer directly in plain words—and not to laugh, you understand!
—not to dare!—or I shall lose patience 30 with you and—

[With a grim smile]

I can be terrible!

[LAZARUS smiles gently at him. He turns away with confused annoyance, then back to LAZARUS, resuming his lawyer-like manner]

What was it restored your youth? How did you contrive that your body reversed the natural process and grows younger? Is it a charm by which you invoke a supernatural force? Or is it a powder you dissolve in 40 wine? Or a liquid? Or an unguent you rub into the skin to revitalize the old bones and tissues? Or—what is it, Lazarus?

LAZARUS

[Gently]

I know that age and time are but timidities of thought.

TIBERIUS

[Broodingly—as if he had not heard—persuasively]

Perhaps you ask yourself, what would Tiberius do with youth? Then, because you must have heard rumors of my depravity, you will conclude the old lecher desires youth for his lusts!

[He laughs harshly]

Ha! Why, do not my faithful subjects draw pictures of an old buck goat upon the walls and write above them, Cæsar? And they are just In self-contempt of Man I have made this man, myself, the most swinish and contemptible of men! Yes! In all this empire there is no man so base a hog as I!

[He grins bitterly and ironically]

My claim to this excellence, at least, is not contested! Everyone admits therein Tiberius is by right their Cæsar!

[He laughs bitterly]

Ha! So who would believe Tiberius if he said, I want youth again because I loathe lust and long for purity!

LAZARUS

[Gently]

I believe you, Cæsar

TIBERIUS

[Stares at him—deeply moved]

You—believe—?

[Then gruffly]

You lie! You are not mad—and only a madman would believe another man!

*[Then confidingly, leaning over toward
LAZARUS]*

I know it is folly to speak—but—one gets old, one becomes talkative, one wishes to confess, to say the thing one has always kept hidden, to reveal one's unique truth—and there is so little time left—and one is alone! Therefore the old—like children—talk to themselves, for they have reached that hopeless wisdom of experience which knows that though one were to cry it in the streets to multitudes, or whisper it in the kiss to one's beloved, the only ears that can ever hear one's secret are one's own!

[He laughs bitterly]

And so I talk aloud, Lazarus! I talk to my loneliness!

LAZARUS

[Simply]

I hear, Tiberius.

TIBERIUS

[Again moved and confused—forcing a mocking smile]

Liar! Eavesdropper! You merely—listen!

[Then he turns away]

My mother, Livia, that strong woman, giving birth to me, desired not a child, but a Cæsar—just as, married to Augustus, she loved him not but loved herself as Cæsar's wife. She made me feel, in the proud questioning of her scornful eyes, that to win her mother love I must become Cæsar. She poisoned Prince Marcellus and young Gaius and Lucius that the way might be clear for me. I used to see their blood dance in red specks before my eyes when I looked at the sky. Now—it is all a red blot! I cannot distinguish. There have been too many. My mother—her blood is in that blot, for I revenged myself on her. I did not kill her, it is true, but I deprived her of her power and she died, as I knew she must, that powerful woman who bore me as a weapon! The murder was subtle and cruel—how cruel only that passionate, deep-breasted woman unslaked by eighty years of devoured desires could know! Too cruel! I did not go to her funeral. I was afraid her closed eyes might open and look at me!

[He brushes his hand before his eyes]

[Then with almost a cry]

I want youth, Lazarus, that I may play again about her feet with the love I felt for her before I learned to read her eyes!

[He half sobs, bowing his head. A pause]

CALIGULA

*[Nudging POMPEIA—with a crafty
whisper]*

Do you hear? The old lecher talks to himself. He is becoming senile. He will soon die. And I shall be Cæsar. Then I shall laugh!

POMPEIA

[Staring up at LAZARUS' face, hearing]

only CALIGULA's words without their meaning]

No My Lazarus does not laugh now See His mouth is silent—and a little sad, I think

LAZARUS

[Gently and comfortingly]

I hear, Tiberius

TIBERIUS

[Harshly]

I hated that woman, my mother, and I still hate her! Have you ever loved, Lazarus?

[Then with a glance at MIRIAM's body and a shuddering away from it—vaguely]

I was forgetting her I killed your love, too, did I not? Well, I must! I envy those who are loved Where I can, I kill love—for retribution's sake—but much of it escapes
me

[Then harshly again]

I loved Agrippina. We were married A son was born to us We were happy Then that proud woman, my mother, saw my happiness Was she jealous of my love? Or did she know no happy man would wish to be Cæsar? Well, she condemned my happiness to death She whispered to Augustus and he ordered me to divorce Agrippina I should have opened her veins and mine, and died with her But my mother stayed by me, Agrippina was kept away, my mother spoke to me and spoke to me and even wept, that tall woman, strong as a great man, and I consented that my love be murdered Then my mother married me to a whore Why? The whore was Cæsar's daughter, true—but I feel that was not all of it, that my mother wished to keep me tortured that I might love her alone and long to be Cæsar!

[He laughs harshly]

Ha! In brief, I married the whore, she tortured me, my mother's scheming prospered—that subtle and crafty woman!— and many years passed in being here and there, in doing this and that, in growing full of hate and revengeful ambition to be Cæsar At last, Augustus died. I was Cæsar Then I killed that whore, my wife, and I starved my mother's strength to death until she died, and I began to take pleasure in vengeance upon men, and pleasure in taking vengeance on myself

[He grins horribly]

It is all very simple, as you see!

[He suddenly starts to his feet—with harsh arrogance and pride, threateningly]

Enough! Why do I tell you these old tales?
Must I explain to you why I want youth?
It is my whim! I am Cæsar! And now I must lie down and try to sleep! And it is my command that you reveal the secret of your youth to me when I awake, or else—

[With malignant cruelty]

I will have to revenge the death of a hope on you—and a hope at my age demands a terrible expiation on its slayer!

[He walks down and starts to go off, right—then turns and addresses LAZ-ARUS with grim irony]

Good night to you, Lazarus And remember there shall be death while I am Cæsar!

[He turns to go]

LAZARUS

[Smiling affectionately at him, shakes his head]

Cæsar must believe in death But does the husband of Agrippina?

TIBERIUS

[Stops short and stares at LAZARUS, confused and stuttering]

What—what—do you mean, Lazarus?

LAZARUS

I have heard your loneliness

TIBERIUS

[Cruelly and grimly again]

So much the more reason why my pride should kill you! Remember that!

[He turns and strides off into the darkness at right]

CALIGULA

[Peers after him until sure he is gone—then gets up and begins a grotesque,

hopping dance, singing a verse of the legionary's song]

A bold legionary am I
March, oh march on!
A Roman eagle was my daddy
My mother was a drunken drabby
Oh march on to the wars!

[He laughs gratingly, posturing and gesticulating up at LAZARUS]

Ha-ha-ha! He is gone! I can breathe! His breath in the same air suffocates me! The gods grant mine do the same for him! But he is failing! He talks to himself like a man in second childhood. His words are a thick babble I could not hear. They well from his lips like clots of blood from a reopened wound. I kept listening to the beating of his heart. It sounded slow, slower than when I last heard it. Did you detect that, Lazarus? Once or twice I thought it faltered—

[He draws in his breath with an avid gasps—then laughs gratingly]

Ha-ha-ha—

[Grandiloquently]

Tiberius, the old buck goat, will soon be gone, my friends, and in his place you will be blessed with the beautiful young god, Caligula! Hail to Caligula! Hail! Ha-haha—

[His laughter suddenly breaks off into a whimper and he stands staring around him in a panic of fear that he has been overheard. He slinks noiselessly up the steps of the dais and squats coweringly at LAZARUS' feet, blinking up at his face in monkey-wise, clutching LAZARUS' hand in both of his. His teeth can be heard chattering together in nervous fear]

[POMPEIA, whose gaze has remained fixed on LAZARUS' throughout, has gradually moved closer to him until she, too, is at his feet, half-kneeling beneath the table on which MIRIAM lies, side by side with CALIGULA but as oblivious of him as he is of her]

[Having grown calmer now, CALIGULA speaks again—mournful and bewildered]

CALIGULA

Why should I love you, Lazarus? Your laughter taunts me! It insults Caesar! It denies Rome! But I will warn you again.

Escape! Tonight Tiberius' mood is to play sentimental, but tomorrow he will jeer while hyenas gnaw at your skull and lick your brain. And then—there is pain, Lazarus! There is pain!

POMPEIA

*[Pressing her hand to her own heart—
with a shudder]*

10 Yes, there is pain!

LAZARUS

[Smiling down on them—gently]

If you can answer. Yes to pain, there is no pain!

POMPEIA

[Passionately]

20

Yes! Yes! I love Lazarus!

CALIGULA

[With a bitter grin]

Do not take pain away from us! It is our one truth. Without pain there is nothing—a nothingness in which even your laughter, Lazarus, is swallowed at one gulp like a whining gnat by the cretin's silence of immensity! Ha-ha! No, we must keep pain!
Especially Caesar must! Pain must twinkle with a mad mirth in a Caesar's eyes—men's pain—or they would become dissatisfied and disrespectful! Ha-ha!

[He stops his grating laughter abruptly and continues mournfully]

I am sick, Lazarus, sick of cruelty and lust and human flesh and all the imbecilities of pleasure—the unclean antics of halfwitted children!

[With a mounting agony of longing]

I would be clean! If I could only laugh your laughter, Lazarus! That would purify my heart. For I could wish to love all men, as you love them—as I love you! If only I did not fear them and despise them! If I could only believe—believe in them—in life—in myself!—believe that one man or woman in the world knew and loved the real Caligula—then I might have faith in Caligula myself—then I might laugh your laughter!

LAZARUS

[Suddenly, in a quiet but compelling voice]

I, who know you, love you, Caligula.

[Gently patting his head]

I love Caligula

CALIGULA

[Staring up at him in pathetic confusion]

You? You? You, Lazarus?

[He begins to tremble all over as if in a seizure—chokingly]

Beware! It is not good—not just—to make fun of me—to laugh at my misery—saying you love—

[In a frenzy, he jumps to his feet threatening LAZARUS]

Are you trying to fool me, hypocrite? Do you think I have become so abject that you dare—? Because I love you, do you presume—? Do you think I am your slave, dog of a Jew, that you can—insult—to my face—the heir of Cæsar—

[He stutters and stammers with rage, hopping up and down grotesquely, shaking his fist at LAZARUS, who smiles at him affectionately as at a child in a tantrum]

LAZARUS

[Catching his eyes and holding them with his glance—calmly]

Believe, Caligula!

CALIGULA

[Again overcome—stuttering with strange terror]

Believe? But I cannot! I must not! You cannot know me, if—You are a holy man! You are a god in a mortal body—you can laugh with joy to be alive—while I—Oh, no, you cannot love me! There is nothing in me at bottom but a despising and an evil eye! You cannot! You are only being kind!

[Hysterically]

I do not want your kindness! I hate your pity! I am too proud! I am too strong!

[He collapses weepingly, kneeling and clutching LAZARUS' hand in both of his]

LAZARUS

[Smiling]

You are so proud of being evil! What if there is no evil? What if there are only health and sickness? Believe in the healthy god called Man in you! Laugh at Caligula, the funny clown who beats the backside of his shadow with a bladder and thinks thereby he is Evil, the Enemy of God!

[He suddenly lifts the face of CALIGULA and stares into his eyes]

Believe! What if you are a man and men are despicable? Men are also unimportant! Men pass! Like rain into the sea! The sea remains! Man remains! Man slowly arises from the past of the race of men that was his tomb of death! For Man death is not! Man, Son of God's Laughter, is!

[He begins to laugh triumphantly, staring deep into CALIGULA's eyes]

I, Caligula! Believe in the laughing god within you!

CALIGULA

[Bursting suddenly into choking, joyful laughter—like a visionary]

I believe! I believe there is love even for Caligula! I can laugh—now—Lazarus! Free laughter! Clean! No sickness! No lust for death! My corpse no longer rots in my heart! The tomb is full of sunlight! I am alive! I who love Man, I who can love and laugh! Listen, Lazarus! I dream! When I am Cæsar, I will devote my power to your truth I will decree that there must be kindness and love! I will make the Empire one great Blessed Isle! Rome shall know happiness, it shall believe in life, it shall learn to laugh your laughter, Lazarus, or I—

[He raises his hand in an imperial autocratic gesture]

LAZARUS

[Gaily mocking]

Or you will cut off its head?

CALIGULA

[Fiercely]

Yes! I will—!

[Then meeting LAZARUS' eyes, he beats his head with his fists crazily]

Forgive me! I forget! I forget!

LAZARUS

Go out under the sky! Let your heart climb on laughter to a star! Then make it look down at earth, and watch Caligula commanding Life under pain of death to do his will!

[He laughs]

CALIGULA

[Laughing]

I will! I do! I laugh at him! Caligula is a trained ape, a humped cripple! Now I take him out under the sky, where I can watch his monkey tricks, where there is space for laughter and where this new joy, your love of me, may dance!

[Laughing clearly and exultantly, he runs out through the arched doorway at rear]

LAZARUS

[Stops laughing—shaking his head, almost sadly]

They forget! It is too soon for laughter!

[Then grinning at himself]

What, Lazarus? Are you too, thinking in terms of time, old fool so soon to reenter infinity?

[He laughs with joyous self-mockery]

POMPEIA

[Who has crept to his feet, kisses his hand passionately]

I love you, Lazarus!

LAZARUS

[Stops laughing, and looks down at her gently]

And I love you, woman.

POMPEIA

[With a gasp of delight]

You?

[She stares up into his eyes doubtfully, raising her face toward his]

Then—put your arms around me

[He does so, smiling gently]

And hold me to you

[He presses her closer to him]

And kiss me.

[He kisses her on the forehead]

No, on the lips!

[He kisses her. She flings her arms about his neck passionately and kisses him again and again—then slowly draws away—remains looking into his eyes a long time, shrinking back from him with bewildered pain which speedily turns to rage and revengeful hatred]

No! No! It is my love, not Love! I want you to know my love, to give me back love—for me—only for me—Pompeia—my body, my heart—me, a woman—not Woman, women! Do I love Man, men? I hate men! I love you, Lazarus—a man—a lover—a father to children! I want love—as you loved that woman there that I poisoned for love of you! But did you love her—or just Woman, wife and mother of men?

[She stares—then as if reading admission in his eyes, she springs to her feet]

Liar! Cheat! Hypocrite! Thief!

[Half hysterical with rage, pain and grief, she bends over MIRIAM and smooths the hair back from her forehead]

Poor wife! Poor woman! How he must have tortured you! Now I remember the pity in your eyes when you looked at me! Oh, how his soothing gray words must have pecked at the wound in your heart like doves with bloody beaks!

[Then with sudden harshness]

But perhaps you were too dull to understand, too poor and tired and ugly and old to care, too slavish—! Pah!

[She turns away with contempt and faces LAZARUS with revengeful hatred]

Did you think I would take her place—become your slave, wait upon you, give you love and passion and beauty in exchange for phrases about man and gods—you who are neither a man nor a god but a dead thing without desire! You dared to hope I would give my body, my love, to you!

[She spits in his face and laughs harshly]

You insolent fool! I shall punish you! You shall be tortured as you have tortured!

[She laughs wildly—then steps down from the dais and goes off right, crying distractedly]

Cæsar! This man has made you a fool before all the world! Torture him, Cæsar! Now! Let the people witness! Send heralds to wake them! Torture him, Cæsar, the man who laughs at you! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[Her laughter is caught up by all the GIRLS and YOUTHS of the palace, who, as she disappears, led by their CHORUS, pour in from each side of the room and dance forward to group themselves around the dais as in the previous scene, staring at LAZARUS, laughing cruelly, falsely, stridently]

CHORUS

[Tauntingly]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!
Laugh now, Lazarus!
Let us see you laugh!
Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CROWD

[Echoing]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!
Ha-ha-ha-ha!

LAZARUS

[Moves, and immediately there is silence. He bends down and kisses MIRIAM and picks her up in his arms. Talking down to her face—with a tender smile]

Farewell! You are home! And now I will take your body home to earth! Space is too far away, you said! Home in the earth! There will be so much for you to do there! Home! Earth!

[His voice trembling a bit]

Farewell, body of Miriam. My grief is a lonely cry wailing in the home in my heart that you have left forever!

[Then exultantly]

But what am I? Now your love has become Eternal Love! Now, since your life passed, I feel Eternal Life made nobler by your selflessness! Love has grown purer! The laughter of God is more profoundly tender!

[He looks up in an ecstasy and descends the dais, carrying her]

Yes, that is it! That is it, my Miriam!

[Laughing softly and tenderly, he walks around the dais and carries the body out through the doorway in rear]

[The CHORUS and YOUTHS and GIRLS make way for him in awed silence—then scurry around to right and left, forming an aisle through which he passes—then after he has gone out through the arch, they close into a semicircular group again, staring after him, and a whisper of strange, bewildered, tender laughter comes from them]

CHORUS

[In this whisper]

That is it!
Love is pure!
Laughter is tender!
Laugh!

10

CROWD

[Echoing]

Laugh! Laugh!

CURTAIN

SCENE TWO

SCENE: The arena of an amphitheatre. It is just before dawn of the same night. Cæsar's throne is on the left at the extreme front, facing right, turned a little toward front. It is lighted by four immense lamps. In front of the throne is a marble railing that tops the wall that encloses the arena. In the rear the towering pile of the circular amphitheatre is faintly outlined in deeper black against the dark sky.

20

TIBERIUS sits on the throne, his eyes fixed on the middle of the arena off right, where, bound to a high stake after he had been tortured, LAZARUS is now being burnt alive over a huge pile of faggots. The crackling of the flames is heard. Their billowing rise and fall is reflected on the masked faces of the multitude who sit on the banked tiers of marble behind and to the rear of the throne, with their CHORUS, seven men masked in Middle Age in the Servile, Hypocritical type, grouped on each side of the throne of Cæsar on a lower tier. Half-kneeling before TIBERIUS, her chin resting on her hands on top of the marble rail, POMPEIA also stares at LAZARUS.

*Before the curtain, the crackle of the flames and an uproar of human voices from the multitude, jeering, hooting, laughing at LAZARUS in cruel mockery of his laughter.
This sound has risen to its greatest volume as the curtain rises*

CHORUS

[Chanting mockingly]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!
Burn and laugh!
Laugh now, Lazarus!
Ha-ha-ha-ha!

CROWD

[Chanting with revengeful mockery]

Ha-ha-ha-ha!

TIBERIUS

Who laughs now, Lazarus—thou or Cæsar?
Ha-ha—!

[With awe]

His flesh melts in the fire but his eyes shine with peace!

POMPEIA

How he looks at me!

[Averting her eyes with a shudder]

Command them to put out his eyes, Cæsar!

TIBERIUS

[Harshly]

No I want to read his eyes when they see 20
death!

[Then averting his face—guiltily]

He is looking at me, not you I should not have listened to your cries for his death

POMPEIA

[Turning to him again with a shudder of agony—beseechingly]

Have them put out his eyes, Cæsar! They call to me!

TIBERIUS

[As if not hearing her—to himself]

Why do I feel remorse? His laughter dies and is forgotten, and the hope it raised 30 dies—

[With sudden excitement]

And yet—he must know something—and if he would—even now he could tell—

[Suddenly rising to his feet he calls imploringly]

Lazarus!

CHORUS

[Chanting in a great imploring chorus now]

Lazarus!

CROWD

[Echoing]

Lazarus!

SOLDIER'S VOICE

[Calling from off beside the stake]

You had us gag him, Cæsar, so he might 10 not laugh Shall we cut away the gag?

POMPEIA

[In terror]

No, Cæsar! He will laugh! And I will go to him!

[Desperately]

He will laugh at you, Cæsar—and the mob will laugh with him!

TIBERIUS

[Struggles with himself—then calls]

Lazarus! If you hear let your eyes answer, and I will grant the mercy of death to end your agony! Is there hope of love somewhere for men on earth?

CHORUS

[Intoning as before]

Is there hope of love
For us on earth?

CROWD

Hope of love
For us on earth!

SOLDIER'S VOICE

His eyes laugh, Cæsar!

TIBERIUS

[In a strange frenzy now]

Hear me, thou Dæmon of Laughter! Hear and answer, I beseech thee, who alone hath known joy!

[More and more wildly]
How must we live? Wherein lies happiness?

CHORUS

Wherein lies happiness?

CROWD

Wherein, happiness?

TIBERIUS

Why are we born? To what end must we die?

CHORUS

Why are we born to die?

CROWD

Why are we born?

SOLDIER'S VOICE

His eyes laugh, Cæsar! He is dying! He would speak!

CHORUS AND CROWD

[In one great cry]

Cæsar! Let Lazarus speak!

POMPEIA

[Terrified]

No, Cæsar! He will laugh—and you will die—and I will go to him!

TIBERIUS

[Torn—arguing with his fear]

But—he may know some hope—

[Then making his decision, with grim fatalism]

Hope—or nothing!

[Calls to the SOLDIERS]

Let him speak!

CHORUS AND CROWD

[Cheering]

Hail, Cæsar!

LAZARUS

[His voice comes, recognizably the voice of LAZARUS, yet with a strange, fresh, clear quality of boyhood, gaily mocking with life]

Hail, Cæsar!

CROWD

[Frantic with hope]

Hail, Lazarus!

TIBERIUS

Pull away the fire from him! I see death in his eyes!

[The flaming reflections in the banked, masked faces dance madly as the SOLDIERS rake back the fire from the stake With a forced, taunting mockery]

What do you say now, Lazarus? You are dying!

CHORUS AND CROWD

[Taking his tone—mockingly]

You are dying, Lazarus!

LAZARUS

[His voice a triumphant assertion of the victory of life over pain and death]

Yes!

TIBERIUS

[Triumphant yet disappointed—with scorn and rage]

Ha! You admit it, do you, coward! Craven!

Knave! Duper of fools! Clown! Liar! Diel
I laugh at you! Ha-ha-ha-ha—

[His voice breaks chokingly]

CROWD

[Led by their CHORUS—in the same frenzy of disappointment, with all sorts of grotesque and obscene gestures and noises, thumbing their fingers to their noses, wagging them at their ears, sticking out their tongues, slapping their behinds, barking, crowing like roosters, howling, and hooting in every conceivable manner]

Yah! Yah! Yellow Gut! Bungkisser! Muckheel! Scumwiper! Liar! Pig! Jackal! Die!

 We laugh at you! Ha-ha-ha—
[Their voices, too, break]

POMPEIA

[Rising to her feet like one in a trance, staring toward LAZARUS]

They are tormenting him I hear him crying to me!

[She moves to the top of the steps leading to the arena]

LAZARUS

[His voice thrilling with exultance]

O men, fear not life! You die—but there is no death for Man!

[He begins to laugh, and at the sound of his laughter, a great spell of silence settles upon all his hearers—then as his laughter rises, they begin to laugh with him]

POMPEIA

[Descending the steps like a sleep-walker]

I hear his laughter calling I must go to him

TIBERIUS

[As if he realized something was happening that was against his will—trying feebly to be imperial]

I command you not to laugh! Cæsar commands—

[Calling feebly to the SOLDIERS]

Put back—the gag! Stop his laughter!

[The laughter of LAZARUS gaily and lovingly mocks back at him]

SOLDIER'S VOICE

[His voice gently remonstrating]

We may not, Cæsar We love his laughter! 20
[They laugh with him]

CHORUS AND CROWD

[In a soft, dreamy murmur]

We love his laughter!
 We laugh!

TIBERIUS

[Dreamily]

Then—pile the fire back around him High and higher! Let him blaze to the stars! I laugh with him!

SOLDIER'S VOICE

[Gently and gravely]

That is just, Cæsar We love men flaming toward the stars! We laugh with him!

CHORUS AND CROWD

[As the flames, piled back and fed anew by the SOLDIERS, flare upward and are reflected on their masks in dancing waves of light]

We love men flaming toward the stars!
 We laugh!

POMPEIA

[In the arena]

The fire calls me My burning heart calls for the fire!

[She laughs softly and passes swiftly across the arena toward LAZARUS]

TIBERIUS

[In a sort of childish complaint]

You must pardon me, Lazarus This is my Cæsar's duty—to kill you! You have no right to laugh—before all these people—at Cæsar It is not kind

[He sobs snuffingly—then begins to laugh at himself]

[Suddenly the flames waver, die down, then shoot up again and POMPEIA's laughter is heard for a moment, rising clear and passionately with that of LAZARUS, then dying quickly out]

SOLDIER'S VOICE

A woman has thrown herself in the flames, Cæsar! She laughs with Lazarus!

TIBERIUS

[In a sudden panicky flurry—feverishly]

Quick, Lazarus! You will soon be silent! Speak!—in the name of man's solitude—his agony of farewell—what is beyond there, Lazarus?

[His voice has risen to a passionate entreaty]

CHORUS

[In a great pleading echo]

What is beyond there, Lazarus?

CROWD

• What is beyond?

LAZARUS

[His voice speaking lovingly, with a surpassing clearness and exaltation]

Life! Eternity! Stars and dust! God's Eternal Laughter!

[His laughter bursts forth now in its highest pitch of ecstatic summons to the feast and sacrifice of Life, the Eternal]

[The crowds laugh with him in a frenzied rhythmic chorus Led by the CHORUS, they pour down from the banked walls of the amphitheatre and dance in the flaring reflection of the flames strange wild measures of liberated joy TIBERIUS stands on the raised dais laughing great shouts of clear, fearless laughter]

CHORUS

[Chanting as they dance]

Laugh! Laugh!
We are stars!
We are dust!
We are gods!
We are laughter!

CROWD

We are dust!
We are gods!
Laugh! Laugh!

CALIGULA

[Enters from behind TIBERIUS. His aspect is wild, his hair disheveled, his clothes torn, he is panting as if exhausted by running He stares toward the flames stupidly—then screams despairingly above the chant]

Lazarus! I come to save you! Do you still live, Lazarus? 30

TIBERIUS

[Has been speaking His words are now

heard as the tumult momentarily dies down]

I have lived long enough! I will die with Lazarus! I no longer fear death! I laugh! I laugh at Cæsar! I advise you, my brothers, fear not Cæsars! Seek Man in the brotherhood of the dust! Cæsar is your fear of Man! I counsel you, laugh away your Cæsars!

CALIGULA

[With resentful jealousy and rage—in a voice rising to a scream]

10 What do I hear, Lazarus? You laugh with your murderer? You give him your laughter? You have forgotten me—my love—you make him love you—you make him laugh at Cæsars—at me!

[Suddenly springs on TIBERIUS in a fury and grabbing him by the throat chokes him, forcing him back on the throne—screaming]

Die, traitor! Die!

[TIBERIUS' body relaxes in his hands, dead, and slips from the chair CALIGULA rushes madly down the stairs into the midst of the oblivious, laughing, dancing crowd, screaming]

You have betrayed me, dog of a Jew! You have betrayed Cæsar!

[Beginning to be caught by the contagion of the laughter]

20 Ha-ah—No! I will not laugh! I will kill you! Give me a spear!

[He snatches a spear from a soldier and fights his way drunkenly toward the flames, like a man half overcome by a poisonous gas, shouting, half-laughing in spite of himself, half-weeping with rage]

Ha-ah—The gods be with Cæsar Caligula! O Immortal Gods, give thy brother strength! You shall die, Lazarus—die—Ha-ah—!

[He disappears toward the flames, his spear held ready to stab]

CHORUS AND CROWD

[Who have been entirely oblivious of him—chanting]

Laugh! Laugh!
We are gods!
We are dust!

LAZARUS

[At his first word there is a profound silence in which each dancer remains frozen in the last movement]

Hail, Caligula Cæsar! Men forget!

[He laughs with gay mockery as at a child]

CHORUS AND CROWD

[Starting to laugh]

Laugh! Laugh!

[Then there is a fierce cry of rage from CALIGULA and LAZARUS' laughter ceases, and with it the laughter of the crowd turns to a wail of fear and lamentation]

CALIGULA

[Dashes back among them waving his bloody spear and rushing up to the throne stands on it and strikes a grandiose pose]

I have killed God! I am Death! Death is Cæsar!

CHORUS AND CROWD

[Turning and scurrying away—huddled in fleeing groups, crouching close to the ground like a multitude of terrified rats, their voices squeaky now with fright]

Hail, Cæsar! Hail to Death!

[They are gone]

CALIGULA

[Keeping his absurd majestic pose, turns and addresses with rhetorical intoning, and flowing gestures, the body of LAZARUS, high upon its stake, the flames below it now flickering fitfully]

Hail, Caligula! Hero of heroes, conqueror of the Dæmon, Lazarus, who taught the treason that fear and death were dead! But I am Lord of Fear! I am Cæsar of Death! And you, Lazarus, are carrion!

[Then in a more conversational tone, putting aside his grandiose airs, confidentially]

I had to kill you, Lazarus! Surely your good sense tells you—You heard what the old fool, Tiberius, told the mob A moment more and there would have been a revolution—no more Cæsars—and my dream—!

[He stops—bewilderedly]

My dream? Did I kill laughter? I had just learned to laugh—with love!

[More confusedly]

I must be a little mad, Lazarus It was one terror too many, to have been laughing your laughter in the night, to have been dreaming great yearning dreams of all the good my love might do for men when I was Cæsar—and then, to hear the old howling of mob lust, and to run here—and there a high white flame amidst the fire—you, Lazarus!—dying!—laughing with him—Tiberius—betraying me—who loved you, Lazarus! Yes, I became mad! I am mad! And I can laugh my own mad laughter, Lazarus—my own! Ha-ha-ha-ha!

[He laughs with a wild triumphant madness and again rhetorically, with sweeping gestures and ferocious capers]

And all of men are vile and mad, and I shall be their madmen's Cæsar!

[He turns as if addressing an amphitheatre full of his subjects]

O my good people, my faithful scum, my brother swine, Lazarus is dead and we have murdered great laughter, and it befits our madness to have done so, and it is befitting above all to have Caligula for Cæsar!

[Then savagely]

Kneel down! Abase yourselves! I am your Cæsar and your God! Hail!

[He stands saluting himself with a crazy intensity that is not without grandeur A pause Suddenly the silence seems to crush down upon him, he is aware that he is alone in the vast arena, he whirls about, looking around him as if he felt an assassin at his back, he lunges with his spear at imaginary foes, jumping, dodging from side to side, yelping]

Ho, there! Help! Help! Your Cæsar calls you! Help, my people! To the rescue!

[Suddenly throwing his spear away and sinking on his knees, his face toward LAZARUS, supplicatingly]

Lazarus! Forgive me! Help me! Fear kills me! Save me from death!

[He is groveling in a paroxysm of terror, grinding his face in his fists as if to hide it]

LAZARUS

[His voice is heard in a gentle, expiring sigh of compassion, followed by a faint dying note of laughter that rises and is lost in the sky like the flight of his soul back into the womb of Infamy]

Fear not, Caligula! There is no death!

CALIGULA

[Lifts his head at the first sound and rises with the laughter to his feet, until, as it is finally lost, he is on tip-toes, his arms straining upward to the sky, a tender, childish laughter of love on his lips]

I laugh, Lazarus! I laugh with you!

[Then grief-stricken]

Lazarus!

[He hides his face in his hands, weeping]

No more!

[Then beats his head with his fists]

I will remember! I will!

[Then suddenly, with a return to grotesqueness—harshly]

All the same, I killed him and I proved there is death!

[Immediately overcome by remorse, groveling and beating himself]

Fool! Madman! Forgive me, Lazarus! Men forget!

HOW WRITING IS WRITTEN <sup>1</sup>

WHAT I want to talk about to you is just the general subject of how writing is written. The beginning of it is what everybody has to know: everybody is contemporary with his period. A very bad painter once said to a very great painter, 'Do what you like, you cannot get rid of the fact that we are contemporaries.' That is what goes on in writing. The whole crowd of you are contemporary to each other, and the whole business of writing is the question of living in that contemporariness. Each generation has to live in that. The thing that is important is that nobody knows what the contemporariness is. In other words, they don't know where they are going, but they are on their way.

Each generation has to do with what you would call the daily life and a writer, painter, or any sort of creative artist, is not at all ahead of his time. He is contemporary. He can't live in the past, because it is gone. He can't live in the future, because no one knows what it is. He can live only in the present of his daily life. He is expressing

10 the thing that is being expressed by everybody else in their daily lives. The thing you have to remember is that everybody lives a contemporary daily life. The writer lives it, too, and expresses it imperceptibly. The fact remains that in the act of living, everybody has to live contemporarily. But in the things concerning art and literature they don't have to live contemporarily, because it doesn't make any difference, and they live about forty years behind their time. And that is the real explanation of why the artist or painter is not recognized by his contemporaries. He is expressing the time-sense of his contemporaries, but nobody is really interested. After the new generation has come, after the grandchildren, so to speak, then the opposition dies out because after all there is then a new contemporary expression to oppose.

30 That is really the fact about contemporariness. As I see the whole crowd of you, if there are any of you who are going to express yourselves contemporarily, you will do something which most people won't want to look at. Most of you will be so busy living the contemporary life that it will be like the tired business man in the things of the mind you will want the things you know. And too, if you don't live contemporarily, you are a nuisance. That is why we live contemporarily If a man goes along the street with horse and carriage in New York in the snow, that man is a nuisance, and he knows it, so now he doesn't do it He would not be living, or acting, contemporarily he would only be in the way, a drag

The world can accept me now because there is coming out of your generation somebody they won't like, and therefore they accept me because I am sufficiently 10 past in having been contemporary so they don't have to dislike me So thirty years from now I shall be accepted And the same thing will happen again that is the reason why every generation has the same thing happen It will always be the same story, because there is always the same situation presented The contemporary thing in art and literature is the thing 20 which doesn't make enough difference to the people of that generation so that they can accept it or reject it

Most of you know that in a funny kind of way you are nearer your grandparents than your parents Since this contemporariness is always there, nobody realizes that you cannot follow it up That is the reason people discover—those interested in the activities of other people—that they cannot understand their contemporaries 30 If you kids started in to write, I wouldn't be a good judge of you, because I am of the third generation What you are going to do I don't know any more than anyone else But I created a movement of which you are the grandchildren The contemporary thing is the thing you can't get away from That is the fundamental thing in all writing

Another thing you have to remember is 40 that each period of time not only has its contemporary quality, but it has a time-sense Things move more quickly, slowly, or differently, from one generation to another Take the Nineteenth Century The Nineteenth Century was roughly the Englishman's Century And their method, as they themselves, in their worst moments, speak of it, is that of 'muddling through' 50 They begin at one end and hope to come out at the other their grammar, parts of speech, methods of talk, go with this fashion The United States began a different phase when, after the Civil War, they discovered and created out of their inner need a different way of life They created the Twentieth Century The United States, instead of having the feeling of beginning at one end and ending at another, had the conception of assembling the whole thing out of its parts, the whole thing which made the Twentieth Century productive. The Twentieth Century conceived an automobile as a whole, so to speak, and then created it, 10 built it up out of its parts It was an entirely different point of view from the Nineteenth Century's The Nineteenth Century would have seen the parts, and worked towards the automobile through them

Now in a funny sort of way this expresses, in different terms, the difference between the literature of the Nineteenth Century and the literature of the Twentieth Think 20 of your reading If you look at it from the days of Chaucer, you will see that what you might call the 'internal history' of a country always affects its use of writing It makes a difference in the expression, in the vocabulary, even in the handling of grammar In an amusing story in your Literary Magazine, when the author speaks of the fact that he is tired of using quotation marks and isn't going to use them any more, with him that is a joke, but when I began writing, the whole question of punctuation was a vital question You see, I had this new conception I had this conception of the whole paragraph, and in The Making of Americans I had this idea of a whole thing But if you think of contemporary English writers, it doesn't work like that at all They conceive of it as 40 pieces put together to make a whole, and I conceived it as a whole made up of its parts I didn't know what I was doing any more than you know, but in response to the need of my period I was doing this thing That is why I came in contact with people who were unconsciously doing the same thing They had the Twentieth Century conception of a whole So the element of punctuation was very vital The comma 50 was just a nuisance If you got the thing as a whole, the comma kept irritating you all along the line If you think of a thing as a whole, and the comma keeps sticking out, it gets on your nerves, because, after all, it destroys the reality of the whole So

I got rid more and more of commas. Not because I had any prejudice against commas, but the comma was a stumbling-block. When you were conceiving a sentence, the comma stopped you. That is the illustration of the question of grammar and parts of speech, as part of the daily life as we live it.

The other thing which I accomplished was the getting rid of nouns. In the Twentieth Century you feel like movement. The Nineteenth Century didn't feel that way. The element of movement was not the predominating thing that they felt. You know that in your lives movement is the thing that occupies you most—you feel movement all the time. And the United States had the first instance of what I call Twentieth Century writing. You see it first in Walt Whitman. He was the beginning of movement. He didn't see it very clearly, but there was a sense of movement that the European was much influenced by, because the Twentieth Century has become the American Century. That is what I mean when I say that each generation has its own literature.

There is a third element. You see, everybody in his generation has his sense of time which belongs to his crowd. But then, you always have the memory of what you were brought up with. In most people that makes a double time, which makes confusion. When one is beginning to write he is always under the shadow of the thing that is just past. And that is the reason why the creative person always has the appearance of ugliness. There is this persistent drag of the habits that belong to you. And in struggling away from this thing there is always an ugliness. That is the other reason why the contemporary writer is always refused. It is the effort of escaping from the thing which is a drag upon you that is so strong that the result is an apparent ugliness, and the world always says of the new writer, 'It is so ugly!' And they are right, because it is ugly. If you disagree with your parents, there is an ugliness in the relation. There is a double resistance that makes the essence of this thing ugly.

You always have in your writing the resistance outside of you and inside of you, a shadow upon you, and the thing which you must express. In the beginning of your writing, this struggle is so tremendous that that result is ugly, and that is the reason why the followers are always accepted before the person who made the revolution. The person who has made the fight probably makes it seem ugly, although the struggle has the much greater beauty. But the followers die out, and the man who made the struggle and the quality of beauty remains in the intensity of the fight. Eventually it comes out all right, and so you have this very queer situation which always happens with the followers: the original person has to have in him a certain element of ugliness. You know that is what happens over and over again: the statement made that it is ugly—the statement made against me for the last twenty years. And they are quite right, because it is ugly. But the essence of that ugliness is the thing which will always make it beautiful. I myself think it is much more interesting when it seems ugly, because in it you see the element of the fight. The literature of one hundred years ago is perfectly easy to see, because the sediment of ugliness has settled down and you got the solemnity of its beauty. But to a person of my temperament, it is much more amusing when it has the vitality of the struggle.

In my own case, the Twentieth Century, which America created after the Civil War, and which had certain elements, had a definite influence on me. And in The Making of Americans, which is a book I would like to talk about, I gradually and slowly found out that there were two things I had to think about, the fact that knowledge is acquired, so to speak, by memory, but that when you know anything, memory doesn't come in. At any moment that you are conscious of knowing anything, memory plays no part. When any of you feels anybody else, memory doesn't come into it. You have the sense of the immediate. Remember that my immediate forebears were people like Meredith, Thomas Hardy, and so forth, and you will see what a struggle it was to do this thing. This was one of my first efforts to give the appearance of one time-knowledge, and not to make it a narrative story. This is what I mean by immediacy of description: you will find it in The Mak- ing of Americans 'It happens very often that a man has it in him, that a man does something, that he does it very often that he does many things, when he is a young man when he is an old man, when he is an older man' Do you see what I mean? And here is a description of a thing that is very interesting 'One of such of these kind of them had a little boy and this one, the little son wanted to make a collection of butterflies and beetles and it was all exciting to him and it was all arranged then and then the father said to the son you are certain this is not a cruel thing that you are wanting to be doing, killing things to make collections of them, and the son was very disturbed then and they talked about it together the two of them and more and more they talked about it then and then at last the boy was convinced it was a cruel thing and he said he would not do it and the father said the little boy was a noble boy to give up pleasure when it was a cruel one The boy went to bed then and then the father when he got up in the early morning saw a wonderfully beautiful moth in the room and he caught him and he killed him and he pinned him and he woke up his son then and showed it to him and he said to him "see what a good father I am to have caught and killed this one," the boy was all mixed up inside him and then he said he would go on with his collecting and that was all there was then of discussing and this is a little description of something that happened once and it is very interesting'

I was trying to get this present immediacy without trying to drag in anything else I had to use present participles, new constructions of grammar The grammar-constructions are correct, but they are changed, in order to get this immediacy. In short, from that time I have been trying in every possible way to get the sense of immediacy, and practically all the work I have done has been in that direction.

In The Making of Americans I had an idea that I could get a sense of immediacy if I made a description of every kind of human being that existed, the rules for resemblances and all the other things, until really I had made a description of every human being—I found this out when I was at Harvard working under William James

Did you ever see that article that came out in The Atlantic Monthly a year or two ago, about my experiments with automatic writing? It was very amusing The experiment that I did was to take a lot of people in moments of fatigue and rest and activity of various kinds, and see if they could do anything with automatic writing. I found they could not do anything with automatic writing, but I found out a great deal about how people act I found there a certain kind of human being who acted in a certain way, and another kind who acted in another kind of way, and their resemblances and their differences. And then I wanted to find out if you could make a history of the whole world, if you could know the whole life history of everyone in the world, their slight resemblances and lack of resemblances I made enormous charts, and I tried to carry these charts out You start in and you take everyone that you know, and then when you see anybody who has a certain expression or turn of the face that reminds you of some one, you find out where he agrees or disagrees with the character, until you build up the whole scheme I got to the place where I didn't know whether I knew people or not I made so many charts that when I used to go down the streets of Paris I wondered whether they were people I knew or ones I didn't That is what The Making of Americans was intended to be I was to make a description of every kind of human being until I could know by these variations how everybody was to be known Then I got very much interested in this thing, and I wrote about nine hundred pages, and I came to a logical conclusion that this thing could be done Anybody who has patience enough could literally and entirely make of the whole world a history of human nature When I found it could be done, I lost interest in it As soon as I found definitely and clearly and completely that I could do it, I stopped writing the long book It didn't interest me any longer. In doing the thing, I found out this question of resemblances, and I found in making these analyses that the resemblances were not of memory I had to remember what person looked like the other person Then I found this contradiction that the resemblances were a matter of memory.

There were two prime elements involved, the element of memory and the other of immediacy

The element of memory was a perfectly feasible thing, so then I gave it up I then started a book which I called A Long Gay Book to see if I could work the thing up to a faster tempo I wanted to see if I could make that a more complete vision I wanted to see if I could hold it in the frame Ordinarily the novels of the Nineteenth Century live by association, they are wont to call up other pictures than the one they present to you I didn't want, when I said 'water,' to have you think of running water Therefore I began limiting my vocabulary, because I wanted to get rid of anything except the picture within the frame While I was writing I didn't want, when I used one word, to make it carry with it too many associations I wanted as far as possible to make it exact, as exact as mathematics, that is to say, for example, if one and one make two, I wanted to get words to have as much exactness as that When I put them down they were to have this quality The whole history of my work, from The Making of Americans, has been a history of that I made a great many discoveries, but the thing that I was always trying to do was this thing

One thing which came to me is that the Twentieth Century gives of itself a feeling of movement, and has in its way no feeling for events To the Twentieth Century events are not important You must know that Events are not exciting Events have lost their interest for people You read them more like a soothing syrup, and if you listen over the radio you don't get very excited The thing has got to this place, that events are so wonderful that they are not exciting Now you have to remember that the business of an artist is to be exciting If the thing has its proper vitality, the result must be exciting I was struck with it during the War the average dough-boy standing on a street corner doing nothing—(they say, at the end of their doing nothing, 'I guess I'll go home')—was much more exciting to people than when the soldiers went over the top The populace were passionately interested in their standing on the street corners, more so than in the St Mihiel drive And it is a perfectly natural thing Events had got so continuous that the fact that events were taking place no longer stimulated anybody. To see three men, strangers, standing, expressed their personality to the European man so much more than anything else they could do. That thing impressed me very much But the novel which tells about what happens is of no interest to anybody

10 It is quite characteristic that in The Making of Americans, Proust, Ulysses, nothing much happens People are interested in existence Newspapers excite people very little Sometimes a personality breaks through the newspapers—Lindbergh, Dillinger—when the personality has vitality It wasn't what Dillinger did that excited anybody The feeling is perfectly simple You can see it in my Four Saints Saints 20 shouldn't do anything The fact that a saint is there is enough for anybody The Four Saints was written about as static as I could make it The saints conversed a little, and it all did something It did something more than the theatre which has tried to make events has done For our purposes, for our contemporary purposes, events have no importance I merely say that for the last thirty years events are of 30 no importance They may make a great many people unhappy, they may cause convulsions in history, but from the standpoint of excitement, the kind of excitement the Nineteenth Century got out of events doesn't exist

And so what I am trying to make you understand is that every contemporary writer has to find out what is the inner time-sense of his contemporariness The writer 40 or painter, or what not, feels this thing more vibrantly, and he has a passionate need of putting it down, and that is what creativeness does He spends his life in putting down this thing which he doesn't know is a contemporary thing If he doesn't put down the contemporary thing, he isn't a great writer, for he has to live in the past. That is what I mean by 'everything is contemporary' The minor poets of the period, 50 or the precious poets of the period, are all people who are under the shadow of the past A man who is making a revolution has to be contemporary A minor person can live in the imagination That tells the story pretty completely.

The question of repetition is very important. It is important because there is no such thing as repetition. Everybody tells every story in about the same way. You know perfectly well that when you and your roommates tell something, you are telling the same story in about the same way. But the point about it is this: Everybody is telling the story in the same way. But if you listen carefully, you will see that not all the story is the same. There is always a slight variation. Somebody comes in, and you tell the story over again. Every time you tell that story it is told slightly differently. All my early work was a careful listening to all the people telling their story, and I conceived the idea which is, funnily enough, the same as the idea of the cinema. The cinema goes on the same principle: each picture is just infinitesimally different from the one before. If you listen carefully, you say something, the other person says something, but each time it changes just a little, until finally you come to the point where you convince him or you don't convince him. I used to listen very carefully to people talking. I had a passion for knowing just what I call their 'insides'. And in The Making of Americans I did this thing, but of course to my mind there is no repetition. For instance, in these early 'Portraits,' and in a whole lot of them in this book (Portraits and Prayers) you will see that every time a statement is made about someone being somewhere, that statement is different. If I had repeated, nobody would listen. Nobody could be in the room with a person who said the same thing over and over and over. He would drive everybody mad. There has to be a very slight change. Really listen to the way you talk, and every time you change it a little bit. That change, to me, was a very important thing to find out. You will see that when I kept on saying something was something or somebody was somebody, I changed it just a little bit until I got a whole portrait. I conceived the idea of building this thing up. It was all based upon this thing of everybody's slightly building this thing up. What I was after was this immediacy. A single photograph doesn't give it. I was trying for this thing, and so to my mind there is no repetition. The only thing that is repetition is when somebody tells you what he has learned. No matter how you say it, you say it differently. It was this that led me in all that early work.

You see, finally, after I got this thing as completely as I could, then, of course, it being my nature, I wanted to tear it down. I attacked the problem from another way. I listened to people. I condensed it in about three words. There again, if you read those later 'Portraits,' you will see that I used three or four words instead of making a cinema of it. I wanted to condense it as much as possible and change it around, until you could get the movement of a human being. If I wanted to make a picture of you as you sit there, I would wait until I got a picture of you as individuals and then I'd change them until I got a picture of you as a whole.

I did these 'Portraits,' and then I got the idea of doing plays. I had the 'Portraits' so much in my head that I would almost know how you differ one from the other. I got this idea of the play, and put it down in a few words. I wanted to put them down in that way, and I began writing plays and I wrote a great many of them. The Nineteenth Century wrote a great many plays, and none of them are now read, because the Nineteenth Century wanted to put their novels on the stage. The better the play the more static. The minute you try to make a play a novel, it doesn't work. That is the reason I got interested in doing these plays.

When you get to that point there is no essential difference between prose and poetry. This is essentially the problem with which your generation will have to wrestle. The thing has got to the point where poetry and prose have to concern themselves with the static thing. That is up to you.

THE LIFE OF JUAN GRIS<sup>1</sup>

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF JUAN GRIS

JUAN GRIS was one of the younger children of a well-to-do merchant of Madrid. The

earliest picture he has of himself is at about five years of age dressed in a little lace dress standing beside his mother who was very sweet and pleasantly maternal-looking When he was about seven years old his father failed in business honorably and the family fell upon very hard times but in one way and another two sons and a daughter lived to grow up well educated and on the whole prosperous Juan went to the school of engineering at Madrid and when about seventeen came to Paris to study He tells delightful stories of his father and Spanish ways which strangely enough he never liked He had very early a very great attraction and love for French culture French culture has always seduced me he was fond of saying It seduces me and then I am seduced over again He used to tell how Spaniards love not to resist temptation In order to please them the better class merchants such as his father would always have to leave many little things about everything else being packages carefully tied up and in the back on shelves He used to dwell upon the lack of trust and comradeship in Spanish life Each one is a general or does not fight and if he does not fight each one is a general No one that is no Spaniard can help any one because no one no Spaniard can help any one And thus being so and it is so Juan Gris was a brother and comrade to every one being one as no one ever had been one That is the proportion One to any one number of millions That is any proportion Juan Gris was that one French culture was always a seduction Bracque who was such a one was always a seduction seducing French culture seducing again and again Josette equable intelligent faithful spontaneous delicate courageous delightful forethoughtful the school of Fountainebleau delicate deliberate measured and free all these things seduced I am seduced and then I am seduced over again he was fond of saying He had his own Spanish gift of intimacy We were intimate Juan knew what he did In the beginning he did all sorts of things he used to

to an intensive use of decorative color, and to analytical abstraction In addition to his work on smaller canvases he designed sets for the ballet, to which Miss Stein refers Her portrait was written at the time of his death, and appeared soon after in Transition, no 4, 160-62

draw for humorous illustrated papers he had a child a boy named George he lived about he was not young and enthusiastic The first serious exhibition of his pictures was at the Galerie Kahnweiler rue Vignon in 1914 As a Spaniard he knew cubism and had stepped through into it He had stepped through it There was beside this perfection To have it shown you Then came the war and desertion There was little aid Four years partly illness much perfection and rejoining beauty and perfection and then at the end there came a definite creation of something This is what is to be measured He made something that is to be measured And that is that something

Therein Juan Gris is not everything but more than anything He made that thing He made the thing He made a thing to be measured

DEATH IN THE WOODS<sup>1</sup>

I

SHE was an old woman and lived on a farm near the town in which I lived All country

<sup>1</sup> 'It seems to me that the theme of this story is the persistent animal hunger of man There are these women who spend their whole lives, rather dumbly feeding this hunger For years I wanted to write this story

'As for the technique, it was quite definitely thought out Over a period of several years I made several attempts that had to be thrown aside For example I thought it necessary to definitely lift the animal hunger, I wanted to get at, out of the realm of sex Therefore my tired-out, sexless old woman, the dogs feeding from the food attached to her body after her own death And there is always the desire to get your story unbedded in the whole life of a community

'The story has its particular form, attempts at flashes out of a community life, the young man and the German fighting over the girl in the road, the son bringing and small-town people have seen such old women, but no one knows much about them Such an old woman comes into town driving an old worn-out horse or she comes afoot carrying a basket She may own a few hens and have eggs to sell She brings his mistress to his mother's house, the butcher, half-grudgingly and yet out of pity, giving her the meat bones, the dogs circling in the mysterious moonlit night in the forest, the men and boys of the town hurrying out of town to find the body all of this to get a certain effect It is a little hard to define What is wanted is something beyond the horizon, to retain the sense of mystery in life while showing, at the same time, at what cost our ordinary animal hungers are sometimes fed' Author's note

them in a basket and takes them to a grocer. There she trades them in. She gets some salt pork and some beans. Then she gets a pound or two of sugar and some flour.

Afterwards she goes to the butcher's and asks for some dog-meat. She may spend ten or fifteen cents, but when she does she asks for something. Formerly the butchers gave liver to any one who wanted to carry it away. In our family we were always having it. Once one of my brothers got a whole cow's liver at the slaughter-house near the fair grounds in our town. We had it until we were sick of it. It never cost a cent. I have hated the thought of it ever since.

The old farm woman got some liver and a soup bone. She never visited with any one, and as soon as she got what she wanted she lit out for home. It made quite a load for such an old body. No one gave her a lift. People drive right down a road and never notice an old woman like that.

There was such an old woman who used to come into town past our house one Summer and Fall when I was a young boy and was sick with what was called inflammatory rheumatism. She went home later carrying a heavy pack on her back. Two or three large gaunt-looking dogs followed at her heels.

The old woman was nothing special. She was one of the nameless ones that hardly any one knows, but she got into my thoughts. I have just suddenly now, after all these years, remembered her and what happened. It is a story. Her name was Grimes, and she lived with her husband and son in a small unpainted house on the bank of a small creek four miles from town.

The husband and son were a tough lot. Although the son was but twenty-one, he had already served a term in jail. It was whispered about that the woman's husband stole horses and ran them off to some other county. Now and then, when a horse turned up missing, the man had also disappeared. No one ever caught him. Once, when I was loafing at Tom Whitehead's livery-barn, the man came there and sat on the bench in front. Two or three other men were there, but no one spoke to him. He sat for a few minutes and then got up and went away. When he was leaving he turned around and stared at the men. There was a look of defiance in his eyes.

'Well, I have tried to be friendly. You don't want to talk to me. It has been so wherever I have gone in this town. If, some day, one of your fine horses turns up missing, well, then what?' He did not say anything actually. 'I'd like to bust one of you on the jaw,' was about what his eyes said. I remember how the look in his eyes made me shiver.

The old man belonged to a family that had had money once. His name was Jake Grimes. It all comes back clearly now. His father, John Grimes, had owned a sawmill when the country was new, and had made money. Then he got to drinking and running after women. When he died there wasn't much left.

Jake blew in the rest. Pretty soon there wasn't any more lumber to cut and his land was nearly all gone.

He got his wife off a German farmer, for whom he went to work one June day in the wheat harvest. She was a young thing then and scared to death. You see, the farmer was up to something with the girl—she was, I think, a bound girl and his wife had her suspicions. She took it out on the girl when the man wasn't around. Then, when the wife had to go off to town for supplies, the farmer got after her. She told young Jake that nothing really ever happened, but he didn't know whether to believe it or not.

He got her pretty easy himself, the first time he was out with her. He wouldn't have married her if the German farmer hadn't tried to tell him where to get off. He got her to go riding with him in his buggy one night when he was threshing on the place, and then he came for her the next Sunday night.

She managed to get out of the house without her employer's seeing, but when she was getting into the buggy he showed up. It was almost dark, and he just popped up suddenly at the horse's head. He grabbed the horse by the bridle and Jake got out his buggy-whip.

They had it out all right! The German was a tough one. Maybe he didn't care whether his wife knew or not. Jake hit him over the face and shoulders with the buggy-whip, but the horse got to acting up and he had to get out.

Then the two men went for it. The girl didn't see it. The horse started to run away.

and went nearly a mile down the road before the girl got him stopped. Then she managed to tie him to a tree beside the road (I wonder how I know all this. It must have stuck in my mind from small-town tales when I was a boy.) Jake found her there after he got through with the German. She was huddled up in the buggy seat, crying, scared to death. She told Jake a lot of stuff, how the German had tried to get her, how he chased her once into the barn, how another time, when they happened to be alone in the house together, he tore her dress open clear down the front. The German, she said, might have got her that time if he hadn't heard his old woman drive in at the gate. She had been off to town for supplies. Well, she would be putting the horse in the barn. The German managed to sneak off to the fields without his wife seeing. He told the girl he would kill her if she told. What could she do? She told a lie about ripping her dress in the barn when she was feeding the stock. I remember now that she was a bound girl and did not know where her father and mother were. Maybe she did not have any father. You know what I mean.

Such bound children were often enough cruelly treated. They were children who had no parents, slaves really. There were very few orphan homes then. They were legally bound into some home. It was a matter of pure luck how it came out.

II

She married Jake and had a son and daughter, but the daughter died.

Then she settled down to feed stock. That was her job. At the German's place she had cooked the food for the German and his wife. The wife was a strong woman with big hips and worked most of the time in the fields with her husband. She fed them and fed the cows in the barn, fed the pigs, the horses and the chickens. Every moment of every day, as a young girl, was spent feeding something.

Then she married Jake Grimes and he had to be fed. She was a slight thing, and when she had been married for three or four years, and after the two children were born, her slender shoulders became stooped.

Jake always had a lot of big dogs around the house, that stood near the unused saw-mill near the creek. He was always trading horses when he wasn't stealing something and had a lot of poor bony ones about. Also he kept three or four pigs and a cow. They were all pastured in the few acres left of the Grimes place and Jake did little enough work.

He went into debt for a threshing outfit and ran it for several years, but it did not pay. People did not trust him. They were afraid he would steal the grain at night. He had to go a long way off to get work and it cost too much to get there. In the Winter he hunted and cut a little firewood, to be sold in some nearby town. When the son grew up he was just like the father. They got drunk together. If there wasn't anything to eat in the house when they came home the old man gave his old woman a cut over the head. She had a few chickens of her own and had to kill one of them in a hurry. When they were all killed she wouldn't have any eggs to sell when she went to town, and then what would she do?

She had to scheme all her life about getting things fed, getting the pigs fed so they would grow fat and could be butchered in the Fall. When they were butchered her husband took most of the meat off to town and sold it. If he did not do it first the boy did. They fought sometimes and when they fought the old woman stood aside trembling.

She had got the habit of silence anyway—that was fixed. Sometimes, when she began to look old—she wasn't forty yet—and when the husband and son were both off, trading horses or drinking or hunting or stealing, she went around the house and the barnyard muttering to herself.

How was she going to get everything fed?—that was her problem. The dogs had to be fed. There wasn't enough hay in the barn for the horses and the cow. If she didn't feed the chickens how could they lay eggs? Without eggs to sell how could she get things in town, things she had to have to keep the life of the farm going? Thank heaven, she did not have to feed her husband—in a certain way. That hadn't lasted long after their marriage and after the babies came. Where he went on his long trips she did not know. Sometimes he was gone from home for weeks, and after the boy grew up they went off together.

They left everything at home for her to manage and she had no money. She knew no one. No one ever talked to her in town. When it was Winter she had to gather sticks of wood for her fire, had to try to keep the stock fed with very little grain.

The stock in the barn cried to her hungrily, the dogs followed her about. In the Winter the hens laid few enough eggs. They huddled in the corners of the barn and she kept watching them. If a hen lays an egg in the barn in the Winter and you do not find it, it freezes and breaks.

One day in Winter the old woman went off to town with a few eggs and the dogs followed her. She did not get started until nearly three o'clock and the snow was heavy. She hadn't been feeling very well for several days and so she went muttering along, scantily clad, her shoulders stooped. She had an old grain bag in which she carried her eggs, tucked away down in the bottom. There weren't many of them, but in Winter the price of eggs is up. She would get a little meat in exchange for the eggs, some salt pork, a little sugar, and some coffee perhaps. It might be the butcher would give her a piece of liver.

When she had got to town and was trading in her eggs the dogs lay by the door outside. She did pretty well, got the things she needed, more than she had hoped. Then she went to the butcher and he gave her some liver and some dog-meat.

It was the first time any one had spoken to her in a friendly way for a long time. The butcher was alone in his shop when she came in and was annoyed by the thought of such a sick-looking old woman out on such a day. It was bitter cold and the snow, that had let up during the afternoon, was falling again. The butcher said something about her husband and her son, swore at them, and the old woman stared at him, a look of mild surprise in her eyes as he talked. He said that if either the husband or the son were going to get any of the liver or the heavy bones with scraps of meat hanging to them that he had put into the grain bag, he'd see him starve first.

Starve, eh? Well, things had to be fed. Men had to be fed, and the horses that weren't any good but maybe could be traded off, and the poor thin cow that hadn't given any milk for three months.

Horses, cows, pigs, dogs, men.

III

The old woman had to get back before darkness came if she could. The dogs followed at her heels, sniffing at the heavy grain bag she had fastened on her back. When she got to the edge of town she stopped by a fence and tied the bag on her back with a piece of rope she had carried in her dress-pocket for just that purpose. That was an easier way to carry it. Her arms ached. It was hard when she had to crawl over fences and once she fell over and landed in the snow. The dogs went frisking about. She had to struggle to get to her feet again, but she made it. The point of climbing over the fences was that there was a short cut over a hill and through a woods. She might have gone around by the road, but it was a mile farther that way. She was afraid she couldn't make it. And then, besides, the stock had to be fed. There was a little hay left and a little corn. Perhaps her husband and son would bring some home when they came. They had driven off in the only buggy the Grimes family had, a rickety thing, a rickety horse hitched to the buggy, two other rickety horses led by halters. They were going to trade horses, get a little money if they could. They might come home drunk. It would be well to have something in the house when they came back.

The son had an affair on with a woman at the county seat, fifteen miles away. She was a rough enough woman, a tough one. Once, in the Summer, the son had brought her to the house. Both she and the son had been drinking. Jake Grimes was away and the son and his woman ordered the old woman about like a servant. She didn't mind much, she was used to it. Whatever happened she never said anything. That was her way of getting along. She had managed that way when she was a young girl at the German's and ever since she had married Jake. That time her son brought his woman to the house they stayed all night, sleeping together just as though they were married. It hadn't shocked the old woman, not much. She had got past being shocked early in life.

With the pack on her back she went painfully along across an open field, wading in the deep snow, and got into the woods.

There was a path, but it was hard to follow. Just beyond the top of the hill, where the woods was thickest, there was a small clearing. Had some one once thought of building a house there? The clearing was as large as a building lot in town, large enough for a house and a garden. The path ran along the side of the clearing, and when she got there the old woman sat down to rest at the foot of a tree.

It was a foolish thing to do. When she got herself placed, the pack against the tree's trunk, it was nice, but what about getting up again? She worried about that for a moment and then quietly closed her eyes.

She must have slept for a time. When you are about so cold you can't get any colder. The afternoon grew a little warmer and the snow came thicker than ever. Then after a time the weather cleared. The moon even came out.

There were four Grimes dogs that had followed Mrs. Grimes into town, all tall gaunt fellows. Such men as Jake Grimes and his son always keep just such dogs. They kick and abuse them, but they stay. The Grimes dogs, in order to keep from starving, had to do a lot of foraging for themselves, and they had been at it while the old woman slept with her back to the tree at the side of the clearing. They had been chasing rabbits in the woods and in adjoining fields and in their ranging had picked up three other farm dogs.

After a time all the dogs came back to the clearing. They were excited about something. Such nights, cold and clear and with a moon, do things to dogs. It may be that some old instinct, come down from the time when they were wolves and ranged the woods in packs on Winter nights, comes back into them.

The dogs in the clearing, before the old woman, had caught two or three rabbits and their immediate hunger had been satisfied. They began to play, running in circles in the clearing. Round and round they ran, each dog's nose at the tail of the next dog. In the clearing, under the snow-laden trees and under the wintry moon they made a strange picture, running thus silently, in a circle their running had beaten in the soft snow. The dogs made no sound. They ran around and around in the circle.

It may have been that the old woman saw them doing that before she died. She may have awakened once or twice and looked at the strange sight with dim old eyes.

She wouldn't be very cold now, just drowsy. Life hangs on a long time. Perhaps the old woman was out of her head. She may have dreamed of her girlhood, at the German's, and before that, when she was a child and before her mother lit out and left her.

Her dreams couldn't have been very pleasant. Not many pleasant things had happened to her. Now and then one of the Grimes dogs left the running circle and came to stand before her. The dog thrust his face close to her face. His red tongue was hanging out.

The running of the dogs may have been a kind of death ceremony. It may have been that the primitive instinct of the wolf, having been aroused in the dogs by the night and the running, made them somehow afraid.

'Now we are no longer wolves. We are dogs, the servants of men. Keep alive, man! When man dies we become wolves again.'

When one of the dogs came to where the old woman sat with her back against the tree and thrust his nose close to her face he seemed satisfied and went back to run with the pack. All the Grimes dogs did it at some time during the evening, before she died. I knew all about it afterward, when I grew to be a man, because once in a woods in Illinois, on another Winter night, I saw a pack of dogs act just like that. The dogs were waiting for me to die as they had waited for the old woman that night when I was a child, but when it happened to me I was a young man and had no intention whatever of dying.

The old woman died softly and quietly. When she was dead and when one of the Grimes dogs had come to her and had found her dead all the dogs stopped running.

They gathered about her.

Well, she was dead now. She had fed the Grimes dogs when she was alive, what about now?

There was the pack on her back, the grain bag containing the piece of salt pork, the liver the butcher had given her, the dog-meat, the soup bones. The butcher in town, having been suddenly overcome with a feeling of pity, had loaded her grain bag heavily. It had been a big haul for the old woman.

It was a big haul for the dogs now.

IV

One of the Grimes dogs sprang suddenly out from among the others and began worrying the pack on the old woman's back. Had the dogs really been wolves that one would have been the leader of the pack. What he did, all the others did.

All of them sank their teeth into the grain bag the old woman had fastened with ropes to her back.

They dragged the old woman's body out into the open clearing. The worn-out dress was quickly torn from her shoulders. When she was found, a day or two later, the dress had been torn from her body clear to the hips, but the dogs had not touched her body. They had got the meat out of the grain bag, that was all. Her body was frozen stiff when it was found, and the shoulders were so narrow and the body so slight that in death it looked like the body of some charming young girl.

Such things happened in towns of the Middle West, on farms near town, when I was a boy. A hunter out after rabbits found the old woman's body and did not touch it. Something, the beaten round path in the little snow-covered clearing, the silence of the place, the place where the dogs had worried the body trying to pull the grain bag away or tear it open—something startled the man and he hurried off to town.

I was in Main street with one of my brothers who was town newsboy and who was taking the afternoon papers to the stores. It was almost night.

The hunter came into a grocery and told his story. Then he went to a hardware-shop and into a drugstore. Men began to gather on the sidewalks. Then they started out along the road to the place in the woods.

My brother should have gone on about his business of distributing papers but he didn't. Every one was going to the woods. The undertaker went and the town marshal. Several men got on a dray and rode out to where the path left the road and went into the woods, but the horses weren't very sharply shod and slid about on the slippery roads. They made no better time than those of us who walked.

The town marshal was a large man whose leg had been injured in the Civil War. He carried a heavy cane and limped rapidly along the road. My brother and I followed at his heels, and as we went other men and boys joined the crowd.

It had grown dark by the time we got to where the old woman had left the road but the moon had come out. The marshal was thinking there might have been a murder. He kept asking the hunter questions. The hunter went along with his gun across his shoulders, a dog following at his heels. It isn't often a rabbit hunter has a chance to be so conspicuous. He was taking full advantage of it, leading the procession with the town marshal. 'I didn't see any wounds. She was a beautiful young girl. Her face was buried in the snow. No, I didn't know her.' As a matter of fact, the hunter had not looked closely at the body. He had been frightened. She might have been murdered and some one might spring out from behind a tree and murder him. In a woods, in the late afternoon, when the trees are all bare and there is white snow on the ground, when all is silent, something creepy steals over the mind and body. If something strange or uncanny has happened in the neighborhood all you think about is getting away from there as fast as you can.

The crowd of men and boys had got to where the old woman had crossed the field and went, following the marshal and the hunter, up the slight incline and into the woods.

My brother and I were silent. He had his bundle of papers in a bag slung across his shoulder. When he got back to town he would have to go on distributing his papers before he went home to supper. If I went along, as he had no doubt already determined I should, we would both be late. Either mother or our older sister would have to warm our supper.

Well, we would have something to tell. A boy did not get such a chance very often. It was lucky we just happened to go into the grocery when the hunter came in. The hunter was a country fellow. Neither of us had ever seen him before.

Now the crowd of men and boys had got to the clearing. Darkness comes quickly on such Winter nights, but the full moon made everything clear. My brother and I stood near the tree, beneath which the old woman had died.

She did not look old, lying there in that light, frozen and still. One of the men turned her over in the snow and I saw everything. My body trembled with some strange mystical feeling and so did my brother's. It might have been the cold.

Neither of us had ever seen a woman's body before. It may have been the snow, clinging to the frozen flesh, that made it look so white and lovely, so like marble. No woman had come with the party from town, but one of the men, he was the town blacksmith, took off his overcoat and spread it over her. Then he gathered her into his arms and started off to town, all the others following silently. At that time no one knew who she was.

V

I had seen everything, had seen the oval in the snow, like a miniature race-track, where the dogs had run, had seen how the men were mystified, had seen the white bare young-looking shoulders, had heard the whispered comments of the men.

The men were simply mystified. They took the body to the undertaker's, and when the blacksmith, the hunter, the marshal and several others had got inside they closed the door. If father had been there perhaps he could have got in, but we boys couldn't.

I went with my brother to distribute the rest of his papers and when we got home it was my brother who told the story.

I kept silent and went to bed early. It may have been I was not satisfied with the way he told it.

Later, in the town, I must have heard other fragments of the old woman's story. She was recognized the next day and there was an investigation.

The husband and son were found somewhere and brought to town and there was an attempt to connect them with the woman's death, but it did not work. They had perfect enough alibis.

However, the town was against them. They had to get out. Where they went I never heard.

I remember only the picture there in the forest, the men standing about, the naked girlish-looking figure, face down in the snow, the tracks made by the running dogs and the clear cold Winter sky above. White fragments of clouds were drifting across the sky. They went racing across the little open space among the trees.

The scene in the forest had become for me, without my knowing it, the foundation for the real story I am now trying to tell. The fragments, you see, had to be picked up slowly, long afterwards.

Things happened. When I was a young man I worked on the farm of a German. The hired-girl was afraid of her employer. The farmer's wife hated her.

I saw things at that place. Once later, I had a half-uncanny, mystical adventure with dogs in an Illinois forest on a clear, moon-lit Winter night. When I was a schoolboy, and on a Summer day, I went with a boy friend out along a creek some miles from town and came to the house where the old woman had lived. No one had lived in the house since her death. The doors were broken from the hinges, the window lights were all broken. As the boy and I stood in the road outside, two dogs, just roving farm dogs no doubt, came running around the corner of the house. The dogs were tall, gaunt fellows and came down to the fence and glared through at us, standing in the road.

The whole thing, the story of the old woman's death, was to me as I grew older like music heard from far off. The notes had to be picked up slowly one at a time. Something had to be understood.

The woman who died was one destined to feed animal life. Anyway, that is all she ever did. She was feeding animal life before she was born, as a child, as a young woman working on the farm of the German, after she married, when she grew old and when she died. She fed animal life in cows, in chickens, in pigs, in horses, in dogs, in men. Her daughter had died in childhood and with her one son she had no articulate relations. On the night when she died she was hurrying homeward, bearing on her body food for animal life.

She died in the clearing in the woods and even after her death continued feeding animal life.

You see it is likely that, when my brother told the story, that night when we got home and my mother and sister sat listening, I did not think he got the point. He was too young and so was I. A thing so complete has its own beauty.

I shall not try to emphasize the point. I am only explaining why I was dissatisfied then and have been ever since. I speak of that only that you may understand why I have been impelled to try to tell the simple story over again.

THE UNDEFEATED

MANUEL GARCIA climbed the stairs to Don Miguel Retana's office. He set down his suitcase and knocked on the door. There was no answer. Manuel, standing in the hallway, felt there was someone in the room. He felt it through the door.

'Retana,' he said, listening.

There was no answer.

He's there, all right, Manuel thought.

'Retana,' he said and banged the door.

'Who's there?' said someone in the office.

'Me, Manolo,' Manuel said.

'What do you want?' asked the voice.

'I want to work,' Manuel said.

Something in the door clicked several times and it swung open. Manuel went in, carrying his suitcase.

A little man sat behind a desk at the far side of the room. Over his head was a bull's head, stuffed by a Madrid taxidermist, on the walls were framed photographs and bull-fight posters.

The little man sat looking at Manuel.

'I thought they'd killed you,' he said.

Manuel knocked with his knuckles on the desk. The little man sat looking at him across the desk.

'How many corridas you had this year?'

Retana asked.

'One,' he answered.

'Just that one?' the little man asked.

'That's all.'

'I read about it in the papers,' Retana said. He leaned back in the chair and looked at Manuel.

Manuel looked up at the stuffed bull. He had seen it often before. He felt a certain family interest in it. It had killed his brother, the promising one, about nine years ago. Manuel remembered the day.

There was a brass plate on the oak shield the bull's head was mounted on. Manuel could not read it, but he imagined it was in memory of his brother. Well, he had been a good kid.

The plate said 'The Bull "Mariposa" of the Duke of Veragua, which accepted 9 varas for 7 caballos, and caused the death of Antonio Garcia, Novillero, April 27, 1909.'

Retana saw him looking at the stuffed bull's head.

'The lot the Duke sent me for Sunday will make a scandal,' he said. 'They're all bad in the legs. What do they say about them at the Café?'

'I don't know,' Manuel said. 'I just got in.'

'Yes,' Retana said. 'You still have your bag.'

He looked at Manuel, leaning back behind the big desk.

'Sit down,' he said. 'Take off your cap.'

Manuel sat down, his cap off, his face was changed. He looked pale, and his coleta pinned forward on his head, so that it would not show under the cap, gave him a strange look.

'You don't look well,' Retana said.

'I just got out of the hospital,' Manuel said.

'I heard they'd cut your leg off,' Retana

said.

'No,' said Manuel. 'It got all right.'

Retana leaned forward across the desk and pushed a wooden box of cigarettes toward Manuel.

'Have a cigarette,' he said.

'Thanks.'

Manuel lit it.

'Smoke?' he said, offering the match to Retana.

'No,' Retana waved his hand, 'I never smoke'

Retana watched him smoking

'Why don't you get a job and go to work?' he said

'I don't want to work,' Manuel said 'I am a bull-fighter'

'There aren't any bull-fighters any more,' Retana said

'I'm a bull-fighter,' Manuel said

'Yes, while you're in there,' Retana said

Manuel laughed

Retana sat, saying nothing and looking at Manuel

'I'll put you in a nocturnal if you want,' Retana offered

'When?' Manuel asked

'To-morrow night'

'I don't like to substitute for anybody,' Manuel said That was the way they all got killed That was the way Salvador got killed He tapped with his knuckles on the table

'It's all I've got,' Retana said

'Why don't you put me on next week?' Manuel suggested

'You wouldn't draw,' Retana said 'All they want is Litri and Rubito and La Torre Those kids are good'

'They'd come to see me get it,' Manuel said, hopefully

'No, they wouldn't They don't know who you are any more'

'I've got a lot of stuff,' Manuel said

'I'm offering to put you on to-morrow night,' Retana said 'You can work with young Hernandez and kill two novillos after the Charlots'

'Whose novillos?' Manuel asked

'I don't know Whatever stuff they've got in the corrals What the veterinaries won't pass in the daytime'

'I don't like to substitute,' Manuel said

You can take it or leave it,' Retana said. He leaned forward over the papers He was no longer interested The appeal that Manuel had made to him for a moment when he thought of the old days was gone He would like to get him to substitute for Larita because he could get him cheaply He could get others cheaply too He would like to help him though Still he had given him the chance It was up to him

'How much do I get?' Manuel asked He was still playing with the idea of refusing. But he knew he could not refuse

'Two hundred and fifty pesetas,' Retana said He had thought of five hundred, but when he opened his mouth it said two hundred and fifty

'You pay Villalta seven thousand,' Manuel said

'You're not Villalta,' Retana said.

10 'I know it,' Manuel said

'He draws it, Manolo,' Retana said in explanation

'Sure,' said Manuel He stood up. 'Give me three hundred, Retana'

'All right,' Retana agreed He reached in the drawer for a paper

'Can I have fifty now?' Manuel asked

20 'Sure,' said Retana He took a fifty peseta note out of his pocket-book and laid it, spread out flat, on the table

Manuel picked it up and put it in his pocket

'What about a cuadrilla?' he asked

'There's the boys that always work for me nights,' Retana said 'They're all right'

'How about picadors?' Manuel asked

'They're not much,' Retana admitted

'I've got to have one good pic,' Manuel said

30 'Get him then,' Retana said 'Go and get him'

'Not out of this,' Manuel said. 'I'm not paying for any cuadrilla out of sixty duros'

Retana said nothing but looked at Manuel across the big desk

'You know I've got to have one good pic,' Manuel said

Retana said nothing but looked at Manuel from a long way off

40 'It isn't right,' Manuel said

Retana was still considering him, leaning back in his chair, considering him from a long way away

'There're the regular pics,' he offered

'I know,' Manuel said 'I know your regular pics'

Retana did not smile Manuel knew it was over

50 'All I want is an even break,' Manuel said reasonably. 'When I go out there I want to be able to call my shots on the bull. It only takes one good picador.'

He was talking to a man who was no longer listening

'If you want something extra,' Retana said, 'go and get it There will be a regular cuadrilla out there Bring as many of your own pics as you want The charlotada is over by 10 30'

'All right,' Manuel said 'If that's the way you feel about it'

'That's the way,' Retana said

'I'll see you to-morrow night,' Manuel said

'I'll be out there,' Retana said

Manuel picked up his suitcase and went out

'Shut the door,' Retana called

Manuel looked back Retana was sitting forward looking at some papers Manuel pulled the door tight until it clicked

He went down the stairs and out of the door into the hot brightness of the street It was very hot in the street and the light on the white buildings was sudden and hard on his eyes He walked down the shady side of the steep street toward the Puerta del Sol The shade felt solid and cool as running water The heat came suddenly as he crossed the intersecting streets Manuel saw no one he knew in all the people he passed

Just before the Puerto del Sol he turned into a café

It was quiet in the café There were a few men sitting at tables against the wall At one table four men played cards Most of the men sat against the wall smoking, empty coffee-cups and liqueur-glasses before them on the tables Manuel went through the long room to a small room in back A man sat at a table in the corner asleep Manuel sat down at one of the tables

A waiter came in and stood beside Manuel's table

'Have you seen Zurito?' Manuel asked him

'He was in before lunch,' the waiter answered 'He won't be back before five o'clock'

'Bring me some coffee and milk and a shot of the ordinary,' Manuel said

The waiter came back into the room carrying a tray with a big coffee-glass and a liqueur-glass on it In his left hand he held a bottle of brandy He swung these down to the table and a boy who had followed him poured coffee and milk into the glass from two shiny, spouted pots with long handles

Manuel took off his cap and the waiter noticed his pigtail pinned forward on his head He winked at the coffee-boy as he poured out the brandy into the little glass beside Manuel's coffee The coffee-boy looked at Manuel's pale face curiously

'You fighting here?' asked the waiter, corking up the bottle

'Yes,' Manuel said 'To-morrow.'

10 The waiter stood there, holding the bottle on one hip

'You in the Charlie Chaplin's?' he asked

The coffee-boy looked away, embarrassed

'No In the ordinary'

'I thought they were going to have Chaves and Hernandez,' the waiter said.

'No Me and another'

'Who? Chaves or Hernandez?'

'Hernandez, I think'

20 'What's the matter with Chaves?'

'He got hurt'

'Where did you hear that?'

'Retana'

'Hey, Looie,' the waiter called to the next room, 'Chaves got cogida'

Manuel had taken the wrapper off the lumps of sugar and dropped them into his coffee He stirred it and drank it down, sweet, hot, and warming in his empty stomach He drank off the brandy

30 'Give me another shot of that,' he said to the waiter

The waiter uncorked the bottle and poured the glass full, slopping another drink into the saucer Another waiter had come up in front of the table The coffee-boy was gone

'Is Chaves hurt bad?' the second waiter asked Manuel

40 'I don't know,' Manuel said, 'Retana didn't say'

'A hell of a lot he cares,' the tall waiter said Manuel had not seen him before He must have just come up

'If you stand in with Retana in this town, you're a made man,' the tall waiter said 'If you aren't in with him, you might just as well go out and shoot yourself'

50 'You said it,' the other waiter who had come in said 'You said it then'

'You're right I said it,' said the tall waiter 'I know what I'm talking about when I talk about that bird'

'Look what he's done for Villalta,' the first waiter said

'And that ain't all,' the tall waiter said.
'Look what he's done for Marcial Lalande Look what he's done for Nacional.'

'You said it, kid,' agreed the short waiter

Manuel looked at them, standing talking in front of his table. He had drunk his second brandy. They had forgotten about him. They were not interested in him.

'Look at that bunch of camels,' the tall waiter went on. 'Did you ever see this Nacional II?'

'I seen him last Sunday didn't I?' the original waiter said.

'He's a giraffe,' the short waiter said.

'What did I tell you?' the tall waiter said. 'Those are Retana's boys.'

'Say, give me another shot of that,' Manuel said. He had poured the brandy the waiter had slopped over in the saucer into his glass and drank it while they were talking.

The original waiter poured his glass full mechanically, and the three of them went out of the room talking.

In the far corner the man was still asleep, snoring slightly on the intaking breath, his head back against the wall.

Manuel drank his brandy. He felt sleepy himself. It was too hot to go out into the town. Besides there was nothing to do. He wanted to see Zurito. He would go to sleep while he waited. He kicked his suitcase under the table to be sure it was there. Perhaps it would be better to put it back under the seat, against the wall. He leaned down and shoved it under. Then he leaned forward on the table and went to sleep.

When he woke there was someone sitting across the table from him. It was a big man with a heavy brown face like an Indian. He had been sitting there some time. He had waved the waiter away and sat reading the paper and occasionally looking down at Manuel, asleep, his head on the table. He read the paper laboriously forming the words with his lips as he read. When it tired him he looked at Manuel. He sat heavily in the chair, his black Cordoba hat tipped forward.

Manuel sat up and looked at him.

'Hello, Zurito,' he said.

'Hello, kid,' the big man said.

'I've been asleep.' Manuel rubbed his forehead with the back of his fist.

'I thought maybe you were.'

'How's everything?'

'Good. How is everything with you?'

'Not so good.'

They were both silent. Zurito, the picador, looked at Manuel's white face. Manuel looked down at the picador's enormous hands folding the paper to put away in his pocket.

10 'I got a favor to ask you, Manos,' Manuel said.

Manosduros was Zurito's nickname. He never heard it without thinking of his huge hands. He put them forward on the table self-consciously.

'Let's have a drink,' he said.

'Sure,' said Manuel.

The waiter came and went and came again. He went out of the room looking back at the two men at the table.

20 'What's the matter, Manolo?' Zurito set down his glass.

'Would you pic two bulls for me tomorrow night?' Manuel asked, looking up at Zurito across the table.

'No,' said Zurito. 'I'm not pic-ing.'

Manuel looked down at his glass. He had expected that answer, now he had it. Well, he had it.

30 'I'm sorry, Manolo, but I'm not pic-ing.' Zurito looked at his hands.

'That's all right,' Manuel said.

'I'm too old,' Zurito said.

'I just asked you,' Manuel said.

'Is it the nocturnal to-morrow?'

'That's it. I figured if I had just one good pic, I could get away with it.'

'How much are you getting?'

'Three hundred pesetas.'

40 'I get more than that for pic-ing.'

'I know,' said Manuel. 'I didn't have any right to ask you.'

'What do you keep on doing it for?'

Zurito asked. 'Why don't you cut off your coleta, Manolo?'

'I don't know,' Manuel said.

'You're pretty near as old as I am,' Zurito said.

50 'I don't know,' Manuel said. 'I got to do it. If I can fix it so that I get an even break, that's all I want. I got to stick with it, Manos.'

'No, you don't.'

'Yes, I do. I've tried keeping away from it.'

'I know how you feel But it isn't right
You ought to get out and stay out '

'I can't do it Besides, I've been going good lately '

Zurito looked at his face.

'You've been in the hospital '

'But I was going great when I got hurt '

Zurito said nothing He tipped the cognac out of his saucer into his glass

'The papers said they never saw a better
faena,' Manuel said

Zurito looked at him.

'You know when I get going I'm good,' Manuel said

'You're too old,' the picador said

'No,' said Manuel. 'You're ten years older than I am '

'With me it's different '

'I'm not too old,' Manuel said

They sat silent, Manuel watching the picador's face

'I was going great till I got hurt,' Manuel offered

'You ought to have seen me, Manos,' Manuel said, reproachfully

'I don't want to see you,' Zurito said 'It makes me nervous '

'You haven't seen me lately '

'I've seen you plenty '

Zurito looked at Manuel, avoiding his
eyes

'You ought to quit it, Manolo '

'I can't,' Manuel said 'I'm going good now, I tell you '

Zurito leaned forward, his hands on the table.

'Listen I'll pic for you and if you don't go big to-morrow night, you'll quit See?
Will you do that?'

'Sure '

Zurito leaned back, relieved

'You got to quit,' he said 'No monkey business You got to cut the coleta '

'I won't have to quit,' Manuel said 'You watch me I've got the stuff '

Zurito stood up He felt tired from arguing

'You got to quit,' he said 'I'll cut your coleta myself.'

'No, you won't,' Manuel said 'You won't have a chance.'

Zurito called the waiter

'Come on,' said Zurito 'Come on up to the house '

Manuel reached under the seat for his suitcase He was happy He knew Zurito would pic for him He was the best picador living It was all simple now

'Come on up to the house and we'll eat,' Zurito said.

Manuel stood in the patio de caballos waiting for the Charlie Chaplins to be over Zurito stood beside him. Where they stood it was dark The high door that led into the bull-ring was shut Above them they heard a shout, then another shout of laughter Then there was silence Manuel liked the smell of the stables about the patio de caballos It smelt good in the dark There was another roar from the arena and then applause, prolonged applause, going on and on

'You ever seen these fellows?' Zurito asked, big and looming beside Manuel in the dark

'No,' Manuel said

'They're pretty funny ' Zurito said He smiled to himself in the dark

The high, double, tight-fitting door into the bull-ring swung open and Manuel saw the ring in the hard light of the arc-lights, the plaza, dark all the way around, rising high, around the edge of the ring were running and bowing two men dressed like tramps, followed by a third in the uniform of a hotel bell-boy who stooped and picked up the hats and canes thrown down onto the sand and tossed them back up into the darkness.

The electric light went on in the patio

'I'll climb onto one of those ponies while you collect the kids,' Zurito said.

Behind them came the jungle of the mules, coming out to go into the arena and be hitched onto the dead bull

The members of the cuadrilla, who had been watching the burlesque from the runway between the barrera and the seats, came walking back and stood in a group talking, under the electric light in the patio A good-looking lad in a silver-and-orange suit came up to Manuel and smiled

'I'm Hernandez,' he said and put out his hand

Manuel shook it.

'They're regular elephants we've got to-night,' the boy said cheerfully

'They're big ones with horns,' Manuel agreed,

'You drew the worst lot,' the boy said

'That's all right,' Manuel said 'The bigger they are, the more meat for the poor.'

'Where did you get that one?' Hernandez grinned

'That's an old one,' Manuel said. 'You line up your cuadrilla, so I can see what I've got'

'You've got some good kids,' Hernandez said. He was very cheerful. He had been on twice before in nocturnals and was beginning to get a following in Madrid. He was happy the fight would start in a few minutes

'Where are the pics?' Manuel asked

'They're back in the corrals fighting about who gets the beautiful horses,' Hernandez grinned

The mules came through the gate in a rush, the whips snapping, bells jangling and the young bull ploughing a furrow of sand

They formed up for the paseo as soon as the bull had gone through

Manuel and Hernandez stood in front. The youths of the cuadrillas were behind, their heavy capes furled over their arms. In back, the four picadors, mounted, holding their steel-tipped push-poles erect in the half-dark of the corral

'It's a wonder Retana wouldn't give us enough light to see the horses by,' one picador said

'He knows we'll be happier if we don't get too good a look at these skins,' another pic answered

'This thing I'm on barely keeps me off the ground,' the first picador said

'Well, they're horses'

'Sure, they're horses'

They talked, sitting their gaunt horses in the dark

Zurito said nothing. He had the only steady horse of the lot. He had tried him, wheeling him in the corrals and he responded to the bit and the spurs. He had taken the bandage off his right eye and cut the strings where they had tied his ears tight shut at the base. He was a good, solid horse, solid on his legs. That was all he needed. He intended to ride him all through the corrida. He had already, since he had mounted, sitting in the half-dark in the big, quilted saddle, waiting for the paseo, pic-ed through the whole corrida in his mind. The other picadors went on talking on both sides of him. He did not hear them

The two matadors stood together in front of their three peones, their capes furled over their left arms in the same fashion. Manuel was thinking about the three lads in back of him. They were all three Madrilenos, like Hernandez, boys about nineteen. One of them, a gypsy, serious, aloof, and dark-faced, he liked the look of. He turned

'What's your name, kid?' he asked the gypsy

'Fuentes,' the gypsy said

'That's a good name,' Manuel said

The gypsy smiled, showing his teeth

'You take the bull and give him a little run when he comes out,' Manuel said

'All right,' the gypsy said. His face was serious. He began to think about just what he would do

'Here she goes,' Manuel said to Hernandez

'All right. We'll go'

Heads up, swinging with the music, their right arms swinging free, they stepped out, crossing the sanded arena under the arc-lights, the cuadrillas opening out behind, the picadors riding after, behind came the bull-ring servants and the jingling mules. The crowd applauded Hernandez as they marched across the arena. Arrogant, swinging, they looked straight ahead as they marched

They bowed before the president, and the procession broke up into its component parts. The bull-fighters went over to the barrera and changed their heavy mantles for the light fighting capes. The mules went out. The picadors galloped jerkily around the ring, and two rode out the gate they had come in by. The servants swept the sand smooth.

Manuel drank a glass of water poured for him by one of Retana's deputies, who was acting as his manager and sword-handler. Hernandez came over from speaking with his own manager.

'You got a good hand, kid,' Manuel complimented him

'They like me,' Hernandez said happily.

'How did the paseo go?' Manuel asked Retana's man

'Like a wedding,' said the handler. 'Fine You came out like Joselito and Belmonte'

Zurito rode by, a bulky equestrian statue. He wheeled his horse and faced him toward the toril on the far side of the ring where the bull would come out. It was strange under the arc-light. He pic-ed in the hot afternoon sun for big money. He didn't like this arc-light business. He wished they would get started.

Manuel went up to him.

'Pic him, Manos,' he said. 'Cut him down to size for me.'

'I'll pic him, kid,' Zurito spat on the sand. 'I'll make him jump out of the ring.'

'Lean on him, Manos,' Manuel said.

'I'll lean on him,' Zurito said. 'What's holding it up?'

'He's coming now,' Manuel said.

Zurito sat there, his feet in the box-stirrups, his great legs in the buckskin-covered armor gripping the horse, the reins in his left hand, the long pic held in his right hand, his broad hat well down over his eyes to shade them from the lights, watching the distant door of the toril. His horse's ears quivered. Zurito patted him with his left hand.

The red door of the toril swung back and for a moment Zurito looked into the empty passageway far across the arena. Then the bull came out in a rush, skidding on his four legs as he came out under the lights, then charging in a gallop, moving softly in a fast gallop, silent except as he woofed through wide nostrils as he charged, glad to be free after the dark pen.

In the first row of seats, slightly bored, leaning forward to write on the cement wall in front of his knees, the substitute bull-fight critic of El Herald scribbled. 'Campagnero, Negro, 42, came out at 90 miles an hour with plenty of gas—'

Manuel, leaning against the barrera, watching the bull, waved his hand and the gypsy ran out, trailing his cape. The bull, in full gallop, pivoted and charged the cape, his head down, his tail rising. The gypsy moved in a zigzag, and as he passed, the bull caught sight of him and abandoned the cape to charge the man. The gyp sprinted and vaulted the red fence of the barrera as the bull struck it with his horns. He tossed into it twice with his horns, banging into the wood blindly.

The critic of El Herald lit a cigarette and tossed the match at the bull, then wrote in his note-book, 'large and with enough horns to satisfy the cash customers, Campagnero showed a tendency to cut into the terrane of the bull-fighters.'

Manuel stepped out on the hard sand as the bull banged into the fence. Out of the corner of his eye he saw Zurito sitting the white horse close to the barrera, about a quarter of the way around the ring to the left. Manuel held the cape close in front of him, a fold in each hand, and shouted at the bull. 'Huh! Huh!' The bull turned, seemed to brace against the fence as he charged in a scramble, driving into the cape as Manuel side-stepped, pivoted on his heels with the charge of the bull, and swung the cape just ahead of the horns. At the end of the swing he was facing the bull again and held the cape in the same position close in front of his body, and pivoted again as the bull recharged. Each time, as he swung, the crowd shouted.

Four times he swung with the bull, lifting the cape so it billowed full, and each time bringing the bull around to charge again. Then, at the end of the fifth swing, he held the cape against his hip and pivoted, so the cape swung out like a ballet dancer's skirt and wound the bull around himself like a belt, to step clear, leaving the bull facing Zurito on the white horse, come up and planted firm, the horse facing the bull, its ears forward, its lips nervous, Zurito, his hat over his eyes, leaning forward, the long pole sticking out before and behind in a sharp angle under his right arm, held halfway down, the triangular iron point facing the bull.

El Herald's second-string critic, drawing on his cigarette, his eyes on the bull, wrote 'the veteran Manolo designed a series of acceptable veronicas, ending in a very Belmontistic recorte that earned applause from the regulars, and we entered the tercio of the cavalry.'

Zurito sat his horse, measuring the distance between the bull and the end of the pic. As he looked, the bull gathered himself together and charged, his eyes on the horse's chest. As he lowered his head to hook, Zurito sunk the point of the pic in the swelling hump of muscle above the bull's shoulder, leaned all his weight on the shaft, and with his left hand pulled the white horse into the air, front hoofs pawing, and swung him to the right as he pushed the bull under and through so the horns passed safely under the horse's belly and the horse came down, quivering, the bull's tail brushing his chest as he charged the cape Hernandez offered him

Hernandez ran sideways, taking the bull out and away with the cape, toward the other picador. He fixed him with a swing of the cape, squarely facing the horse and rider, and stepped back. As the bull saw the horse he charged. The picador's lance slid along his back, and as the shock of the charge lifted the horse, the picador was already half-way out of the saddle, lifting his right leg clear as he missed with the lance and falling to the left side to keep the horse between him and the bull. The horse, lifted and gored, crashed over with the bull driving into him, the picador gave a shove with his boots against the horse and lay clear, waiting to be lifted and hauled away and put on his feet.

Manuel let the bull drive into the fallen horse, he was in no hurry, the picador was safe, besides, it did a picador like that good to worry. He'd stay on longer next time. Lousy pics! He looked across the sand at Zurito a little way out from the barrera, his horse rigid, waiting.

'Huh!' he called to the bull, 'Tomar!' holding the cape in both hands so it would catch his eye. The bull detached himself from the horse and charged the cape, and Manuel, running sideways and holding the cape spread wide, stopped, swung on his heels, and brought the bull sharply around facing Zurito.

'Campagnero accepted a pair of varas for the death of one rosinante, with Hernandez and Manolo at the quites,' El Herald's critic wrote. 'He pressed on the iron and clearly showed he was no horse-lover. The veteran Zurito resurrected some of his old stuff with the pike-pole, notably the suerte—'

'Olé! Olé!' the man sitting beside him shouted. The shout was lost in the roar of the crowd, and he slapped the critic on the back. The critic looked up to see Zurito, directly below him, leaning far out over his horse, the length of the pic rising in a sharp angle under his armpit, holding the pic almost by the point, bearing down with all his weight, holding the bull off, the bull pushing and driving to get at the horse, and Zurito, far out, on top of him, holding him, holding him, and slowly pivoting the horse against the pressure, so that at last he was clear. Zurito felt the moment when the horse was clear and the bull could come past, and relaxed the absolute steel lock of his resistance, and the triangular steel point of the pic ripped in the bull's hump of shoulder muscle as he tore loose to find Hernandez's cape before his muzzle. He charged blindly into the cape and the boy took him out into the open arena.

Zurito sat patting his horse and looking at the bull charging the cape that Hernandez swung for him out under the bright light while the crowd shouted.

'You see that one?' he said to Manuel.

'It was a wonder,' Manuel said.

'I got him that time,' Zurito said. 'Look at him now.'

At the conclusion of a closely turned pass of the cape the bull slid to his knees. He was up at once, but far out across the sand. Manuel and Zurito saw the shine of the pumping flow of blood, smooth against the black of the bull's shoulder.

'I got him that time,' Zurito said.

'He's a good bull,' Manuel said.

'If they gave me another shot at him, I'd kill him,' Zurito said.

'They'll change the thirds on us,' Manuel said.

'Look at him now,' Zurito said.

'I got to go over there,' Manuel said, and started on a run for the other side of the ring, where the monos were leading a horse out by the bridle toward the bull, whacking him on the legs with rods and all, in a procession, trying to get him toward the bull, who stood, dropping his head, pawing, unable to make up his mind to charge.

Zurito, sitting his horse, walking him toward the scene, not missing any detail, scowled.

Finally the bull charged, the horse leaders ran for the barrera, the picador hit too far back, and the bull got under the horse, lifted him, threw him onto his back.

Zurito watched. The monos, in their red shirts, running out to drag the picador clear. The picador, now on his feet, swearing and flopping his arms. Manuel and Hernandez standing ready with their capes. And the bull, the great, black bull, with a horse on his back, hooves dangling, the bridle caught in the horns. Black bull with a horse on his back, staggering short-legged, then arching his neck and lifting, thrusting, charging to slide the horse off, horse sliding down. Then the bull into a lunging charge at the cape. Manuel spread for him.

The bull was slower now, Manuel felt. He was bleeding badly. There was a sheen of blood all down his flank.

Manuel offered him the cape again. There he came, eyes open, ugly, watching the cape. Manuel stepped to the side and raised his arms, tightening the cape ahead of the bull for the veronica.

Now he was facing the bull. Yes, his head was going down a little. He was carrying it lower. That was Zurito.

Manuel flopped the cape, there he comes, he side-stepped and swung in another veronica. He's shooting awfully accurately, he thought. He's had enough fight, so he's watching now. He's hunting now. Got his eye on me. But I always give him the cape.

He shook the cape at the bull, there he comes, he side-stepped. Awful close that time. I don't want to work that close to him.

The edge of the cape was wet with blood where it had swept along the bull's back as he went by.

All right, here's the last one.

Manuel, facing the bull, having turned with him each charge, offered the cape with his two hands. The bull looked at him. Eyes watching, horns straight forward, the bull looked at him, watching.

'Huh!' Manuel said, 'Toro!' and leaning back, swung the cape forward. Here he comes. He side-stepped, swung the cape in back of him, and pivoted, so the bull followed a swirl of cape and then was left with nothing, fixed by the pass, dominated by the cape. Manuel swung the cape under his muzzle with one hand, to show the bull was fixed, and walked away.

There was no applause.

Manuel walked across the sand towards the barrera, while Zurito rode out of the ring. The trumpet had blown to change the act to the planting of the banderillos while Manuel had been working with the bull. He had not consciously noticed it. The monos were spreading canvas over the two dead horses and sprinkling sawdust around them.

Manuel came up to the barrera for a drink of water. Retana's man handed him the heavy porous jug.

Fuentes, the tall gypsy, was standing holding a pair of banderillos, holding them together, slim, red sticks, fish-hook points out. He looked at Manuel.

'Go on out there,' Manuel said.

The gypsy trotted out. Manuel set down the jug and watched. He wiped his face with his handkerchief.

The critic of El Heraldo reached for the bottle of warm champagne that stood between his feet, took a drink, and finished his paragraph.

'—the aged Manolo rated no applause for a vulgar series of lances with the cape and we entered the third of the palings.'

Alone in the centre of the ring the bull stood, still fixed. Fuentes, tall, flat-backed, walking toward him arrogantly, his arms spread out, the two slim, red sticks, one in each hand, held by the fingers, points straight forward. Fuentes walked forward. Back of him and to one side was a peon with a cape. The bull looked at him and was no longer fixed.

His eyes watched Fuentes, now standing still. Now he leaned back, calling to him. Fuentes twitched the two banderillos and the light on the steel points caught the bull's eye.

His tail went up and he charged.

He came straight, his eyes on the man. Fuentes stood still, leaning back, the banderillos pointing forward. As the bull lowered his head to hook, Fuentes leaned backward, his arms came together and rose, his two hands touching, the banderillos two descending red lines, and leaning forward drove the points into the bull's shoulder, leaning far in over the bull's horns and pivoting on the two upright sticks, his legs tight together, his body curving to one side to let the bull pass.

'Olé!' from the crowd.

The bull was hooking wildly, jumping like a trout, all four feet off the ground. The red shafts of the banderillos tossed as he jumped.

Manuel standing at the barrera, noticed that he hooked always to the right.

'Tell him to drop the next pair on the right,' he said to the kid who started to run out to Fuentes with the new banderillos

A heavy hand fell on his shoulder It was Zurito

'How do you feel, kid?' he asked

Manuel was watching the bull

Zurito leaned forward on the barrera, leaning the weight of his body on his arms Manuel turned to him

'You're going good,' Zurito said

Manuel shook his head He had nothing to do now until the next third The gypsy was very good with the banderillos. The bull would come to him in the next third in good shape He was a good bull It had all been easy up to now The final stuff with the sword was all he worried over He did not really worry He did not even think about it But standing there he had a heavy sense of apprehension He looked out at the bull, planning his faena, his work with the red cloth that was to reduce the bull, to make him manageable

The gypsy was walking out toward the bull again, walking heel-and-toe, insultingly, like a ball-room dancer, the red shafts of the banderillos twitching with his walk The bull watched him, not fixed now, hunting him, but waiting to get close enough so he could be sure of getting him, getting the horns into him

As Fuentes walked forward the bull charged Fuentes ran across the quarter of a circle as the bull charged and, as he passed running backward, stopped, swung forward, rose on his toes, arms straight out, and sunk the banderillos straight down into the tight of the big shoulder muscles as the bull missed him

The crowd were wild about it

'That kid won't stay in this night stuff long,' Retana's man said to Zurito

'He's good,' Zurito said

'Watch him now.'

They watched

Fuentes was standing with his back against the barrera Two of the cuadrilla were back of him, with their capes ready to flop over the fence to distract the bull

The bull, with his tongue out, his barrel heaving, was watching the gypsy He thought he had him now Back against the red planks Only a short charge away The bull watched him

The gypsy bent back, drew back his arms, the banderillos pointing at the bull. He called to the bull, stamped one foot. The bull was suspicious. He wanted the man No more barbs in the shoulder.

Fuentes walked a little closer to the bull. Bent back Called again Somebody in the crowd shouted a warning

'He's too damn close,' Zurito said

10 'Watch him,' Retana's man said

Leaning back, inciting the bull with the banderillos, Fuentes jumped, both feet off the ground As he jumped the bull's tail rose and he charged Fuentes came down on his toes, arms straight out, whole body arching forward, and drove the shafts straight down as he swung his body clear of the right horn

20 The bull crashed into the barrera where the flopping capes had attracted his eye as he lost the man

The gypsy came running along the barrera toward Manuel, taking the applause of the crowd His vest was ripped where he had not quite cleared the point of the horn. He was happy about it, showing it to the spectators He made the tour of the ring Zurito saw him go by, smiling, pointing at his vest He smiled

30 Somebody else was planting the last pair of banderillos Nobody was paying any attention

Retana's man tucked a baton inside the red cloth of a muleta, folded the cloth over it, and handed it over the barrera to Manuel He reached in the leather sword-case, took out a sword, and holding it by its leather scabbard, reached it over the fence to Manuel Manuel pulled the blade out by the red hilt and the scabbard fell limp

40 He looked at Zurito The big man saw he was sweating

'Now you get him, kid,' Zurito said

Manuel nodded

'He's in good shape,' Zurito said

'Just like you want him,' Retana's man assured him

Manuel nodded

50 The trumpeter, up under the roof, blew for the final act, and Manuel walked across the arena toward where, up in the dark boxes, the president must be.

In the front row seats the substitute bull-fight critic of El Heraldo took a long drink of the warm champagne He had decided it was not worth while to write a running story and would write up the corrida back in the office. What the hell was it anyway? Only a nocturnal. If he missed anything he would get it out of the morning papers. He took another drink of the champagne. He had a date at Maxim's at twelve. Who were these bull-fighters anyway? Kids and bums. A bunch of bums. He put his pad of paper in his pocket and looked over toward Manuel, standing very much alone in the ring, gesturing with his hat in a salute toward a box he could not see high up in the dark plaza. Out in the ring the bull stood quiet, looking at nothing.

'I dedicate this bull to you, Mr. President, and to the public of Madrid, the most intelligent and generous of the world,' was what Manuel was saying. It was a formula. He said it all. It was a little long for nocturnal use.

He bowed at the dark, straightened, tossed his hat over his shoulder, and, carrying the muleta in his left hand and the sword in his right, walked out toward the bull.

Manuel walked toward the bull. The bull looked at him, his eyes were quick. Manuel noticed the way the banderillos hung down on his left shoulder and the steady sheen of blood from Zurito's pic-ing. He noticed the way the bull's feet were. As he walked forward, holding the muleta in his left hand and the sword in his right, he watched the bull's feet. The bull could not charge without gathering his feet together. Now he stood square on them, dully.

Manuel walked toward him, watching his feet. This was all right. He could do this. He must work to get the bull's head down, so he could go in past the horns and kill him. He did not think about the sword, not about killing the bull. He thought about one thing at a time. The coming things oppressed him, though. Walking forward, watching the bull's feet, he saw successively his eyes, his wet muzzle, and the wide, forward-pointing spread of his horns. The bull had light circles about his eyes. His eyes watched Manuel. He felt he was going to get this little one with the white face.

Standing still now and spreading the red cloth of the muleta with the sword, pricking the point into the cloth so that the sword, now held in his left hand, spread the red flannel like the jib of a boat, Manuel noticed the points of the bull's horns. One of them was splintered from banging against the barrera. The other was sharp as a porcupine quill. Manuel noticed while spreading the muleta that the white base of the horn was stained red. While he noticed these things he did not lose sight of the bull's feet. The bull watched Manuel steadily.

He's on the defensive now, Manuel thought. He's reserving himself. I've got to bring him out of that and get his head down. Always get his head down. Zurito had his head down once, but he's come back. He'll bleed when I start him going and that will bring it down.

Holding the muleta, with the sword in his left hand widening it in front of him, he called to the bull.

The bull looked at him.

He leaned back insultingly and shook the wide-spread flannel.

The bull saw the muleta. It was a bright scarlet under the arc-light. The bull's legs tightened.

Here he comes. Whoosh! Manuel turned as the bull came and raised the muleta so that it passed over the bull's horns and swept down his broad back from head to tail. The bull had gone clean up in the air with the charge. Manuel had not moved.

At the end of the pass the bull turned like a cat coming around a corner and faced Manuel.

He was on the offensive again. His heaviness was gone. Manuel noted the fresh blood shining down the black shoulder and dripping down the bull's leg. He drew the sword out of the muleta and held it in his right hand. The muleta held low down in his left hand, leaning toward the left, he called to the bull. The bull's legs tightened, his eyes on the muleta. Here he comes, Manuel thought. Yuh!

He swung with the charge, sweeping the muleta ahead of the bull, his feet firm, the sword following the curve, a point of light under the arcs.

The bull recharged as the pase natural finished and Manuel raised the muleta for a pase de pecho. Firmly planted, the bull came by his chest under the raised muleta. Manuel leaned his head back to avoid the clattering banderillo shafts The hot, black bull body touched his chest as it passed

Too damn close, Manuel thought Zurito, leaning on the barrera, spoke rapidly to the gypsy, who trotted out toward Manuel with a cape, Zurito pulled his hat down low and looked out across the arena at Manuel

Manuel was facing the bull again, the muleta held low and to the left The bull's head was down as he watched the muleta

'If it was Belmonte doing that stuff, they'd go crazy,' Retana's man said

Zurito said nothing He was watching Manuel out in the centre of the arena

'Where did the boss dig this fellow up?' Retana's man asked

'Out of the hospital,' Zurito said

'That's where he's going damn quick,' Retana's man said

Zurito turned on him.

'Knock on that,' he said, pointing to the barrera

'I was just kidding, man,' Retana's man said

'Knock on the wood '

Retana's man leaned forward and knocked three times on the barrera

'Watch the faena,' Zurito said

Out in the centre of the ring, under the lights, Manuel was kneeling, facing the bull, and as he raised the muleta in both hands the bull charged, tail up

Manuel swung his body clear and, as the bull recharged, brought around the muleta in a half-circle that pulled the bull to his knees

'Why, that one's a great bull-fighter,' Retana's man said

'No, he's not,' said Zurito

Manuel stood up and, the muleta in his left hand, the sword in his right, acknowledged the applause from the dark plaza

The bull had humped himself up from his knees and stood waiting, his head hung low

Zurito spoke to two of the other lads of the cuadrilla and they ran out to stand back of Manuel with their capes There were four men back of him now Hernandez had followed him since he first came out with the muleta Fuentes stood watching, his cape held against his body, tall, in repose, watching lazy-eyed Now the two came up Hernandez motioned them to stand one at each side Manuel stood alone, facing the bull.

Manuel waved back the men with the capes Stepping back cautiously, they saw his face was white and sweating

Didn't they know enough to keep back? Did they want to catch the bull's eye with the capes after he was fixed and ready? He had enough to worry about without that kind of thing

The bull was standing, his four feet square, looking at the muleta Manuel furled the muleta in his left hand The bull's eyes watched it His body was heavy on his feet He carried his head low, but not too low

Manuel lifted the muleta at him The bull did not move Only his eyes watched

He's all lead, Manuel thought He's all square He's framed right He'll take it

He thought in bull-fight terms Sometimes he had a thought and the particular piece of slang would not come into his mind and he could not realize the thought His instincts and his knowledge worked automatically, and his brain worked slowly and in words He knew all about bulls He did not have to think about them He just did the right thing His eyes noted things and his body performed the necessary measures without thought If he thought about it, he would be gone

Now, facing the bull, he was conscious of many things at the same time There were the horns, the one splintered, the other smoothly sharp, the need to profile himself toward the left horn, lance himself short and straight, lower the muleta so the bull would follow it, and, going in over the horns, put the sword all the way into a little spot about as big as a five-peseta piece straight in back of the neck, between the sharp pitch of the bull's shoulders. He must do all this and must then come out from between the horns He was conscious he must do all this, but his only thought was in words 'Corto y derecho '

'Corto y derecho,' he thought, furling the muleta Short and straight Corto y derecho, he drew the sword out of the muleta, profiled on the splintered left horn, dropped the muleta across his body, so his right hand with the sword on the level with his eye made the sign of the cross, and, rising on his toes, sighted along the dipping blade of the sword at the spot high up between the bull's shoulders

Corto y derecho he lanced himself on the bull

There was a shock, and he felt himself go up in the air. He pushed on the sword as he went up and over, and it flew out of his hand. He hit the ground and the bull was on him. Manuel, lying on the ground, kicked at the bull's muzzle with his slippered feet. Kicking, kicking, the bull after him, missing him in his excitement, bumping him with his head, driving the horns into the sand. Kicking like a man keeping a ball in the air, Manuel kept the bull from getting a clean thrust at him.

Manuel felt the wind on his back from the capes flopping at the bull, and then the bull was gone, gone over him in a rush. Dark, as his belly went over. Not even stepped on.

Manuel stood up and picked up the muleta. Fuentes handed him the sword. It was bent where it had struck the shoulder-blade. Manuel straightened it on his knee and ran toward the bull, standing now beside one of the dead horses. As he ran, his jacket flopped where it had been ripped under his armpit.

'Get him out of there,' Manuel shouted to the gypsy. The bull had smelled the blood of the dead horse and ripped into the canvas cover with his horns. He charged Fuentes's cape, with the canvas hanging from his splintered horn, and the crowd laughed. Out in the ring, he tossed his head to rid himself of the canvas. Hernandez, running up from behind him, grabbed the end of the canvas and neatly lifted it off the horn.

The bull followed it in a half-charge and stopped still. He was on the defensive again. Manuel was walking toward him with the sword and muleta. Manuel swung the muleta before him. The bull would not charge.

Manuel profiled toward the bull, sighting along the dipping blade of the sword. The bull was motionless, seemingly dead on his feet, incapable of another charge.

Manuel rose to his toes, sighting along the steel, and charged.

Again there was the shock and he felt himself being borne back in a rush, to strike hard on the sand. There was no chance of kicking this time. The bull was on top of him. Manuel lay as though dead, his head on his arms, and the bull bumped him. Bumped his back, bumped his face in the sand. He felt the horn go into the sand between his folded arms. The bull hit him in the small of the back. His face drove into the sand. The horn drove through one of his sleeves and the bull ripped it off. Manuel was tossed clear and the bull followed the capes.

Manuel got up, found the sword and muleta, tried the point of the sword with his thumb, and then ran toward the barrera for a new sword.

Retana's man handed him the sword over the edge of the barrera.

'Wipe off your face,' he said.

Manuel, running again toward the bull, wiped his bloody face with his handkerchief. He had not seen Zurito. Where was Zurito?

The cuadrilla had stepped away from the bull and waited with their capes. The bull stood, heavy and dull again after the action.

Manuel walked toward him with the muleta. He stopped and shook it. The bull did not respond. He passed it right and left, left and right before the bull's muzzle. The bull's eyes watched it and turned with the swing, but he would not charge. He was waiting for Manuel.

Manuel was worried. There was nothing to do but go in. Corto y derecho. He profiled close to the bull, crossed the muleta in front of his body and charged. As he pushed in the sword, he jerked his body to the left to clear the horn. The bull passed him and the sword shot up in the air, twinkling under the arc-lights, to fall red-lit on the sand.

Manuel ran over and picked it up. It was bent and he straightened it over his knee.

As he came running toward the bull, fixed again now, he passed Hernandez standing with his cape.

'He's all bone,' the boy said encouragingly.

Manuel nodded, wiping his face. He put the bloody handkerchief in his pocket.

There was the bull. He was close to the barrera now. Damn him. Maybe he was all bone. Maybe there was not any place for the sword to go in. The hell there wasn't! He'd show them.

He tried a pass with the muleta and the bull did not move. Manuel chopped the muleta back and forth in front of the bull. Nothing doing.

He furlled the muleta, drew the sword out, profiled and drove in on the bull. He felt the sword buckle as he shoved it in, leaning his weight on it, and then it shot high in the air, end-over-ending into the crowd. Manuel had jerked clear as the sword jumped.

The first cushions thrown down out of the dark missed him. Then one hit him in the face, his bloody face looking toward the crowd. They were coming down fast. Spotting the sand, somebody threw an empty champagne-bottle from close range. It hit Manuel on the foot. He stood there watching the dark, where the things were coming from. Then something whished through the air and struck by him. Manuel leaned over and picked it up. It was his sword. He straightened it over his knee and gestured with it to the crowd.

'Thank you,' he said. 'Thank you.'

Oh, the dirty bastards! Dirty bastards! Oh, the lousy, dirty bastards! He kicked into a cushion as he ran.

There was the bull. The same as ever. All right, you dirty, lousy bastard!

Manuel passed the muleta in front of the bull's black muzzle.

Nothing doing.

You won't! All right. He stepped close and jammed the sharp peak of the muleta into the bull's damp muzzle.

The bull was on him as he jumped back and as he tripped on a cushion he felt the horn go into him, into his side. He grabbed the horn with his two hands and rode backward, holding tight onto the place. The bull tossed him and he was clear. He lay still. It was all right. The bull was gone.

He got up coughing and feeling broken and gone. The dirty bastards!

'Give me the sword,' he shouted. 'Give me the stuff.'

Fuentes came up with the muleta and the sword.

Hernandez put his arm around him.

'Go on to the infirmary, man,' he said. 'Don't be a damn fool.'

'Get away from me,' Manuel said. 'Get to hell away from me.'

He twisted free. Hernandez shrugged his shoulders. Manuel ran toward the bull.

There was the bull standing, heavy, firmly planted.

All right, you bastard! Manuel drew the sword out of the muleta, sighted with the same movement, and flung himself on to the bull. He felt the sword go in all the way. Right up to the guard. Four fingers and his thumb into the bull. The blood was hot on his knuckles, and he was on top of the bull.

The bull lurched with him as he lay on, and seemed to sink, then he was standing clear. He looked at the bull going down slowly over on his side, then suddenly four feet in the air.

Then he gestured at the crowd, his hand warm from the bull blood.

All right, you bastards! He wanted to say something, but he started to cough. It was hot and choking. He looked down for the muleta. He must go over and salute the president. President hell! He was sitting down looking at something. It was the bull. His four feet up. Thick tongue out. Things crawling around on his belly and under his legs. Crawling where the hair was thin. Dead bull. To hell with the bull! To hell with them all! He started to get to his feet and commenced to cough. He sat down again, coughing. Somebody came and pushed him up.

They carried him across the ring to the infirmary, running with him across the sand, standing blocked at the gate as the mules came in, then around under the dark passageway, men grunting as they took him up the stairway, and then laid him down.

The doctor and two men in white were waiting for him. They laid him out on the table. They were cutting away his shirt. Manuel felt tired. His whole chest felt scalding inside. He started to cough and they held something to his mouth. Everybody was very busy.

There was an electric light in his eyes. He shut his eyes.

He heard someone coming very heavily up the stairs. Then he did not hear it. Then he heard a noise far off. That was the crowd. Well, somebody would have to kill his other bull. They had cut away all his shirt. The doctor smiled at him. There was Retana.

'Hello, Retana' Manuel said He could not hear his voice

Retana smiled at him and said something Manuel could not hear it

Zurito stood beside the table, bending over where the doctor was working He was in his picador clothes, without his hat

Zurito said something to him Manuel could not hear it

Zurito was speaking to Retana One of the men in white smiled and handed Retana a pair of scissors Retana gave them to Zurito. Zurito said something to Manuel He could not hear it

To hell with this operating-table! He'd been on plenty of operating-tables before He was not going to die There would be a priest if he was going to die

Zurito was saying something to him Holding up the scissors

That was it They were going to cut off his coleta They were going to cut off his pigtail

Manuel sat up on the operating-table The doctor stepped back, angry Someone grabbed him and held him

'You couldn't do a thing like that, Manos,' he said.

He heard suddenly, clearly, Zurito's voice

'That's all right,' Zurito said. 'I won't do it I was joking'

'I was going good,' Manuel said 'I didn't have any luck That was all'

Manuel lay back They had put something over his face It was all familiar He inhaled deeply He felt very tired He was very, very tired They took the thing away from his face

'I was going good,' Manuel said weakly 'I was going great'

Retana looked at Zurito and started for the door

'I'll stay here with him,' Zurito said

Retana shrugged his shoulders

Manuel opened his eyes and looked at Zurito

'Wasn't I going good, Manos?' he asked, for confirmation

'Sure,' said Zurito 'You were going great'

The doctor's assistant put the cone over Manuel's face and he inhaled deeply Zurito stood awkwardly, watching

JOHN DOS PASSOS

1896--

FROM U S A

'Mr Ford the automobileer,' the feature-writer wrote in 1900,

'Mr Ford the automobileer began by giving his steed three or four sharp jerks with the lever at the righthand side of the seat, that is, he pulled the lever up and down sharply in order, as he said, to mix air with gasoline and drive the charge into the exploding cylinder

Mr Ford slipped a small electric switch handle and there followed a puff, puff, puff The puffing of the machine assumed a higher key She was flying along about eight miles an hour The ruts in the road were deep, but the machine certainly went with a dreamlike smoothness There was none of the bumping common even to a streetcar . . . By this time the boulevard had been reached, and the automobileer, letting a lever fall a little, let her out Whiz! She picked up speed with infinite rapidity As she ran on there was a clattering behind, the new noise of the automobile

For twenty years or more,

ever since he'd left his father's farm when he was sixteen to get a job in a Detroit machinshop, Henry Ford had been nuts about machinery First it was watches, then he designed a steamtractor, then he built a horseless carriage with an engine adapted from the Otto gasengine he'd read about in The World of Science, then a mechanical buggy with a onecylinder four-cycle motor, that would run forward but not back, at last, in ninetyeight, he felt he was far enough along to risk throwing up his job

with the Detroit Edison Company, where he'd worked his way up from night fireman to chief engineer, to put all his time into working on a new gasoline engine,

(in the late eighties he'd met Edison at a meeting of electriclight employees in Atlantic City. He'd gone up to Edison after Edison had delivered an address and asked him if he thought gasoline was practical as a motor fuel. Edison had said yes. If Edison said it, it was true. Edison was the great admiration of Henry Ford's life), and in driving his mechanical buggy, sitting there at the lever jauntily dressed in a tightbuttoned jacket and a high collar and a derby hat, back and forth over the level illpaved streets of Detroit, scaring the big brewery horses and the skinny trotting horses and the sleekrumped pacers with the motor's loud explosions, looking for men scatterbrained enough to invest money in a factory for building automobiles

He was the eldest son of an Irish immigrant who during the Civil War had married the daughter of a prosperous Pennsylvania Dutch farmer and settled down to farming near Dearborn in Wayne County, Michigan, like plenty of other Americans, young Henry grew up hating the endless sogging through the mud about the chores, the hauling and pitching manure, the kerosene lamps to clean, theirk and sweat and solitude of the farm

He was a slender, active youngster, a good skater, clever with his hands, what he liked was to tend the machinery and let the others do the heavy work. His mother had told him not to drink, smoke, gamble or go into debt, and he never did

When he was in his early twenties his father tried to get him back from Detroit, where he was working as mechanic and repairman for the Drydock Engine Company that built engines for steamboats, by giving him forty acres of land

Young Henry built himself an uptodate square white dwellinghouse with a false mansard roof and married and settled down on the farm, but he let the hired men do the farming,

he bought himself a buzzsaw and rented a stationary engine and cut the timber off the woodlots

He was a thrifty young man who never drank or smoked or gambled or coveted his neighbor's wife, but he couldn't stand living on the farm

He moved to Detroit, and in the brick barn behind his house tinkered for years in his spare time with a mechanical buggy that would be light enough to run over the clayey wagonroads of Wayne County, Michigan

By 1900 he had a practicable car to promote

He was forty years old before the Ford Motor Company was started and production began to move

Speed was the first thing the early automobile manufacturers went after. Races advertised the makes of cars

Henry Ford himself hung up several records at the track at Grosse Pointe and on the ice on Lake St. Clair. In his 999 he did the mile in thirtynine and fourfifths seconds

But it had always been his custom to hire others to do the heavy work. The speed he was busy with was speed in production, the records records in efficient output. He hired Barney Oldfield, a stunt bicyclerider from Salt Lake City, to do the racing for him

Henry Ford had ideas about other things than the designing of motors, carburetors, magnetos, jigs and fixtures, punches and dies, he had ideas about sales, that the big money was in economical quantity production, quick turnover, cheap interchangeable easilyreplaced standardized parts, it wasn't until 1909, after years of arguing with his partners, that Ford put out the first Model T

Henry Ford was right

That season he sold more than ten thousand tin lizzies, ten years later he was selling almost a million a year

In these years the Taylor Plan was stirring up plantmanagers and manufacturers all over the country. Efficiency was the word. The same ingenuity that went into improving the performance of a machine could go into improving the performance of the workmen producing the machine

In 1913 they established the assembly-line at Ford's. That season the profits were something like twentyfive million dollars, but they had trouble in keeping the men on the job, machinists didn't seem to like it at Ford's

Henry Ford had ideas about other things than production

He was the largest automobile manufacturer in the world, he paid high wages, maybe if the steady workers thought they were getting a cut (a very small cut) in the profits, it would give trained men an inducement to stick to their jobs, wellpaid workers might save enough money to buy a tin lizzie, the first day Ford's announced that cleancut properly-married American workers who wanted jobs had a chance to make five bucks a day (of course it turned out that there were strings to it, always there were strings to it)

such an enormous crowd waited outside the Highland Park plant

all through the zero January night that there was a riot when the gates were opened, cops broke heads, jobhunters threw bricks, property, Henry Ford's own property, was destroyed. The company dicks had to turn on the firehose to beat back the crowd.

The American Plan, automotive prosperity seeping down from above, it turned out there were strings to it

But that five dollars a day

paid to good, clean American workmen who didn't drink or smoke cigarettes or read or think,

and who didn't commit adultery and whose wives didn't take in boarders, made America once more the Yukon of the sweated workers of the world, made all the tin lizzies and the automotive age, and incidentally, made Henry Ford the automobileer, the admirer of Edison, the birdlover, the great American of his time

But Henry Ford had ideas about other things besides assemblylines and the living-habits of his employees. He was full of ideas. Instead of going to the city to make his fortune, here was a country boy who'd made his fortune by bringing the city out to the farm. The precepts he'd learned out of McGuffey's Reader, his mother's prejudices and preconceptions, he had preserved clean and unworn as freshprinted bills in the safe in a bank

He wanted people to know about his ideas, so he bought the Dearborn Independent and started a campaign against cigarettesmoking

When war broke out in Europe, he had ideas about that too (Suspicion of army-men and soldiering were part of the mid-west farm tradition, like thrift, stickativeness, temperance and sharp practice in money matters). Any intelligent American mechanic could see that if the Europeans hadn't been a lot of ignorant underpaid foreigners who drank, smoked, were loose about women and wasteful in their methods of production, the war could never have happened

When Rosika Schwimmer broke through the stockade of secretaries and servicemen who surrounded Henry Ford and suggested to him that he could stop the war, he said sure they'd hire a ship and go over and get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas

He hired a steamboat, the Oscar II, and filled it up with pacifists and socialworkers, to go over to explain to the princelings of Europe that what they were doing was vicious and silly

It wasn't his fault that Poor Richard's commonsense no longer rules the world and that most of the pacifists were nuts, goofy with headlines

When William Jennings Bryan went over to Hoboken to see him off, somebody handed William Jennings Bryan a squirrel in a cage, William Jennings Bryan made a speech with the squirrel under his arm. Henry Ford threw American Beauty roses to the crowd. The band played I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier. Practical jokers let loose more squirrels. An eloping couple was married by a platoon of ministers in the saloon, and Mr. Zero, the flop-house humanitarian, who reached the dock too late to sail, the novel—for the novel is the form in which literature affects the greatest number—we may remark this gradual secularization of literature during at least the last three hundred years Bunyan, and to some extent Defoe, had moral purposes the former is beyond suspicion, the latter may be suspect But since Defoe the secularization of the novel has been continuous. There have been three chief phases In the first, the novel took the Faith, in its contemporary version, for granted, and omitted it from its picture of life Fielding, Dickens and Thackeray belong to this phase. In the second, it doubted, worried about, or contested the Faith To this phase belong George Eliot, George Meredith and Thomas Hardy To the third phase, in which we are living, belong nearly all contemporary novelists except Mr James Joyce. It is the phase of those who have never heard the Christian Faith spoken of as anything but an anachronism

Now, do people in general hold a definite opinion, that is to say religious or anti-religious, and do they read novels, or poetry for that matter, with a separate compartment of their minds? The common ground between religion and fiction is behaviour Our religion imposes our ethics, our judgement and criticism of ourselves, and our behaviour towards our fellow men The fiction that we read affects our behaviour towards our fellow men, affects our patterns of ourselves When we read of human beings behaving in certain ways, with the approval of the author, who gives his benediction to this behaviour by his attitude towards the result of the behaviour arranged by himself, we can be influenced towards behaving in the same way<sup>1</sup> When the contemporary novelist is an individual thinking for himself in isolation, he may have something important to offer to those who are able to receive it He who is alone may speak to the individual But the majority of novelists are persons drifting in the stream, only a little faster. They have some sensitiveness, but little intellect.

We are expected to be broadminded about literature, to put aside prejudice or conviction, and to look at fiction as fiction and at drama as drama. With what is inaccurately called 'censorship' in this country—with what is much more difficult to cope with than an official censorship, because it represents the opinions of individuals in an irresponsible democracy, I have very little sympathy, partly because it so often suppresses the wrong books, and partly because it is little more effective than Prohibition of Liquor, partly because it is one manifestation of the desire that state control should take the place of decent domestic influence, and wholly because it acts only from custom and habit, not from decided theological and moral principles Incidentally, it gives people a false sense of security in leading them to believe that books which are not suppressed are harmless Whether there is such a thing as a harmless book I am not sure but there very likely are books so utterly unreadable as to be incapable of injuring anybody. But it is certain that a book is not harmless merely because no one is consciously offended by it And if we, as readers, keep our religious and moral convictions in one compartment, and take our reading merely for entertainment, or on a higher plane, for æsthetic pleasure, I would point out that the author, whatever his conscious intentions in writing, in practice recognizes no such distinctions The author of a work of imagination is trying to affect us wholly, as human beings, whether he knows it or not, and we are affected by it, as human beings, whether we intend to be or not I suppose that everything we eat has some other effect upon us than merely the pleasure of taste and mastication, it affects us during the process of assimilation and digestion, and I believe that exactly the same is true of anything we read

The fact that what we read does not concern merely something called our literary taste, but that it affects directly, though only amongst many other influences, the whole of what we are, is best elicited, I think, by a conscientious examination of the history of our individual literary education. Consider the adolescent reading of any person with some literary sensibility. Everyone, I believe, who is at all sensible to the seductions of poetry, can remember some moment in youth when he or she was completely carried away by the work of one poet. Very likely he was carried away by several poets, one after the other. The reason for this passing infatuation is not merely that our sensibility to poetry is keener in adolescence than in maturity. What happens is a kind of inundation, of invasion of the undeveloped personality, the empty (swept and garnished) room, by the stronger personality of the poet. The same thing may happen at a later age to persons who have not done much reading. One author takes complete possession of us for a time, then another, and finally they begin to affect each other in our mind. We weigh one against another, we see that each has qualities absent from others, and qualities incompatible with the qualities of others. We begin to be, in fact, critical, and it is our growing critical power which protects us from excessive possession by any one literary personality. The good critic—and we should all try to be critics, and not leave criticism to the fellows who write reviews in the papers—is the man who, to a keen and abiding sensibility, joins wide and increasingly discriminating reading. Wide reading is not valuable as a kind of hoarding, an accumulation of knowledge, or what sometimes is meant by the term ‘a well-stocked mind.’ It is valuable because in the process of being affected by one powerful personality after another, we cease to be dominated by any one, or by any small number. The very different views of life, cohabiting in our minds, affect each other, and our own personality asserts itself and gives each a place in some arrangement peculiar to ourself.

It is simply not true that works of fiction, prose or verse, that is to say works depicting the actions, thoughts and words and passions of imaginary human beings, directly extend our knowledge of life. Direct knowledge of life is knowledge directly in relation to ourselves, it is our knowledge of how people behave in general, of what they are like in general, in so far as that part of life in which we ourselves have participated gives us material for generalization. Knowledge of life obtained through fiction is only possible by another stage of self-consciousness. That is to say, it can only be a knowledge of other people’s knowledge of life, not of life itself. So far as we are taken up with the happenings in any novel in the same way in which we are taken up with what happens under our eyes, we are acquiring at least as much falsehood as truth. But when we are developed enough to say ‘This is the view of life of a person who was a good observer within his limits, Dickens, or Thackeray, or George Eliot, or Balzac, but he looked at it in a different way from me, because he was a different man, he even selected rather different things to look at, or the same things in a different order of importance, because he was a different man, so what I am looking at is the world as seen by a particular mind’—then we are in a position to gain something from reading fiction. We are learning something about life from these authors direct, just as we learn something from the reading of history direct, but these authors are only really helping us when we can see, and allow for, their differences from ourselves.

Now what we get, as we gradually grow up and read more and more, and read a greater diversity of authors, is a variety of views of life. But what people commonly assume, I suspect, is that we gain this experience of other men’s views of life only by ‘improving reading.’ This, it is supposed, is a reward we get by applying ourselves to Shakespeare, and Dante, and Goethe, and Emerson, and Carlyle, and dozens of other respectable writers. The rest of our reading for amusement is merely killing time. But I incline to come to the alarming conclusion that it is just the literature that we read for ‘amusement,’ or ‘purely for pleasure’ that may have the greatest and least suspected influence upon us. It is the literature which we read with the least effort that can have the easiest and most insidious influence upon us. Hence it is that the influence of popular novelists, and of popular plays of contemporary life, requires to be scrutinized most closely. And it is chiefly contemporary literature that the majority of people ever read in this attitude of ‘purely for pleasure,’ of pure passivity.

The relation of what I have been saying to the subject announced for my discourse should now be a little more apparent. Though we may read literature merely for pleasure, of 'entertainment' or of 'æsthetic enjoyment,' this reading never affects simply a sort of special sense: it affects us as entire human beings, it affects our moral and religious existence. And I say that while individual modern writers of eminence can be improving, contemporary literature as a whole tends to be degrading. And that even the effect of the better writers, in an age like ours, may be degrading to some readers, for we must remember that what a writer does to people is not necessarily what he intends to do. It may be only what people are capable of having done to them. People exercise an unconscious selection, in being influenced. A writer like D. H. Lawrence may be in his effect either beneficial or pernicious. I am not even sure that I have not had some pernicious influence myself.

At this point I anticipate a rejoinder from the liberal-minded, from all those who are convinced that if everybody says what he thinks, and does what he likes, things will somehow, by some automatic compensation and adjustment, come right in the end. 'Let everything be tried,' they say, 'and if it is a mistake, then we shall learn by experience.' This argument might have some value, if we were always the same generation upon earth, or if, as we know to be not the case, people ever learned much from the experience of their elders. These liberals are convinced that only by what is called unrestrained individualism will truth ever emerge. Ideas, views of life, they think, issue distinct from independent heads, and in consequence of their knocking violently against each other, the fittest survive, and truth rises triumphant. Anyone who dissents from this view must be either a mediævalist, wishful only to set back the clock, or else a fascist, and probably both.

If the mass of contemporary authors were really individualists, every one of them inspired Blakes, each with his separate vision, and if the mass of the contemporary public were really a mass of individuals there might be something to be said for this attitude. But this is not, and never has been, and never will be. It is not only that the reading individual to-day (or at any day) is not enough an individual to be able to absorb all the 'views of life' of all the authors pressed upon us by the publishers' advertisements and reviewers, and to be able to arrive at wisdom by considering one against another. It is that the contemporary authors are not individuals enough either. It is not that the world of separate individuals of the liberal democrat is undesirable, it is simply that this world does not exist. For the reader of contemporary literature is not, like the reader of the established great literature of all time, exposing himself to the influence of divers and contradictory personalities; he is exposing himself to a mass movement of writers who, each of them, think that they have something individually to offer, but are really all working together in the same direction. And there never was a time, I believe, when the reading public was so large, or so helplessly exposed to the influences of its own time. There never was a time, I believe, when those who read at all, read so many more books by living authors than books by dead authors, there never was a time so completely parochial, so shut off from the past. There may be too many publishers, there are certainly too many books published, and the journals ever incite the reader to 'keep up' with what is being published. Individualistic democracy has come to high tide and it is more difficult to-day to be an individual than it ever was before.

Within itself, modern literature has perfectly valid distinctions of good and bad, better and worse. And I do not wish to suggest that I confound Mr. Bernard Shaw with Mr. Noel Coward, Mrs. Woolf with Miss Mannin. On the other hand, I should like it to be clear that I am not defending a 'high'-brow against a 'low'-brow literature. What I do wish to affirm is that the whole of modern literature is corrupted by what I call Secularism, that it is simply unaware of, simply cannot understand the meaning of, the primacy of the supernatural over the natural life of something which I assume to be our primary concern.

I do not want to give the impression that I have delivered a mere fretful jeremiad against contemporary literature. Assuming a common attitude between you, or some of you, and myself, the question is not so much, what is to be done about it? as, how should we behave towards it?

I have suggested that the liberal attitude towards literature will not work. Even if the writers who make their attempt to impose their 'view of life' upon us were really distinct individuals, even if we as readers were distinct individuals, what would be the result? It would be, surely, that each reader would be impressed, in his reading, merely by what he was previously prepared to be impressed by, he would follow the 'line of least resistance,' and there would be no assurance that he would be made a better man. For literary judgement we need to be acutely aware of two things at once of 'what we like,' and of 'what we ought to like.' Few people are honest enough to know either. The first means knowing what we really feel. Very few know that. The second involves understanding our shortcomings, for we do not really know what we ought to like unless we also know why we ought to like it, which involves knowing why we don't yet like it. It is not enough to understand what we ought to be, unless we know what we are, and we do not understand what we are, unless we know what we ought to be. The two forms of self-consciousness, knowing what we are and what we ought to be, must go together.

It is our business, as readers of literature, to know what we like. It is our business, as Christians, as well as readers of literature, to know what we ought to like. It is our business as honest men not to assume that whatever we like is what we ought to like, and it is our business as honest Christians not to assume that we do like what we ought to like. And the last thing I would wish for would be the existence of two literatures, one for Christian consumption and the other for the pagan world. What I believe to be incumbent upon all Christians is the duty of maintaining consciously certain standards and criteria of criticism over and above those applied by the rest of the world, and that by these criteria and standards everything that we read must be tested. We must remember that the greater part of our current reading matter is written for us by people who have no real belief in a supernatural order, though some of it may be written by people with individual notions of a supernatural order which are not ours. And the greater part of our reading matter is coming to be written by people who not only have no such belief, but are even ignorant of the fact that there are still people in the world so 'backward' or so 'eccentric' as to continue to believe. So long as we are conscious of the gulf fixed between ourselves and the greater part of contemporary literature, we are more or less protected from being harmed by it, and are in a position to extract from it what good it has to offer us.

There are a very large number of people in the world to-day who believe that all ills are fundamentally economic. Some believe that various specific economic changes alone would be enough to set the world right, others demand more or less drastic changes in the social as well, changes chiefly of two opposed types. These changes demanded, and in some places carried out, are alike in one respect, that they hold the assumptions of what I call Secularism: they concern themselves only with changes of a temporal, material, and external nature, they concern themselves with morals only of a collective nature. In an exposition of one such new faith I read the following words:

'In our morality the one single test of any moral question is whether it impedes or destroys in any way the power of the individual to serve the State. [The individual] must answer the questions "Does this action injure the nation? Does it injure other members of the nation? Does it injure my ability to serve the nation?" And if the answer is clear on all those questions, the individual has absolute liberty to do as he will.'

Now I do not deny that this is a kind of morality, and that it is capable of great good within limits; but I think that we should all repudiate a morality which had no higher ideal to set before us than that. It represents, of course, one of the violent reactions we are witnessing, against the view that the community is solely for the benefit of the individual, but it is equally a gospel of this world, and of this world alone. My complaint against modern literature is of the same kind. It is not that modern literature is in the ordinary sense 'immoral' or even 'amoral', and in any case to prefer that charge would not be enough

It is simply that it repudiates, or is wholly ignorant of, our most fundamental and important beliefs, and that in consequence its tendency is to encourage its readers to get what they can out of life while it lasts, to miss no 'experience' that presents itself, and to sacrifice themselves, if they make any sacrifice at all, only for the sake of tangible benefits to others in this world either now or in the future. We shall certainly continue to read the best of its kind, of what our time provides, but we must tirelessly criticize it according to our own principles, and not merely according to the principles admitted by the writers and by the critics who discuss it in the public press

THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK

*S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza piu scosse
Ma perciocche giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s'i'odo il vero,
Senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo*<sup>1</sup>

LET us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky

Like a patient etherized upon a table,
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,

The muttering retreats
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels

And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells

Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent

To lead you to an overwhelming question

Oh, do not ask, 'What is it?'

Let us go and make our visit

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo

<sup>1</sup> 'If I could believe that my answer might be to a person who should ever return into the world, this flame would stand without more quiverings, but inasmuch as, if I hear the truth, never from this depth did any living man return, without fear of infamy I answer thee' (trans. C. E. Norton). The passage is spoken by a soul in hell to Dante, in his Inferno, XXVII, 61-66.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes,

The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes

Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,

Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,

Let fall upon its back the soot that falls
from chimneys,

Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,

And seeing that it was a soft October night, Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,

Rubbing its back upon the window-panes,
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet,

There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days of hands

That lift and drop a question on your plate,
Time for you and time for me,<sup>31</sup>
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo

And indeed there will be time
To wonder, 'Do I dare?' and, 'Do I dare?'
Time to turn back and descend the stair,
With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
[They will say 'How his hair is growing thin!']<sup>41</sup>

My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,

My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—

[They will say 'But how his arms and legs are thin!']

Do I dare

Disturb the universe?

In a minute there is time

For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.

For I have known them all already, known them all.—

Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons, 50
 I have measured out my life with coffee
 spoons,
 I know the voices dying with a dying fall
 Beneath the music from a farther room
 So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
 The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
 And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
 When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
 Then how should I begin To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways? 60
 And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—
 Arms that are braceleted and white and bare [But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!]
 Is it perfume from a dress
 That makes me so digress?
 Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl
 And should I then presume?
 And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets 70
 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
 Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows?

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
 Scuttling across the floors of silent seas

. . . . .

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
 Smoothed by long fingers,
 Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers, Stretched on the floor, here beside you and
 me.
 Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
 Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis? 80

But though I have wept and fasted, wept
 and prayed,
 Though I have seen my head [grown slightly bald] brought in upon a platter,
 I am no prophet—and here's no great
 matter,
 I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
 And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
 And in short, I was afraid

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 After the cups, the marmalade, the tea, Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
 Would it have been worth while, 90
 To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
 To have squeezed the universe into a ball
 To roll it toward some overwhelming
 question,
 To say 'I am Lazarus, come from the dead,
 Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you
 all'—
 If one, settling a pillow by her head, Should say 'That is not what I meant at all,
 That is not it, at all'

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 Would it have been worth while, 100
 After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
 After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
 And this, and so much more?—
 It is impossible to say just what I mean!
 But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen
 Would it have been worth while If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
 And turning toward the window, should
 say.

'That is not it at all,
 That is not what I meant, at all.' 110

. . . . .

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be,
 Am an attendant lord, one that will do
 To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
 Advise the prince, no doubt, an easy tool,
 Deferential, glad to be of use,

Politically, cautious, and meticulous;
Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse,
At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
Almost, at times, the Fool

I grow old . . . I grow old . . . 120
I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach
I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
When the wind blows the water white and black

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and
brown 130
Till human voices wake us, and we drown

LA FIGLIA CHE PIANGE <sup>1</sup>

O quam te memorem virgo . . . <sup>2</sup>

STAND on the highest pavement of the stair—

Lean on a garden urn—

Weave, weave the sunlight in your hair—
Clasp your flowers to you with a pained surprise—

Fling them to the ground and turn
With a fugitive resentment in your eyes
But weave, weave the sunlight in your hair

So I would have had him leave,
So I would have had her stand and grieve,
So he would have left 10
As the soul leaves the body torn and bruised,

As the mind deserts the body it has used.
I should find
Some way incomparably light and deft,
Some way we both should understand,

<sup>1</sup> 'The Weeping Maiden'

Æneid, I, 327

Simple and faithless as a smile and shake of the hand.

She turned away, but with the autumn weather

Compelled my imagination many days,
Many days and many hours:
Her hair over her arms and her arms full of flowers 20

And I wonder how they should have been together!

I should have lost a gesture and a pose.
Sometimes these cogitations still amaze
The troubled midnight and the noon's
repose

THE HIPPOPOTAMUS <sup>3</sup>

Similiter et omnes revereantur Diaconos, ut mandatum Jesu Christi, et Episcopum, ut Jesum Christum, existentem filium Patris, Presbyteros autem, ut concilium Dei et conjunctionem Apostolorum Sine his Ecclesia non vocatur; de quibus suadeo vos sic habeo

S IGNATII AD TRALLIANOS <sup>4</sup>

And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans <sup>5</sup>

THE broad-backed hippopotamus
Rests on his belly in the mud,
Although he seems so firm to us
He is merely flesh and blood

Flesh and blood is weak and frail,
Susceptible to nervous shock;
While the True Church can never fail
For it is based upon a rock

The hippo's feeble steps may err
In compassing material ends, 10
While the True Church need never stir
To gather in its dividends

<sup>3</sup> 'The Hippopotamus' is a free, satirical paraphrase of a poem of the same title by Theophile Gautier (1811– 1872)

<sup>4</sup> 'In like manner, let all reverence the Deacons as Jesus Christ, and the Bishop as the Father, and the Presbyters as the council of God, and the assembly of the Apostles Without these there is no Church Concerning all which I am persuaded that ye think after the same manner' Chevallier, trans., 'The Epistle of Ignatius to the Trallians,' Epistles . . . of Ignatius
(London, 1833), 96

<sup>5</sup> Colossians 4 16

The 'potamus can never reach
The mango on the mango-tree,
But fruits of pomegranate and peach
Refresh the Church from over sea.

At mating time the hippo's voice
Betrays inflexions hoarse and odd,
But every week we hear rejoice
The Church, at being one with God 20

The hippopotamus's day
Is passed in sleep, at night he hunts,
God works in a mysterious way—
The Church can sleep and feed at once

I saw the 'potamus take wing
Ascending from the damp savannas,
And quiring angels round him sing
The praise of God, in loud hosannas

Blood of the Lamb shall wash him clean
And him shall heavenly arms enfold, 30
Among the saints he shall be seen Performing on a harp of gold

He shall be washed as white as snow,
By all the martyr'd virgins kist,
While the True Church remains below
Wrap in the old miasmal mist

WHISPERS OF IMMORTALITY

WEBSTER was much possessed by death
And saw the skull beneath the skin,
And breastless creatures underground
Leaned backward with a lipless grin

Daffodil bulbs instead of balls
Stared from the sockets of the eyes!
He knew that thought clings round dead limbs
Tightening its lusts and luxuries.

Donne, I suppose, was such another
Who found no substitute for sense, 10
To seize and clutch and penetrate,
Expert beyond experience,

He knew the anguish of the marrow
The ague of the skeleton,
No contact possible to flesh
Allayed the fever of the bone.

Grishkin is nice. her Russian eye
Is underlined for emphasis,
Uncorseted, her friendly bust
Gives promise of pneumatic bliss. 20

The couched Brazilian jaguar
Compels the scampering marmoset
With subtle effluence of a cat,
Grishkin has a maisonette

The sleek Brazilian jaguar
Does not in his arboreal gloom
Distil so rank a feline smell
As Grishkin in a drawing-room

And even the Abstract Entities
Circumambulate her charm, 30
But our lot crawls between dry ribs
To keep our metaphysics warm

SWEENEY AMONG THE NIGHTINGALES<sup>1</sup>

ώμοι πέπληγμαι καιρίαν πληγὴν ἔσω<sup>2</sup>

APENECK Sweeney spreads his knees
Letting his arms hang down to laugh,
The zebra stripes along his jaw
Swelling to maculate giraffe

The circles of the stormy moon
Slide westward to the River Plate,
Death and the Raven drift above
And Sweeney guards the hornèd gate

Gloomy Orion and the Dog
Are veiled, and hushed the shrunken seas,
The person in the Spanish cape 11
Tries to sit on Sweeney's knees

<sup>1</sup> 'Eliot once remarked that all he consciously set out to create in "Sweeney Among the Nightingales" was a sense of foreboding. Yet the very exactitude with which he has built up his impression by means of the close details of his night-town scene, as well as by the way he underlines his effect both through a reference in the epigraph and in the final stanza to another scene of foreboding that ended in the murder of Agamemnon, inevitably causes his delineation to take on wider implications. The sharp contrast that seems at first simply to be mocking a debased present as it juxtaposes Sweeney with the hero of antiquity, ends in establishing also an undercurrent of moving drama for a sympathetic feeling for Sweeney is set up by the realization that he is a man as well as Agamemnon, and that his plotted death is therefore likewise a human tragedy.' Matthiessen, The Achievement of T S Eliot (Boston, 1935), 129-30.

Tears at the grapes with murderous paws;

She and the lady in the cape
Are suspect, thought to be in league,
Therefore the man with heavy eyes

GERONTION<sup>1</sup>

*Thou hast nor youth nor age
But as it were an after dinner sleep
Dreaming of both*<sup>2</sup>

HERE I am, an old man in a dry month,
Being read to by a boy, waiting for rain

1 'The poem opens with what is to be a recurrent theme of Mr Eliot's the mixing of "memory and desire" in present barrenness. The old man in his "dry month," waiting for the life-giving "rain" that he knows will never come, is spurred to envy, then to poignant recollection by the story of hot-blooded vitality, which contrasts with the squalour of his actual surrounding. Youthful desire mingles in memory with the most exalted emotions, those associated with the mysteries of religion.' Leavis, New Bearings in English Poetry (London, 1932), 84.

'As he [Eliot] said once in conversation, the images here are "consciously concrete," they correspond as closely as possible to something he has actually seen

I was neither at the hot gates
Nor fought in the warm rain
Nor knee deep in the salt marsh, heaving a cutlass,
Bitten by flies, fought
My house is a decayed house,
And the Jew squats on the window sill, the owner,
Spawned in some estaminet of Antwerp, Blistered in Brussels, patched and peeled in London 10
The goat coughs at night in the field
overhead,
Rocks, moss, stonecrop, iron, merds
The woman keeps the kitchen, makes tea, Sneezes at evening, poking the peevish gutter

I an old man,
A dull head among windy spaces

Signs are taken for wonders 'We would see a sign!'
The word within a word, unable to speak a
word, Swaddled with darkness In the juvenescence of the year
Came Christ the tiger 20
In depraved May, dogwood and chestnut, flowering Judas,
To be eaten, to be divided, to be drunk
Among whispers, by Mr Silvero
With caressing hands, at Limoges
Who walked all night in the next room,

By Hakagawa, bowing among the Titans,
By Madame de Tornquist, in the dark room
Shifting the candles, Fraulein von Kulp

But he also believes that if they are clearly rendered, they will stand for something larger than themselves, they will not depend for their apprehension upon any private reference, but will become "unconsciously general." # ASH-WEDNESDAY <sup>1</sup>

I

BECAUSE I do not hope to turn again
 Because I do not hope
 Because I do not hope to turn Desiring this man's gift and that man's scope

I no longer strive to strive towards such things

(Why should the aged eagle stretch its wings?)

Why should I mourn
 The vanished power of the usual reign?

Because I do not hope to know again
 The infirm glory of the positive hour 10

Because I do not think Because I know I shall not know
 The one veritable transitory power
 Because I cannot drink
 There, where trees flower, and springs flow, for there is nothing again

Because I know that time is always
 time
 And place is always and only place
 And what is actual is actual only for one time

And only for one place
 I rejoice that things are as they are and 20
 I renounce the blessed face
 And renounce the voice

1 ' The balance that is sustained in "Ash-Wednesday" between knowledge of the desert and perception of the garden gives a full tone of authority to both, and thus to the range of experience which they encompass. This poem is not an escape from the problem of life into an easy dream world. The most urgent notes are suggested by the connotations of its title. On Ash-Wednesday is performed the ritual of anointing the forehead with ashes, while the priest recites "Remember, man, that thou art dust, and unto dust thou shalt return". By the time we reach the last poem of the series, we have a full sense of the wavering of an individual spirit, its desire to lose itself in the universal Will, and yet its continual distraction back to the world of desire and loss' Matthiessen, The Achievement of T S Eliot (Boston, 1935), 120-22

Because I cannot hope to turn again Consequently I rejoice, having to construct something
 Upon which to rejoice

And pray to God to have mercy upon us
 And I pray that I may forget These matters that with myself I too much discuss
 Too much explain
 Because I do not hope to turn again      30
 Let these words answer
 For what is done, not to be done again
 May the judgement not be too heavy upon us

Because these wings are no longer wings to fly
 But merely vans to beat the air
 The air which is now thoroughly small and dry Smaller and dryer than the will Teach us to care and not to care
 Teach us to sit still

Pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death      40
 Pray for us now and at the hour of our
     death

Lady, three white leopards sat under a juniper-tree
 In the cool of the day, having fed to satiety
 On my legs my heart my liver and that which had been contained In the hollow round of my skull And God
     said
 Shall these bones live? shall these Bones live? And that which had been contained In the bones (which were already dry) said chirping
 Because of the goodness of this Lady And because of her loveliness, and because      50
 She honours the Virgin in meditation,
 We shine with brightness And I who am here dissembled
 Proffer my deeds to oblivion, and my love
 To the posterity of the desert and the fruit of the gourd
 It is this which recovers
 My guts the strings of my eyes and the indigestible portions

Which the leopards reject The Lady is withdrawn
 In a white gown, to contemplation, in a white gown
 Let the whiteness of bones atone to forgetfulness      59
 There is no life in them As I am forgotten
 And would be forgotten, so I would forget Thus devoted, concentrated in purpose
     And God said
 Prophecy to the wind, to the wind only for only
 The wind will listen And the bones sang chirping
 With the burden of the grasshopper, saying

Lady of silences
 Calm and distressed
 Torn and most whole
 Rose of memory
 Rose of forgetfulness      70
 Exhausted and life-giving Worried resposful
 The single Rose
 Is now the Garden
 Where all loves end
 Terminate torment
 Of love unsatisfied
 The greater torment
 Of love satisfied
 End of the endless      80
 Journey to no end
 Conclusion of all that Is inconclusible
 Speech without word and Word of no speech
 Grace to the Mother
 For the Garden
 Where all love ends

Under a juniper-tree the bones sang, scattered and shining
 We are glad to be scattered, we did little good to each other,      90
 Under a tree in the cool of the day, with the blessing of sand,
 Forgetting themselves and each other, united
 In the quiet of the desert. This is the land which ye Shall divide by lot And neither division nor unity
 Matters This is the land We have our inheritance.

At the first turning of the second stair
 I turned and saw below
 The same shape twisted on the banister
 Under the vapour in the fetid air Struggling with the devil of the stairs who wears 100
 The deceitful face of hope and of despair.

At the second turning of the second
     stair
 I left them twisting, turning below,
 There were no more faces and the stair was dark,
 Damp, jagged, like an old man's mouth
     drivelling, beyond repair,
 Or the toothed gullet of an aged shark

At the first turning of the third stair
 Was a slotted window bellied like the fig's fruit
 And beyond the hawthorn blossom and a pasture scene
 The broadbacked figure drest in blue and green 110
 Enchanted the maytime with an antique flute
 Blown hair is sweet, brown hair over the mouth blown,
 Lilac and brown hair, Distraction, music of the flute, stops and steps of the mind over the third
     stair,
 Fading, fading, strength beyond hope and despair
 Climbing the third stair

1 'It is more than likely that he [Eliot] meant the turnings of his stair to represent something even more definite, to remind the reader that they correspond in general to the three divisions of Dante's hell of Purgatory. At the foot of the hill were those whose sin had been the greatest, who had been guilty of love distorted, those who had loved evil things instead of God, those whose self-absorbed pride had shut them off from Him. Higher up were those whose love of God had been defective, higher still, the least gravely sinful, those who had loved excessively things which should take only a secondary place in the affections, among them the sensual and lustful (A hint of the correspondence between these particular qualities of excess and Eliot's third stair is underscored by the image describing the window itself "bellied like the fig's fruit") Such a reminder that the stages of the soul which Eliot is depicting correspond also to a completely developed pattern of philosophic and religious thought, would remove the experience entirely from anything purely personal, and would thus enable it to possess a more universal significance' Matthiessen, ibid. 65-66

If the lost word is lost, if the spent word is spent
 If the unheard, unspoken 150
 Word is unspoken, unheard,
 Still is the unspoken word, the Word unheard,
 The Word without a word, the Word within
 The world and for the world,
 And the light shone in darkness and Against the Word the unstilled world still whirled
 About the centre of the silent Word

O my people, what have I done unto thee

Where shall the word be found, where will the word Resound? Not here, there is not enough silence 160
 Not on the sea or on the islands, not On the mainland, in the desert or the rain land,
 For those who walk in darkness
 Both in the day time and in the night time
 The right time and the right place are not here
 No place of grace for those who avoid the
 face
 No time to rejoice for those who walk among noise and deny the voice

Will the veiled sister pray for Those who walk in darkness, who chose thee and oppose thee,
 Those who are torn on the horn between season and season, time and time,
 between 170
 Hour and hour, word and word, power and power, those who wait
 In darkness? Will the veiled sister pray
 For children at the gate
 Who will not go away and cannot pray
 Pray for those who chose and oppose

O my people, what have I done unto thee

Will the veiled sister between the slender
 Yew trees pray for those who offend her
 And are terrified and cannot surrender
 And affirm before the world and deny between the rocks 180
 In the last desert between the last blue rocks

The desert in the garden the garden in the desert
 Of drouth, spitting from the mouth the withered apple-seed.

O my people.

Although I do not hope to turn again
 Although I do not hope
 Although I do not hope to turn

Wavering between the profit and the loss
 In this brief transit where the dreams cross
 The dreamcrossed twilight between birth and dying 190
 (Bless me father) though I do not wish to wish these things
 From the wide window towards the granite shore
 The white sails still fly seaward, seaward flying Unbroken wings

And the lost heart suffens and rejoices
 In the lost lilac and the lost sea voices
 And the weak spirit quickens to rebel
 For the bent golden-rod and the lost sea smell
 Quickens to recover
 The cry of quail and the whirling plover 200
 And the blind eye creates
 The empty forms between the ivory gates And smell renews the salt savour of the sandy earth

This is the time of tension between dying and birth
 The place of solitude where three dreams cross
 Between blue rocks
 But when the voices shaken from the yew-tree drift away
 Let the other yew be shaken and reply

Blessèd sister, holy mother, spirit of the fountain, spirit of the garden, Suffer us not to mock ourselves with falsehood 210

Teach us to care and not to care
 Teach us to sit still
 Even among these rocks,
 Our peace in His will
 And even among these rocks
 Sister, mother

And spirit of the river, spirit of the sea,
Suffer me not to be separated

And let my cry come unto Thee.

MARINA <sup>1</sup>

Quis hic locus, quae regio, quae mundi plaga? <sup>2</sup>

WHAT seas what shores what grey rocks and what islands

What water lapping the bow
And scent of pine and the woodthrush singing through the fog

What images return
O my daughter.

Those who sharpen the tooth of the dog,
meaning

Death
Those who glitter with the glory of the hummingbird, meaning

Death
Those who sit in the sty of contentment, meaning 10

Death
Those who suffer the ecstasy of the animals, meaning

Death

Are become unsubstantial, reduced by a wind,

A breath of pine, and the woodsong fog
By this grace dissolved in place

What is this face, less clear and clearer
The pulse in the arm, less strong and stronger—

Given or lent? more distant than stars and nearer than the eye

Whispers and small laughter between leaves and hurrying feet 10

<sup>1</sup> 'It is Marina, who was lost and found again, who becomes the symbol for the new realization striven after "Marina" belongs, like "Ash-Wednesday," to "the time of tension between dying and birth," and exhibits an even more subtle ambiguity than anything in the sequence. The liturgical note is absent, and one may indicate the change in rhythm by saying that it has about it nothing of ritual, yet the poem expresses something nearer to assurance than anything in "Ash-Wednesday"' Leavis, New Bearings in English Poetry (London, 1932), 129-30

Under sleep, where all the waters meet.

Bowsprit cracked with ice and paint cracked with heat.

I made this, I have forgotten

And remember

The rigging weak and the canvas rotten Between one June and another September Made this unknowing, half conscious, unknown, my own

The garboard strake leaks, the seams need caulking

This form, this face, this life

Living to live in a world of time beyond me, let me 30

Resign my life for this life, my speech for that unspoken,

The awakened, lips parted, the hope, the new ships

What seas what shores what granite islands towards my timbers

And woodthrush calling through the fog
My daughter

FROM CORIOLAN

TRIUMPHAL MARCH <sup>3</sup>

STONE, bronze, stone, steel, stone, oakleaves
horses' heels

Over the paving

And the flags And the trumpets And so many eagles

<sup>3</sup> In the context of the lines at the end of 'Triumphal March,' 'the central figure of the poem is seen to be neither Coriolanus nor a modern statesman alone, no more an Elizabethan than a Roman general, not even a symbol for leadership so much as the embodiment of qualities of spiritual perception and mastery that are integral to any deep apprehension of the meaning of life, and thus also to the existence of any adequate society. The hidden sources of inner life, the reserved balance, which sustain this individual and mark him off from the shallow chaotic flux of mere externalized rootless existence, make him almost a symbol for the harmonious union of emotion and thought that Eliot has so frequently stressed as characteristic of a "firm grasp of human experience", these qualities likewise demand a sustained equilibrium in the relations between the individual and the social structure. The ripely developed human being has gained the integrity that comes from mature self-knowledge, and he therefore understands that no wholeness exists in isolation, that the individual cannot find fulfillment except through also giving himself to society—a truth none the less implied in "Difficulties of a Statesman" [the remaining section of "Coriolanus"] by the fact that what is presented there is the break-down of the relation between the leader and the state in the hopeless con-

 28,000 trench mortars,
 53,000 field and heavy guns,
 I cannot tell how many projectiles, mines and fuses, fusion of bureaucracy ' Matthiessen, The Achievement of T. S. Eliot (Boston, 1935), 140-41

'It happens that I have recently come across an interesting example of how Eliot's own feeling for syllable and rhythm, encountering a passage in prose seems to have started the movement of his "Triumphal March," and hence gives an illuminating glimpse of his own "auditory imagination" in action I began reading Charles Maurras's L'Avenir de l'Intelligence largely because Eliot had recommended it as one of the standard expositions of the classical point of view. It opens with an ironic account of how each new tawdry journalistic triumph is now greeted in the streets with procession and applause. A mediocre writer is represented as talking excitedly "—Y avez-vous pris garde? dit-il, les yeux serrés, le chef de l'Etat s'était fait représenter. Nous avions la moitié du Conseil des ministres et les deux préfets. Tant de généraux! Des régiments avec drapeau, des musiciens et leur bannière. Sans compter beaucoup de magistrats en hermine et de professeurs, ces derniers sans leur toge, ce qui est malheureux —Et les soldats faisaient la haie?— Ils la faisaient —En armes? Vous l'avez dit —Mais que disait le peuple?—Il n'en croyait pas ses cent yeux!"

'I have given a whole paragraph in order that the reader can also sense the possible way in which Eliot's ear quickened at "Tant de généraux", and can perceive not only the source from which he took his final marching line "Et les soldats faisaient la haie? ILS LA FAISAIENT", but, more importantly, the source from which he also incorporated something of the whole sensation of movement that he transformed into the rhythms of his verse. In calculating what elements a poet's ear takes from the sources of his inspiration, it should also be observed that Eliot transformed the context here into quite a new pattern of his own, utilizing, however, a suggestion of the futile bustle of the crowd to contrast with the momentary vision of the serenity of his hero ' Matthiessen, ibid., 82-83

FROM THE ROCK

O LIGHT Invisible, we praise Thee!
 Too bright for mortal vision O Greater Light, we praise Thee for the less,
 The eastern light our spires touch at
     morning, 20
 The light that slants upon our western doors at evening,
 The twilight over stagnant pools at batflight,
 Moon light and star light, owl and moth
     light,
 Glow-worm glowlight on a grassblade
 O Light Invisible, we worship Thee!

We thank Thee for the lights that we have kindled,
 The light of altar and of sanctuary, Small lights of those who meditate at midnight
 And lights directed through the coloured panes of windows
 And light reflected from the polished
     stone, 30
 The gilded carven wood, the coloured fresco.
 Our gaze is submarine, our eyes look upward
 And see the light that fractures through unquiet water.

We see the light but see not whence it comes.
 O Light Invisible, we glorify Thee!

In our rhythm of earthly life we tire of light.
 We are glad when the day ends, when the play ends, and ecstasy is too much pain

We are children quickly tired children who are up in the night and fall asleep as the rocket is fired, and the day is long for work or play.

We tire of distraction or concentration, we sleep and are glad to sleep,

Controlled by the rhythm of blood and the day and the night and the seasons

And we must extinguish the candle, put out the light and relight it, 40

Forever must quench, forever relight the flame

Therefore we thank Thee for our little light, that is dappled with shadow

We thank Thee who hast moved us to building, to finding, to forming at the ends of our fingers and beams of our eyes

And when we have built an altar to the Invisible Light, we may set thereon the little lights for which our bodily vision is made

And we thank Thee that darkness reminds us of light

O Light Invisible, we give Thee thanks for Thy great glory!

NOTE BY A. MACL

THE one man who should never attempt an explanation of a poem is its author. If the poem can be improved by its author's explanations it never should have been published, and if the poem cannot be improved by its author's explanations the explanations are scarcely worth reading. The following brief notes therefore are offered not by way of interpretation of the poems but by way of illustration of the materials out of which the poems came. They are excerpts from note-books kept at the time
 'Ars Poetica' was written in 1924. Notebook references to its subject read as follows 'The purpose of the expression of emotion in a poem is not to recreate the poet's emotion in some one else . . . Art is not a pandar. . . . The poem itself is a finality, an end, a creation—not a stimulant'

'Fenellosa says truly that metaphor "the revealer of nature" is the very essence of poetry. But metaphor is not exegesis or demonstration. Metaphor is experience. It is the conviction of the senses and the conviction of the senses is experience'

'The essential fact about form in poetry is that poetry is an art in and of time and that its form is the line of a succession'

'You Andrew Marvell' (so-called in reference to the famous 'Ever at my back' lines from Marvell's 'To His Coy Mistress') was written in the fall of 1926 after a return from Persia. It originated with a phrase in the following note written on the Mediterranean 'The unforeseen experience—consciousness now of the other side of the earth the always westward coming on of night—Teheran dark—Pa-i-Tak—the Tigris—the house at Rutba Wells—the Levant shore—Crete—Messina—the Garoupe Light—Saragossa the round domes—ocean'

'L'An Trentuesme de Mon Eage' was written in France in December 1924. A note made in Paris reads 'The curious fact that significance in our time has fallen from the sun and the stars and the vast words with the resounding vowels to light upon the minute facets of minute experience—the door knob, the coat buttons and the bannisters. And this would not be strange were it not that we retain so strongly the sense of mortality.'

'Conquistador' was begun in 1929. The first note referring to the project runs '“The Conquest of the New World” which is the metaphor not only of our continent but (and most movingly) of our time—as “America” is the metaphor of all human hope—as “west” is the metaphor of the dreamed-of future. . . . The reports of the existence of this world, the rumors of its riches, the discovery of its coast, of its mountains westward, the arduous journey, the hopeless battles, the beautiful city, the victory which yields defeat. . . . The heroism and the nobility and the pathos of our indestructible belief in that kingdom in the west, our search for it, our discovery of it, our conquest of it and its forever loss. . . .'

Of the other poems selected it is perhaps only necessary to give the dates: 'Not Marble, Nor the Gilded Monuments' was written in New York about 1926, 'The End of the World' in Normandy in 1924, the 'Too-Late Born' at the end of 1924, the 'Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City' (the reference being to the fresco Diego Rivera painted for Mr. Rockefeller's Radio City, and was compelled to paint out) in 1932, the 'Speech to Those Who Say Comrade' and 'Pole Star for This Year' in 1935, 'Pony Rock' in 1929.

ARS POETICA

A POEM should be palpable and mute
As a globed fruit

Dumb
As old medallions to the thumb

Silent as the sleeve-worn stone 10 Of casement ledges where the moss has grown—

A poem should be wordless
As the flight of birds

A poem should be motionless in time
As the moon climbs

20 Leaving, as the moon releases
Twig by twig the night-entangled trees,

Leaving, as the moon behind the winter
leaves,
Memory by memory the mind—

A poem should be motionless in time
As the moon climbs

30 A poem should be equal to Not true

For all the history of grief
An empty doorway and a maple leaf

For love
The leaning grasses and two lights above the sea—

40 A poem should not mean
But be

YOU, ANDREW MARVELL

AND here face down beneath the sun
And here upon earth's noonward height
To feel the always coming on 50 The always rising of the night

To feel creep up the curving east
The earthy chill of dusk and slow
Upon those under lands the vast
And ever climbing shadow grow

And strange at Ecbatan the trees
Take leaf by leaf the evening strange 10
The flooding dark about their knees
The mountains over Persia change

And now at Kermanshah the gate
Dark empty and the withered grass
And through the twilight now the late
Few travelers in the westward pass

And Baghdad darken and the bridge Across the silent river gone
And through Arabia the edge
Of evening widen and steal on 20

And deepen on Palmyra's street
The wheel rut in the ruined stone
And Lebanon fade out and Crete
High through the clouds and overblown

And over Sicily the air
Still flashing with the landward gulls
And loom and slowly disappear
The sails above the shadowy hulls

And Spain go under and the shore
Of Africa the gilded sand 30
And evening vanish and no more
The low pale light across that land

Nor now the long light on the sea

And here face downward in the sun
To feel how swift how secretly
The shadow of the night comes on.
1926 1930

'NOT MARBLE NOR THE GILDED MONUMENTS'

THE praisers of women in their proud and beautiful poems
Naming the grave mouth and the hair and
the eyes
Boasted those they loved should be forever remembered
These were lies

The words sound but the face in the Istrian sun is forgotten
The poet speaks but to her dead ears no
more
The sleek throat is gone—and the breast that was troubled to listen Shadow from door

Therefore I will not praise your knees nor your fine walking Telling you men shall remember your name as long 10

As lips move or breath is spent or the iron of English Rings from a tongue

I shall say you were young and your arms straight and your mouth scarlet I shall say you will die and none will remember you
Your arms change and none remember the swish of your garments
Nor the click of your shoe

Not with my hand's strength not with difficult labor
Springing the obstinate words to the bones of your breast
And the stubborn line to your young stride and the breath to your breathing
And the beat to your haste 20
Shall I prevail on the hearts of unborn men to remember

(What is a dead girl but a shadowy ghost
Or a dead man's voice but a distant and vain affirmation Like dream words most)

Therefore I will not speak of the undying glory of women
I will say you were young and straight and your skin fair
And you stood in the door and the sun was a shadow of leaves on your shoulders
And a leaf on your hair

I will not speak of the famous beauty of dead women
I will say the shape of a leaf lay once on your hair 30
Till the world ends and the eyes are out and the mouths broken
Look! It is there!

THE END OF THE WORLD

QUITE unexpectedly as Vasserot
The armless ambidextrian was lighting
A match between his great and second toe
And Ralph the lion was engaged in biting
The neck of Madame Sossman while the drum

Pointed, and Teeny was about to cough In waltz-time swinging Jocko by the thumb—
Quite unexpectedly the top blew off.

And there, there overhead, there, there, hung over Those thousands of white faces, those dazed eyes, 10
There in the starless dark the poise, the hover,
There with vast wings across the canceled
skies,
There in the sudden blackness the black pall
Of nothing, nothing, nothing—nothing at
all

L'AN TRENTIESME DE MON EAGE

AND I have come upon this place
By lost ways, by a nod, by words,
By faces, by an old man's face
At Morlaix lifted to the birds,

By hands upon the tablecloth
At Aldebori's, by the thin Child's hands that opened to the moth
And let the flutter of the moonlight in,

By hands, by voices, by the voice
Of Mrs Whitman on the stair, 10
By Margaret's 'If we had the choice
To choose or not—' through her thick hair,

By voices, by the creak and fall
Of footsteps on the upper floor,
By silence waiting in the hall
Between the doorbell and the door,

By words, by voices, a lost way—
And here above the chimney stack
The unknown constellations sway—
And by what way shall I go back? 20

THE TOO-LATE BORN

WE too, we too, descending once again
The hills of our own land, we too have heard
Far off—Ah, que ce cor a longue haleine—
The horn of Roland in the passages of Spain,

The first, the second blast, the failing third,
And with the third turned back and climbed once more
The steep road southward, and heard faint the sound
Of swords, of horses, the disastrous war,
And crossed the dark defile at last, and found
At Roncevaux upon the darkening plain 10
The dead against the dead and on the silent
ground
The silent slain—

PONY ROCK

ONE who has loved the hills and died, a man
Intimate with them—how their profiles fade
Large out of evening or through veils of rain
Vanish and reappear or how the sad Long look of moonlight troubles their blind stones—
One who has loved them does not utterly,
Letting his fingers loosen and the green
Ebb from his eyeballs, close his eyes and go
But other men long after he is dead
Seeing those hills will catch their breath and stare 10
As one who reading in a book some word
That calls joy back but can recall not where—
Only the crazy sweetness in the head—
Will stare at the black print till the page is blurred

FROM FRESCOES FOR MR ROCKEFELLER'S CITY

I

LANDSCAPE AS A NUDE

SHE lies on her left side her flank golden:
Her hair is burned black with the strong
sun
The scent of her hair is of rain in the dust on her shoulders
She has brown breasts and the mouth of no
other country
Ah she is beautiful here in the sun where she lies

She is not like the soft girls naked in vineyards
Nor the soft naked girls of the English islands
Where the rain comes in with the surf on an east wind

Hers is the west wind and the sunlight the west
Wind is the long clean wind of the continents—
The wind turning with earth, the wind descending Steadily out of the evening and following on

The wind here where she lies is west the trees
Oak ironwood cottonwood hickory standing in Great groves they roll on the wind as the sea would
The grasses of Iowa Illinois Indiana

Run with the plunge of the wind as a wave tumbling.

Under her knees there is no green lawn of the Florentines
Under her dusty knees is the corn stubble
Her belly is flecked with the flickering light of the corn

She lies on her left side her flank golden
Her hair is burned black with the strong
sun
The scent of her hair is of dust and of smoke on her shoulders
She has brown breasts and the mouth of no
other country

WILDWEST

THERE were none of my blood in this battle
There were Minneconjous Sans Arcs Brules
Many nations of Sioux they were few men galloping

This would have been in the long days in June.
They were galloping well deployed under the plum-trees
They were driving riderless horses themselves they were few:

Crazy Horse had done it with few numbers:
Crazy Horse was small for a Lakota
He was riding always alone thinking of something.

He was standing alone by the picket lines
by the ropes
He was young then he was thirty when he died
Unless there were children to talk he took no notice

When the soldiers came for him there on the other side
On the Greasy Grass in the villages we were shouting
'Hoka Hey! Crazy Horse will be riding!'

They fought in the water horses and men were drowning
They rode on the butte dust settled in sunlight
Hoka Hey! they lay on the bloody ground

No one could tell of the dead which man was Custer
That was the end of his luck by that river
The soldiers beat him at Slim Buttes once

They beat him at Willow Creek when the snow lifted
The last time they beat him was the Tongue
He had only the meat he had made and of that little

Do you ask why he should fight? It was his country
My God should he not fight? It was his But after the Tongue there were no herds to be hunting

He cut the knots of the tails and he led them in
He cried out 'I am Crazy Horse! Do not touch me!'
There were many soldiers between and the gun glinting

And a Mister Josiah Perham of Maine had much of the land Mister Perham was building the Northern Pacific railroad that is Mister Perham was saying at lunch that forty say fifty millions of acres in gift and government grant outright ought to be worth a wide price on the Board at two-fifty and later a Mister Cooke had relieved Mister Perham and later a Mister Morgan relieved Mister

Cooke
Mister Morgan converted at prices current.

It was all prices to them they never looked at it 40
why should they look at the land they were Empire Builders it was all in the bid and the asked and the ink on their books .

When Crazy Horse was there by the Black Hills
His heart would be big with the love he had for that country
And all the game he had seen and the mares he had ridden

And how it went out from you wide and clean in the sunlight

BURYING GROUND BY THE TIES

AYEE! Ai! This is heavy earth on our shoulders
There were none of us born to be buried in this earth
Niggers we were Portuguese Magyars
Polacks

We were born to another look of the sky certainly
Now we lie here in the river pastures
We lie in the mowings under the thick
turf

We hear the earth and the all-day rasp of the grasshoppers
It was we laid the steel on this land from ocean to ocean
It was we (if you know) put the U P.
through the passes

Bringing her down into Laramie full load 10
Eighteen mile on the granite anticlinal
Forty-three foot to the mile and the grade holding:

It was we did it hunkies of our kind
It was we dug the caved-in holes for the cold water.
It was we built the gully spurs and the freight sidings

Who would do it but we and the Irishmen bossing us?
It was all foreign-born men there were in this country
It was Scotsmen Englishmen Chinese Squareheads Austrians. . .

Ayee! but there's weight to the earth under
it
Not for this did we come out—to be lying
here 20
Nameless under the ties in the clay cuts

There's nothing good in the world but the rich will buy it Everything sticks to the grease of a gold note—
Even a continent—even a new sky!

Do not pity us much for the strange grass
over us
We laid the steel to the stone stock of these mountains
The place of our graves is marked by the telegraph poles!

It was not to lie in the bottoms we came out
And the trains going over us here in the dry hollows .

'To Thos Jefferson Esq his obd't serv't
 M Lewis captain detached

Sir

Having in mind your repeated commands in this matter

And the worst half of it done and the streams mapped

And we here on the back of this beach beholding the

Other ocean—two years gone and the cold

Breaking with rain for the third spring
     since St Louis

The crows at the fishbones on the frozen dunes 30

The first cranes going over from south north

And the river down by a mark of the pole
     since the morning

And time near to return, and a ship
     (Spanish)

Lying in for the salmon and fearing chance or the

Drought or the Sioux should deprive you of these discoveries—
 Therefore we send by sea in this writing

Above the Platte there were long plains and a clay

     country
 Rim of the sky far off grass under it.

Dung for the cook fires by the sulphur licks:
 After that there were low hills and the sycamores. 40

And we poled up by the Great Bend in the skiffs
 The honey bees left us after the Osage
     River

The wind was west in the evenings and no dew and the Morning Star larger and whiter than usual—

The winter rattling in the brittle haws
 The second year there was sage and the quail calling

All that valley is good land by the river
 Three thousand miles and the clay cliffs
     and

Rue and beargrass by the water banks
 And many birds and the brant going over and tracks of 50

Bear elk wolves marten the buffalo Numberless so that the cloud of their dust covers them

The antelope fording the fall creeks and the mountains and Grazing lands and the meadow lands and the ground

Sweet and open and well-drained
     We advise you to Settle troops at the forks and to issue licenses

Many men will have living on these lands
 There is wealth in the earth for them all and the wood standing

And wild birds on the water where they sleep

There is stone in the hulls for the towns of a great people . , 60

You have just beheld the Makers making America

They screwed her scrawny and gaunt with their seven-year panics
They bought her back on their mortgages old-whore-cheap
They fattened their bonds at her breasts till the thin blood ran from them'

Men have forgotten how full clear and deep The Yellowstone moved on the gravel and grass grew
When the land lay waiting for her westward people'

FROM CONQUISTADOR

TENTH BOOK

*O Halcyon! O sea-conceiving bird!
The bright surf breaking on thy silver beaches*

And the life goes out of us leaving the chucked sherds'

Leaving an old man's memories to leach
Like a cock's jewels of gravel and worn thin
With the sleepless caul of the heart and hard and clean

Leaving within the eyes behind the fingers
Back of the soft lid and the scarlet vein
The harsh flash of the steel where the light lingers' . .

Leaving the slag in us . 10 leaving us those days . .

And I see well as from dark into light lying
here
The lint of the broom-straw turns in the sun's ray

The cocks sing in the heat there are cakes frying
The drinking water drops from the hung gourd
The rafters circle with the dozing flies

The dogs rise and cross to the cool of the urine

I see well in the dark of the room—as through shutters the Sun is white on a street and the shadows
sure—

As men move under tree-boughs and the sunlight 20
Leaps like a cat on their gilt capes and clings
And is swept off by the next branch.
shunted .

So I remember it yes and the evening bringing the Doves down from the air their wings steep to it!
And thou Colúa! and the paddles rinsed in the Clear pools of thy sun! I cannot sleep for the

Light under my lids of thy bitter water
I cannot sleep for thy cries and the walls keeping the Leaning weight of thy sun by night and the autumn Smelling of flowers as spring does (wearing

the 30
Cotton sleeves we were drunk and the wind caught in them)

And the girls they gave us for love with the scented hair
The green light through the leaves the slow awakening
How there were many and small birds in the air then .

We were like those that in their lands they say
The steers of the sun went up through the wave-lit orchards Shaking the water drops and those gold naked

Girls before them at their dripping horns!
And they ate the sea-doused figs with the salt taste
And all their time was of kine and of sea and of morning 40

So did we lie in that land in the long days
 And they gave us a king's house to our heads and we dwelt in it And the house was smooth and of clean walls and so spacious

And well made and with lime and the stone set there was
 Place for us all and the guns and our goods and our Indians
 Each man his mat under him smelling of Lake grass and of leeks and an ell in width

 And his painted cloth with the corn and the cones and the aloes (For in that land there were men skilled in these images—

Such as sit with a day's sun in their laps 50
 And they stare in the eyes of the trapped hare in the stubble )
 And the rooms smelled of the sweet wood like a chapel

And all were of plank and were ceiled and of pinned lumber
 And painted with scarlet beams and their out-walls burnished
 And made to shine as a good coin and some were

Build to the water and the light returned And spilled up from the float of the ripples and ran on the Wall's glare as a flame where the sunlight blurs it

And some were shadowed to the cool canals
 And they poled in with their slow skiffs and their melons 60 Leaning against the gaff's end and the slash
     and

Drip of the stroke came back and the cries sending the Sun-bright birds up—and the beat of
     sound
 Would pass and float on the stream and the wings settle

(For all the isle was channeled as that ground
 That takes its stars from Istria and their
     eyes

See first the new moon toward the Tuscan Mountain )

And the town rang with the clang of oars and the cries
 And they brought the corn through the water-streets and the faggots
 They poled in with the heaped fish, the hides 70

Smelling of oak the bowls slobbered with maguay
 They stood in the cool of the dark arcades in the market.
 Many there were of them tall men with the hank of the

Coarse skein on their wrists and their thumbs parting it
 Sellers of split fruits of blue stones
 Of brass of the nubile slaves—their hands bargaining

Stroking the breasts up and the thung was shown Merchants of sweet nuts and of chives and of honey
 Of leaves of dock for the eyes of a calf's bone for the

Gloss of the hair as the hand draws it of dung 80
 For salt for the tanning of leather sellers of yarn
 Old men with the sun-bleached hair and the bunches of

Herbs of lettuces washed cool of garlic
 Dried brown on a withy of plaited grass
 Sellers of cooked dough by the coal-fires larding the

Stained skirt with the spittle of burning fat.
 Those the makers of ropes those that shredded the Silken down of a seed and their fingers fastened the

Stone to the twist of it turning the scarlet thread
 Sellers of good dreams of blue clay for the Baking of gods of quills of the gold of hennequin 90

Sellers of beetles for red dyes makers of Stone masks of the dead and of stone mirrors.

Makers of fortunate knots magistrates in
the

Swept porch—and they kept the names of the year

They took the tax on the red stones and the herons

They judged of the levies of salt venders of syrups

Of harsh drugs for the old from the coupling of hares

Of dry seeds of sweet straws . . . many
and

Strange cries that they had . . . and they stood wearing the 100

Knotted and white cloths like capes and they went with

Strong knees through the heat of the sun and their thighs were Straight and their bellies like knuckles of bronze and they set their Heels in the sand of the earth as a man riding a

Wave's back in the sea and their sex was naked

And stained with the salt of the sun like a golden hide

And the tall girls there were in the wind and the way of the Sun was under their knees and the way of the wind

Like a hand over them smoothing the scarves out shaking an

Odor of noon from their skirts like the odor at mudday of 110

Clean cloths to bleach on the water stones (And the butterfly opens his slow wings.) and their skin like the Rain's fragrance of water (one alone Returns from a shadow of plantains and her mouth

Secret with lust as the honey of black combs)

And their loins were heavy with love and they laid them down

Under the lids of their eyes as under a garment

They gave themselves in the green herb and the flowers.

Ah how the throat of a girl and a girl's arms
are

Bright in the riding sun and the young sky
And the green year of our lives where the willows are! 121

How they were slender with strong breasts and the light of the Leaves over them! How there were tall men And the wading lake to their wrists and their wet thighs

Dabbled with sunlight: and they drew the nets

In the green sedge of the shore and they came singing

The sea-film silvered in the lifting web.

Ah how the land was a good land! and the king of it

Rich and with young wives and with gold and his gardens

Sounding with water and he went to drink

At noon at the grooved stone by the sheds and the jars were 131

Choked with the float of the sun and he ate sunnel

And sweet cakes he ate and a kind of partridges.

And none knew his ways or his times with women

Silent he was and not seen and he came by Dark and his desire was in their limbs as an Odor of plums in the night air and they wakened

Stretching their arms out and between their knees

Delight like the sun's mouth and the water's weight

And all his house was sounding as of trees
And the leaves of the trees were dark and a dew came down from them 141
Even at noon the dew fell like an ease of Dusk to comfort a man's eyes and the ground was

Trodden with naked heels and he kept beasts
And birds he kept in a grove and the green loud with the

Locusts and golden and shrill wrens and the bees
In the split hive of the wall and the names of serpents
Curled in the painted vessels at his feet.

And he kept marks on a stone for the sky's turning—
For the way of stars in the trees and the moon's toil 150
Niter and salt he ate from the quick earth

They brought baskets of sweetened seeds and of oil to him
They cried to him Lord! my Lord! my great Lord!
They came with naked feet and the small voices

Ah how the land was a good land! and the doors with Morning with many leaves with the clean odor of Water sluiced on the night stones (and the core of the Broken melon smelled of a girl's robe )

We woke scenting the slot of the heat on the air
We rinsed our mouths in the sun, by the listed boats 160

Purging ourselves to the coarse sand the glare of the Sun was a cleanness of pebbles far out
The fisherman leaned to his line and the silent herons:

And we lay under a lift of the green and their gowns were of Spun twist in our hands the hollow groin Beat with a small heart we heard the trowels

Strike on the brick of the roofs like silver coins
We heard the whistle of tamed birds' to our tongues
Our mouths were sweetened with the scented ointment

And we drank of the milk of the aloe and were drunk 170
And the words hived in the heap of our bones and we praised the Taste of a bitter leaf we praised the sun

And the earth for the odor of men in its hot days—
For a woman's color of pink shell or the pock of the Purple vein at her breast as a bruise made in it

We praised the trampling of sun as a gilt cock
Our hearts were singing as hammered bronze and our mouths with Sound as the corn is where the wind goes and we mocked the Shape of love with our thumbs we cried aloud of the Great sky of the salt rock of the land . . .

And nevertheless it was not so for the ground was 181

Silent against us on our foreign hands
The dust was a solemn and red stain our tongues were Unskilled to the pulp of their fruits as a language of

Sullen stones in our mouths we heard the sun in the Crackle of live trees with the ears of strangers . .

And they passed with their cries at dawn and their deep drums

And we saw them go by the stone courts and the cages
And all clean and with coarse lime and the temple Steep in the reach of the sky . 190 and the boy was slain!

The belly arched to the stone knife I remember
They sang and were glad as a small child in the sunlight
And they ate the limbs for a feast and the flesh trembled .

SPEECH TO THOSE WHO SAY COMRADE

THE brotherhood is not by the blood certainly
But neither are men brothers by speech—by saying so
Men are brothers by life lived and are hurt
for it

Hunger and hurt are the great begetters of brotherhood
Humiliation has gotten much love Danger I say is the nobler father and mother

Those are as brothers whose bodies have shared fear
Or shared harm or shared hurt or indignity Why are the old soldiers brothers and nearest?

For this with their minds they go over the sea a little 10
And find themselves in their youth again as they were in Soissons and Meaux and at Ypres and those cities

A French loaf and the girls with their eyelids painted
Bring back to aging and lonely men Their twentieth year and the metal odor of danger

It is this in life which of all things is tenderest—
To remember together with unknown men
the days
Common also to them and perils ended

It is this which makes of many a generation—
A wave of men who having the same years Have in common the same dead and the changes 21

The solitary and unshared experience
Dies of itself like the violations of love
Or lives on as the dead live eerily.

The unshared and single man must cover his Loneliness as a girl her shame for the way of Life is neither by one man nor by suffering.

Who are the born brothers in truth? The puddlers
Scorched by the same flame in the same foundries
Those who have spit on the same boards with the blood in it 30

Ridden the same rivers with green logs Fought the police in the parks of the same cities
Grinned for the same blows the same flogging

Veterans out of the same ships—factories—Expeditions for fame the founders of continents
Those that hid in Geneva a time back

Those that have hidden and hunted and all such—Fought together labored together they carry the Common look like a card and they pass touching

Brotherhood! No word said can make you brothers! 40
Brotherhood only the brave earn and by danger or
Harm or by bearing hurt and by no other.

Brotherhood here in the strange world is the rich and Rarest giving of life and the most valued
Not to be had for a word or a week's wishing.

POLE STAR FOR THIS YEAR

WHERE the wheel of light is turned.
Where the axle of the night is Turned is motionless. where holds
And has held ancient sureness always:

Where of faring men the eyes
At oar bench at the rising bow
Have seen—torn shrouds between—the Wain
And that star's changelessness: not changing

There upon that intent star
Trust of wandering men of truth 10
The most reminding witness we Fix our eyes also: waylost the wanderers

We too turn now to that star
 We too in whose trustless hearts
 All truth alters and the lights
 Of earth are out now turn to that star

Liberty of man and mind
 That once was mind's necessity
 And made the West blaze up has burned
 To bloody embers and the lamp's out 20

Hope that was a noble flame
 Has fanned to violence and feeds
 On cities and the flesh of men And chokes where unclean smoke defiles it

Even the small spark of pride
 That taught the tyrant once is dark
 Where gunfire rules the starving street
 And justice cheats the dead of honor

Liberty and pride and hope
 And every guide-mark of the mind 30

That led our blindness once has vanished
 This star will not. Love's star will not.

Love that has beheld the face
 A man has with a man's eyes in it Bloody from the slugger's blows
 Or heard the cold child cry for hunger—

Love that listens where the good
 The virtuous, the men of faith
 Proclaim the paradise on earth
 And murder starve and burn to make it—

Love that cannot either sleep 41
 Or keep rich music in the ear
 Or lose itself for the wild beat
 The anger in the blood makes raging—

Love that hardens into hate—
 Love like hatred and as bright—
 Love is that one waking light
 That leads now when all others darken

JOHN CROWE RANSOM

1888—

SPECTRAL LOVERS

By night they haunted a thicket of April mist,
 As out of the rich ground strangely come to birth,

Else two immaculate angels fallen on earth Lovers they knew they were, but why unclasped, unknissed?

Why should two lovers go frozen asunder in fear?

And yet they were, they were

Over the shredding of an April blossom
 Her thrilling fingers touched him quick with care,

Of many delicate postures she cast a snare,
 But for all the red heart beating in the bale
       bosom, 10

Her face as of cunningly tinctured ivory
 Was hard with an agony

Stormed by the little batteries of an April
       night,

Passionate being the essences of the field,
 Should the penetrable walls of the crumbling prison yield

And open her treasure to the first clamorous knight?

'This is the mad moon, and must I surrender all?

If he but ask it, I shall '

And gesturing largely to the very moon of Easter,

Mincing his steps, and swishing the jubilant grass, 20

And beheading some field-flowers that had come to pass,

He had reduced his tributaries faster,
 Had not considerations pinched his heart
 Unfitly for his art

'Am I reeling with the sap of April like a drunkard?

Blessed is he that taketh this richest of cities,
 But it is so stainless, the sack were a thousand pities;

This is that marble fortress not to be conquered,

Lest its white peace in the black flame turn to tinder

And an unutterable cinder ' 30

They passed me once in April, in the mist
No other season is it, when one walks and discovers
Two clad in the shapes of angels, being spectral lovers,
Trailing a glory of moon-gold and amethyst,
Who touch their quick fingers fluttering like a bird
Whose songs shall never be heard

OLD MAN PLAYING WITH CHILDREN

A DISCREET householder exclaims on the grandsire
In war-paint and feathers, with fierce grandsons and axes,
Dancing around a backyard fire of boxes,
'Watch grandfather, he'll set the house on fire'

But I will unriddle for you the thought of his mind,
An old one you cannot open with conversation
What animates those thin legs in risky
motion?
Mixes the snow on the head with snow on the wind?

'Grandson, grandsire We are equally boy and boy
Do not offer me your reclining-chair and slippers
With tedious old women talking in wrappers
This life is not good but in danger and in joy

10

'It is you who are elder to these and younger to me
That are penned as slaves by your properties and causes
And never walk out of your shaped insupportable houses,
And shamefully, when boys shout, go in and flee

'God forgive me, I know too well your muddling ways,
Having taken care and performed ignominies unreckoned

Between the first brief childhood and the brief second,
But I will be more honourable in these days.'

PHILOMELA

PROCNE, Philomela, and Itylus,
Your names are liquid, your improbable tale

Is recited in the classic numbers of the nightingale

Ah, but our numbers are not felicitous,
It goes not liquidly for us.

Perched on a Roman ilex, and duly apostrophized,
The nightingale descanted unto Ovid,
She has even appeared to the Teutons, the swilled and gravid,
At Fontainebleau it may be the bird was gallicized,
Never was she baptized

12

To England came Philomela with her pain, Fleeing the hawk her husband, querulous
ghost,
She wanders when he sits heavy on his roost,
Utters herself in the original again,
The untranslatable refrain.

Not to these shores she came! this other Thrace,
Environ barbarous to the royal Attic,
How could her delicate dirge run democratic,
Delivered in a cloudless boundless public place
To an inordinate race?

20

I pernoctated with the Oxford students
once,
And in the quadrangles, in the cloisters, on the Cher, Precociously knocked at antique doors ajar, Fatuously touched the hems of the hierophants,
Sick of my dissonance.

I went out to Bagley Wood, I climbed the hill,
Even the moon had slanted off in a twinkling,

I heard the sepulchral owl and a few bells
tinkling,
There was no more villainous day to unfulfil,
The diuturnity was still 30
Up from the darkest wood where Philomela sat,
Her fairy numbers issued What then ailed
me?
My ears are called capacious but they failed me,

Her classics registered a little flat!
I rose, and venomously spat
Philomela, Philomela, lover of song,
I am in despair if we may make us worthy,
A bantering breed sophistical and swarthy,
Unto more beautiful, persistently more young
Thy fabulous provinces belong. 40

ALLEN TATE

1899—

JEFFERSON DAVIS 1808–1889

No more the white refulgent streets,
Never the dry hollows of the mind
Shall he in fine courtesy walk
Again, for death is not unkind.

A civil war cast on his fame,
The four years' odium of strife
Unbodies his dust; love cannot warm
His tall corpuscles to this life

What did we gain? What did we lose?
Be still, grief for the pious dead 10
Suspires from bosoms of kind souls
Lavender-wise, propped up in bed

Our loss put six feet under ground
Is measured by the magnolia's root,
Our gain's the intellectual sound
Of death's feet round a weedy tomb

<sup>1</sup> The first version of this poem, just four stanzas, was written in 1921, and called "Euthanasia", the first I ever had in print. It wasn't good and it had nothing to do with Jefferson Davis. I forgot it until, one day in 1930, in the way things began to run about loose in one's head, the first two lines came back to me, with the original "gutter" automatically changed to "hollows." The man walking the street became an elegant figure. He was unmistakably Jefferson Davis. I wrote the new poem in a very few minutes. From the original only four lines were carried over without change into the new poem, though a good deal of the imagery, slightly altered, was still useful. I ignore Davis' pathetic old age, and conceive him as a tragic person, as he would have been had the Federal Government executed him for "treason." I often think of my poems as commentaries on those human situations from which there is no escape. Author's note

In the back chambers of the State
(Just preterition for his crimes)
We curse him to our busy sky
Who's busy in hell a hundred times 20

A day, though profitless his task,
Heedless what Belial may say—
He who wore out the perfect mask
Orestes fled in night and day 1922–1931 1928

ODE TO THE CONFEDERATE
DEAD<sup>2</sup>

Row after row with strict impunity
The headstones yield their names to the element,

<sup>2</sup> The structure of the "Ode" is simple. Figure to yourself a man stopping at the gate of a Confederate graveyard on a late autumn afternoon. The leaves are falling, his first impressions bring him the "rumor of mortality", and the desolation barely allows him, at the beginning of the second stanza, the heroically conventional surmise that the dead will enrich the earth, "where these memories grow." From those quoted words to the end of that passage he pauses for a baroque meditation on the ravages of time, concluding with the figure of the "blind crab." This creature has mobility but no direction, energy but no purposeful world to use it in. In the entire poem there are only two explicit symbols for the locked-in ego, the crab is the first and less explicit symbol, a mere hint, a planting of the idea that will become overt in its second instance—the jaguar towards the end. The crab is the first intimation of the nature of the moral conflict upon which the drama of the poem develops: the cut-offness of the modern "intellectual man" from the world.

The next long passage or strophe, beginning "You know who have waited by the wall," states the other term of the conflict. It is the theme of heroism, not merely moral heroism, but heroism in a grand style,

The wind whirrs without recollection,
 In the riven troughs the splayed leaves Pile up, of nature the casual sacrament
 To the seasonal eternity of death,
 Then driven by the fierce scrutiny Of heaven to their election in the vast breath,
 They sough the rumor of mortality.

Autumn is desolation in the plot      10
 Of a thousand acres where these memories grow
 From the inexhaustible bodies that are not Dead, but feed the grass row after rich
     row.
 Think of the autumns that have come and gone!—
 Ambitious November with the humors of
     the year,
 With a particular zeal for every slab,
 Staining the uncomfortable angels that rot
 On the slabs, a wing chipped here, an arm
     there
 The brute curiosity of an angel's stare
 Turns you, like them, to stone,      20
 Transforms the heaving air
 Till plunged to a heavier world below
 You shift your sea-space blindly
 Heaving, turning like the blind crab

Dazed by the wind, only the wind
 The leaves flying, plunge

You know who have waited by the wall
 The twilight certainty of an animal,
 Those midnight restitutions of the blood
 You know—the inmitigable pines, the smoky frieze      30
 Of the sky, the sudden call you know the rage,
 The cold pool left by the mounting flood,

elevating even death from mere physical dissolution into a formal ritual thus heroism is a formal ebullience of the human spirit in an entire society, not private, romantic illusion—something better than moral heroism, great as that may be, for moral heroism, being personal and individual, may be achieved by certain men in all ages, even ages of decadence But the late Hart Crane's commentary is better than any I can make "The theme of chivalry, a tradition of excess (not literally excess, rather active faith) which cannot be perpetuated in the fragmentary cosmos of today—those desires that should be yours tomorrow," but which, you know, will not persist nor find any way into action" Fate, 'Narcissus as Narcissus,'
The Virginia Quarterly Review, XIV, 1, 113-14 The essay also contains a valuable analysis of the poetics of his 'Ode'

Of muted Zeno and Parmenides
 You who have waited for the angry resolution
 Of those desires that should be yours
     tomorrow,
 You know the unimportant shrift of death
 And praise the vision
 And praise the arrogant circumstance
 Of those who fall
 Rank upon rank, hurried beyond decision—      40
 Here by the sagging gate, stopped by the wall

Seeing, seeing only the leaves
 Flying, plunge and expire

Turn your eyes to the immoderate past,
 Turn to the inscrutable infantry rising Demons out of the earth—they will not last Stonewall, Stonewall, and the sunken fields of hemp,
 Shuloh, Antietam, Malvern Hill, Bull Run.
 Lost in that orient of the thick and fast
 You will curse the setting sun      50

Cursing only the leaves crying
 Like an old man in a storm

You hear the shout, the crazy hemlocks point
 With troubled fingers to the silence which Smothers you, a mummy, in time.

The hound bitch
 Toothless and dying, in a musty cellar
 Hears the wind only

Now that the salt of their blood
 Stiffens the saltier oblivion of the sea,      60
 Seals the malignant purity of the flood,
 What shall we who count our days and bow
 Our heads with a commemorial woe
 In the ribboned coats of grim felicity,
 What shall we say of the bones, unclean,
 Whose verdurous anonymity will grow?
 The ragged arms, the ragged heads and
     eyes
 Lost in these acres of the insane green?
 The gray lean spiders come, they come and go,

In a tangle of willows without light 70
 The singular screech-owl's tight
 Invisible lyric seeds the mind
 With the furious murmur of their chivalry

We shall say only the leaves
 Flying, plunge and expire

We shall say only the leaves whispering
 In the improbable mist of nightfall
 That flies on multiple wing
 Night is the beginning and the end
 And in between the ends of distraction 80
 Waits mute speculation, the patient curse
 That stones the eyes, or like the jaguar leaps
 For his own image in a jungle pool, his victim

What shall we say who have knowledge
 Carried to the heart? Shall we take the act
 To the grave? Shall we, more hopeful, set up the grave
 In the house? The ravenous grave?

Leave now
 The shut gate and the decomposing wall
 The gentle serpent, green in the mulberry bush, 90
 Riots with his tongue through the hush—
 Sentinel of the grave who counts us all!

MOTHER AND SON<sup>1</sup>

Now all day long the man who is not dead
 Hastens the dark with inattentive eyes,
 The lady of the white hand, of the erect
 head,
 Stares at the cover, leans for the son's replies

1 'This poem was written in Paris in 1928, one morning when suddenly the first line came to mind, without warning of what the poem would be about, the first draft was very rapid. But it has been retouched many times. I think there is little in it to interpret. The cuttlefish, symbol of memory, has puzzled a few readers. This disagreeable creature blinds its prey by squirting a black fluid into the water, in which it then hides. A man in emotional danger withdraws into his private mind where not even maternal love can follow him and where he becomes mysterious and menacing. I speak of this dark place as "beams of memory" because I want the blackness to shine. Milton and Dante in two famous phrases make you see darkness, but I cannot without subterfuge, of course. Dante cheats a little too by calling it perso. At the end of the poem the spider is not a symbol, merely an image of horror.' Author's note

At last to her importunate womanhood—
 That hand of death laid on the living bed;
 Such is the fierce compositor of blood.

She waits, he lies upon the bed of sin
 Where greed, avarice, anger writhed and slept
 Till to their silence they were gathered in:
 There, fallen with time, his tall and wicked kin 11
 Once fired the passions that were never kept In the permanent heart, and there his mother lay
 To bear him on the impenetrable day

The falcon mother cannot will her hand
 Up to the bed, nor break the manacle
 That exile sets upon her harsh command
 That he should say the time is beautiful—Transfigured with her own devouring
 light.
 The sick man craves the impalpable night

Loosed betwixt eye and lid, the swimming beams 21
 Of memory, that school of cuttlefish,
 Rise to the air, plunge to the cold streams—
 Rising and plunging the half-forgotten wish
 To tear his heart out in a slow disgrace
 And freeze the hue of terror to her face

Hate, misery, and fear beat off his heart
 To the dry fury of the woman's mind,
 The son prone in his autumn moves apart
 A seed blown upon a returning wind 30
 O child, be vigilant till towards the south
 On the flowered wall all the sweet afternoon,
 That reach of sun, swift as the cottonmouth,
 Strikes at the black crucifix on her breast
 Where the cold dusk comes suddenly to rest—
 Mortality will speak the victor soon!

The dreary flies lazy and casual Stuck to the ceiling, buzz along the wall,
 O heart, the spider shuffles from the mould Weaving, between the pinks and grapes, his pall 41
 The bright wallpaper, imperishably old,
 Uncurls and flutters, it will never fall 1928 1928

TO THE ROMANTIC

I HAVE looked at them long,
My eyes blur, sourceless light Keeps them forever young Before our aging sight

You see them too—strict forms
Of will, the secret dignity
Of our dissolute storms,
They grow too bright to be.

What were they like? What mark
Can signify their charm?<sup>10</sup>
They never saw the dark,
Rigid, they never knew alarm.

Do not the scene rehearse!
The perfect eyes enjoin
A contemptuous verse,
We speak the crabbed line.

Immaculate race! to yield

Us final knowledge set
In a cold frieze, a field
Of war but no blood let<sup>20</sup>

Are they quite willing,
Do they ask to pose Naked and simple, chilling
The very wind's nose?

They ask us how to live!
We answer Again try
Being the drops we sieve.
What death it is to die!

Therefore because they nod
Being too full of us<sup>30</sup>
I look at the turned sod
Where it is perilous

And yawning all the same
As if we knew them not
And history had no name—
No need to name the spot!

STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT

1898—

KING DAVID<sup>2</sup>

I

DAVID sang to his hook-nosed harp.
'The Lord God is a jealous God!
His violent vengeance is swift and sharp!
And the Lord is King above all gods!

<sup>1</sup> 'This poem is addressed to people who destroy the past by trying to live it, but it might have been written to persons who give the same allegiance to the future. This kind of romantic character imagines a life from which evil, and so the life, is removed. At bottom the heresy like other romantic attitudes however finespun, is pragmatism and secular, putting its faith in the externals of a system. The poem is like a speech from a conversation, one of the talkers takes the floor to admonish his friends, but he appears to have the grace to include himself in the censure. For after he addresses the romantics as "you" in the second stanza, he speaks of "we" from then on, and it may not be mere politeness. "Them" in the first line alludes to the perfect men of a perfect past. They cannot shield us from death, the "turned sod," which is the goal and meaning of the eternal evil in life. (Of course, there ought to be a poem some time on the barbarians of the pure present, who think they can ignore the past entirely.)' Author's note

'Blest be the Lord, through years untold,
The Lord Who has blessed me a thousand fold!

'Cattle and concubines, corn and hives
Enough to last me a dozen lives.

'Plump, good women with noses flat,
Marrowful blessings, weighty and fat<sup>10</sup>

'I wax in His peace like a pious gourd,
The Lord God is a pleasant God, in the strict ballad-form with refrain, "The Mountain Whippoorwill" with variations. A ballad ought to have pace. I hope they both have it. In "The Mountain Whippoorwill" I was trying to adapt the strict ballad form to a contemporary American subject, vary it as I chose, and use colloquial speech—get the note of the boxwood fiddle into it, if it could be done. I had heard the mountain fiddlers in the North Carolinas, and their tunes stuck in my mind. Of course I didn't draw up these rules on paper before I wrote the poem, any more than you say to yourself "I will now have a blue-eyed child with a Roman nose and a hare-lip." But I was trying to think back to the fiddle music and the speech. ' Author's note Break mine enemy's jaw, O Lord!

For the Lord is King above all gods!

His hand dropped slack from the tunable
strings,
A sorrow came on him—a sorrow of kings.

A sorrow sat on the arm of his throne,
An eagle sorrow with claws of stone

'I am merry, yes, when I am not thinking,
But life is nothing but eating and drinking

'I can shape my psalms like daggers of
jade,
But they do not shine like the first I made 21

'I can harry the heathen from North to South,
But no hot taste comes into my mouth.

'My wives are comely as long-haired goats,
But I would not care if they cut their throats!

'Where are the maids of the desert tents
With lips like flagons of frankincense?

'Where is Jonathan? Where is Saul?
The captain-towers of Zion wall? 30

'The trees of cedar, the hills of Nod,
The kings, the running lions of God?

'Their words were a writing in golden dust,
Their names are myrrh in the mouths of the just

'The sword of the slayer could never divide
them—
Would God I had died in battle beside them!

The Lord looked down from a thunder-clap
(The Lord God is a crafty God )
He heard the strings of the shrewd harp snap.
(The Lord who is King above all gods ) 40

He pricked the king with an airy thorn,
It burnt in his body like grapes of scorn.

The eyelids roused that had drooped like lead
David lifted his heavy head.

The thorn stung at him, a fiery bee,
'The world is wide I will go and see From the roof of my haughty palace,' said he.

2

Bathsheba bathed on her vine-decked roof
(The Lord God is a mighty God )
Her body glittered like mail of proof 40
(And the Lord is King above all gods )

Her body shimmered, tender and white
As the flesh of aloes in candlelight

King David forgot to be old or wise
He spied on her bathing with sultry eyes

A breath of spice came into his nose
He said, 'Her breasts are like two young roes '

His eyes were bright with a crafty gleam
He thought, 'Her body is soft as cream '

He straightened himself like an unbent bow
And called a servant and bade him go 61

3

Uriah the Hittite came to his lord,
Dusty with war as a well-used sword

A close, trim man like a belt, well-buckled,
A jealous gentleman, hard to cuckold

David entreated him, soft and bland,
Offered him comforts from his own hand

Drank with him deep till his eyes grew red,
And laughed in his beard as he went to bed

The days slipped by without hurry or strife, 70
Like apple-parings under a knife
And still Uriah kept from his wife

Lean fear tuttered through David's psalm,
'This merry husband is far too calm!'

David sent for Uriah then,
They greeted each other like pious men

'Thou hast borne the battle, the dust and the heat
Go down to thy house and wash thy feet!'

Uriah frowned at the words of the king.
His brisk, hard voice had a leaden ring 80

'While the hosts of God still camp in the field,
My house to me is a garden sealed

'How shall I rest while the arrow yet flies?
The dust of the war is still in my eyes.'

David spoke with his lion's roar
'If Peace be a bridle that rubs you sore,
You shall fill your belly with blood and war!'

Uriah departed, calling him kind
His eyes were serpents in David's mind.

He summoned a captain, a pliable man 90
'Uriah the Hittite shall lead the van

'In the next assault when the fight roars
high,
And the Lord God is a hostile God,
Retire from Uriah that he may die

4

The messenger came while King David played
The friskiest ditty ever made

'News, O King, from our dubious war!
The Lord of Hosts hath prevailed once more!

'His foes are scattered like chirping sparrows, 100
Their kings lie breathless, feathered with arrows

'Many are dead of your captains' fall.
Uriah the Hittite was first to fall '

David turned from the frolicsome strings
And rent his clothes for the death of kings.

Yet, as he rent them, he smiled for joy,
The sly, wide smile of a wicked boy

'The powerful grace of the Lord prevails!
He has cracked Uriah between His nails!

'His blessings are mighty, they shall not cease! 110

And my days henceforth shall be days of peace!'

His mind grew tranquil, smoother than fleece
He rubbed his body with scented grease
And his days thenceforward were days of peace.

His days were fair as the flowering lime
—For a little time, for a little time.

And Bathsheba lay in his breast like a dove,
A vessel of amber, made for love

5

When Bathsheba was great with child,
(The Lord God is a jealous God!) 120
Portly and meek as a moon grown mild,
(The Lord is King above all gods!)

Nathan, the prophet, wry and dying,
Preached to the king like a locust crying

'Hearken awhile to a doleful thing!
There were two men in thy land, O King!

'One was rich as a gilded ram
One had one treasure, a poor ewe-lamb

'Rich man wasted his wealth like spittle Poor man shared with his lamb spare victual. 130

'A traveler came to the rich man's door
"Give me to eat, for I hunger sore!"

'Rich man feasted him fatly, true,
But the meat that he gave him was fiends'
meat, too,
Stolen and roasted, the poor man's ewe!

'Hearken, my lord, to a deadly thing!
What shall be done with these men, O
King?"

David hearkened, seeing it plain,
His heart grew heavy with angry pain.
'Show me the rich man, that he be slain!'

Nathan barked as a jackal can 140
'Just, O King! And thou art the man!'

David rose as the thunders rise
When some one in Heaven is telling lies.

But his eyes were weaker than Nathan's
eyes

His huge bulk shivered like quaking sod,
Shoulders bowing to Nathan's rod,
Nathan, the bitter apple of God.

His great voice shook like a runner's, spent
'My sin has found me! Oh, I repent!' 150

Answered Nathan, that talkative Jew
'For many great services, comely and true,
The Lord of Mercy will pardon you

'But the child in Bathsheba, come of your seed,
Shall sicken and die like a blasted weed '

David groaned when he heard him speak
The painful tears ran hot on his cheek.

Ashes he cast on his kingly locks
All night long he lay on the rocks

Beseeching his Lord with a howling cry. 160
'O Lord God, O my jealous God,
Be kind to the child that it may not die,
For thou art King above all gods!'

6

Seven long nights he lay there, howling,
A lion wounded, moaning and growling

Seven long midnights, sorrowing greatly,
While Sin, like a dead man, embraced him straitly

Till he was abased from his lust and pride
And the child was born and sickened and died

He arose at last It was ruddy Day 170
And his sin like water had washed away.

He cleansed and anointed, took fresh apparel,
And worshiped the Lord in a tuneful carol.

His servants, bearing the child to bury,
Marveled greatly to see him so merry.

He spoke to them mildly as mid-May weather
'The child and my sin are perished
together

'He is dead, my son Though his whole soul yearn to me,
I must go to him, he may not return to
me.

'Why should I sorrow for what was
pain? 180
A cherished grief is an iron chain '

He took up his harp, the sage old chief,
His heart felt clean as a new green
leaf.

His soul smelt pleasant as rain-wet
clover
'I have sinned and repented and that's all over

'In his dealings with heathen, the Lord is hard
But the humble soul is his spikenard '

His wise thoughts fluttered like doves in the air
'I wonder is Bathsheba still so fair?

'Does she weep for the child that our sin made perish? 190
I must comfort my ewe-lamb, comfort and cherish

'The justice of God is honey and balm
I will soothe her heart with a little psalm '

He went to her chamber, no longer sad,
Walking as light as a shepherd lad

He found her weeping, her garments rent,
Trodden like straw by God's punishment
He solaced her out of his great content

Being but a woman, a while she grieved, But at last she was comforted, and conceived 200

Nine months later she bore him a son
(The Lord God is a mighty God!)
The name of that child was SOLOMON
He was God's tough staff till his days were run!
(And the Lord is King above all gods!)

THE MOUNTAIN WHIPPOORWILL

(OR, HOW HILL-BILLY JIM WON THE GREAT FIDDLERS' PRIZE)

(A Georgia Romance)

UP in the mountains, it's lonesome all the time, (Sof' win' slewin' thu' the sweet-potato vine )

Up in the mountains, it's lonesome for a child, (Whippoorwills a-callin' when the sap runs wild )

Up in the mountains, mountains in the fog,
Everythin's as lazy as an old houn' dog

Born in the mountains, never raised a pet,
Don't want nuthin' an' never got it yet

Born in the mountains, lonesome-born, Raised runnin' ragged thu' the cockleburrs and corn 10

Never knew my pappy, mebbe never should

Think he was a fiddle made of mountain laurel-wood

Never had a mammy to teach me pretty-please

Think she was a whippoorwill, a-skittin' thu' the trees

Never had a brother ner a whole pair of pants,

But when I start to fiddle, why, yuh got to start to dance!

Listen to my fiddle—Kingdom Come—Kingdom Come!

Hear the frogs a-chunkin' 'Jug o' rum, Jug o' rum!"

Hear that mountain-whippoorwill be lonesome in the air,

An' I'll tell yuh how I traveled to the Essex County Fair 20

Essex County has a mighty pretty fair,
All the smarty fiddlers from the South come
there

Elbows flyin' as they rosin up the bow

For the First Prize Contest in the Georgia Fiddlers' Show.

Old Dan Wheeling, with his whiskers in his ears,
King-pin fiddler for nearly twenty years

Big Tom Sargent, with his blue wall-eye, An' Little Jimmy Weezer that can make a fiddle cry

*All sittin' roun', spittin' high an' struttin'
proud,*

(Listen, little whippoorwill, yuh better bug yore eyes!) 30

*Tun-a-tun-a-tunn' while the jedges told the
crowd*

Them that got the mostest claps'd win the bestest prize

Everybody waitin' for the first tweedle-dee,
When in comes a-stumblin'—hill-billy me!

Bowed right pretty to the jedges an' the
rest,

Took a silver dollar from a hole inside my vest,

Plunked it on the table an' said 'There's my callin' card!

An' anyone that licks me—well, he's got to fiddle hard!

Old Dan Wheeling, he was laughin' fit to holler,

Little Jimmy Weezer said, 'There's one dead dollar!' 40

Big Tom Sargent had a yaller-toothy grin,
But I tucked my little whippoorwill spang underneath my chin,

An' petted it an' tuned it till the jedges said, 'Begin!'

Big Tom Sargent was the first in line;
He could fiddle all the bugs off a sweet-potato-vine

He could fiddle down a possum from a mile-high tree.

He could fiddle up a whale from the bottom of the sea

Yuh could hear hands spankun' till they spanked each other raw,

When he finished variations on 'Turkey in the Straw'

Little Jimmy Weezer was the next to play;
He could fiddle all night, he could fiddle all
day 51

He could fiddle chills, he could fiddle fever,
He could make a fiddle rustle like a lowland
river

He could make a fiddle croon like a lovin'
woman
An' they clapped like thunder when he'd finished strummin'.

Then came the ruck of the bob-tailed fiddlers,
The let's-go-easies, the fair-to-middlers

They got their claps an' they lost their bicker,
An' settled back for some more corn-licker

An' the crowd was tired of their no-count squealing, 60
When out in the center steps Old Dan Wheeling

He fiddled high and he fiddled low, (Listen, little whippoorwill, yuh got to spread yore wings!)
He fiddled with a cherrywood bow (Old Dan Wheeling's got bee-honey in his strings)

He fiddled the wind by the lonesome
moon,
He fiddled a most almighty tune

He started fiddling like a ghost,
He ended fiddling like a host

He fiddled north an' he fiddled south, 70
He fiddled the heart right out of yore
mouth

He fiddled here an' he fiddled there
He fiddled salvation everywhere

When he was finished, the crowd cut loose, (Whippoorwill, they's rain on yore breast)
An' I sat there wonderin' 'What's the use?'
(Whippoorwill, fly home to yore nest)

But I stood up pert an' I took my bow,
An' my fiddle went to my shoulder, so

An'—they wasn't no crowd to get me
fazed— 80
But I was alone where I was raised

Up in the mountains, so still it makes yuh skeered,
Where God lies sleepin' in his big white beard

An' I heard the sound of the squirrel in the pine,
An' I heard the earth a-breathin' thu' the long night-time

They've fiddled the rose, an' they've fiddled the thorn,
But they haven't fiddled the mountain-corn

They've fiddled sinful an' fiddled moral,
But they haven't fiddled the breshwood-laurel

They've fiddled loud, an' they've fiddled
still, 90
But they haven't fiddled the whippoorwill

I started off with a dump-diddle-dump, (Oh, hell's broke loose in Georgia!)
Skunk-cabbage growin' by the bee-gum stump, (Whippoorwill, yo're singin' now!)

Oh, Georgia booze is mighty fine booze,
The best yuh ever poured yuh,
But it eats the soles right offen yore shoes,
For Hell's broke loose in Georgia

My mother was a whippoorwill pert, 100
My father, he was lazy,
But I'm Hell broke loose in a new store shirt
To fiddle all Georgia crazy

Swing yore partners—up an' down the middle!

Sashay now—oh, listen to that fiddle!
Flapjacks flippin' on a red-hot griddle,
An' Hell broke loose,
Hell broke loose,
Fire on the mountains—snakes in the grass Satan's here a-bilin'—oh, Lordy, let him
pass! 110

Go down Moses, set my people free,
 Pop goes the weasel thu' the old Red Sea!
 Jonah sittin' on a hickory-bough,
 Up jumps a whale—an' where's yore prophet now?
 Rabbit in the pea-patch, possum in the pot,
 Try an' stop my fiddle, now my fiddle's gettin' hot!
 Whippoorwill, singin' thu' the mountain hush, Whippoorwill, shoutin' from the burnin'
     bush,
 Whippoorwill, cryin' in the stable-door,
 Sing tonight as yuh never sang before!<sup>120</sup> Hell's broke loose like a stompin' mountain-shoat,
 Sing till yuh bust the gold in yore throat!
 Hell's broke loose for forty miles aroun'
 Bound to stop yore music if yuh don't sing
     it down
 Sing on the mountains, little whippoorwill,
 Sing to the valleys, an' slap 'em with a hull,
 For I'm struttin' high as an eagle's quill,
 An' Hell's broke loose,
 Hell's broke loose,
 Hell's broke loose in Georgia!<sup>130</sup>

They wasn't a sound when I stopped
     bowin', (Whippoorwill, yuh can sing no more)
 But, somewhere or other, the dawn was growin',
(Oh, mountain whippoorwill!)

An' I thought, 'I've fiddled all night an' lost Yo're a good hill-billy, but yuh've been bossed'

So I went to congratulate old man Dan,
 —But he put his fiddle into my han'—
 An' then the noise of the crowd began

FROM JOHN BROWN'S BODY<sup>1</sup>

INVOCATION

AMERICAN muse, whose strong and diverse
     heart
 So many men have tried to understand

<sup>1</sup> The method of John Brown's Body is an expansion of the method used in Five Men and Pompey. The "Invocation" was, originally, the start of the Third Book. Then, when finished, it seemed to go more naturally as the beginning of the whole poem. The incidental lyrics, of which "The Hider's Song" is one, are in the poem for relief, change of mood, etc., but I wanted

But only made it smaller with their art,
 Because you are as various as your land,

As mountainous-deep, as flowered with blue rivers,
 Thirsty with deserts, buried under snows,
 As native as the shape of Navajo quivers,
 And native, too, as the sea-voyaged rose.

Swift runner, never captured or subdued,
 Seven-branched elk beside the mountain stream,<sup>10</sup>
 That half a hundred hunters have pursued But never matched their bullets with the dream,

Where the great huntsmen failed, I set my sorry
 And mortal snare for your immortal quarry

You are the buffalo-ghost, the broncho-ghost
 With dollar-silver in your saddle-horn,
 The cowboys riding in from Painted Post,
 The Indian arrow in the Indian corn,

And you are the clipped velvet of the lawns
 Where Shropshire grows from Massachusetts sods,<sup>20</sup>
 The grey Maine rocks—and the war-painted dawns
 That break above the Garden of the Gods

The prairie-schooners crawling toward the ore
 And the cheap car, parked by the station-
     door

Where the skyscrapers lift their foggy plumes
 Of stranded smoke out of a stony mouth
 You are that high stone and its arrogant fumes,
 And you are ruined gardens in the South

And bleak New England farms, so winter-
     white
 Even their roofs look lonely, and the deep
 The middle granland where the wind of night<sup>31</sup>
 Is like all blind earth sighing in her sleep.

them to be an essential part of the poem, not just stuck in like currants in a cake. They are part of the building, not removable ornaments. "Pickett's Charge" was a try for an unrhymed form that would carry ballad narrative. Author's note

A friend, an enemy, a sacred hag
With two tied oceans in her medicine-bag

They tried to fit you with an English song
And clip your speech into the English tale
But, even from the first, the words went wrong,
The catbird pecked away the nightingale.

The homesick men begot high-cheekboned things
Whose wit was whittled with a different
sound 40
And Thames and all the rivers of the kings
Ran into Mississippi and were drowned

They planted England with a stubborn trust
But the cleft dust was never English dust

Stepchild of every exile from content
And all the disavouched, hard-bitten pack
Shipped overseas to steal a continent
With neither shirts nor honor to their back

Pimping grandee and rump-faced regicide, Apple-cheeked youngers from a windmill-square, 50
Puritans stubborn as the nails of Pride, Rakes from Versailles and thieves from County Clare,

The black-robed priests who broke their hearts in vain
To make you God and France or God and Spain

These were your lovers in your buckskin-youth
And each one married with a dream so proud
He never knew it could not be the truth
And that he coupled with a girl of cloud.

And now to see you is more difficult yet
Except as an immensity of wheel 60
Made up of wheels, oiled with inhuman sweat
And glittering with the heat of ladled steel

All these you are, and each is partly you,
And none is false, and none is wholly true.

So how to see you as you really are,
So how to suck the pure, distillate, stored

Essence of essence from the hidden star
And make it pierce like a riposting sword

For, as we hunt you down, you must escape
And we pursue a shadow of our own 70
That can be caught in a magician's cape
But has the flatness of a painted stone

Never the running stag, the gull at wing,
The pure elixir, the American thing

And yet, at moments when the mind was hot
With something fierier than joy or grief,
When each known spot was an eternal spot
And every leaf was an immortal leaf,

I think that I have seen you, not as one, 79
But clad in diverse semblances and powers,
Always the same, as light falls from the sun,
And always different, as the differing hours

Yet, through each altered garment that you wore
The naked body, shaking the heart's core

All day the snow fell on that Eastern town
With its soft, pelting, little, endless sigh
Of infinite flakes that brought the tall sky
down
Till I could put my hands in the white sky

And taste cold scraps of heaven on my tongue
And walk in such a changed and luminous
light 90
As gods inhabit when the gods are young
All day it fell And when the gathered night

Was a blue shadow cast by a pale glow
I saw you then, snow-image, bird of the snow.

And I have seen and heard you in the dry
Close-huddled furnace of the city street
When the parched moon was planted in the sky
And the limp air hung dead against the heat.

I saw you rise, red as that rusty plant,
Dizzied with lights, half-mad with senseless
sound, 100
Enormous metal, shaking to the chant
Of a triphammer striking iron ground

Enormous power, ugly to the fool,
And beautiful as a well-handled tool

These, and the memory of that windy day
On the bare hills, beyond the last barbed wire,

When all the orange poppies bloomed one way

As if a breath would blow them into fire,

I keep forever, like the sea-lion's tusk
The broken sailor brings away to land, 110
But when he touches it, he smells the musk,
And the whole sea lies hollow in his hand

So, from a hundred visions, I make one,
And out of darkness build my mocking sun.

And should that task seem fruitless in the
eyes

Of those a different magic sets apart
To see through the ice-crystal of the wise
No nation but the nation that is Art,

Their words are just But when the birchbark-call
Is shaken with the sound that hunters make The moose comes plunging through the forest-wall 121
Although the rifle waits beside the lake

Art has no nations—but the mortal sky
Lingers like gold in immortality

This flesh was seeded from no foreign grain
But Pennsylvania and Kentucky wheat,
And it has soaked in California rain
And five years tempered in New England sleet

To strive at last, against an alien proof
And by the changes of an alien moon, 130
To build again that blue, American roof
Over a half-forgotten battle-tune

And call unsurely, from a haunted ground,
Armies of shadows and the shadow-sound

In your Long House there is an attic-place
Full of dead epics and machines that rust,
And there, occasionally, with casual face,
You come awhile to stir the sleepy dust,

Neither in pride nor mercy, but in vast Indifference at so many gifts unsought, 140

The yellowed satins, smelling of the past,
And all the loot the lucky pirates brought.

I only bring a cup of silver air,
Yet, in your casualness, receive it there

Receive the dream too haughty for the breast,
Receive the words that should have walked as bold

As the storm walks along the mountain-crest

And are like beggars whining in the cold.

The maimed presumption, the unskilful skill,
The patchwork colors, fading from the first,
And all the fire that fretted at the will 151
With such a barren ecstasy of thirst.

Receive them all—and should you choose to touch them
With one slant ray of quick, American light, Even the dust will have no power to smutch
them,
Even the worst will glitter in the night

If not—the dry bones littered by the way
May still point giants toward their golden prey.

THE HIDER'S SONG

THIS is the hidden place that hiders know.
This is where hiders go Step softly, the snow that falls here is different snow,
The rain has a different sting Step softly, step like a cloud, step softly as the least
Whisper of air against the beating wing,
And let your eyes be sealed
With two blue muscadines
Stolen from secret vines,
Or you will never find in the lost field 10
The table spread, the signs of the hidden feast

This is where hiders live.
This is the tentative
And outcast corner where hiders steal away
To bake their hedgehogs in a lump of clay,
To raise their crops and children wild and shy.

And let the world go by
In accidental marches of armed wrath
That stumble blindly past the buried path Step softly, step like a whisper, but do not speak

Or you will never see
The furriness curled within the hollow tree,
The shadow-dance upon the wilderness creek

This is the hidens' house
This is the ark of pine-and-willow-boughs
This is the quiet place
You may call now, but let your call be sweet

As clover-honey strained through silver sieves

And delicate as the dust upon the moth
Or you will never find your fugitives      30
Call once, and call again,
Then, if the lifted strain
Has the true color and substance of the wild.

You may perceive, if you have lucky eyes,
Something that ran away from being wise
And changed silk ribbons for a greener cloth.

Some budding-horned and deer-milk-suckled child

Some lightness, moving toward you on light feet,

Some girl with indolent passion in her face

PICKETT'S CHARGE

THE cannonade fell still All along the fishhook line,

The tired men stared at the smoke and waited for it to clear,

The men in the centre waited, their rifles
gripped in their hands,

By the trees of the riding fate, and the low stone wall, and the guns.

These were Hancock's men, the men of the Second Corps,

Eleven States were mixed there, where Minnesota stood

In battle-order with Maine, and Rhode Island beside New York,

The metals of all the North, cooled into an axe of war

The strong sticks of the North, bound into a fasces-shape, 1070

The hard winters of snow, the wind with the cutting edge,
And against them came that summer that does not die with the year,
Magnolia and honeysuckle and the blue
Virginia flag

Tall Pickett went up to Longstreet—his handsome face was drawn George Pickett, old friend of Lincoln's in days gone by with the blast
When he was a courteous youth and Lincoln the strange shawled man Who would talk in a Springfield street with a boy who dreamt of a sword

Dreamt of a martial sword, as swords are martial in dreams,
And the courtesy to use it, in the old bright way of the tales
Those days are gone with the blast He has his sword in his hand 1080
And he will use it today, and remember that using long

He came to Longstreet for orders, but Longstreet would not speak
He saw Old Peter's mouth and the thought in Old Peter's mind
He knew the task that was set and the men that he had to lead
And a pride came into his face while Longstreet stood there dumb

'I shall go forward, sir,' he said and turned to his men.

The commands went down the line The grey ranks started to move

Slowly at first, then faster, in order,
stepping like deer,

The Virginians, the fifteen thousand, the seventh wave of the tide

There was a death-torn mile of broken ground to cross. 1090

And a low stone wall at the end, and behind it the Second Corps.

And behind that force another, fresh men who had not yet fought.

They started to cross that ground. The guns began to tear them.

From the hill they say that it seemed more like a sea than a wave.

A sea continually torn by stones flung out of the sky,
And yet, as it came, still closing, closing and rolling on,
As the moving sea closes over the flaws and rips of the tide

You could mark the path that they took by the dead that they left behind, Spilled from that deadly march as a cart spills meal on a road,
And yet they came on unceasing, the fifteen thousand no more, 1100
And the blue Virginia flag did not fall, did not fall, did not fall.

They halted but once to fire as they came.
Then the smoke closed down
And you could not see them, and then, as it cleared again for a breath,
They were coming still but divided,
gnawed at by blue attacks,
One flank half-severed and halted, but the centre still like a tide

Cushing ran down the last of his guns to the battle-line,
The rest had been smashed to scrap by Lee's artillery fire
He held his guts in his hand as the charge came up to the wall
And his gun spoke out for him once before he fell to the ground

Armistead leapt the wall and laid his hand on the gun, 1110
The last of the three brigadiers who ordered Pickett's brigades,
He waved his hat on his sword and 'Give
'em the steel!' he cried,
A few men followed him over. The rest were beaten or dead

A few men followed him over There had been fifteen thousand When that sea began its march toward the fish-hook ridge and the wall
So they came on in strength, light-footed,
stepping like deer,
So they died or were taken So the iron entered their flesh

Lee, a mile away, in the shade of a little wood,

Stared, with his mouth shut down, and saw them go and be slain,
And then saw for a single moment, the blue
Virginia flag 1120
Planted beyond the wall, by that other flag that he knew

The two flags planted together, one instant, like hostile flowers
Then the smoke wrapped both in a mantle
—and when it had blown away, Armistead lay in his blood, and the rest were dead or down,
And the valley grey with the fallen and the wreck of the broken wave.

Pickett gazed around him, the boy who had dreamt of a sword
And talked with a man named Lincoln
The sword was still in his hand
He had gone out with fifteen thousand He came back to his lines with five.
He fought well till the war was over, but a thing was cracked in his heart

LITANY FOR DICTATORSHIPS<sup>1</sup>

FOR all those beaten, for the broken heads,
The fosterless, the simple, the oppressed,
The ghosts in the burning city of our time . . .

For those taken in rapid cars to the house and beaten
By the skilful boys, the boys with the rubber fists,
—Held down and beaten, the table cutting their loins,
Or kicked in the groin and left, with the muscles jerking
Like a headless hen's on the floor of the slaughter-house While they brought the next man in with his white eyes staring.
For those who still said 'Red Front' or
'God Save the Crown' 10

1 "Litany for Dictatorships" began with the obvious idea "For all those . . .," "For all those, who . . .,"
and developed, starting with the general statement, widening out, and coming back to general statement again. It was meant to hurt, and, again, I hope it does.
The last lines are as flat and definite a statement as I could get—each line ends with a period, and the voice is not raised. Author's note

And for those who were not courageous
 But were beaten nevertheless.
 For those who spit out the bloody stumps of their teeth
 Quietly in the hall, Sleep well on stone or iron, watch for the
     time
 And kill the guard in the privy before they
     die,
 Those with the deep-socketed eyes and the lamp burning.

For those who carry the scars, who walk lame—for those Whose nameless graves are made in the prison-yard
 And the earth smoothed back before morning and the lime scattered 20

For those slain at once For those living through months and years Enduring, watching, hoping, going each
     day
 To the work or the queue for meat or the secret club,
 Living meanwhile, begetting children,
     smuggling guns,
 And found and killed at the end like rats in a drain.

For those escaping
 Incredibly into exile and wandering there For those who live in the small rooms of foreign cities
 And who yet think of the country, the long green grass,
 The childhood voices, the language, the way wind smelt then, 30
 The shape of rooms, the coffee drunk at the table,
 The talk with friends, the loved city, the waiter's face,
 The gravestones, with the name, where they will not lie Nor in any of that earth Their children are strangers

For those who planned and were leaders and were beaten
 And for those, humble and stupid, who had no plan
 But were denounced, but grew angry, but told a joke,
 But could not explain, but were sent away
     to the camp,

But had their bodies shipped back in the sealed coffins,
 'Died of pneumonia' 'Died trying to escape' 40

For those growers of wheat who were shot by their own wheat-stacks,
 For those growers of bread who were sent to the ice-locked wastes,
 And their flesh remembers their fields.

For those denounced by their smug, horrible children
 For a peppermint-star and the praise of the Perfect State,
 For all those strangled or gelded or merely starved
 To make perfect states, for the priest hanged in his cassock,
 The Jew with his chest crushed in and his eyes dying,
 The revolutionist lynched by the private guards
 To make perfect states, in the names of the perfect states 50

For those betrayed by the neighbors they shook hands with
 And for the traitors, sitting in the hard chair
 With the loose sweat crawling their hair and their fingers restless
 As they tell the street and the house and the man's name

And for those sitting at table in the house
 With the lamp lit and the plates and the smell of food,
 Talking so quietly, when they hear the cars
 And the knock at the door, and they look at each other quickly
 And the woman goes to the door with a stiff
     face,
 Smoothing her dress 60
 'We are all good citizens here
 We believe in the Perfect State'

And that was the last Time Tony or Karl or Shorty came to the house
 And the family was liquidated later.

It was the last time
     We heard the shots in the night
 But nobody knew next day what the trouble
     was

And a man must go to his work. So I didn't see him
For three days, then, and me near out of my mind 70
And all the patrols on the streets with their dirty guns
And when he came back, he looked drunk, and the blood was on him.

For the women who mourn their dead in the secret night,
For the children taught to keep quiet, the old children,
The children spat-on at school
For the wrecked laboratory,
The gutted house, the dinged picture, the pissed-in well,
The naked corpse of Knowledge flung in the square
And no man lifting a hand and no man speaking

For the cold of the pistol-butt and the bullet's heat, 80
For the rope that chokes, the manacles that bind,
The huge voice, metal, that lies from a thousand tubes
And the stuttering machine-gun that answers all

For the man crucified on the crossed machine-guns
Without name, without resurrection, without stars,
His dark head heavy with death and his flesh long sour

With the smell of his many prisons—John Smith, John Doe,
John Nobody—oh, crack your mind for his name!
Faceless as water, naked as the dust, Dishonored as the earth the gas-shells
poison 90
And barbarous with portent

This is he
This is the man they ate at the green table
Putting their gloves on ere they touched the meat
This is the fruit of war, the fruit of peace,
The ripeness of invention, the new lamb,
The answer to the wisdom of the wise,
And still he hangs, and still he will not die,
And still, on the steel city of our years
The light fails and the terrible blood streams down 100

We thought we were done with these things but we were wrong
We thought, because we had power, we had wisdom
We thought the long train would run to the end of Time
We thought the light would increase Now the long train stands derailed and the bandits loot it Now the boar and the asp have power in our time
Now the night rolls back on the West and the night is solid
Our fathers and ourselves sowed dragon's teeth
Our children know and suffer the armed men

1899—

AN OLD SPELL

HEARTS may not bend in course, but toward its loves,
Through heaping time, shall run the simple
river,
And that enchantment that I lightly took
Out of the lovely April is for ever

O falsely hearing, since of lying tunes,
Three notes were solitary, three apart,
That made of all the insolent armour wax,

Sank in the breast, and pierced the sensible
heart,

And eyes forsworn, that, busied with your cheats,
Were fixed with tears, is not that only need,
Beauty's, the desolate wanderer of waste
earth, 11
The sower in darkness of an exquisite seed?

These dropped like dew upon a dreaming
flower

That in my breast stirred with delicious morn,
And breathed upon its colour the bleak air,
And felt along its lovely side the thorn.

Not now will I turn from comfortless love
again,
Nor, heart, forget the burden that you hold,
And flesh, though it harry you unto the last,
Go ridden through darkness to an end of gold

SAID OF THE EARTH AND THE MOON

Now moony light
The dews drink over the black turf,
And earth, at bottom darkness lying,
Looks up on heaven and heavenly night,
Stares on the glittering lady climbing
Her airy arch away,
Till a cold humour of her breast
Infests her clay

The huntress of the air lets fly,
The beast of earth receives her arrow, 10
And by those silver arrows maimed,
The bones course with watery marrow.

Now fever-bright the dead moon goes,
The mistress to the sun, that crept
From starveling death, and on his breath
Has fed her lustre while her lover slept

For the swart earth has breeded of her loves,
But the moon spent upon her withered shell,
And though the moon is barren, she's not cursed,
Nor the fruit unholy to be beautiful 20

The stars were scattered at the edge of even,
Clouds may not snare her glittering heels
tonight,
And still the amorous gold sun is sleeping,
The earth lies moored, she mounts the brink of heaven.

THE RIVER IN THE MEADOWS<sup>1</sup>

CRYSTAL parting the meads,
A boat drifted up like a swan,

<sup>1</sup> The texts of 'The River in the Meadows,' 'Country

Tranquil, dipping his bright front to the waters,
A slow swan is gone.

Full water, O flowing silver,
Clear, level with the clover,
It will stain drowning a star,
With the moon it will brim over.

Runner through lands dewy and shorn,
Cattle stoop at its brink, 10
And every fawny-coloured throat
Will sway its bells and drink.

I saw a boat sailing the meadows
With a tranced gait, it seemed Loosed by a spell from its moorings,
By a thing the helmsman dreamed

And I saw it could carry no traveller,
For the vessel would go down
If a heart were heavy winged
Or the bosom it dwelt in stone 20

COUNTRY SUMMER

Now the rich cherry whose sleek wood
And top with silver petals traced
Like a strict box its gems encased
Has spilt from out that cunning lid,
All in an innocent green round
Those melting rubies which it hid,
With moss ripe-strawberry encrusted
So birds get half and lips are merry
To taste that deep-red, lark'sbite berry,
And blackcap bloom meal-yellow dusted

The wren that thieved it in the eaves 11
A trailer of the rose could catch
To her poor droopy sloven thatch,
And side by side with the wren's brood—
O quarry Rour of beggars' luck!—
Opens the quaint and hairy bud,
And full, and golden is the yield
Of cows that never have to house,
But all night nibble under boughs
Or cool their sides in the moist field. 20

Into the rooms flow meadow airs,
The warm farm-baking smell's blown
round,

Summer,' and 'Word for Harvest' are the revised versions to be included in Miss Adams's forthcoming volume of selected poems

Inside and out, and sky and ground
 Are much the same the wishing star,
 Hesperus, kind and early-born,
 Is risen only finger-far,
 All stars are close in summer air,
 And tremble, and beam mild as amber,
 And wicks in the blue evening chamber Shine hushed as stars which settled there

But called his name as Time.
 His bin was morning light,
 Those straws which gild his bed
 Are of the fallen West
 Although green lands consume
 Beneath their burning tread, 20
 In everlasting bright
 His hooves have rest

* Now straightening from the flowery hay
 Down the still light the mowers look, 32
 Then turn, as they in slumber shook
 And stirred, half-waked, to later days
 When left alone in the yellow stubble
 The rusty-coated mare would graze,
 Yet thick the lazy dreams are born,
 A second thought will come to mind
 Small as the shivering of the wind
 Morning and evening in the corn 40

THE MOUNT

No, I have tempered haste,
 The joyous traveller said,
 The steed has passed me now
 Whose hurrying hooves I fled
 My spectre rides thereon,
 I learned what mount he has,
 Upon what summers fed,
 And wept to know again,
 Beneath the saddle swung, 10
 Treasure for whose great theft
 This breast was wrung
 His bridle bells sang out,
 I could not tell their chime,
 So brilliantly he rings,

WORD FOR HARVEST

THE year turns to its rest;
 Up from the earth, the fields, the early-fallen dew
 Moves the large star with evening,
 Arcturus, low with autumn,
 And summer calls in her many voices upon the frost.

I, who have not seen for weeping
 The plum ripen and fall or the yellowing sheaf,
 Am not unmindful now of the season which came and went,
 The hours which told off sweetness,
 The bud, and the rich leaf 9

Though I turned aside before the summer,
 And weathered a gaunt season of the mind,
 Let me sit among you when the husk is stripped,
 Let me weigh by the bright grain
 Those labours in an acre of cloud and the reap of the wind.

WILLIAM FAULKNER

1897-

DRY SEPTEMBER

THROUGH the bloody September twilight, aftermath of sixty-two rainless days, it had gone like a fire in dry grass—the rumor, the story, whatever it was Something about Miss Minnie Cooper and a Negro Attacked, insulted, frightened none of them, gathered in the barber shop on that Saturday evening where the ceiling fan stirred, 10 without freshening it, the vitiated air, sending back upon them, in recurrent surges of stale pomade and lotion, their own stale breath and odors, knew exactly what had happened.

'Except it wasn't Will Mayes,' a barber said He was a man of middle age; a thin, sand-colored man with a mild face, who was shaving a client 'I know Will Mayes He's a good nigger And I know Miss Minnie Cooper, too'

'What do you know about her?' a second barber said.

'Who is she?' the client said 'A young girl?'

'No,' the barber said 'She's about forty.

I reckon. She aint married That's why I dont believe—'

'Believe, hell!' a hulking youth in a sweat-stained silk shirt said 'Wont you take a white woman's word before a nigger's?'

'I dont believe Will Mayes did it,' the barber said 'I know Will Mayes'

'Maybe you know who did it, then Maybe you already got him out of town, you damn niggerlover'

'I dont believe anybody did anything I dont believe anything happened I leave it to you fellows if them ladies that get old without getting married dont have notions that a man cant—'

'Then you are a hell of a white man,' the client said He moved under the cloth The youth had sprung to his feet

'You dont?' he said 'Do you accuse a white woman of lying?'

The barber held the razor poised above the half-risen client He did not look around

'It's this durn weather,' another said 'It's enough to make a man do anything Even to her'

Nobody laughed The barber said in his mild, stubborn tone 'I aint accusing nobody of nothing I just know and you fellows know how a woman that never—'

'You damn niggerlover!' the youth said

'Shut up, Butch,' another said 'We'll get the facts in plenty of time to act'

'Who is? Who's getting them?' the youth said 'Facts, hell! I—'

'You're a fine white man,' the client said 'Aint you?' In his frothy beard he looked like a desert rat in the moving pictures 'You tell them, Jack,' he said to the youth 'If there aint any white men in this town, you can count on me, even if I aint only a drummer and a stranger'

'That's right, boys,' the barber said 'Find out the truth first I know Will Mayes'

'Well, by God!' the youth shouted 'To think that a white man in this town—'

'Shut up, Butch,' the second speaker said 'We got plenty of time'

The client sat up He looked at the speaker Do you claim that anything excuses a nigger attacking a white woman? Do you mean to tell me you are a white man and you'll stand for it? You better go back North where you came from. The South dont want your kind here'

'North what?' the second said 'I was born and raised in this town'

'Well, by God!' the youth said. He looked about with a strained, baffled gaze, as if he was trying to remember what it was he wanted to say or to do He drew his sleeve across his sweating face 'Damn if I'm going to let a white woman—'

'You tell them, Jack,' the drummer said 'By God, if they—'

The screen door crashed open A man stood in the floor, his feet apart and his heavy-set body poised easily His white shirt was open at the throat, he wore a felt hat His hot, bold glance swept the group His name was McLendon He had commanded troops at the front in France and had been decorated for valor

'Well,' he said, 'are you going to sit there and let a black son rape a white woman on the streets of Jefferson?'

Butch sprang up again The silk of his shirt clung flat to his heavy shoulders At each armpit was a dark halfmoon 'That's what I been telling them! That's what I—'

'Did it really happen?' a third said 'This aint the first man scare she ever had, like Hawkshaw says. Wasn't there something about a man on the kitchen roof, watching her undress, about a year ago?'

'What?' the client said 'What's that?' The barber had been slowly forcing him back into the chair, he arrested himself reclining, his head lifted, the barber still pressing him down

McLendon whirled on the third speaker 'Happen? What the hell difference does it make? Are you going to let the black sons get away with it until one really does it?'

'That's what I'm telling them!' Butch shouted He cursed, long and steady, pointless

'Here, here,' a fourth said 'Not so loud. Dont talk so loud.'

'Sure,' McLendon said, 'no talking necessary at all I've done my talking. Who's with me?' He poised on the balls of his feet, roving his gaze.

The barber held the drummer's face down, the razor poised 'Find out the facts first, boys I know Willy Mayes. It wasn't him Let's get the sheriff and do this thing right'

McLendon whirled upon him his furious, rigid face. The barber did not look away. They looked like men of different races. The other barbers had ceased also above their prone clients. 'You mean to tell me,' McLendon said, 'that you'd take a nigger's word before a white woman's? Why, you damn niggerloving—'

The third speaker rose and grasped McLendon's arm, he too had been a soldier. 'Now, now. Let's figure this thing out. Who knows anything about what really happened?'

'Figure out hell!' McLendon jerked his arm free. 'All that're with me get up from there. The ones that aint—' He roved his gaze, dragging his sleeve across his face.

Three men rose. The drummer in the chair sat up. 'Here,' he said, jerking at the cloth about his neck, 'get this rag off me. I'm with him. I don't live here, but by God, if our mothers and wives and sisters—' He smeared the cloth over his face and flung it to the floor. McLendon stood in the floor and cursed the others. Another rose and moved toward him. The remainder sat uncomfortable, not looking at one another, then one by one they rose and joined him.

The barber picked the cloth from the floor. He began to fold it neatly. 'Boys, don't do that. Will Mayes never done it. I know.'

'Come on,' McLendon said. He whirled from his hip pocket protruded the butt of a heavy automatic pistol. They went out. The screen door crashed behind them reverberant in the dead air.

The barber wiped the razor carefully and swiftly, and put it away, and ran to the rear, and took his hat from the wall. 'I'll be back as soon as I can,' he said to the other barbers. 'I can't let—' He went out, running. The two other barbers followed him to the door and caught it on the rebound, leaning out and looking up the street after him. The air was flat and dead. It had a metallic taste at the base of the tongue.

'What can he do?' the first said. The second one was saying 'Jees Christ, Jees Christ' under his breath. 'I'd just as lief be Will Mayes as Hawk, if he gets McLendon riled.'

'Jees Christ, Jees Christ,' the second whispered.

'You reckon he really done it to her?' the first said.

II

She was thirty-eight or thirty-nine. She lived in a small frame house with her invalid mother and a thin, sallow, unflagging aunt, where each morning between ten and eleven she would appear on the porch in a lace-trimmed boudoir cap, to sit swinging in the porch swing until noon. After dinner she lay down for a while, until the afternoon began to cool. Then, in one of the three or four new voile dresses which she had each summer, she would go downtown to spend the afternoon in the stores with the other ladies, where they would handle the goods and haggle over the prices in cold, immediate voices, without any intention of buying.

She was of comfortable people—not the best in Jefferson, but good people enough—and she was still on the slender side of ordinary looking, with a bright, faintly haggard manner and dress. When she was young she had had a slender, nervous body and a sort of hard vivacity which had enabled her for a time to ride upon the crest of the town's social life as exemplified by the high school party and church social period of her contemporaries while still children enough to be unclassconscious.

She was the last to realize that she was losing ground, that those among whom she had been a little brighter and louder flame than any other were beginning to learn the pleasure of snobbery—male—and retaliation—female. That was when her face began to wear that bright, haggard look. She still carried it to parties on shadowy porticoes and summer lawns, like a mask or a flag, with that bafflement of furious repudiation of truth in her eyes. One evening at a party she heard a boy and two girls, all schoolmates, talking. She never accepted another invitation.

She watched the girls with whom she had grown up as they married and got homes and children, but no man ever called on her steadily until the children of the other girls had been calling her 'aunty' for several years, the while their mothers told them in bright voices about how popular Aunt Minnie had been as a girl Then the town began to see her driving on Sunday afternoons with the cashier in the bank He was a widower of about forty—a high-colored man, smelling always faintly of the barber shop or of whisky He owned the first automobile in town, a red runabout, Minnie had the first motoring bonnet and veil the town ever saw Then the town began to say 'Poor Minnie' 'But she is old enough to take care of herself,' others said That was when she began to ask her old schoolmates that their children call her 'cousin' instead of 'auntie'

It was twelve years now since she had been relegated into adultery by public opinion, and eight years since the cashier had gone to a Memphis bank, returning for one day each Christmas, which he spent at an annual bachelors' party at a hunting club on the river From behind their curtains the neighbors would see the party pass, and during the over-the-way Christmas day visiting they would tell her about him, about how well he looked, and how they heard that he was prospering in the city, watching with bright, secret eyes her haggard, bright face Usually by that hour there would be the scent of whisky on her breath It was supplied her by a youth, a clerk at the soda fountain 'Sure, I buy it for the old gal I reckon she's entitled to a little fun'

Her mother kept to her room altogether now, the gaunt aunt ran the house Against that background Minnie's bright dresses, her idle and empty days, had a quality of furious unreality She went out in the evenings only with women now, neighbors, to the moving pictures Each afternoon she dressed in one of the new dresses and went downtown alone, where her young 'cousins' were already strolling in the late afternoons with their delicate, silken heads and thin, awkward arms and conscious hips, clinging to one another or shrieking and giggling with paired boys in the soda fountain when she passed and went on along the serried store fronts, in the doors of which the sitting and lounging men did not even follow her with their eyes any more

The barber went swiftly up the street where the sparse lights, insect-swirled, glared in rigid and violent suspension in the lifeless air The day had died in a pall of dust, above the darkened square, shrouded by the spent dust, the sky was as clear as the inside of a brass bell Below the east was a rumor of the twice-waxed moon

When he overtook them McLendon and three others were getting into a car parked in an alley McLendon stooped his thick head, peering out beneath the top 'Changed your mind, did you?' he said 'Damn good thing, by God, tomorrow when this town hears about how you talked tonight—'

'Now, now,' the other ex-soldier said 'Hawkshaw's all right Come on, Hawk, jump in'

'Will Mayes never done it, boys,' the barber said 'If anybody done it Why, you all know well as I do there aint any town where they got better niggers than us And you know how a lady will kind of think things about men when there aint any reason to, and Miss Minnie anyway—'

'Sure, sure,' the soldier said 'We're just going to talk to him a little, that's all'

'Talk hell' Butch said 'When we're through with the—'

'Shut up, for God's sake!' the soldier said 'Do you want everybody in town—'

'Tell them, by God!' McLendon said 'Tell every one of the sons that'll let a white woman—'

'Let's go, let's go here's the other car' The second car slid squealing out of a cloud of dust at the alley mouth McLendon started his car and took the lead Dust lay like fog in the street The street lights hung numbed as in water They drove on out of town

A rutted lane turned at right angles Dust hung above it too, and above all the land The dark bulk of the ice plant, where the Negro Mayes was night watchman, rose against the sky 'Better stop here, hadn't we?' the soldier said McLendon did not reply He hurled the car up and slammed to a stop, the headlights glaring on the blank wall

'Listen here, boys,' the barber said, 'if he's here, dont that prove he never done it? Dont it? If it was him, he would run. Dont you see he would?' The second car came up and stopped McLendon got down, Butch sprang down beside him

'Listen, boys,' the barber said

'Cut the lights off!' McLendon said. The breathless dark rushed down. There was no sound in it save their lungs as they sought air in the parched dust in which for two months they had lived, then the diminishing crunch of McLendon's and Butch's feet, and a moment later McLendon's voice

'Will! . Will!'

Below the east the wan hemorrhage of the moon increased. It heaved above the ridge, silvering the air, the dust, so that they seemed to breathe, live, in a bowl of molten lead. There was no sound of night-bird nor insect, no sound save their breathing and a faint ticking of contracting metal about the cars. Where their bodies touched one another they seemed to sweat dryly, for no more moisture came. 'Christ!' a voice said, 'let's get out of here.'

But they didn't move until vague noises began to grow out of the darkness ahead, then they got out and waited tensely in the breathless dark. There was another sound—a blow, a hissing expulsion of breath and McLendon cursing in undertone. They stood a moment longer, then they ran forward. They ran in a stumbling clump, as though they were fleeing something. 'Kill him, kill the son,' a voice whispered.
McLendon flung them back.

'Not here,' he said. 'Get him into the car.' 'Kill him, kill the black son!' the voice murmured. They dragged the Negro to the car. The barber had waited beside the car.
He could feel himself sweating and he knew he was going to be sick at the stomach.

'What is it, captains?' the Negro said.
'I aint done nothing. 'Fore God, Mr. John.' Someone produced handcuffs. They worked busily about the Negro as though he were a post, quiet, intent, getting in one another's way. He submitted to the handcuffs, looking swiftly and constantly from dim face to dim face. 'Who's here, captains?' he said, leaning to peer into the faces until they could feel his breath and smell his sweaty reek. He spoke a name or two.
'What you all say I done, Mr. John?'

McLendon jerked the car door open.
'Get in!' he said.

The Negro did not move. 'What you all going to do with me, Mr. John? I aint done nothing. White folks, captains, I aint done nothing. I swear 'fore God.' He called another name.

'Get in!' McLendon said. He struck the Negro. The others expelled their breath in a dry hissing and struck him with random blows and he whirled and cursed them, and swept his manacled hands across their faces and slashed the barber upon the mouth, and the barber struck him also. 'Get him in there,' McLendon said. They pushed at him. He ceased struggling and got in and sat quietly as the others took their places.
He sat between the barber and the soldier, drawing his limbs in so as not to touch them, his eyes going swiftly and constantly from face to face. Butch clung to the running board. The car moved on. The barber nursed his mouth with his handkerchief.

'What's the matter, Hawk?' the soldier
said.

'Nothing,' the barber said. They regained the highroad and turned away from town. The second car dropped back out of the dusk. They went on, gaining speed, the final fringe of houses dropped behind.

'Goddamn, he stinks!' the soldier said.

'We'll fix that,' the drummer in front beside McLendon said. On the running board Butch cursed into the hot rush of air.
The barber leaned suddenly forward and touched McLendon's arm.

'Let me out, John,' he said.

'Jump out, niggerlover,' McLendon said without turning his head. He drove swiftly.
Behind them the sourceless lights of the second car glared in the dust. Presently McLendon turned into a narrow road. It was rutted with disuse. It led back to an abandoned brick kiln—a series of reddish mounds and weed- and vine-choked vats without bottom. It had been used for pasture once, until one day the owner missed one of his mules. Although he prodded carefully in the vats with a long pole, he could not even find the bottom of them.

'John,' the barber said.

'Jump out, then,' McLendon said, hurling the car along the ruts. Beside the barber the Negro spoke.

'Mr. Henry.'

The barber sat forward. The narrow tunnel of the road rushed up and past.
Their motion was like an extinct furnace.

blast cooler, but utterly dead. The car bounded from rut to rut

'Mr Henry,' the Negro said

The barber began to tug furiously at the door 'Look out, there!' the soldier said, but the barber had already kicked the door open and swung onto the running board. The soldier leaned across the Negro and grasped at him, but he had already jumped. The car went on without checking speed.

The impetus hurled him crashing through dust-sheathed weeds, into the ditch. Dust puffed about him, and in a thin, vicious crackling of sapless stems he lay choking and retching until the second car passed and died away. Then he rose and limped on until he reached the high-road and turned toward town, brushing at his clothes with his hands. The moon was higher, riding high and clear of the dust at last, and after a while the town began to glare beneath the dust. He went on, limping. Presently he heard cars and the glow of them grew in the dust behind him and he left the road and crouched again in the weeds until they passed. McLendon's car came last now. There were four people in it and Butch was not on the running board.

They went on, the dust swallowed them, the glare and the sound died away. The dust of them hung for a while, but soon the eternal dust absorbed it again. The barber climbed back onto the road and limped on toward town.

IV

As she dressed for supper on that Saturday evening, her own flesh felt like fever. Her hands trembled among the hooks and eyes, and her eyes had a feverish look, and her hair swirled crisp and crackling under the comb. While she was still dressing the friends called for her and sat while she donned her sheerest underthings and stockings and a new voile dress. 'Do you feel strong enough to go out?' they said, their eyes bright too, with a dark glitter. 'When you have had time to get over the shock, you must tell us what happened. What he said and did, everything.'

In the leafed darkness, as they walked toward the square, she began to breathe deeply, something like a swimmer preparing to dive, until she ceased trembling, the four of them walking slowly because of the terrible heat and out of solicitude for her. But as they neared the square she began to tremble again, walking with her head up, her hands clinched at her sides, their voices about her murmurous, also with that feverish, glittering quality of their eyes.

They entered the square, she in the center of the group, fragile in her fresh dress. She was trembling worse. She walked slower and slower, as children eat ice cream, her head up and her eyes bright in the haggard banner of her face, passing the hotel and the coatless drummers in chairs along the curb looking around at her. 'That's the one, see? The one in pink in the middle.' 'Is that her? What did they do with the nigger? Did they—?' 'Sure. He's all right.' 'All right, is he?' 'Sure. He went on a little trip.' Then the drug store, where even the young men lounging in the doorway tipped their hats and followed with their eyes the motion of her hips and legs when she passed.

They went on, passing the lifted hats of the gentlemen, the suddenly ceased voices, deferent, protective. 'Do you see?' the friends said. Their voices sounded like long, hovering sighs of hussing exultation. 'There's not a Negro on the square. Not one.'

They reached the picture show. It was like a miniature fairyland with its lighted lobby and colored lithographs of life caught in its terrible and beautiful mutations. Her lips began to tingle. In the dark, when the picture began, it would be all right, she could hold back the laughing so it would not waste away so fast and so soon. So she hurried on before the turning faces, the undertones of low astonishment, and they took their accustomed places where she could see the aisle against the silver glare and the young men and girls coming in two and two against it.

The lights flicked away, the screen glowed silver, and soon life began to unfold, beautiful and passionate and sad, while still the young men and girls entered, scented and sibilant in the half dark, their paired backs in silhouette delicate and sleek, their slim, quick bodies awkward, divinely young, while beyond them the silver dream accumulated, inevitably on and on. She began to laugh. In trying to suppress it, it made more noise than ever, heads began to turn Still laughing, her friends raised her and led her out, and she stood at the curb, laughing on a high, sustained note, until the taxi came up and they helped her in

They removed the pink voile and the sheer underthings and the stockings, and put her to bed, and cracked ice for her temples, and sent for the doctor He was hard to locate, so they ministered to her with hushed ejaculations, renewing the ice and fanning her While the ice was fresh and cold she stopped laughing and lay still for a time, moaning only a little But soon the laughing welled again and her voice rose screaming

'Shhhhhhh! Shhhhhhhhh!' they said, freshening the icepack, smoothing her hair, examining it for gray, 'poor girl!' Then to one another 'Do you suppose anything really happened?' their eyes darkly aglitter, secret and passionate 'Shhhhhhhhh! Poor girl! Poor Minnie!'

V

It was midnight when McLendon drove up to his neat new house It was trim and fresh as a birdcage and almost as small, with its clean green-and-white paint He locked the car and mounted the porch and entered His wife rose from a chair beside the reading lamp McLendon stopped in the floor and stared at her until she looked down

'Look at that clock,' he said, lifting his arm, pointing She stood before him, her face lowered, a magazine in her hands Her face was pale, strained, and weary-looking 'Haven't I told you about sitting up like this, waiting to see when I come in?'

'John,' she said She laid the magazine down. Poised on the balls of his feet, he glared at her with his hot eyes, his sweating face

'Didn't I tell you?' He went toward her She looked up then He caught her shoulder She stood passive, looking at him

'Dont, John. I couldn't sleep The heat, something Please, John You're hurting me'

'Didn't I tell you?' He released her and half struck, half flung her across the chair, and she lay there and watched him quietly as he left the room

He went on through the house, ripping off his shirt, and on the dark, screened porch at the rear he stood and mopped his head and shoulders with the shirt and flung it away He took the pistol from his hip and laid it on the table beside the bed, and sat on the bed and removed his shoes, and rose and slipped his trousers off He was sweating again already, and he stooped and hunted furiously for the shirt At last he found it and wiped his body again, and, with his body pressed against the dusty screen, he stood panting There was no movement, no sound, not even an insect. The dark world seemed to be stricken beneath the cold moon and the lidless stars

FROM OF TIME AND THE RIVER

THE DEATH OF STONEMAN GANT<sup>1</sup>

I

THE news that Gant was dying had spread rapidly through the town and, as often happens, that news had brought him back to life again in the heart and living memory of men who had known him, and who had scarcely thought of him for years. That night—the night of his death—the house was filled with some of the men who had known him best since he came to the town forty years before.

Among these people were several of the prominent and wealthy business men of the community these included, naturally, Eliza's brothers, William and James Pentland, both wealthy lumber dealers, as well as one of her younger brothers, Crockett, who was Will Pentland's bookkeeper, a pleasant, ruddy, bucolic man of fifty years Among the other men of wealth and influence who had been Gant's friends there was Fagg Sluder, who had made a fortune as a contractor and retired to invest his money in business property, and to spend his time seated in an easy creaking chair before the fire department, in incessant gossip about baseball with the firemen and the young professional baseball players whose chief support he was, whose annual deficit he cheerfully supplied, and to whom he had given the local baseball park, which bore his name. He had been one of Gant's best friends for twenty years, he was immensely fond of him, and now, assembled in the broad front hall in earnest discussion with the Pentlands and Mike Fogarty, another of Gant's friends, and armed with the invariable cigar (despite his doctor's orders he smoked thirty or forty strong black cigars every day), which he chewed on, took out of his mouth, and put back again, with quick, short, unconscious movements, he could be heard saying in the rapid, earnest, stammering tone that was one of the most attractive qualities of his buoyant and constantly hopeful nature

'I-I-I-I just believe he's going to pull right out of this and-and-and-get well! Why-why-why-why-when I went in there tonight he spoke right up and-and-and knew me right away!' he blurted out, sticking the cigar in his mouth and chewing on it vigorously a moment—'why-why-why his mind is-is-is-is just as clear—as it always was—spoke right up, you know, says "Sit down, Fagg"—shook hands with me—knew me right away—talked to me just the same way he always talked—says "Sit down, Fagg I'm glad to see you. How have you been?"' he says—and-and-and—I just believe he's going to pull right out of this,' Mr Sluder blurted out,—'be damned if I don't—what do you say, Will?' and snatching his chewed cigar butt from his mouth he turned eagerly to Will Pentland for confirmation. And Will, who, as usual, had been paring his stubby nails during the whole course of the conversation, his lips pursed in their characteristic family grimace, now studied his clenched fingers for a moment, pocketed his knife and turning to Fagg Sluder, with a little bird-like nod and wink, and with the incomparable Pentland drawl, at once precise, and full of the relish of self-satisfaction, said

'Well, if any man alive can do it, W O

is that man I've seen him time and again when I thought every breath would be his last—and he's got over it every time. I've always said,' he went on precisely, and with a kind of deadly directness in his small compact and almost wizened face, 'that he has more real vitality than any two men that I ever knew—he's got out of worse holes than this before—and he may do it again.' He was silent a moment, his small packed face pursed suddenly in its animal-like grimace that had an almost savage ferocity and a sense of deadly and indomitable power

Even more astonishing and troubling was the presence of these four older members of the Pentland family gathered together in his mother's hall. As they stood there talking—Eliza with her hands held in their loose and powerful clasp across her waist, Will intently busy with his fingernails, Jim listening attentively to all that was said, his solid porcine face and small eyes wincing from time to time in a powerful but unconscious grimace, and Crockett, gentlest, ruddiest, most easy-going and dreamy of them all, speaking in his quiet drawling tone and stroking his soft brown mustaches in a gesture of quiet and bucolic meditation, Luke could not recall having seen so many of them together at one time and the astonishing enigma of their oneness and variety was strikingly apparent

What was it?—this undefinable tribal similarity that united these people so unmistakably. No one could say it would have been difficult to find four people more unlike in physical appearance, more strongly marked by individual qualities. Whatever it was—whether some chemistry of blood and character, or perhaps some physical identity of broad and fleshy nose, pursed reflective lips and flat wide cheeks, or the energies of powerfully concentrated egotisms—their kinship with one another was astonishing and instantly apparent

2

In a curious and undefinable way the two groups of men in the hallway had become divided. the wealthier group of prominent citizens, which was composed of the brothers William, James, and Crockett Pentland, Mr Sluder and Eliza, stood in a group near the front hall door, engaged in earnest conversation The second group, which was composed of working men, who had known Gant well, and worked for or with him—a group composed of Jannadeau the jeweller, old Alec Ramsay and Saul Gudger, who were stonecutters, Gant's nephew, Ollie Gant, who was a plasterer, Ernest Pegram, the city plumber, and Mike Fogarty, who was perhaps Gant's closest friend, a building contractor—this group, composed of men who had all their lives done stern labor with their hands, and who were really the men who had known the stonecutter best, stood apart from the group of prominent and wealthy men who were talking so earnestly to Eliza

And in this circumstance, in this unconscious division, in the air of constraint, vague uneasiness and awkward silence that was evident among these working men, as they stood there in the hallway dressed in their 'good clothes,' nervously fingering their hats in their big hands, there was something immensely moving. The men had the look that working people the world over have always had when they found themselves suddenly gathered together on terms of social intimacy with their employers or with members of the governing class.

And Helen, coming out at this instant from her father's room into the hall, suddenly saw and felt the awkward division between these two groups of men, as she had never before felt or noticed it, as sharply as if they had been divided with a knife

And, it must be admitted, her first feeling was an unworthy one—an instinctive wish to approach the more 'important' group, to join her life to the lives of these 'influential' people who represented to her a 'higher' social level. She found herself walking towards the group of wealthy and prominent men at the front of the hall, and away from the group of working men who had really been Gant's best friends.

But seeing the brick-red face of Alec Ramsay, the mountainous figure of Mike Fogarty, suddenly with a sense of disbelief, and almost terrified revelation of the truth, she thought. 'Why-why-why—these men are really the closest friends he's got—not rich men like Uncle Will or Uncle Jim or even Mr Sluder—but men like Mike Fogarty—and Jannadeau—and Mr Duncan—and Alec Ramsay—and Ernest Pegram—and Ollie Gant—but—but—good heavens, no!' she thought, almost desperately—'surely these are not his closest friends—why-why—of course, they're decent people—they're honest men—but they're only common people—I've always considered them as just working men—and—and—and—my God!' she thought, with that terrible feeling of discovery we have when we suddenly see ourselves as others see us—'do you suppose that's the way people in this town think of Papa? Do you suppose they have always thought of him as just a common working man—oh, no! but of course not!' she went on impatiently, trying to put the troubling thought out of her mind 'Papa's not a working man—Papa is a business man—a well thought of business man in this community. Papa has always owned property since he came here—he has always had his own shop'—she did not like the sound of the word shop, and in her mind she hastily amended it to 'place'—'he's always had his own place, up on the public square—he's—he's rented places to other people—he's—he's—oh, of course not!—Papa is different from men like Ernest Pegram, and Ollie, and Jannadeau and Alec Ramsay—why, they're just working men—they work with their hands—Ollie's just an ordinary plasterer—and—and—Mr Ramsay is nothing but a stonecutter'

And a small insistent voice inside her said most quietly 'And your father?'

And suddenly Helen remembered Gant's great hands of power and strength, and how they now lay quietly beside him on the bed, and lived and would not die, even when the rest of him had died, and she remembered the thousands of times she had gone to his shop in the afternoon and found the stonecutter in his long striped apron bending with delicate concentration over a stone inscription on a trestle, holding in his great hands the chisel and the heavy wooden mallet the stonecutters use, and remembering, the whole rich and living compact of the past came back to her, in a rush of tenderness and joy and terror, and on that flood a proud and bitter honesty returned. She thought 'Yes, he was a stonecutter, no different from these other men, and these men were his real friends.'

And going directly to old Alec Ramsay she grasped his blunt thick fingers, the nails of which were always whitened a little with stone dust, and greeted him in her large and spacious way

'Mr Ramsay,' she said, 'I want you to know how glad we are that you could come. And that goes for all of you—Mr Jannadeau, and Mr Duncan, and Mr Fogarty, and you, Ernest, and you, too, Ollie—you are the best friends Papa has, there's no one he thinks more of, and no one he would rather see'

Mr Ramsay's brick-red face and brick-red neck became even redder before he spoke, and beneath his grizzled brows his blue eyes suddenly were smoke blue. He put his blunt hand to his mustache for a moment, and tugged at it, then he said in his gruff, quiet, and matter-of-fact voice

'I guess we know Will about as well as any one, Miss Helen. I've worked for him off and on for thirty years'

At the same moment, she heard Ollie Gant's easy, deep, and powerful laugh, and saw him slowly lift his cigarette in his coarse paw, she saw Jannadeau's great yellow face and massive domy brow, and heard him laugh with guttural pleasure, saying, 'Ah-h! I tell you vat! Dat girl has always looked out for her datty—she's de only vun dat coult hantle him, efer since she vas ten years olt it has been de same' And she was overwhelmingly conscious of that immeasurable mountain of a man, Mike Fogarty, beside her, the sweet clarity of his blue eyes, and the almost purring music of his voice as he gently laid his mutton of a hand upon her shoulder for a moment, saying,

'Ah, Miss Helen, I don't know how Will could have got along all these years without ye—for he has said the same himself a thousand times—aye! that he has!'

And instantly, having heard these words, and feeling the strong calm presences of these powerful men around her, it seemed to Helen she had somehow re-entered a magic world that she thought was gone forever. And she was immensely content

At the same moment, with a sense of wonder, she discovered an astonishing thing, that she had never noticed before, but that she must have heard a thousand times,—this was that of all these people, who knew Gant best, and had a deep and true affection for him, there were only two—Mr Fogarty and Mr Ramsay—who had ever addressed him by his first name. And so far as she could now remember, these two men, together with Gant's mother, his brothers, his sister Augusta, and a few of the others who had known him in his boyhood in Pennsylvania, were the only people who ever had. And this revelation cast a strange, a lonely and a troubling light upon the great gaunt figure of the stonemason, which moved her powerfully and which she had never felt before. And most strange of all was the variety of names by which these various people called her father

As for Eliza, had any of her children ever heard her address her husband as anything but 'Mr Gant'—had she ever called him by one of his first names—their anguish of shame and impropriety would have been so great that they could hardly have endured it. But such a lapse would have been incredible. Eliza could no more have addressed Gant by his first name, than she could have quoted Homer's Greek, had she tried to address him so, the muscles of her tongue would have found it physically impossible to pronounce the word. And in this fact there was somehow, now that Gant was dying, an enormous pathos. It gave to Eliza's life with him a pitiable and moving dignity, the compensation of a proud and wounded spirit for all the insults and injuries that had been heaped upon it. She had been a young country woman of twenty-four when she had met him, she had been ignorant of life, and innocent of the cruelty, the violence, the drunkenness and abuse of which men are capable, she had borne this man fifteen children, of whom eight had come to life, and had for forty years eaten the bread of blood and tears and joy and grief and terror, she had wanted affection and had been given taunts, abuse, and curses, and somehow her proud and wounded spirit had endured with an anguished but unshaken fortitude all the wrongs and cruelties and injustices of which he had been guilty toward her. And now at the very end her pride still had this pitiable distinction, her spirit still preserved this last integrity. She had not betrayed her wounded soul to a shameful familiarity, he had remained to her—mind and heart and living word—what he had been from the first day that she met him, the author of her grief and misery, the agent of her suffering, the gaunt and lonely stranger who had come into her hills from a strange land and a distant people—that furious, gaunt, and lonely stranger with whom by fatal accident her destiny—past hate or love or birth or death or human error and confusion—had been insolubly enmeshed, with whom for forty years she had lived, a wife, a mother, and a stranger—and who would to the end remain to her a stranger—‘Mr Gant’

What was it? What was the secret of this strange and bitter mystery of life that had made of Gant a stranger to all men, and most of all a stranger to his wife? Perhaps some of the answer might have been found in Eliza’s own unconscious words when she described her meeting with him forty years before

‘It was not that he was old,’ she said,—‘he was only thirty-three—but he looked old—his ways were old—he had lived so much among old people—Pshaw!’ she continued, with a little puckered smile, ‘if any one had told me that night I saw him sitting there with Lydia and old Mrs. Mason—that was the very day they moved into the house, the night he gave the big dinner—and Lydia was still alive and, of course, she was ten years older than he was, and that may have had something to do with it—but I got to studying him as he sat there, of course, he was tired and run down and depressed and worried over all that trouble that he’d had in Sidney before he came up here, when he lost everything, and he knew that Lydia was dying, and that was preyin’ on his mind—but he looked old, thin as a rake you know, and sallow and run down, and with those old ways he had acquired, I reckon, from associatin’ with Lydia and old Mrs. Mason and people like that—but I just sat there studying him as he sat there with them and I said—“Well, you’re an old man, aren’t you, sure enough?”—pshaw! if any one had told me that night that some day I’d be married to him I’d have laughed at them—I’d have considered that I was marrying an old man—and that’s just exactly what a lot of people thought, sir, when the news got out that I was goin’ to marry him—I know Martha

Patton came running to me, all excited and out of breath—said, “Eliza! You’re not going to marry that old man—you know you’re not!”—you see, his ways were old, he looked old, dressed old, acted old—everything he did was old, there was always, it seemed, something strange and old-like about him, almost like he had been born that way’

And it was at this time that Eliza met him, saw him first—‘Mr Gant’—an immensely tall, gaunt, cadaverous-looking man, with a face stern and sad with care, lank, drooping mustaches, sandy hair, and cold-gray staring eyes—‘not so old, you know—he was only thirty-three—but he looked old, he acted old, his ways were old—he had lived so much among older people he seemed older than he was—I thought of him as an old man’

Thus, then, was ‘Mr Gant’ at thirty-three, and since then, although his fortunes and position had improved, his character had changed little. And now Helen, faced by all these working men, who had known, liked, and respected him, and had now come to see him again before he died—suddenly knew the reason for his loneliness, the reason so few people—least of all, his wife—had ever dared address him by his first name. And with a swift and piercing revelation, his muttered words, which she had heard him use a thousand times when speaking of his childhood—‘We had a tough time of it—I tell you what, we did!’—now came back to her with the unutterable poignancy of discovery. For the first time she understood what they meant. And suddenly, with the same swift and nameless pity, she remembered all the pictures which she had seen of her father as a boy and a young man. There were a half dozen of them in the big family album, together with pictures of his own and Eliza’s family—they were the small daguerreotypes of fifty years before, in small frames of faded plush, with glass covers, touched with the faint pale pinks with which the photographers of an earlier time tried to paint with life the sallow hues of their photography. The first of these pictures showed Gant as a little boy, later, a boy of twelve, he was standing in a chair beside his brother Wesley, who was seated, with a wooden smile upon his face. Later, a picture of Gant in the years in Baltimore, standing, his feet crossed, leaning elegantly upon a marble slab beside a vase, later still, the young stonemason before his little shop in the years at Sidney, finally, Gant, after his marriage with Eliza, standing with gaunt face and lank drooping mustaches before his shop upon the square, in the company of Will Pentland, who was at the time his business partner.

And all these pictures, from first to last, from the little boy to the man with the lank drooping mustaches, had been marked by the same expression the sharp thin face was always stern and sad with care, the shallow cold-gray eyes always stared out of the bony cage-formation of the skull with a cold mournfulness—the whole impression was always one of gaunt sad loneliness. And it was not the loneliness of the dreamer, the poet, or the misjudged prophet, it was just the cold and terrible loneliness of man, of every man, and of the lost American who has been brought forth naked under immense and lonely skies, to 'shift for himself,' to grope his way blindly through the confusion and brutal chaos of a life as naked and unsure as he, to wander blindly down across the continent, to hunt forever for a goal, a wall, a dwelling place of warmth and certitude, a light, a door.

And for this reason, she now understood something about her father, this great gaunt figure of a stonemason that she had never understood or thought about before she suddenly understood his order, sense of decency and dispatch, his love of cleanliness, roaring fires, and rich abundance, his foul drunkenness, violence, and howling fury, his naked shame and trembling penitence, his good clothes of heavy monumental black that he always kept well pressed, his clean boiled shirts, wing collars, and his love of hotels, ships, and trains, his love of gardens, new lands, cities, voyages. She knew suddenly that he was unlike any other man that ever lived, and that every man that ever lived was like her father. And remembering the cold and mournful look in his shallow staring eyes of cold hard gray, she suddenly knew the reason for that look, as she had never known it before, and understood now why so few men had ever called him by his first name

—why he was known to all the world as 'Mr. Gant.'

Having joined this group of working men, Helen immediately felt an indefinable but powerful sense of comfort and physical well-being which the presence of such men as these always gave to her. And she did not know why; but immediately, once she had grasped Mr. Ramsay by the hand, and was aware of Mike Fogarty's mountainous form and clear-blue eye above her, and Ollie Gant's deep and lazy laugh, and the deliberate and sensual languor with which he raised his cigarette to his lips with his powerful plasterer's hand, drawing the smoke deep into his strong lungs and letting it trickle slowly from his nostrils as he talked—she was conscious of a feeling of enormous security and relief which she had not known in years.

And this feeling, as with every person of strong sensuous perceptions, was literal, physical, chemical, astoundingly acute. She not only felt an enormous relief and joy to get back to these working people, it even seemed to her that everything they did—the way Mr. Duncan held his strong cheap cigar in his thick dry fingers, the immense satisfaction with which he drew on it, the languid and sensual trickling of cigarette smoke from Ollie Gant's nostrils, his deep, good-natured, indolently lazy laugh, even the perceptible bulge of tobacco-quid in Alec Ramsay's brick-red face, his barely perceptible rumination of it—all these things, though manlike in their nature, seemed wonderfully good and fresh and living to her—the whole plain priceless glory of the earth restored to her—and gave her a feeling of wonderful happiness and joy.

And later that night when all these men, her father's friends, had gone into his room, filling it with their enormous and full-blooded vitality, as she saw him lying there, wax-pale, bloodless, motionless, yet with a faint grin at the edge of his thin mouth as he received them, as she heard their deep full-fibred voices, Mike Fogarty's lilting Irish, Mr. Duncan's thick Scotch burr, Ollie Gant's deep and lazy laugh, and the humor of Alec Ramsay's deep, gruff and matter-of-fact tone, relating old times—'God, Will!' he said, 'at your worst, you weren't in it compared to Wes! He was a holy terror when he drank! Do you remember the day he drove his fist through your plate-glass window right in the face of Jannadeau—and went home then and tore all the plumbing out of the house and pitched the bathtub out of the second-story window into Orchard Street—God! Will!—you weren't in it compared to Wes'—as she heard all this, and saw Gant's thin grin and heard his faint and rusty cackle, his almost inaudible 'E'God! Poor Wes!—she could not believe that he was going to die, the great full-blooded working men filled the room with the vitality of a life which had returned in all its rich and living flood, and seemed intolerably near and familiar—and she kept thinking with a feeling of wonderful happiness and disbelief 'Oh, but Papa's not going to die! It's not possible! He can't! He can't!'

The dying man himself was no longer to be fooled and duped by hope, he knew that he was done for, and he no longer cared. Rather, as if that knowledge had brought him a new strength—the immense and measureless strength that comes from resignation, and that has vanquished terror and despair—Gant had already consigned himself to death, and now was waiting for it, without weariness or anxiety, and with a perfect and peaceful acquiescence.

This complete resignation and tranquility of a man whose life had been so full of violence, protest, and howling fury stunned and silenced them, and left them helpless. It seemed that Gant, knowing that often he had lived badly, was now determined to die well. And in this he succeeded. He accepted every ministrations, every visit, every stammering reassurance, or frenzied activity, with a passive gratefulness which he seemed to want every one to know. On the evening of the day after his first hemorrhage, he asked for food and Eliza, bustling out, pathetically eager to do something, killed a chicken and cooked it for him.

And as if, from that infinite depth of death and silence from which he looked at her, he had seen, behind the bridling brisk activity of her figure, forever bustling back and forth, saying confusedly— 'Why, yes! The very thing! This very minute, sir!—had seen the white strained face, the stricken eyes of a proud and sensitive woman who had wanted affection all her life, had received for the most part injury and abuse, and who was ready to clutch at any crust of comfort that might console or justify her before he died—he ate part of the chicken with relish, and then looking up at her, said quietly.

'I tell you what—that was a good chicken.'

And Helen, who had been sitting beside him on the bed, and feeding him, now cried out in a tone of bantering and good-humored challenge.

'What! Is it better than the ones I cook for you! You'd better not say it is—I'll beat you if you do.'

And Gant, grinning feebly, shook his head, and answered

'Ah-h! Your mother is a good cook, Helen. You're a good cook, too—but there's no one else can cook a chicken like your mother!'

And stretching out his great right hand, he patted Eliza's worn fingers with his own.

And Eliza, suddenly touched by that word of unaccustomed praise and tenderness, turned and rushed blindly from the room at a clumsy bridling gait, clasping her hands together at the wrist, her weak eyes blind with tears—shaking her head in a strong convulsive movement, her mouth smiling a pale tremulous smile, ludicrous, touching, made unnatural by her false teeth, whispering over and over to herself, 'Poor fellow! Says, "There's no one else can cook a chicken like your mother"'

Reached out and patted me on the hand, you know. Says "I tell you what, there's no one who can cook a chicken like your mother." I reckon he wanted to let me know, to tell me, but says, "The rest of you have all been good to me, Helen's a good cook, but there's no one else can cook like your mother."'

'Oh, here, here, here,' said Helen, who, laughing uncertainly had followed her mother from the room when Eliza had rushed out, and had seized her by the arms, and shook her gently, 'good heavens! Here! You mustn't carry on like this! You mustn't take it this way! Why, he's all right!' she cried out heartily and shook

Eliza again 'Papa's going to be all right! Why, what are you crying for?' she laughed 'He's going to get well now—don't you know that?'

And Eliza could say nothing for a moment but kept smiling that false trembling and unnatural smile, shaking her head in a slight convulsive movement, her eyes blind with tears

'I tell you what,' she whispered, smiling tremulously again and shaking her head, 'there was something about it—you know, the way he said it—says, "There's no one who can come up to your mother"—there was something in the way he said it! Poor fellow, says, "None of the rest of you can cook like her"—says, "I tell you what, that was certainly a good chicken"—Poor fellow! It wasn't so much what he said as the way he said it—there was something about it that went through me like a knife—I tell you what it did!'

'Oh, here, here, here!' Helen cried again, laughing. But her own eyes were also wet, the bitter possessiveness that had dominated all her relations with her father, and that had thrust Eliza away from him, was suddenly vanquished. At that moment she began to feel an affection for her mother that she had never felt before, a deep and nameless pity and regret, and a sense of sombre satisfaction

'Well,' she thought, 'I guess it's all she's had, but I'm glad she's got that much to remember. I'm glad he said it—she'll always have that now to hang on to.'

And Gant lay looking up from that sunken depth of death and silence, his great hands of living power quiet with their immense and passive strength beside him on the bed

4

Towards one o'clock that night Gant fell asleep and dreamed that he was walking down the road that led to Spangler's Run. And although he had not been along that road for fifty years everything was as fresh, as green, as living and familiar as it had ever been to him. He came out on the road from Schaefer's farm, and on his left he passed by the little white frame church of the United Brethren, and the graveyard about the church where his friends and family had been buried. From the road he could see the line of family gravestones which he himself had carved and set up after he had returned from serving his apprenticeship in Baltimore. The stones were all alike tall flat slabs of marble with plain rounded tops, and there was one for his sister Susan, who had died in infancy, and one for his sister Huldah, who had died in childbirth while the war was on, and one for Huldah's husband, a young farmer named Jake Lentz who had been killed at Chancellorsville, and one for the husband of his oldest sister, Augusta, a man named Martin, who had been an itinerant photographer and had died soon after the war, and finally one for Gant's own father. And since there were no stones for his brother George or for Elmer or for John, and none for his mother or Augusta, Gant knew that he was still a young man, and had just recently come home. The stones which he had put up were still white and new, and in the lower right hand corner of each stone, he had carved his own name W O Gant

It was a fine morning in early May and everything was sweet and green and as familiar as it had always been. The graveyard was carpeted with thick green grass, and all around the graveyard and the church there was the incomparable green velvet of young wheat. And the thought came back to Gant, as it had come to him a thousand times, that the wheat around the graveyard looked greener and richer than any other wheat that he had ever seen. And beside him on his right were the great fields of the Schaefer farm, some richly carpeted with young green wheat, and some ploughed, showing great bronzed strips of fertile nobly swelling earth. And behind him on the great swell of the land, and commanding that sweet and casual scene with the majesty of its incomparable lay was Jacob Schaefer's great red barn and to the right the neat brick house with the white trimming of its windows, the white picket fence, the green yard with its rich tapestry of flowers and lilac bushes and the massed leafy spread of its big maple trees. And behind the house the hill rose, and all its woods were just greening into May, still smoky, tender and unfledged, gold-yellow with the magic of young green. And before the woods began there was the apple orchard halfway up the hill, the trees were heavy with the blossoms and stood there in all their dense still bloom incredible

And from the greening trees the bird-song rose, the grass was thick with the dense gold glory of the dandelions, and all about him were a thousand magic things that came and went and never could be captured. Below the church, he passed the old frame house where Elly Spangler, who kept the church keys, lived, and there were apple trees behind the house, all dense with bloom, but the house was rickety, unpainted and dilapidated as it had always been, and he wondered if the kitchen was still buzzing with a million flies, and if Elly's half-wit brothers, Jim and Willy, were inside. And even as he shook his head and thought, as he had thought so many times 'Poor Elly,' the back door opened and Willy Spangler, a man past thirty wearing overalls, and with a fond, foolish witless face, came galloping down across the yard toward him, flinging his arms out in exuberant greeting, and shouting to him the same welcome that he shouted out to every one who passed, friends and strangers all alike— 'I've been lookin' fer ye! I've been lookin' fer ye, Oll,' using, as was the custom of the friends and kinsmen of his Pennsylvania boyhood, his second name—and then, anxiously, pleadingly, again the same words that he spoke to every one 'Ain't ye goin' to stay?'

And Gant, grinning, but touched by the indefinable sadness and pity which that kind and witless greeting had always stirred in him since his own childhood, shook his head, and said quietly

'No, Willy. Not to-day. I'm meeting some one down the road'—and straightway felt, with thudding heart, a powerful and nameless excitement, the urgency of that impending meeting—why, where, with whom, he did not know—but all-compelling now, inevitable

And Willy, still with wondering, foolish, kindly face followed along beside him now, saying eagerly, as he said to every one

'Did ye bring anythin' fer me? Have ye got a chew?'

And Gant, starting to shake his head in refusal, stopped suddenly, seeing the look of disappointment on the idiot's face, and putting his hand in the pocket of his coat, took out a plug of apple-tobacco, saying

'Yes. Here you are, Willy. You can have this.'

And Willy, grinning with foolish joy, had clutched the plug of tobacco and, still kind and foolish, had followed on a few steps more, saying anxiously.

'Are ye comin' back, Oll? Will ye be comin' back real soon?'

And Gant, feeling a strange and nameless sorrow, answered

'I don't know, Willy'—for suddenly he saw that he might never come this way again

But Willy, still happy, foolish, and contented, had turned and galloped away toward the house, flinging his arms out and shouting as he went

'I'll be waitin' fer ye. I'll be waitin' fer ye, Oll.'

And Gant went on then, down the road, and there was a nameless sorrow in him that he could not understand, and some of the brightness had gone out of the day.

When he got to the mill, he turned left along the road that went down by Spangler's Run, crossed by the bridge below, and turned from the road into the wood-path on the other side. A child was standing in the path, and turned and went on ahead of him. In the wood the sunlight made swarming moths of light across the path, and through the leafy tangle of the trees the sunlight kept shufing and swarming on the child's gold hair, and all around him were the sudden noises of the wood, the stir, the rustle, and the bullet thrum of wings, the cool broken sound of hidden water.

The wood got denser, darker as he went on and coming to a place where the path split away into two forks, Gant stopped, and turning to the child said, 'Which one shall I take?' And the child did not answer him.

But some one was there in the wood before him. He heard footsteps on the path, and saw a footprint in the earth, and turning took the path where the footprint was, and where it seemed he could hear some one walking.

And then, with the bridgeless instance of dreams, it seemed to him that all of the bright green-gold around him in the wood grew dark and sombre, the path grew darker, and suddenly he was walking in a strange and gloomy forest, haunted by the brown and tragic light of dreams. The forest shapes of great trees rose around him, he could hear no bird-song now, even his own feet on the path were soundless, but he always thought he heard the sound of some one walking in the wood before him. He stopped and listened: the steps were muffled, softly thunderous, they seemed so near that he thought that he must catch up with the one he followed in another second, and then they seemed immensely far away, receding in the dark mystery of that gloomy wood. And again he stopped and listened, the footsteps faded, vanished, he shouted, no one answered. And suddenly he knew that he had taken the wrong path, that he was lost. And in his heart there was an immense and quiet sadness, and the dark light of the enormous wood was all around him, no birds sang.

Gant awoke suddenly and found himself looking straight up at Eliza who was seated in a chair beside the bed.

'You were asleep,' she said quietly with a grave smile, looking at him in her direct and almost accusing fashion.

'Yes,' he said, breathing a little hoarsely, 'what time is it?'

It was a few minutes before three o'clock in the morning. She looked at the clock and told him the time. He asked where Helen was.

'Why,' said Eliza quickly, 'she's right here in this hall room. I reckon she's asleep, too. Said she was tired, you know, but that if you woke up and needed her to call her. Do you want me to get her?'

'No,' said Gant. 'Don't bother her. I guess she needs the rest, poor child. Let her sleep.'

'Yes,' said Eliza, nodding, 'and that's exactly what you must do, too, Mr. Gant. You try to go on back to sleep now,' she said coaxingly, 'for that's what we all need. There's no medicine like sleep—as the fellow says, it's Nature's sovereign remedy,' said Eliza, with that form of sentimentousness that she was very fond of—'so you go on, now, Mr. Gant, and get a good night's sleep, and when you wake up in the morning, you'll feel like a new man. That's half the battle—if you can get your sleep, you're already on the road to recovery.'

'No,' said Gant, 'I've slept enough.'

He was breathing rather hoarsely and heavily and she asked him if he was comfortable and needed anything. He made no answer for a moment, and then muttered something under his breath that she could not hear plainly, but that sounded like 'little boy.'

'Hah? What say? What is it, Mr. Gant?' Eliza said. 'Little boy?' she said sharply, as he did not answer.

'Did you see him?' he said.

She looked at him for a moment with troubled eyes, then said:

'Pshaw, Mr. Gant, I guess you must have been dreaming.'

He did not answer, and for a moment there was no sound in the room but his breathing, hoarse, a little heavy. Then he muttered:

'Did some one come into the house?'

She looked at him sharply, inquiringly again, with troubled eyes.

'Hah? What say? Why, no, I think not,' she said doubtfully, 'unless you may have heard Gilmer come in an' go up to his room.'

And Gant was again silent for several moments, breathing a little heavily and hoarsely, his hands resting with an enormous passive strength, upon the bed. Presently he said quietly:

'Where's Bacchus?'

'Hah? Who's that?' Eliza said sharply, in a startled kind of tone. 'Bacchus? You mean Uncle Bacchus?'

'Yes,' said Gant.

'Why, pshaw, Mr. Gant!' cried Eliza laughing—for a startled moment she had wondered if 'his mind was wanderin',' but one glance at his quiet eyes, the tranquil sanity of his quiet tone, reassured her—

'Pshaw!' she said, putting one finger up to her broad nose-wing and laughing slyly. 'You must have been havin' queer dreams, for a fact.'

'Is he here?'

'Why, I'll vow, Mr. Gant!' she cried again. 'What on earth is in your mind? You know that Uncle Bacchus is way out West in Oregon—it's been ten years since he came back home last—that summer of the reunion at Gettysburg’

‘Yes,’ said Gant ‘I remember now’

And again he fell silent, staring upward in the semi-darkness, his hands quietly at rest beside him, breathing a little hoarsely, but without pain Eliza sat in the chair watching him, her hands clasped loosely at her waist, her lips pursed reflectively, and a puzzled look in her eyes ‘Now I wonder what ever put that in his mind?’ she thought ‘I wonder what made him think of Bacchus Now his mind’s not wanderin’—that’s one thing sure He knows what he’s doing just as well as I do—I reckon he must have dreamed it—that Bacchus was here—but that’s certainly a strange thing, that he should bring it up like this’

He was so silent that she thought he might have gone to sleep again, he lay motionless with his eyes turned upward in the semi-darkness of the room, his hands immense and passive at his side But suddenly he startled her again by speaking, a voice so quiet and low that he might have been talking to himself

‘Father died the year before the war,’ he said, ‘when I was nine years old I never got to know him very well I guess Mother had a hard time of it There were seven of us—and nothing but that little place to live on—and some of us too young to help her much—and George away at war She spoke pretty hard to us sometimes—but I guess she had a hard time of it It was a tough time for all of us,’ he muttered, ‘I tell you what, it was’

‘Yes,’ Eliza said, ‘I guess it was I know she told me—I talked to her, you know, the time we went there on our honeymoon—whew! what about it?’ she shrieked faintly, and put her finger up to her broad nose-wing with the same sly gesture—‘it was all I could do to keep a straight face sometimes—why, you know, the way she had of talkin’—the expressions she used—oh! came right out with it, you know—sometimes I’d have to turn my head away so she wouldn’t see me laughin’—says, you know, “I was left a widow with seven children to bring up, but I never took charity from no one, as I told ’em all, I’ve crawled under the dog’s belly all my life, now I guess I can get over its back.”’

‘Yes,’ said Gant with a faint grin ‘Many’s the time I’ve heard her say that’

‘But she told it then, you know,’ Eliza went on in explanatory fashion, ‘about your father and how he’d done hard labor on a farm all his life and died—well, I reckon you’d call it consumption’

‘Yes,’ said Gant ‘That was it.’

‘And,’ Eliza said reflectively, ‘I never asked—of course, I didn’t want to embarrass her—but I reckon from what she said, he may have been—well, I suppose you might say he was a drinkin’ man.’

‘Yes,’ said Gant, ‘I guess he was.’

‘And I know she told it on him,’ said Eliza, laughing again, and passing one finger slyly at the corner of her broad nose-wing, ‘how he went to town that time—to Brant’s Mill, I guess it was—and how she was afraid he’d get to drinkin’, and she sent you and Wes along to watch him and to see he got home again—and how he met up with some fellers there and, sure enough, I guess he started drinkin’ and stayed away too long—and then, I reckon he was afraid of what she’d say to him when he got back—and that was when he bought the clock—it’s that very clock upon the mantel, Mr Gant—but that was when he got the clock, all right—I guess he thought it would pacify her when she started out to scold him for gettin’ drunk and bein’ late’

‘Yes,’ said Gant, who had listened without moving, staring at the ceiling, and with a faint grin printed at the corners of his mouth, ‘well do I remember that was it, all right’

‘And then,’ Eliza went on, ‘he lost the way comin’ home—it had been snowin’, and I reckon it was getting dark, and he had been drinkin’—and instead of turnin’ in on the road that went down by your place he kept goin’ on until he passed Jake Schaefer’s farm—an’ I guess Wes and you, poor chuld, kept follerin’ where he led, thinkin’ it was all right—and when he realized his mistake he said he was tired an’ had to rest a while and—I’ll vow! to think he’d go and do a thing like that,’ said Eliza, laughing again—‘he lay right down in the snow, sir, with the clock beside him—and went sound to sleep.’

‘Yes,’ said Gant, ‘and the clock was broken’

‘Yes,’ Eliza said, ‘she told me about that too—and how she heard you all come creepin' in real quiet an' easy-like about nine o'clock that night, when she and all the children were in bed—an' how she could hear him whisperin' to you and Wes to be quiet—an' how she heard you all come creepin' up the steps—and how he came tip-toein' in real easy-like an' laid the clock down on the bed—I reckon the glass had been broken out of it—hopin' she'd see it when she woke up in the mornin' an' wouldn't scold him then for stayin' out—'

'Yes,' said Gant, still with the faint attentive grin, 'and then the clock began to strike'

'Whew-w!' cried Eliza, putting her finger underneath her broad nose-wing—'I know she had to laugh about it when she told it to me—she said that all of you looked so sheepish when the clock began to strike that she didn't have the heart to scold him'

And Gant, grinning faintly again, emitted a faint rusty cackle that sounded like 'E'God!' and said 'Yes, that was it Poor fellow'

'But to think,' Eliza went on, 'that he would have no more sense than to do a thing like that—to lay right down there in the snow an' go to sleep with you two children watchin' him And I know how she told it, how she questioned you and Wes next day, and I reckon started in to scold you for not takin' better care of him, and how you told her, "Well, Mother, I thought that it would be all right I kept steppin' where he stepped, I thought he knew the way" And said she didn't have the heart to scold you after that—poor child, I reckon you were only eight or nine years old, and boy-like thought you'd follow in your father's footsteps and that everything would be all right'

'Yes,' said Gant, with the faint grin again, 'I kept stretchin' my legs to put my feet down in his tracks—it was all I could do to keep up with him . . . Ah, Lord,' he said, and in a moment said in a faint low voice, 'how well I can remember it. That was just the winter before he died.'

'And you've had that old clock ever since,' Eliza said 'That very clock upon the mantel, sir—at least, you've had it ever since I've known you, and I reckon you had it long before that—for I know you told me how you brought it South with you And that clock must be all of sixty or seventy years old—if it's a day'

'Yes,' said Gant, 'it's all of that'

And again he was silent, and lay so still and motionless that there was no sound in the room except his faint and labored breathing, the languid stir of the curtains in the cool night breeze, and the punctual tocking of the old wooden clock And presently, when she thought that he might have gone off to sleep again, he spoke, in the same remote and detached voice as before

'Eliza,'—he said—and at the sound of that unaccustomed word, a name he had spoken only twice in forty years—her white face and her worn brown eyes turned toward him with the quick and startled look of an animal—'Eliza,' he said quietly, 'you have had a hard life with me, a hard time I want to tell you that I'm sorry'

And before she could move from her white stillness of shocked surprise, he lifted his great right hand and put it gently down across her own And for a moment she sat there bolt upright, shaken, frozen, with a look of terror in her eyes, her heart drained of blood, a pale smile trembling uncertainly and foolishly on her lips Then she tried to withdraw her hand with a clumsy movement, she began to stammer with an air of ludicrous embarrassment, she bridled, saying—'Aw-w, now, Mr Gant Well, now, I reckon,'—and suddenly these few simple words of regret and affection did what all the violence, abuse, drunkenness and injury of forty years had failed to do She wrenched her hand free like a wounded creature, her face was suddenly contorted by that grotesque and pitiable grimace of sorrow that women have had in moments of grief since the beginning of time, and digging her fist into her closed eye quickly with the pathetic gesture of a child, she lowered her head and wept bitterly

'It was a hard time, Mr Gant,' she whispered, 'a hard time, sure enough. . . It wasn't all the cursin' and the drinkin'—I got used to that. . . I reckon I was only an ignorant sort of girl when I met you and I guess,' she went on with a pathetic and unconscious humor, 'I didn't know what married life was like . . . but I could have stood the rest of it . . . the bad names an' all the things you called me when I was goin' to have another child . . . but it was what you said when Grover died . . . accusin' me of bein' responsible for his death because I took the children to St. Louis to the Fair—' and at the words as if an old and lacerated wound had been re-opened raw and bleeding, she wept hoarsely, harshly, bitterly—'that was the worst time that I had—sometimes I prayed to God that I would not wake up—he was a fine boy, Mr. Gant, the best I had—like the write-up in the paper said he had the sense an' judgment of one twice his age . . . an' somehow it had grown a part of me, I expected him to lead the others—when he died it seemed like everything was gone . . . an' then to have you say that I had—' her voice faltered to a whisper, stopped with a pathetic gesture she wiped the sleeve of her old frayed sweater across her eyes and already ashamed of her tears, said hastily

'Not that I'm blamin' you, Mr. Gant . . . I reckon we were both at fault . . . we were both to blame . . . if I had it to do all over I know I could do better . . . but I was so young and ignorant when I met you, Mr. Gant . . . knew nothing of the world . . . there was always something strange-like about you that I didn't understand'

Then, as he said nothing, but lay still and passive, looking at the ceiling, she said quickly, drying her eyes and speaking with a brisk and instant cheerfulness, the undaunted optimism of her ever-hopeful nature

'Well, now, Mr. Gant, that's all over, and the best thing we can do is to forget about it. . . . We've both made our mistakes—we wouldn't be human if we didn't—but now we've got to profit by experience—the worst of all this trouble is all over—you've got to think of getting well now, that's the only thing you've got to do, sir,' she said pursing her lips and winking briskly at him—'just set your mind on getting well—that's all you've got to do now, Mr. Gant—and the battle is half won. For half our ills and troubles are all imagination,' she said sententiously, 'and if you'll just make up your mind now that you're going to get well—why, sir, you'll do it,' and she looked at him with a brisk nod. 'And we've both got years before us, Mr. Gant—for all we know, the best years of our life are still ahead of us—so we'll both go on and profit by the mistakes of the past and make the most of what time's left,' she said 'That's just exactly what we'll do'

And quietly, kindly, without moving, and with the impassive and limitless regret of a man who knows that there is no return, he answered

'Yes, Eliza That is what we'll do'

'And now,' she went on coaxingly, 'why don't you go on back to sleep now, Mr. Gant? There's nothin' like sleep to restore a man to health—as the feller says, it's Nature's sovereign remedy, worth all the doctors and all the medicine on earth,' she winked at him, and then concluded on a note of cheerful finality, 'so you go on and get some sleep now, and to-morrow you will feel like a new man'

And again he shook his head in an almost imperceptible gesture of negation

'No,' he said, 'not now. Can't sleep.'

He was silent again, and presently, his breath coming somewhat hoarse and labored, he cleared his throat, and put one hand up to his throat, as if to relieve himself of some impediment

Eliza looked at him with troubled eyes and said

'What's the matter, Mr. Gant? There's nothing hurtin' you?'

'No,' he said 'Just something in my throat. Could I have some water?'

'Why, yes, sir! That's the very thing!' She got up hastily, and looking about in a somewhat confused manner, saw behind her a pitcher of water and a glass upon his old walnut bureau, and saying 'Thus very minute, sir!' started across the room.

And at the same moment, Gant was aware that some one had entered the house, was coming towards him through the hall, would soon be with him. Turning his head towards the door he was conscious of something approaching with the speed of light, the instancy of thought, and at that moment he was filled with a sense of inexpressible joy, a feeling of triumph and security he had never known. Something immensely bright and beautiful was converging in a flare of light, and at that instant, the whole room blurred around him, his sight was fixed upon that focal image in the door, and suddenly the child was standing there and looking towards him.

And even as he started from his pillows, and tried to call his wife he felt something thick and heavy in his throat that would not let him speak. He tried to call to her again but no sound came, then something wet and warm began to flow out of his mouth and nostrils, he lifted his hands up to his throat, the warm wet blood came pouring out across his fingers, he saw it and felt joy.

For now the child—or some one in the house was speaking, calling to him, he heard great footsteps, soft but thunderous, imminent, yet immensely far, a voice well-known, never heard before. He called to it, and then it seemed to answer him, he called to it with faith and joy to give him rescue, strength, and life, and it answered him and told him that all the error, old age, pain and grief of life was nothing but an evil dream, that he who had been lost was found again, that his youth would be restored to him and that he would never die, and that he would find again the path he had not taken long ago in a dark wood.

And the child still smiled at him from the dark door, the great steps, soft and powerful, came ever closer, and as the instant imminent approach of that last meeting came intolerably near, he cried out through the lake of jetting blood, 'Here, Father, here!' and heard a strong voice answer him, 'My son!'

At that instant he was torn by a rending cough, something was wrenched loose in him, the death gasp rattled through his blood, and a mass of greenish matter foamed out through his lips. Then the world was blotted out, a blind black fog swam up and closed above his head, some one seized him, he was held, supported in two arms, he heard some one's voice saying in a low tone of terror and of pity, 'Mr Gant! Mr Gant! Oh, poor man, poor man! He's gone!' And his brain faded into night. Even before she lowered him back upon the pillows, she knew that he was dead.

Eliza's sharp scream brought three of her children—Daisy, Steve, and Luke, and the nurse, Bessie Gant, who was the wife of Gant's nephew Ollie—running from the kitchen. At the same moment Helen, who had taken an hour's sleep—her first in two days—in the little hall-bedroom off the porch, was awakened by her mother's cry, the sound of a screen-door slammed, and the sound of footsteps running past her window on the porch. Then, for several minutes she had no consciousness of what she did, and later she could not remember it. Her actions were those of a person driven by a desperate force, who acts from blind intuition, not from reason. Instantly, the moment that she heard her mother scream, the slam of the screen-door, and the running feet, she knew what had happened, and from that moment she knew only one frenzied desire, somehow to get to her father before he died.

The breath caught hoarse and sharp in her throat in a kind of nervous sob, it seemed that her heart had stopped beating and that her whole life-force was paralyzed, but she was out of her bed with a movement that left the old springs rattling, and she came across the back-porch with a kind of tornado-like speed that just came instantly from nowhere. In a moment she was standing in the open door with the sudden bolted look of a person who has been shot through the heart, staring at the silent group of people, and at the figure on the bed, with a dull strained stare of disbelief and horror.

All the time, although she was not conscious of it, her breath kept coming in a kind of hoarse short sob, her large big-boned face had an almost animal look of anguish and surprise, her mouth was partly open, her large chin hung down, and at this moment, as they turned towards her she began to moan, 'Oh-h, oh-h, oh-h, oh-h!' in the same unconscious way, like a person who has received a heavy blow in the pit of the stomach. Then her mouth gaped open, a hoarse and ugly cry was torn from her throat—a cry not of grief but loss—and she rushed forward like a mad woman. They tried to stop her, to restrain her, she flung them away as if they had been rag dolls and hurled herself down across the body on the bed, raving like a maniac.

'Oh, Papa, Papa . . . Why didn't they tell me? . . . Why didn't they let me know? . . . Why didn't they call me? . . . Oh, Papa, Papa, Papa! . . . dead, dead, dead . . . and they didn't tell me . . . they didn't let me know . . . they let you die . . . and I wasn't here! . . . I wasn't here!'—and she wept harshly, horribly, bitterly, rocking back and forth like a mad woman, with a dead man in her arms. She kept moaning, ' . . . They didn't tell me . . . they let you die without me . . . I wasn't here . . . I wasn't here . . . '

And even when they lifted her up from the bed, detached her arms from the body they had held in such a desperate hug, she still kept moaning in a demented manner, as if talking to the corpse, and oblivious of the presence of these living people.

'They never told me . . . they never told me . . . They let you die here all by yourself . . . and I wasn't here . . . I wasn't here . . . '

All of the women, except Bessie Gant, had now begun to weep hysterically, more from shock, exhaustion, and the nervous strain than from grief, and now Bessie Gant's voice could be heard speaking to them sharply, coldly, peremptorily, as she tried to bring back order and calmness to the distracted scene.

'Now, you get out of here—all of you! . . . There's nothing more any of you can do—I'll take care of all the rest of it! . . . Get out, now . . . I can't have you in the room while there's work to do . . . Helen, go on back to bed and get some sleep . . . You'll feel better in the morning.'

'They never told me! . . . They never told me,' she turned and stared stupidly at Bessie Gant with dull glazed eyes. 'Can't you do something? . . . Where's McGuire? Has any one called him yet?'

'No,' said the nurse sharply and angrily, 'and no one's going to. You're not going to get that man out of bed at this hour of the night when there's nothing to be done . . . Get out of here, now, all of you,' she began to push and herd them towards the door. 'I can't be bothered with you . . . Go somewhere—anywhere—get drunk—only don't come back in here.'

The whole house had come to life, in the excitement, shock, and exhaustion of their nerves the dead man still lying there in such a grotesque and twisted position, was forgotten. One of Eliza's lodgers, a man named Gilmer, who had been in the house for years, was awakened, went out, and got a gallon of corn whiskey, every one drank a great deal, became, in fact, somewhat intoxicated, when the undertakers came to take Gant away, none of the family was present. No one saw it. They were all in the kitchen seated around Eliza's battered old kitchen table, with the jug of whiskey on the table before them. They drank and talked together all night long until dawn came.

The morning of Gant's funeral the house was filled with people who had known him and the air was heavy with the sweet, cloying fragrance of the funeral flowers: the odors of lilies, roses, and carnations. His coffin was banked with flowers, but in the centre there was a curious and arresting plainness, a simple wreath of laurel leaves. Attached to the wreath was a small card on which these words were written. 'Hugh McGuire.'

And people passing by the coffin paused for a moment and stared at the name with a feeling of unspoken wonder in their hearts. Eliza stood looking at the wreath a moment with hands clasped across her waist, and then turned away, shaking her head rapidly, with a short convulsive pucker of her lips, as she spoke to Helen in a low voice.

'I tell you what—it's pretty strange when you come to think of it—it gives you a queer feeling—I tell you what, it does.'

And this expressed the emotion that every one felt when they saw the wreath. For Hugh McGuire had been found dead at his desk at six o'clock that morning, the news had just spread through the town, and now, when people saw the wreath upon Gant's coffin, there was something in their hearts they could not utter.

Gant lay in the splendid coffin, with his great hands folded quietly on his breast. Later, the boy could not forget his father's hands. They were the largest, most powerful, and somehow the most shapely hands he had ever seen. And even though his great right hand had been so crippled and stiffened by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism ten years before that he had never regained the full use of it, and since that time could only hold the great wooden mallet that the stonecutters use in a painful and clumsy half-clasp between the thumb and the big stiffened fingers, his hands had never lost their character of life, strength, and powerful shapeliness

The hands had given to the interminable protraction of his living death a kind of concrete horror that it otherwise would not have had. For as his powerful gaunt figure waned and wasted under the ravages of the cancer that was consuming him until he had become only the enfeebled shadow of his former self, his gaunt hands, on which there was so little which death could consume, lost none of their former rock-like heaviness, strength and shapely power. Thus, even when the giant figure of the man had become nothing but a spectral remnant of itself, sunk in a sorrow of time, awaiting death, those great, still-living hands of power and strength hung incredibly, horribly, from that spectral form of death to which they were attached

And for this reason those powerful hands of life evoked, as nothing else could have done, in an instant searing flash of memory and recognition the lost world of his father's life of manual power, hunger, fury, savage abundance and wild joy, the whole enchanted structure of that lost life of magic he had made for them. Constantly, those great hands of life joined, with an almost grotesque incongruity, to that scarecrow form of wasting death would awake for them, as nothing else on earth could do, all of the sorrowful ghosts of time, the dream-like spell and terror of the years between, the years of phantom death, the horror of unreality, strangeness, disbelief, and memory, that haunted them

So was it now, even in death, with his father's hands. In their powerful, gaunt and shapely clasp, as he lay dead in his coffin, there seemed to be held and gathered, somehow, all of his life that could never die—a living image of the essential quality of his whole life with its fury and unrest, desire and hunger, the tremendous sweep and relish of its enormous appetites and the huge endowment of its physical and sensual powers of a dead poet there might remain—how, where or in what way we could not tell, a kind of flame, a light, a glory,—the magic and still living chrysm of his genius. And on the face of the dead conqueror we might still see living, arrogant, and proud with all its dark authorities the frown of power, the inflexible tyranny of stern command, the special infinitude of the invincible will that would not die with life, and that incredibly remains, still dark and living in its scorn and mockery of time.

Thus, one could suppose that on the face

Then, on the face of an old dead prophet or philosopher there would live and would not die the immortality of proud, lonely thought. We could not say just where that spirit rested. Sometimes it would seem to rest upon the temples of the grand and lonely head. Sometimes we would think it was a kind of darkness in the shadows of the closed and sunken eyes, sometimes the marsh fire of a dark and lambent flame that hovered round the face, that could never be fixed, but that we always knew was there

And just as poet, prophet, priest and conqueror might each retain in death some living and fitting image of his whole life's truth, so would the strength, the skill, all of the hope, hunger, fury, and unrest that had lashed and driven on through life the gaunt figure of a stonecutter be marvelously preserved in the granite power and symmetry of those undying hands

Now the corpse was stretched out on the splendid satin cushions of the expensive coffin. It has been barbered, powdered, disembowelled, and pumped full of embalming fluid. And as it lay there with its waxen head set forward in its curious gaunt projectiveness, the pale lips firmly closed and with a little line of waxen mucous in the lips, the women came forward with their oily swollen faces, and a look of ravenous eagerness in their eyes, stared at it hard and long, lifted their sodden handkerchiefs slowly to their oily mouths, and were borne away, sobbing hysterically, by their equally oily, ravenous, sister orgiasts in sorrow.

Meanwhile his father's friends, the stonecutters, masons, building contractors, butchers, business men and male relatives were standing awkwardly about, dressed in their good, black clothes which they seemed not to wear so much as to inhabit with a kind of unrestful itchiness, lowering their eyes gravely and regretfully as the women put on their revolting show, talking together in low voices, and wondering when it would all be over.

These circumstances, together with the heavy unnatural languor of the funeral smells, the sweet-sick heaviness of the carnations, the funereal weepy blacks in which the women had arrayed themselves, the satiny sandalwood scent that came from the splendid coffin, and the fragrant faintly acrid odor of embalmed flesh, particularly when blended with the smell of cooking turnip greens, roast pork and apple sauce out in the kitchen, combined to create an atmosphere somewhat like a dinner party in a comfortably furnished morgue

In all this obscene pomp of burial there was something so grotesque, unnatural, disgusting, and remote from all he could remember of the dead man's life and personality that everything about him—even the physical horror of his bloody death—now seemed so far away he could hardly believe it ever happened. Therefore, he stared at this waxen and eviscerated relic in the coffin with a sense of weird disbelief, unable to relate it to the living man who had bled great lakes of blood the night before.

Yet, even in his death, his father's hands still seemed to live, and would not die. And this was the reason why the memory of those hands haunted him then and would haunt him forever after. This was the reason why, when he would try to remember how he looked when dead, he could remember nothing clearly except the powerful sculptured weight and symmetry of his tremendous hands as they lay folded on his body in the coffin. The great hands had a stony, sculptured and yet living strength and vitality, as if Michelangelo had carved them. They seemed to rest there upon the groomed, bereft and vacant horror of the corpse with a kind of terrible reality as if there really is, in death, some energy of life that will not die, some element of man's life that must persist and that resumes into a single feature of his life the core and essence of his character.

GENERAL AIMS AND THEORIES <sup>1</sup>

WHEN I started writing Faustus & Helen it was my intention to embody in modern terms (words, symbols, metaphors) a contemporary approximation to an ancient human culture or mythology that seems to have been obscured rather than illumined with the frequency of poetic allusions made to it during the last century. The name of Helen, for instance, has become an all-too-easily employed crutch for evocation whenever a poet felt a stitch in his side. The real evocation of this (to me) very real and absolute conception of beauty seemed to consist in a reconstruction in these modern terms of the basic emotional attitude toward beauty that the Greeks had. And in so doing I found that I was really building a bridge between so-called classic experience and many divergent realities of our seething, confused cosmos of today, which has no formulated mythology yet for classic poetic reference or for religious exploitation.

So I found 'Helen' sitting in a street car, the Dionysian revels of her court and her seduction were transferred to a Metropolitan roof garden with a jazz orchestra, and the katharsis of the fall of Troy I saw approximated in the recent World War. The importance of this scaffolding may easily be exaggerated, but it gave me a series of correspondences between two widely separated worlds on which to sound some major themes of human speculation—love, beauty, death, renascence. It was a kind of grafting process that I shall doubtless not be interested in repeating, but which is consistent with subsequent theories of mine on the relation of tradition to the contemporary creating imagination

It is a terrific problem that faces the poet today—a world that is so in transition from a decayed culture toward a reorganization of human evaluations that there are few common terms, general denominators of speech that are solid enough or that ring with any vibration or spiritual conviction. The great mythologies of the past (including the Church) are deprived of enough façade to even launch good railery against. Yet much of their traditions are operative still—in millions of chance combinations of related and unrelated detail, psychological reference, figures of speech, precepts, etc. These are all a part of our common experience and the terms, at least partially, of that very experience when it defines or extends itself

The deliberate program, then, of a 'break' with the past or tradition seems to me to be a sentimental fallacy. The poet has a right to draw on whatever practical resources he finds in books or otherwise about him. He must tax his sensibility and his touchstone of experience for the proper selections of these themes and details, however,—and that is where he either stands, or falls into useless archeology.

I put no particular value on the simple objective of 'modernity.' The element of the temporal location of an artist's creation is of very secondary importance, it can be left to the impressionist or historian just as well. It seems to me that a poet will accidentally define his time well enough simply by reacting honestly and to the full extent of his sensibilities to the states of passion, experience and rumination that fate forces on him, first hand. He must, of course, have a sufficiently universal basis of experience to make his imagination selective and valuable. His picture of the 'period,' then, will simply be a by-product of his curiosity and the relation of his experience to a postulated 'eternity.'

I am concerned with the future of America, but not because I think that America has any so-called par value as a state or as a group of people. It is only because I feel persuaded that here are destined to be discovered certain as yet undefined spiritual quantities, perhaps a new hierarchy of faith not to be developed so completely elsewhere. And in this process I like to feel myself as a potential factor; certainly I must speak in its terms and what discoveries I may make are situated in its experience.

But to fool one's self that definitions are being reached by merely referring frequently to skyscrapers, radio antennæ, steam whistles, or other surface phenomena of our time is merely to paint a photograph. I think that what is interesting and significant will emerge only under the conditions of our submission to, and examination and assimilation of the organic effects on us of these and other fundamental factors of our experience. It can certainly not be an organic expression otherwise. And the expression of such values may often be as well accomplished with the vocabulary and blank verse of the Elizabethans as with the calligraphic tricks and slang used so brilliantly at times by an impressionist like Cummings.

It may not be possible to say that there is, strictly speaking, any 'absolute' experience. But it seems evident that certain æsthetic experience (and this may for a time engross the total faculties of the spectator) can be called absolute, inasmuch as it approximates a formally convincing statement of a conception or apprehension of life that gains our unquestioning assent, and under the conditions of which our imagination is unable to suggest a further detail consistent with the design of the æsthetic whole.

I have been called an 'absolutist' in poetry, and if I am to welcome such a label it should be under the terms of the above definition. It is really only a modus operandi, however, and as such has been used organically before by at least a dozen poets such as Donne, Blake, Baudelaire, Rimbaud, etc. I may succeed in defining it better by contrasting it with the impressionistic method. The impressionist is interesting as far as he goes—but his goal has been reached when he has succeeded in projecting certain selected factual details into his reader's consciousness. He is really not interested in the causes (metaphysical) of his materials, their emotional derivations or their utmost spiritual consequences. A kind of retinal registration is enough, along with a certain psychological stimulation. And this is also true of your realist (of the Zola type), and to a certain extent of the classicist, like Horace, Ovid, Pope, etc.

Blake meant these differences when he wrote

We are led to believe in a lie
When we see with not through the eye

The impressionist creates only with the eye and for the readiest surface of the consciousness, at least relatively so. If the effect has been harmonious or even stimulating, he can stop there, relinquishing entirely to his audience the problematic synthesis of the details into terms of their own personal consciousness.

It is my hope to go through the combined materials of the poem, using our 'real' world somewhat as a spring-board, and to give the poem as a whole an orbit or predetermined direction of its own. I would like to establish it as free from my own personality as from any chance evaluation on the reader's part (This is, of course, an impossibility, but it is a characteristic worth mentioning.) Such a poem is at least a stab at a truth, and to such an extent may be differentiated from other kinds of poetry and called 'absolute.' Its evocation will not be toward decoration or amusement, but rather toward a state of consciousness, an 'innocence' (Blake) or absolute beauty. In this condition there may be discoverable under new forms certain spiritual illuminations, shining with a morality essentialized from experience directly, and not from previous precepts or preconceptions. It is as though a poem gave the reader as he left it a single, new word, never before spoken and impossible to actually enunciate, but self-evident as an active principle in the reader's consciousness henceforward.

As to technical considerations: the motivation of the poem must be derived from the implicit emotional dynamics of the materials used, and the terms of expression employed are often selected less for their logical (literal) significance than for their associational meanings. Via this and their metaphorical inter-relationships, the entire construction of the poem is raised on the organic principle of a 'logic of metaphor,' which antedates our so-called pure logic, and which is the genetic basis of all speech, hence consciousness and thought-extension.

These dynamics often result, I'm told, in certain initial difficulties in understanding my poems. But on the other hand I find them at times the only means possible for expressing certain concepts in any forceful or direct way whatever. To cite two examples—when, in Voyages (II), I speak of 'adagios of islands,' the reference is to the motion of a boat through islands clustered thickly, the rhythm of the motion, etc. And it seems a much more direct and creative statement than any more logical employment of words such as 'coasting slowly through the islands,' besides ushering in a whole world of music. Similarly in Faustus and Helen (III) the speed and tense altitude of an aeroplane are much better suggested by the idea of 'nimble blue plateaus'—implying the aeroplane and its speed against a contrast of stationary elevated earth. Although the statement is pseudo in relation to formal logic—it is completely logical in relation to the truth of the imagination, and there is expressed a concept of speed and space that could not be handled so well in other terms.

In manipulating the more imponderable phenomena of psychic motives, pure emotional crystallizations, etc., I have had to rely even more on these dynamics of inferential mention, and I am doubtless still very unconscious of having committed myself to what seems nothing but obscurities to some minds. A poem like Possessions really cannot be technically explained. It must rely (even to a large extent with myself) on its organic impact on the imagination to successfully imply its meaning. This seems to me to present an exceptionally difficult problem, however, considering the real clarity and consistent logic of many of the other poems.

I know that I run the risk of much criticism by defending such theories as I have, but as it is part of a poet's business to risk not only criticism—but folly—in the conquest of consciousness I can only say that I attach no intrinsic value to what means I use beyond their practical service in giving form to the living stuff of the imagination.

New conditions of life germinate new forms of spiritual articulation And while I feel that my work includes a more consistent extension of traditional literary elements than many contemporary poets are capable of appraising, I realize that I am utilizing the gifts of the past as instruments principally, and that the voice of the present, if it is to be known, must be caught at the risk of speaking in idioms and circumlocutions sometimes shocking to the scholar and historians of logic. Language has built towers and bridges, but itself is inevitably as fluid as always.

FOR THE MARRIAGE OF FAUSTUS AND HELEN<sup>1</sup>

*'And so we may arrive by Talmud skill

 Smutty wings flash out equivocations

<sup>1</sup> Horton says of this poem "Arranged in three parts, which he conceived as spanning a rising scale from the "quotidian" to the universal, this work was his first attempt to deal with the major problems of poetry. That parts as he described them were colorless abstractions: first, "Meditation, Evocation, Love, Beauty", second, "Dance, Humor, Satisfaction", and third, "Tragedy, War (the eternal soldier), Résume, Ecstasy, Final Declaration." But the symbolism he chose provided a concrete, even a dramatic, framework. Once it is known that Helen is "the symbol of this abstract 'sense of beauty'—Faustus the symbol of myself, the poetic or imaginative man of all time," the action of the poem and its philosophical implications become perfectly apparent. Crane imagined the poem as a kind of prothalamion celebrating his pursuit and capture of the Platonic idea of beauty, and at the same time defining his relation not only to his art, but also to the world of tradition in which beauty had sometimes lived as a vital principle." Horton, Hart Crane (N.Y., 1937), 119-20.

 To druggist, barber and tobacconist,
 Until the graduate opacities of evening
 Take them away as suddenly to somewhere
 Virginal perhaps, less fragmentary, cool.

There is the world dimensional for those untwisted by the love of things irreconcilable

And yet, suppose some evening I forgot
 The fare and transfer, yet go by that way
 Without recall,—lost yet poised in traffic.
 Then I might find your eyes across an aisle,

Still flickering with those prefigurations—
 Prodigal, yet uncontested now,
 Half-riant before the jerky window frame

There is some way, I think, to touch
 Those hands of yours that count the nights Suppled with pink and green advertisements

And now, before its arteries turn dark,
 I would have you meet this bartered blood
 Imminent in his dream, none better knows
 The white wafer cheek of love, or offers
 words

Lightly as moonlight on the eaves meets snow

Reflective conversion of all things
 At your deep blush, when ecstasies thread
 The limbs and belly, when rainbows spread Impinging on the throat and sides
 Inevitable, the body of the world
 Weeps in inventive dust for the hiatus
 That winks above it, bluet in your breasts.

The earth may glide diaphanous to death,
 But if I lift my arms it is to bend
 To you who turned away once, Helen,
 knowing

The press of troubled hands, too alternate
 With steel and soil to hold you endlessly
 I meet you, therefore, in that eventual flame

You found in final chains, no captive then—Beyond their million brittle, bloodshot
 eyes,

White, through white cities passed on to assume

That world which comes to each of us alone.

Accept a lone eye riveted to your plane,
Bent axle of devotion along companion
ways 49
That beat, continuous, to hourless days—
One inconspicuous, glowing orb of praise.

II

Brazen hypnotics glitter here,
Glee shifts from foot to foot,
Magnetic to their tremolo
This crashing opéra bouffe,
Blest excursion! this ricochet
From roof to roof—
Know, Olympians, we are breathless
While nigger cupids scour the stars!

A thousand light shrugs balance us 60
Through snarling hails of melody
White shadows slip across the floor
Splayed like cards from a loose hand;
Rhythmic ellipses lead into canters
Until somewhere a rooster banter

Greet naively—yet intrepidly
New soothing, new amazements
That corners introduce at every turn—
And you may fall downstairs with me 70
With perfect grace and equanimity
Or, plaintively scud past shores
Where, by strange harmonic laws
All relatives, serene and cool,
Sit rocked in patent armchairs

O, I have known metallic paradises
Where cuckoos clucked to finches
Above the deft catastrophes of drums
While titters hailed the groans of death
Beneath gyrating awnings I have seen
The incunabula of the divine grotesque 80
This music has a reassuring way

The siren of the springs of guilty song—
Let us take her on the incandescent wax Striated with nuances, nervosities
That we are heir to she is still so young,
We cannot frown upon her as she smiles,
Dipping here in this cultivated storm
Among slim skaters of the gardened skies.

Capped arbiter of beauty in this street
That narrows darkly into motor dawn,— 90

You, here beside me, delicate ambassador
Of intricate slain numbers that arise
In whispers, naked of steel, religious gunman!
Who faithfully, yourself, will fall too soon,
And in other ways than as the wind settles
On the sixteen thrifty bridges of the city.
Let us unbind our throats of fear and pity.

We even, 100
Who drove speediest destruction
In corymbulous formations of mechanics,—
Who hurried the hill breezes, spouting
malice
Plangent over meadows, and looked down
On rifts of torn and empty houses
Like old women with teeth unjubilant
That waited faintly, briefly and in vain.

We know, eternal gunman, our flesh remembers
The tensile boughs, the numble blue plateaus,
The mounted, yielding cities of the air!
That saddled sky that shook down vertical Repeated play of fire—no hypogeum 111
Of wave or rock was good against one hour.

We did not ask for that, but have survived,
And will persist to speak again before
All stubble streets that have not curved To memory, or known the ominous lifted arm
That lowers down the arc of Helen's brow
To saturate with blessing and dismay

A goose, tobacco and cologne—Three-winged and gold-shod prophecies of heaven, 120
The lavish heart shall always have to leaven
And spread with bells and voices, and atone
The abating shadows of our conscript dust.

Anchises' navel, dripping of the sea,—
The hands Erasmus dipped in gleaming tides,
Gathered the voltage of blown blood and vine,
Delve upward for the new and scattered
wine,
O brother-thief of time, that we recall.
Laugh out the meager penance of their days
Who dare not share with us the breath released, 130

The substance drilled and spent beyond repair
For golden, or the shadow of gold hair.

Distinctly praise the years, whose volatile Blamed bleeding hands extend and thresh the height

The imagination spans beyond despair,
Outpacing bargain, vocable and prayer.

Still, having in mind gold hair,
I cannot see that broken brow
And miss the dry sound of bees
Stretching across a lucid space.

Scatter these well-meant idioms
Into the smoky spring that fills
The suburbs, where they will be lost.
They are no trophies of the sun.

BLACK TAMBOURINE

THE interests of a black man in a cellar
Mark tardy judgment on the world's closed
door

Gnats toss in the shadow of a bottle,
And a roach spans a crevice in the floor

Æsop, driven to pondering, found Heaven with the tortoise and the hare,
Fox brush and sow ear top his grave
And mingling incantations on the air

The black man, forlorn in the cellar, Wanders in some mid-kingdom, dark, that lies, 10

Between his tambourine, stuck on the wall,

And, in Africa, a carcass quick with flies.

PRAISE FOR AN URN

IN MEMORIAM ERNEST NELSON

IT was a kind and northern face
That mingled in such exile guise
The everlasting eyes of Pierrot
And, of Gargantua, the laughter

His thoughts, delivered to me
From the white coverlet and pillow,
I see now, were inheritances—
Delicate riders of the storm

The slant moon on the slanting hull
Once moved us toward presentiments 10
Of what the dead keep, living still,
And such assessments of the soul

As, perched in the crematory lobby,
The insistent clock commented on,
Touching as well upon our praise
Of glories proper to the time

FROM VOYAGES

2

AND yet this great wink of eternity,
Of rimless floods, unfettered leewardings, Samite sheeted and processioned where Her undinal vast belly moonward bends, Laughing the wrapt inflections of our
love,

Take this Sea, whose diapason knells
On scrolls of silver snowy sentences,
The sceptred terror of whose sessions rends

As her demeanors motion well or ill,
All but the pieties of lovers' hands. 10

And onward, as bells off San Salvador
Salute the crocus lustres of the stars,
In these poinsettia meadows of her tides,—

Adagios of islands, O my Prodigal, Complete the dark confessions her veins
spell

Mark how her turning shoulders wind the hours,

And hasten while her penniless rich palms

Pass superscription of bent foam and wave,—

Hasten, while they are true,—sleep, death,
desire,

Close round one instant in one floating flower. 20

Bind us in time, O Seasons clear, and awe.

O minstrel galleons of Carib fire, Bequeath us to no earthly shore until
Is answered in the vortex of our grave
The seal's wide spindrift gaze toward paradise.

FROM THE BRIDGE

PROEM

TO BROOKLYN BRIDGE<sup>1</sup>

How many dawns, chill from his rippling
rest
The seagull's wings shall dip and pivot him,
Shedding white rings of tumult, building
high
Over the chained bay waters Liberty—

Then, with inviolate curve, forsake our eyes
As apparitional as sails that cross
Some page of figures to be filed away,
—Till elevators drop us from our day . . .

I think of cinemas, panoramic sleights
With multitudes bent toward some flashing
scene 10
Never disclosed, but hastened to again,
Foretold to other eyes on the same screen,

And Thee, across the harbor, silver-paced
As though the sun took step of thee, yet left
Some motion ever unspent in thy stride,— Implicitly thy freedom staying thee!

Out of some subway scuttle, cell or loft
A bedlamite speeds to thy parapets, Tilting there momentarily, shrill shirt ballooning,
A jest falls from the speechless caravan 20

Down Wall, from girder into street noon leaks,
A rip-tooth of the sky's acetylene,
All afternoon the cloud-flown derricks
turn
Thy cables breathe the North Atlantic still.

And obscure as that heaven of the Jews, Thy guerdon . . . Accolade thou dost bestow
Of anonymity time cannot raise Vibrant reprieve and pardon thou dost show.

<sup>1</sup> Crane wrote, 18 Feb. 1923, to a friend "Very roughly, it [The Bridge] concerns a mystical synthesis of America. History and fact, location etc. all have to be transfigured into abstract form that would almost function independently of its subject matter. The initial impulses of our people will have to be gathered up toward the climax of the bridge, symbol of our constructive future, our unique identity, in which is also included our scientific hopes and achievements of the future" Ibid., 142

O harp and altar, of the fury fused, (How could mere toil align thy choiring strings!) 30
Terrific threshold of the prophet's pledge,
Prayer of pariah, and the lover's cry,—

Again the traffic lights that skim thy swift Unfractioned idiom, immaculate sigh of stars,
Beading thy path—condense eternity:
And we have seen night lifted in thine arms

Under thy shadow by the piers I waited;
Only in darkness is thy shadow clear.
The City's fiery parcels all undone,
Already snow submerges an iron year . . .

O Sleepless as the river under thee, 41
Vaulting the sea, the prairies' dreaming sod,
Unto us lowliest sometime sweep, descend
And of the curviship lend a myth to God

THE DANCE<sup>2</sup>

THE swift red flesh, a winter king—
Who squared the glacier woman down the sky?
She ran the neighing canyons all the spring;
She spouted arms, she rose with maize—to
die

And in the autumn drouth, whose burnished hands

<sup>2</sup> "The Dance" is from Part II "Powhatan's Daughter" Crane wrote, 12 Sept. 1927, of it to Otto Kahn. "Powhatan's daughter, or Pocahontas, is the mythological nature-symbol chosen to represent the physical body of the continent, or the soil. The five subsections of Part II are mainly concerned with a gradual exploration of this "body" whose first possessor was the Indian. [Section] 4 "The Dance" Here one is on the pure mythical and smoky soil at last! Not only do I describe the conflict between the two races in this dance—I also become identified with the Indian and his world before it is over, which is the only method possible of ever really possessing the Indian and his world as a cultural factor. I think I really succeed in getting under the skin of this glorious and dying animal, in terms of expression, in symbols, which he, himself, would comprehend Pocahontas (the continent) is the common basis of our meeting, she survives the extinction of the Indian, who finally, after being assumed into the elements of nature (as he understood them) persists only as a kind of "eye" in the sky, or as a star that hangs between day and night—"the twilight's dim perpetual throne" Ibid., 335-38

With mineral wariness found out the stone Where prayers, forgotten, streamed the mesa sands?

He holds the twilight's dim, perpetual throne

Mythical brows we saw retiring—loth, 9
Disturbed and destined, into denser green.
Greeting they sped us, on the arrow's oath.
Now lie incorrigibly what years between

There was a bed of leaves, and broken play;
There was a veil upon you, Pocahontas,
bride—
O princess whose brown lap was virgin
May,
And bridal flanks and eyes hid tawny pride.

I left the village for dogwood By the canoe Tugging below the mill-race, I could see Your hair's keen crescent running, and the blue 19
First moth of evening take wing stealthily

What laughing chains the water wove and threw!
I learned to catch the trout's moon whisper, I Drifted how many hours I never knew,
But, watching, saw that fleet young crescent
die,—

And one star, swinging, take its place,
alone,
Cupped in the larches of the mountain
pass—
Until, immortally, it bled into the dawn.
I left my sleek boat nibbling margin
grass . .

I took the portage climb, then chose 30
A further valley-shed, I could not stop
Feet nozzled wat'ry webs of upper flows,
One white veil gusted from the very top

O Appalachian Spring! I gained the ledge, Steep, inaccessible smile that eastward bends
And northward reaches in that violet wedge
Of Adirondacks!—wisped of azure wands,

Over how many bluffs, tarns, streams I sped!

—And knew myself within some boding
shade—

Grey tepees tufting the blue knolls ahead, Smoke swirling through the yellow chestnut glade . . 40

A distant cloud, a thunder-bud—it grew,
That blanket of the skies the padded foot Within,—I heard it, 'til its rhythm drew, —Siphoned the black pool from the heart's hot root!

A cyclone threshes in the turbine crest, Swooping in eagle feathers down your back,
Know, Maquokeeta, greeting, know death's
best,
—Fall, Sachem, strictly as the tamarack!

A birch kneels All her whistling fingers fly
The oak grove circles in a crash of leaves, 50
The long moan of a dance is in the sky Dance, Maquokeeta! Pocahontas grieves . .

And every tendon scurries toward the twangs
Of lightning deltaed down your saber hair,
Now snaps the flint in every tooth, red fangs
And splay tongues thinly busy the blue
air

Dance, Maquokeeta! snake that lives
before,
That casts his pelt, and lives beyond!
Sprout, horn!
Spark, tooth! Medicine-man, relent, restore— 59
Lie to us,—dance us back the tribal morn!

Spears and assemblies black drums thrusting on—
O yelling battlements,—I, too, was liege
To rainbows currying each pulsant bone Surpassed the circumstance, danced out the siege!

And buzzard-circleted, screamed from the stake,
I could not pick the arrows from my side
Wrapped in that fire, I saw more escorts
wake—Flickering, sprint up the hill groins like a tide

I heard the hush of lava wrestling your arms, 69
And stag teeth foam about the raven throat, Flame cataracts of heaven in seething swarms
Fed down your anklets to the sunset's moat

O, like the lizard in the furious noon,
That drops his legs and colors in the sun,
—And laughs, pure serpent, Time itself, and moon
Of his own fate, I saw thy change begun!

And saw thee dive to kiss that destiny Like one white meteor, sacrosanct and blent
At last with all that's consummate and free
There, where the first and last gods keep thy tent 80

Thewed of the levin, thunder-shod and
lean,
Lo, through what infinite seasons dost thou gaze—
Across what bivouacs of thin angered slain,
And see'st thy bride immortal in the maize!

Totem and fire-gall, slumbering pyramid—
Though other calendars now stack the sky, Thy freedom is her largesse, Prince, and hid
On paths thou knewest best to claim her by

High unto Labrador the sun strikes free
Her speechless dream of snow, and sturred
again, 90
She is the torrent and the singing tree,
And she is virgin to the last of men .

West, west and south! winds over Cumberland
And winds across the llano grass resume Her hair's warm sibilance Her breasts are fanned
O stream by slope and vineyard—into bloom!

And when the caribou slant down for salt
Do arrows thirst and leap? Do antlers shine Alert, star-triggered in the listening vault Of dusk?—And are her perfect brows to thine? 100

We danced, O Brave, we danced beyond their farms,
In cobalt desert closures made our vows . . .
Now is the strong prayer folded in thine
arms,
The serpent with the eagle in the boughs 1926 1930

CUTTY SARK<sup>1</sup>

*O, the navies old and oaken,
O, the Temeraire no more!*
—MELVILLE

I met a man in South Street, tall—a nervous shark tooth swung on his chain
His eyes pressed through green grass —green glasses, or bar lights made them so—shine—
GREEN—
eyes—
stepped out—forgot to look at you or left you several blocks away— 10

in the nuckel-in-the-slot piano jogged
'Stamboul Nights'—weaving somebody's nickel—sang—

O Stamboul Rose—dreams weave the rose!

Murmurs of Leviathan he spoke, and rum was Plato in our heads .

<sup>1</sup> In the same letter to Kahn, Crane wrote "Cutty Sark" is a phantasy on the period of the whalers and clipper ships. It also starts in the present and "progresses backwards." The form of the poem may seem erratic, but is meant to present the hallucinations incident to rum-drinking in a South Street dive, as well as reminiscent lurchings of a boat in heavy seas, etc. So I allow myself something of the same freedom of punctuation which E. E. Cummings employs.

"Cutty Sark" is arranged on the plan of a fugue. Two voices—that of the world of Time, and that of the World of Eternity—are interwoven in the action. The Atlantis theme (Eternity, or the Absolute) is the transmuted voice of the nuckel-in-the-slot piano, and this voice alternates with that of the derelict sailor and the description of the action. It is into this Absolute that the finale to the whole poem (Atlantis) projects at the close of the book.

"The calligramme of ships, seen as a phantom regatta from Brooklyn Bridge on the way 'home' is simply a lyrical apostrophe to a world of loveliness forever vanished." Ibid., 339

'It's S S Ala—Antwerp—now remember
 kid
 to put me out at three she sails on time.
 I'm not much good at time any more keep weakeyed watches sometimes snooze—' his bony hands 19
 got to beating time . 'A whaler
 once—
 I ought to keep time and get over it—I'm a Democrat—I know what time it is—No
 I don't want to know what time it is—that damned white Arctic killed my time . '

O Stamboul Rose—drums weave—

'I ran a donkey engine down there on the Canal
 in Panama—got tired of that—then Yucatan selling kitchenware—beads—
 have you seen Popocatepetl—birdless mouth with ashes sifting down—? 30 and then the coast again ,

Rose of Stamboul O coral Queen—teased remnants of the skeletons of cities—and galleries, galleries of waterguttled lava snarling stone—green—drums—drown Sing!

'—that spiracle!' he shot a finger out the
 door
 'O life's a geyser—beautiful—my lungs—
 No—I can't live on land—!'

I saw the frontiers gleaming of his mind, 40 or are there frontiers—running sands sometimes running sands—somewhere—sands running
 Or they may start some white machine that sings.
 Then you may laugh and dance the axletree—steel—silver—kick the traces—and know—

*ATLANTIS ROSE drums wreath the rose,
 the star floats burning in a gulf of tears and sleep another thousand—* interminably long since somebody's nickel—stopped—

 playing— 51

A wind worried those wicker-neat lapels, the swinging summer entrances to cooler hells
 Outside a wharf truck nearly ran him down
 —he lunged up Bowery way while the dawn was putting the Statue of Liberty out—that torch of hers you know—

I started walking home across the Bridge . . .

Blithe Yankee vanities, turreted sprites, 59 winged British repartees, skilful savage sea-girls that bloomed in the spring—Heave, weave those bright designs the trade winds drive

*Sweet opium and tea, Yo-ho!
 Pennies for porpoises that bank the keel!
 Fins whip the breeze around Japan!*

Bright skysails ticketing the line, wink round the Horn to Frisco, Melbourne . . .
 Pennants, parabolas—clipper dreams indelible and ranging, 70 baronial white on lucky blue!
 Perennial-Cutty-trophied-Sark!

Thermopylae, Black Prince, Flying Cloud
 through Sunda
 —scarfed of foam, their bellies veered
 green esplanades, locked in wind-humors, ran their eastings
 down,

at Java Head freshened the mp (sweet opium and tea!)
 and turned and left us on the lee .

Buntlines tusseling (91 days, 20 hours and anchored!) 79
Rainbow, Leander
 (last trip a tragedy)—where can you be Nimbus? and you rivals two—a long tack keeping—

Taeping?
Ariel?

THE TUNNEL<sup>1</sup>

To Find the Western path Right thro' the Gates of Wrath.

—BLAKE

PERFORMANCES, assortments, résumés—Up Times Square to Columbus Circle
lights

Channel the congresses, nightly sessions, Refractions of the thousand theatres,
faces—

Mysterious kitchens      You shall search them all

Some day by heart you'll learn each famous sight

And watch the curtain lift in hell's despite;
You'll find the garden in the third act dead,
Finger your knees—and wish yourself in bed
With tabloid crime-sheets perched in easy
sight      10

Then let you reach your hat
and go
As usual, let you—also walking down—exclaim to twelve upward leaving a subscription praise for what time slays

Or can't you quite make up your mind to ride,

A walk is better underneath the L a brisk Ten blocks or so before? But you find yourself      20

Preparing penguin flexions of the arms,—
As usual you will meet the scuttle yawn
The subway yawns the quickest promise
home

Be minimum, then, to swim the hiving
swarms

Out of the Square, the Circle burning bright—

Avoid the glass doors gyring at your right, Where boxed alone a second, eyes take fright

—Quite unprepared rush naked back to light

And down beside the turnstile press the coin
Into the slot. The gongs already rattle.      30

And so of cities you bespeak subways, rivered under streets and rivers. . . . In the car the overtone of motion underground, the monotone of motion is the sound of other faces, also underground—

'Let's have a pencil Jimmy—living now at Floral Park      40 Flatbush—on the fourth of July—like a pigeon's muddy dream—potatoes to dig in the field—travel in the town—too—night after night—the Culver line—the girls all shaping up—it used to be—'

Our tongues recant like beaten weather vanes
This answer lives like verdigris, like hair
Beyond extinction, surcease of the bone,
And repetition freezes—'What

'what do you want? getting weak on the links?      50
fandaddle daddy don't ask for change—IS

THIS FOURTEENTH? it's half past six she said—if you don't like my gate why did you swing on it, why didja swing on it anyhow—'

And somehow anyhow swing—

The phonographs of hades in the brain Are tunnels that re-wind themselves, and love

A burnt match skating in a urinal—      60
Somewhere above Fourteenth TAKE

THE EXPRESS

To brush some new presentment of pain—

'But I want service in this office SERVICE
I said—after the show she cried a little afterwards but—'

Whose head is swinging from the swollen strap?
Whose body smokes along the bitten rails,

<sup>1</sup> In an earlier letter to Kahn, 18 March 1926, Crane spoke of 'The Tunnel' as 'the encroachment of machinery on humanity, a kind of purgatory in relation to the open sky of the last section' Hound and Horn, VII, iv, 678

Bursts from a smouldering bundle far behind
 In back forks of the chasms of the brain,—
 Puffs from a riven stump far out behind 70
 In interborough fissures of the mind ?

And why do I often meet your visage here,
 Your eyes like agate lanterns—on and on Below the toothpaste and the dandruff ads?
 —And did their riding eyes right through your side,
 And did their eyes like unwashed platters
 ride?
 And Death, aloft—gigantically down Probing through you—toward me, O
 Evermore!
 And when they dragged your retching
 flesh,
 Your trembling hands that night through Baltimore— 80
 That last night on the ballot rounds, did
 you
 Shaking, did you deny the ticket, Poe?

For Gravesend Manor change at Chambers
 Street
 The platform hurries along to a dead stop

The intent escalator lifts a serenade Stilly
 Of shoes, umbrellas, each eye attending its shoe, then Bolting outright somewhere above where streets
 Burst suddenly in rain . . . The gongs recur
 Elbows and levers, guard and hissing door
 Thunder is galvothemic here below
 The car 91
 Wheels off The train rounds, bending to a scream,
 Taking the final level for the dive
 Under the river—
 And somewhat emptier than before,
 Demented, for a hutching second, humps;
 then
 Lets go . . . Toward corners of the floor Newspapers wing, revolve and wing Blank windows gargle signals through the roar
 And does the Dæmon take you home, also,
 Wop washerwoman, with the bandaged
 hair? 101

After the corridors are swept, the cuspidors—
 The gaunt sky-barracks cleanly now, and bare,
 O Genoese, do you bring mother eyes and hands
 Back home to children and to golden hair?

Dæmon, demurring and eventful yawn!
 Whose hideous laughter is a bellows
 mirth
 —Or the muffled slaughter of a day in birth—
 O cruelly to inoculate the brinking dawn
 With antennæ toward worlds that glow and sink,— 110
 To spoon us out more liquid than the dim
 Locution of the eldest star, and pack
 The conscience navelled in the plunging
 wind,
 Umbilical to call—and straightway die!

O caught like pennues beneath soot and steam,
 Kiss of our agony thou gatherest,
 Condensed, thou takest all—shrill ganglia Impassioned with some song we fail to keep
 And yet, like Lazarus, to feel the slope,
 The sod and billow breaking,—lifting
 ground, 120
 —A sound of waters bending astride the sky Unceasing with some Word that will not die . . .

A tugboat, wheezing wreaths of steam, Lunged past, with one galvanic blare stove up the River
 I counted the echoes assembling, one after
 one,
 Searching, thumbing the midnight on the piers Lights, coasting, left the oily tympanum of waters,
 The blackness somewhere gouged glass on a sky
 And thus thy harbor, O my City, I have driven under,
 Tossed from the coil of tucking towers . . .
 Tomorrow, 130
 And to be . . . Here by the River that is East—
 Here at the waters' edge the hands drop memory,

Shadowless in that abyss they unaccounting
lie
How far away the star has pooled the sea—
Or shall the hands be drawn away, to die?

Kiss of our agony Thou gatherest,
O Hand of Fire
gatherest—

A NOTE ON POETRY

THE language of modern poetry is best explained by Wallace Stevens in his introduction to William Carlos Williams's Collected Poems. I cannot presume to say more than he has said in that significant essay. But there is perhaps something to be said about my technic of recreating images, for it is often closely related to the physical environment in which I live. The motion picture has deeply influenced our visual consciousness, quite as a speech heard over the radio enters our conception of the spoken word. And certain other means of mechanical invention, as well as the sciences of physical-chemistry, have greatly altered our conceptions of time and space. In so far as these actually enter our lives and become part of human consciousness, they become important and from them 'new' sensations are aroused, so much so, that it may be said that we see and feel things in a 'new' perspective. Some few of my poems reveal the direct influence of montage, particularly, 'New York, Cassandra' in which images are superimposed one upon the other in rapid succession, in the order of their emotional intensity. This poem must not be read as one might read a narrative, nor should the Emerson section of Chorus For Survival, nor 'It is Later Than You Think.' In these poems the visual technic owes a debt to the consciousness of living in a world in which human emotions are deeply affected by 'new' sensations. It is my hope always to convey precise emotion which is the function of poetry, no matter where or when it happens to be written.

NEW YORK, CASSANDRA

CASSANDRA, the world's on fire, the harvest's sour from Salem into China, an old sailor's song sung to the yellow sea that pours oceans of grain over us, fire and flood,
it will be hard to sleep.

Macbeth has murder'd sleep, sleep festering under his eyelids, Cassandra, like an old wound split wide.
Macbeth shall sleep no more—good night, Macbeth—wake well tonight.

spring (naked mind)
arms, sheets, window curtains pushed aside to see the fire, hear the guns.

10

Breakfast will be delayed beyond Canopus, lunch clean, untouched by human hands, embalmed in cellophane,
revolving in an automat, will wait . . .

Somebody said that Macbeth went insane, leaped thirty stories down to Birnam wood (inane, O Dunsinane, your palaces are empty)

The king bled through the sheets (cock crow) Macbeth grew sick, cracked the eternal verities engraved upon his heart in rock 20

Pick me sweet verities,
sweet verities,
where shall we find again such girls as these?
Nightingale Venus, bright Beatrice shall sing tonight, silverlipped requiem Mary shall answer them, clothed in the blood of Christ down to her knees Pick me sweet verities,
sweet verities

30

They stand, a row of broken statues from Alexandria (B.C.)
to Salt Lake City

II

Give Cerberus a non-employment wage, the dog is hungry
This head served in the war, Cassandra, it lost an eye, that head spits fire, for it lost its tongue licking the paws of lions caged in Wall Street and their claws were merciless

Follow, O follow him, loam-limbed Apollo, crumbling before Tiffany's window, he must buy himself earrings for he meets his love tonight, (Blossoming Juliet emptied her love into her true love's lap) dies in his arms

40

He is a poet,
kiss him, Socrates

They say the red arm of the Proletariat swings,
Hammer and Sickle, a quarter moon in the sky,
The dogstar comets leap
They say Macbeth embezzled funds, the market fell too soon, too soon the hands of Christ withered on the cross

50

His wife was barren (her eyes are flowers blowing in the field down where the Lackawanna railroad runs:
flow softly rivers of coal and steam)
His life insurance went to the banks

III

There are five limousines, unbought, rotting behind plate glass, delicate worms in leather and sharp April grass piercing steel joints . . .
Talk to the guns, Cassandra, tell them this is peace,
not war, not war,

60

peace,
PEACE.

IV

We came to you with a city in our hands, we said

    Destroy this city, by God, we hate this city.
You heard us and your house was a tower of flames
Remember there was once a king, an old king with an iron beard,
Whose life was like your house, a floor of ashes.

70

He put out his eyes, Cassandra

    We shall keep our eyes though we learn nothing

    The night is cold,

POEM FOR MY DAUGHTER

TELL her I love

    she will remember me

always, for she is of my tissues made,

    she will remember

these streets where the moon's shade falls and my shadow mingles with shadows sprung

from a midnight tree

Tell her I love that I am neither in earth nor sky,

stone nor cloud,

but only this

walled garden she knows well and which her body is.

10

Her eyes alone shall make me blossom for her sake, contained within her, all my days shall flower or die,

birthday or funeral concealed where no man's eye finds me unless she says.

He is my flesh and I am what he was.

FROM CHORUS FOR SURVIVAL

VI

UNDER the stone I saw them flow, express Times Square at five o'clock eyes set in darkness, trampling down all under, limbs and bodies driven in crowds, crowds over crowds, the street exit in starlight and dark air to empty rooms, to empty arms, wall paper gardens flowering there, error and loss upon the walls

I saw each man who rode alone prepare for sleep in deeper sleep and there to ride, sightless, unknown, to darkness that no day recalls

10

Riderless home, shoulder to head, feet on concrete and steel to ride Times Square at morning and repeat tomorrow's five o'clock in crowds (red light and green for speed) descend break entrance home to love or hate (I read the answer at the door)
 the destination marked 'Return, no stop till here, this is the end'

XIII

THROUGH streets where crooked Wicklow flows
 I saw a man with broken nose
 His venomous eyes turned full on me
 And cursed the ancient poverty
 That scarred his limbs and mired his clothes.

*O cursed, wind-driven poverty
 That breaks the man and mires his clothes*

Beyond the street, beyond the town,
 Rose hill and tree and sea and down
 O drear and shadowy green ash-tree,
 O hills that neither sleep nor rest
 But are like waves in that dark sea
 That rides the wind, nor-east, nor-west,

10

O cursed, wind-driven poverty!

Below the hill, below the town,
 Deep, whispering voices everywhere
 Break quiet in the morning air
 And mount the skies to pierce the sun

I saw the naked, cowering man
 Shrink in the midnight of his eye,
 There, to eat bitterness within,
 And close the door and hide the sin
 That made his withering heart run dry
O venomous, dark, unceasing eye
 That turned on street and town and me,
 Between the waves of hill and sea
 Until his eyelid closed the sky.

20

The rain-rilled, shaken, green ash-tree
 Spread roots to gather him and me
 In downward pull of earth that drains
 The blood that empties through men's veins
 Under the churchyard, under stone
 Until the body lies alone
 And will not wake nor wind, nor sky
 Bring sunlight into morning air
 And breathe disquiet everywhere
 Into the heart of hill and town

30

O heart whose heart is like my own
 And not to rest or sleep but climb
 Wearily out of earth again
 To feed again that venomous eye
 That is the manhood of my time,
 Whether at home or Wicklow town

40

This is my street to walk again,
O cursed, wind-driven poverty,

I hear the coming of the rain.

*After a year's

'THE voyage crossed, the firmament one star,
 New found New England, home

Now meet me there

In Concord's orchard where the apple bough Swings over shoulder at the window-pane
 In the green season .

Wake my limbs again

Adam-Ralph Emerson, the first man here,
 Eden, the gate unlatched, this place my own

He recalls London

And I have seen the world, heard the lark climbing
 His golden sinuous music in dark air,
 That speech unknown but to the subtlest ear
 Echo through morning over St Paul's dome,
 Wing following through April's hemisphere,
 Not less familiar now than earth at home
 England, the colosseum of great minds

10

Under deep trees, the bright-eyed mariner, Coleridge, speaking and the music gone
 Miraculous white hair, the oracle Voice descending, flowing on,

Visits Coleridge,

20

Knowing, perhaps, that I would understand.
 Me, in a vision, under visionary eyes,
 My pale, frail body and the profile spare.

Visible the wedding guest who must depart,
Must go like youth before the day is done,
Saying "good-bye" and clasp an aged hand.

then Carlyle

Perhaps he knew, perhaps he saw . . .

Perhaps Carlyle

Read something in my veins.

Mary, 'the aunt of genius' speaks

We are a little mad,

30

The Emersons, blood thin but deep and the quick body given
To God at bed-time, clipped within the spirit
In sleep, in prayers, the candle lit at dark
In homage to the sun
Dissolve the body and the light is gone
The stars expire and angels lose their glory,
The vertebræ within a nest of quiet
Between the sheets to fear the wind that stirs
Cypress and willow over us

40

I, the boy, the curious scientific dreaming eye
Fixed on the landscape ash-tree, elm,
And rippling grass like water at low tide Trees' branches spars of Salem's ships that rode Jewel-edged at sunset into Asia's side,
Her night our noon, her noon-day our tomorrow,
The tropic desert silence under snow

*The Emerson

Lyceum

Lectures at the hearth at home, and in the fire there,
My boyhood saw
Greek islands floating over Harvard Square
Homer, the blind head sleeping
In celestial seas,
Everett, the voice, asking whose lips were these Come out of time to breathe our native air?
State House, the fallen stone Acropolis . . .

50

The Emerson poets Dante, the old poet,

And at my hearth, the family Lyceum
Feed the soul's sepulture, they said, and hear Dante the Florentine who walked to heaven,
Spring in golden cages out of hell
To hail unearthly love, the Beatrice Lady and bride,

60 spirit on the last hull

Of that high world,

O Paradiso!

And the last desire
Turned in a crystal image on the stair
More beautiful than dress that angels wear
Was hers, whose waking limbs were cloaked with fire

and Thomas Gray, the new

Read Thomas Gray, the grave-yard nightingale,
The cold rhyme out of season, raven-dark November-piercing death at April's core Love, fame, Cromwell or Milton sleep at last
In dust that circles at the cottage door
Worship and heresy God's food, the devil's meat,
Black cloth and ashes where I sit to eat—

70

The rejection of the ministry and Calvinism.

To be divine
(and through my heart great goodness flows)
To walk in India at a Concord shrine.

Bitter the thinking man who sees
The careful millionaire, the red frontier
In city walls closed, and the hot mills pour Iron for guns, starvation, war
To know too well, to think too long 80

The bitter hours into seasons pass
Until the soul fills up, Breaks, scatters backward into that better time that never was
We are alive this hour and survive

Then, walk with me alone an orchard mile
Into the twilight end of Concord days,
Know in my face the acquiescent smile,
Dissention always deepest in mild gaze
To look down darkness toward the trembling light—

90

Prince Arthur is the Tower No more the eyes of youth

Lights out! and the globe broken, And with hot irons
Put out both mine eyes?
Still gaze toward music where the light
Was and the song

The last memory of Europe

Swing chariot philomel in midnight skies!
Broken, yet not unheard

Say in my heart I am 100

That angry ancient legend of a bird
Who walked alive

eating the ashes of his funeral urn, Alive to walk until the memory fails
In clapboard lecture halls

Phoenix

O my America,
And not to speak of you except in praise,
The midland ocean at my heart,
Thou art Atlantis risen from the seas,
Bride of the Indian Summer and the corn,

110

The mountain forest, slow, unwinding plain
The many footed cities at thy side . .

I am thy husband to divorce thee never Never-forever is a long, long time
For faith in blindness and the memory gone.

This place an orchard and no roads,
Yet every step I take shall be my own
Till houses fall in houses, cities fall
Still floats the wedding caul, the oversoul,
My name the hydrographic written on This stone that crumbles with the garden wall

120

Cheerful, the actual smile is permanent,
I turn my head always to face the sun '

XV

The meek shall disinheret the earth

From Furnished Rooms at twilight through the rain,— Traffic in asphalt mirrors on the Square
Gathers before it mounts Fifth Avenue,
North through the white-arc'd victory in stone,
Toward five o'clock, past Forty Second Street,— Midnight at Riverside and no return .

The voices out of air,

The dying echoes of a bitter year
'Come talk to me at 61, my attic
An antique stairway-landing in the sky,
My heart, your friend '

10

O poet, dying at this year's end,
An old man in the mirror's calendar!

The house, an old ship harbored into alien time,
Dry-docked in broken timber, the bricks fallen,
Steel hawsers split, the cornice sprung
Here, the brass plate, another poet's name,
'Where Allen Seeger lived,' but read no more,
See this man leaning from the top flight floor,
Unfolding light from the quick eye,
Mid-darkness, down

20

His body was a shadow on the stair,
The resurrection from a wax museum
In X-ray photographs against the wall,
The voice, Isaiah's noise at heaven's throne

'I have been ill, been poor, the menopause Too long and all gestation ceased, yet in my dreams alive
With poetry, the long wave coiling
In my blood, and after it, the tide.

30

I am the poet of the golden bird,

The winged bough whose day is always spring,
Whose fiery chariot is the song unheard Leaping the ashes of time's Illum
From dark to dark . . .

Perhaps no one will hear

Me when I say "It is impossible to die,"
Seeing men starve at street corners in rain,
(My face reflected in each eye,
The soul's glass inward down the vertebræ),
When there's a word unsaid that I must find Written across the bottom of my brain,
There, in the long quietus after pain,
In sleep, in memories . . .
Shakespeare and Dante singing in the shade,
Perpetual oak and olive sheltering
The delicate laurel of middle-aged spring—
May in October and an early frost
The dream still warm—

40

Will no one hear my dream?

50

Before the words are lost
In speech of men unborn on foreign shores?

Weeping in gas-lit solitudes of fame,
I saw the naked goddess of the sky
Open her lips to mine
Until I waked "Good morning" to the sun,
And no one knew my name

I had been gone

Too long, revolving doors, no entrance, here's the street,
We'll take your finger prints next time we meet,
The face is unfamiliar—

60

And old friends

Stored all my letters in forgotten drawers

Then my book perished
At second-hand, old stock, unsold in dust,
The leaf uncut, unfallen from the tree
Who touches it unfolds my heart, heart, body
Trembling between sheets in a cold room
On winter mornings and the sun gone out
To pace the park with nursemaids in the Square . . .

70

O my America, in me discover
Thy face in darkness and thy road dissevered,
The hundred million souls unknown, unknown
Bright in oblivion and yet unseen,
Each house an institution for the blind,
A local habitation with no name,
Until the blow-torch splinters stone

I saw the flame

Leap fifty stories high in elevators
Riding through the sky.
Will someone speak? There is no requiem '

IT IS LATER THAN YOU THINK

ABIGAIL TO MINERVA

SAVE us, O save us, cries Abigail to Minerva
 Do you see what time it is On the clock's face, full moon half-risen in July, Bells chiming? Look at time, Minerva, O come in from the tomb,
 That orchard where the apple tree's last century
 Now blooms underground, its dry roots spreading Across the graveyard whose only flower is thin grass
 Of lost New Milford I am here on the top stair
 Holding the banister to keep from falling

Come, come to me, Minerva, before the clock strikes,
 Before we dissolve in night wind, the pure darkness that has no name.
 Do not wait now until I call no more,
 Until the voice itself is gone, when hands lose hold on oak,
 When stays in calico no longer hold weak body
 Is that your footstep at the door?
 Is your hand raised to knock, have you come quietly
 As you once did as a child, deceiving me, stealing the young heart
 Out of my clumsy flesh, perfect cool fingers closing over the rich heart?
 My body trembling, my lips saying 'No, this is not my sister,
 This gold-haired girl, whose pale skin is delight,
 Clear water in crystal as the noon sun shines through it,
 She is not my sister,' but someone seen
 As a vision in a noon-tide dream, naked and faintly smiling,
 Small hand of love extended from thin arm,
 The bare feet scarcely pressing grass
 And love's hand offering new-picked buttercups

Come, come, O come, Minerva, both of us must be here
 To meet this hour in an old empty house
 Where the clock strikes everywhere, even between its walls,
 Through coverlet, through pillow 'One, two, one, two'
 As though distant owls called us awake to tell us the actual dream had fled.
 That we could not return to what we were In the old orchard on a summer noon,
 There, quite alone, locked in each other's arms in prayer;
 That a third face had slipped between us
 And a third pair of eyes looked down
 From heaven unmoving, piercing sun's rays at noon,
 Entering even the darkness of the night that has no moon

If I were calling someone who had no name, she would come sooner, Minerva!
 If my voice were a voice without words,
 Would you hear me calling, calling as a bird calls
 After the trap has sprung and will call again
 After he has been set free, knowing the cage is always there,
 Even in the topmost branches of the tallest elm?
 Would you hear me then, Minerva, would you know the voice was I,
 A tired woman, who has lived fifty years too long Beyond noon when we met and from that hour had no need of love?

This white house is no longer white, but gray rain-beaten,

Difficult to see at night unless the lamp
Is lit at kitchen window or the moon carries our iron Cock-crowing weather vane across her face 50
Do not step from the path, Minerva, clear road between our hearts,
Sun-lit, moon-lit, for the orchard grass
Uncut so long conceals the treacherous dead grape vine, apple root,
Rose brier, rusty scythe and the half-dug pit that was to be a grave
Come to the door, say without words through faintly smiling lips
'Yes, we have lived too long and there is danger everywhere'
Because the clock's hands move across the full moon's face,
Because Grandfather Colby died before the hour struck,
And the whole town knew the clock was slow, 60
Retarding time that I could not set right
Loss of a million hours in our blood
I heard him scream in the same voice that I call now
'It's late, it's very late'
And after him banks closed, crops failed,
And the workmen starved like varnished rats between factory walls
And the food store failed
'It's late,' he said, 'will someone break the clock that's always late'

Come to me, child Minerva, like the child Christ
In a vision to his dying mother, 70
Thorn-free and body whole, the cross forgotten,
Eyes wide and beautiful, forever piercing death
Come, come, Minerva, close the door softly as I no longer wait,
Feeling the earth downplunging in darkness, sink in deeper earth,
I saying quietly 'It is very late,
It is later than you think'

COMMENTARIES

JOHN SMITH (1580-1631)

THE first book written in the English colonies was by a man well fitted to a new land. Captain John Smith had led, according to his own story, an adventurer's life had fought 'beyond all men's expectation' on the Continent, waged Christian warfare against the Turks, been captured and sold into slavery, and beat out his master's brains to win his way to freedom. Deviously, by way of Russia and Africa, he had returned home, but two years of English calm were apparently enough. Late in 1606 he sailed with 143 colonists for Virginia. The expedition was financed by the Virginia Company of London, one of the corporations established for the settlement and exploitation of new territory in America.

Once in Virginia, Smith found enough excitement. He was in and out of control of the disorganized settlement at Jamestown, and was harassed by the difficulty of provisioning the colonists and pacifying the natives. When the vessel which had first brought the colonists was returning in 1608 to England after a second voyage, Smith sent back the manuscript of A True Relation. It was a business report and a newsletter. Almost immediately on its receipt in England the manuscript was published.

In his dedication of a later book, The General History of Virginia, New England & the Summer Isles (London, 1624), Smith declared that the events 'ought to have been clad in better robes than my rude military hand can cut out in paper ornaments. But because, of the most things therein, I am no compiler by hearsay, but have been a real actor, I take myself to have a property in them, and therefore have been bold to challenge them to come under the reach of my own rough pen.' This might even more truly have been prefixed to A True Relation. There were few wasted words in his account of the first year of the settlement. It was written with functional directness and simplicity. Smith's later prose was more ornate, it was not better.

In 1609, Smith returned to England, after quarreling over the leadership of the colony. He became interested in the settlement of New England, and in 1614 made a voyage of exploration along that coast, an account of which he published in A Description of New England (London, 1616). In addition to numerous pamphlets to encourage colonization, he wrote a picaresque autobiography, which he called The True Travels, Adventures, and Observations of Captain John Smith, in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America (London, 1630). He died in 1631.

RICHARD RICH (fl. 1610)

THE English who were hungry for news from Virginia were not forced to content themselves with accounts in prose. The broadside was a popular medium, and Rich's News from Virginia (London, 1610) was in the suitable ballad form. Almost nothing is known of Rich's identity, not even his first name being certain. He was evidently a member of the company of settlers under Sir Thomas Gates, who were wrecked on the Bermudas in the summer of 1609 during a voyage to Virginia. After ten troubled months among the hogs and tortoises, the survivors continued to Virginia in two cedarwood pinnaces which they built. Rich returned from there to England, and seems to have rushed into poetry, though he promised a later and fuller account of his adventures in prose

In his preface, Rich addressed the public 'Reader, thou dost peradventure imagine that I am mercenary in this business, and write for money, as your modern poets are use[d] to do, hired by some of those ever-to-be-admired Adventureres to flatter the world NO' I disclaim it! I have known the voyage, passed the danger, seen that honorable work of Virginia, and, I thank God, am arrived here to tell thee what I have seen, done, and passed If thou wilt believe me, [do] so, if not, so too, for I cannot force thee but to thine own liking I am a soldier, blunt and plain, and so is the phrase of my news, and I protest it is true If thou ask why I put it in verse, I prithee know it was only to feed mine own humor'

Rich was hardly a poet of sensibility, but he managed to cram into his verse a complicated sequence of events and an amazing amount of detailed information about the most recent terms under which the Virginia Company of London would send out a planter His disastrous voyage did not in the least daunt him 'I must not lose my patrimony,' he wrote, 'I am for Virginia again'

WILLIAM BRADFORD (1590-1657)

WILLIAM BRADFORD was born in Yorkshire in 1590, and while still a boy allied himself with religious Nonconformists He joined the closely-knit group which met at Scrooby with William Brewster, and in 1609 he migrated with them to Holland The wandering was not over, and in 1620 he sailed with these and others for America There they established the colony at Plymouth A few months after their arrival their first governor died, and Bradford was elected to succeed him Thirty-one times in all he filled the office

The seventeenth century held history in great respect, not only for the simple pleasure it gave in reading the events of the past, but because a general adherence to the authority of tradition made such knowledge essential to any determination of civil or ecclesiastical policy It was natural enough that Bradford should wish to recount the history which he was helping to make Like a modern Moses, he made it his duty to chronicle his people's exodus, that the true line of tradition should not be broken in the future by an ignorance of the immediate past He died in 1657, but his history Of Plymouth Plantation covers only the years up to a decade before

His manner was, as he said, to tell all these events in a 'plain style,' and he wrote with quiet dignity Unlike the writers of news-letters he sought a definite emotional effect, and this he brought about by a conscious use of biblical analogies and overtones His phrases from the Testaments were borrowed not to replenish a scant imagination, but to evoke for readers, as familiar with the Bible as he himself, parallels inseparably a part of the greatest storehouse of their fancy Technically the effect was not different from that of allusion in poetry like Milton's on minds perfectly at home in the classics The emotional reaction was, however, as preachers knew, far greater.

Bradford's manuscript itself had an exciting history Part of the great collection of New England historical material gathered in the early eighteenth century by Thomas Prince and deposited in the library of the Old South Church in Boston, it was probably seized by some British soldier during the occupation of Boston at the time of the Revolution Then it was lost track of for three-quarters of a century before it was discovered in the library of the Bishop of London The history was first published in full in 1856, and in 1897 its manuscript was returned to this country

THOMAS MORTON (fl 1622-1647)

Not all persons in New England were moved to settle there by the impulsion of God. Thomas Morton was not. His first appearance in New England in 1622 appears to have been as one of fifty or sixty 'rude and profane fellows' sent out to trade in rivalry with the Pilgrims. Leaving New England after a single summer, he returned with a similar party some years later and set up a post at Quincy from which to trade for fur with the Indians. A liberal supply of liquor and guns for barter brought him a success which threatened not only the trade but the safety of the Pilgrim Fathers. To this competition and danger they objected, as well as to a looseness of conduct which offended their sense of morality. He was seized in 1628 by Capt Miles Standish of Plymouth, and was sent under arrest to England. A year and a half later he returned, and the expulsion was repeated—this time by the Puritans from Salem, after Endecott had cut down Morton's maypole. In 1637 he published in Holland his New English Canaan as a kind of defense of his actions. In 1643 he reappeared in Massachusetts. Hustled off, he went to Maine and then to Rhode Island, but returned still again. This time he was thrown into prison for a year, and two years after his release he died. No one mourned him.

His book had some of the amusement which goes with any burlesque, but its wit has generally been overestimated in periods of reaction against the Puritan character.

NATHANIEL WARD (c 1578-1652)

No one of gustier humor and few of greater learning than Nathaniel Ward came to New England. A Suffolk man, born about 1578, he was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and received his degree in 1599. He then read law, but turned to the ministry. After pulpits in Prussia and in London he was presented with a rural Essex living, from which he was dismissed in 1633 because of his nonconformity. In the next year he went to Massachusetts, where he became co-pastor of the church at Agawam (Ipswich). He was not well, and on his retirement two years later the General Court of Massachusetts took advantage of his legal and religious training by recruiting him to aid in the preparation of the legal code of the commonwealth, The Body of Liberties.

It is, however, by The Simple Cobler of Agawam in America (London, 1647) that he is known today. Emigrants to New England saw no reason to cut themselves off from their mother-country, and considered it a privilege and a duty to offer advice and the pure example of New England for guidance in religious and civil disputes at home. Thus even the establishment of the first printing press at Boston in 1638 did not materially lessen the number of colonial books published in England.

Ward, who described himself on the title-page of his Simple Cobler as one 'willing to help mend his native country, lamentably tattered, both in the upper-leather and sole, with all the honest stitches he can take,' was eager to be of help. His honest stitches ripped into the rotten leather. He had no patience with those Englishmen who tried to patch with toleration. New England gave free liberty to troublesome sects, liberty 'to keep away from us, and such as will come—to be gone as fast as they can, the sooner the better.'

The problem of extravagant apparel had been a topic of controversy since the repeal by James I of all sumptuary legislation. English ministers railed from the pulpit against any woman 'with a ruff like a sail, with a feather in her cap like a flag in her top, to tell, I think, which way the wind will blow' Ward joined in the hue and cry His style is swift and full-blooded, and he had a racy delight in the creation of nonce-words from Latin, which smack almost as much of Plautus as of seventeenth-century literary conceit. He wrote in this fashion, he says in a significant appendix, lest he 'speak to light heads with heavy words'

The Simple Cobler was popular in England, and ran into four editions in its first year. No doubt others like Adam Eyre, the solemn Yorkshire diarist who was bothered both by his conscience and his wife's love of finery, noted soon after its publication
'This day I rested at home all day, and in the morn I read a part of the American Cobbler, and wrote in the margin as far as I went'

Ward returned to England the year before its publication, repeated his message in person before the Commons as he had promised, published two other minor volumes, and died in 1652 in Essex, where he had returned to become pastor

ROGER WILLIAMS (c. 1603-1683)

ROGER WILLIAMS was even more troublesome to the New England Puritans than Thomas Morton had been, yet he had an ability which they conceded and which posterity admires. He was born about 1603, the son of a prosperous London shopkeeper. His brilliance as a youth brought him to the attention of Sir Edward Coke, the famous jurist and parliamentarian, who got him a scholarship at the Charterhouse school. Later Williams was a member of Pembroke College at Cambridge, from which he received a degree in 1626. He then studied for the ministry. A friend of many of the Puritan leaders, he sailed in 1630 for New England to take part in this radical experiment in the establishment of a Puritan commonwealth.

Williams found the new state not entirely congenial to his own ideas of reform. As a theorist he objected to the legality of the colonists' title to their land, a view which they naturally resented. Even more, Williams disliked their hesitancy to cut loose from the Established Church. In his search for the ideal he followed the path of separatism and ended at a position from which he could see only the beauty of religious liberty. He was not a mute and cool con-former. Cotton Mather, in his history of New England, described him as a windmill, whose whirl was likely to set all America afire. In 1635 Williams was banished, and with a group of followers founded Providence.

Like most Puritans, Williams was a sturdy pamphleteer. Best known of his disputes is that with John Cotton, of Boston, on the principle of freedom of conscience.
Cotton originally attacked an English defense of such liberty, Williams answered with The Bloody Tenet of Persecution, for Cause of Conscience, discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace (London, 1644), Cotton replied twice, once with The Bloody Tenet Washed (London, 1647), and Williams ended the argument, though not the question, with *The Bloody Tenet Yet
More Bloody* (London, 1652).

The dialogue as a form for such discussion had been popular since Plato, both in prose and poetry. It has certain dramatic values, and clarity results from the straightforward use of pro and con. William Bradford wrote several times in this manner, and it is basically the form of Anne Bradstreet's poem, 'The Flesh and the Spirit'

Williams' life was never free from controversy, and his 'Letter to the Town of Providence' is an important clarification of his attitude towards liberty of conscience. It has been said by Moses Coit Tyler, best of the historians of American colonial literature, to have 'the moral and literary harmonies of a classic.' Williams wrote nothing to surpass it

PHILIP PAIN (?-c 1668)

Daily Meditations (Cambridge, 1668) appears to be the first book of original verse published in the English colonies. Of Philip Pain, its author, nothing is known except that a memorial poem calls him young, and the title-page describes him as one 'who lately suffering shipwreck, was drowned.' He may not have been even technically an American, unless this is assumed from the fact that the book was apparently not published in England.

Whoever the author, the book is important as an indication of the interest in poetry in New England. In the translation of such sacred poems as the Psalms, the Puritan was unwilling to sacrifice the exactness of the divinely inspired original 'for the sake of a little jingle at the end of a line', but he felt no hindrance to the writing of occasional poems, either for the commemoration of particular events or as an individual stimulus to devotion.

Pain's mind was typically concerned with the vanity of the present and the imminence of death, and his pulse beat fast lest, as he said, he be 'drowned in this deluge of security.' This terror of the unknown he was able to express with the Poe-like accent of his fifty-sixth meditation, or in phrases of wit reminiscent of English verse like that of George Herbert or Francis Quarles, from both of whom he seems to have learned. Most of his similes came naturally enough from the Bible. What New Englanders thought of his poetry is not known, but his book must have had some popularity for it was reprinted in 1670.

ANNE BRADSTREET (c 1612-1672)

OF Anne Bradstreet, New Englanders were extremely proud. She was the daughter of Thomas Dudley, who had been Governor of Massachusetts, and the wife of Simon Bradstreet, who held high office there. Mrs Bradstreet was born in England, about 1612, and was brought up in the household of the Earl of Lincoln, of whose estates her father was steward. Here her background was the rich tapestry of English tradition, sobered to conform to Puritan taste. Her husband had also become a member of the household, first at the age of fourteen and again after his graduation from Cambridge. In 1630 they sailed with the Dudleys to New England.

'It pleased God to keep me a long time without a child, which was a great grief to me, and cost me many prayers and tears before I obtained one, and after him many more, of whom I now take the care, that as I have brought you into the world, and with great pains, weakness, cares, and fears brought you to this, I now travail in birth of you again till Christ be formed in you.'

Out of this maternal emotion came many of her shorter poems and her Meditations. The vogue of meditations and aphorisms flourished in the seventeenth century. Rhetoric was its nursemaid, but its texts were the 'wise-books' of the Scriptures. The Proverbs was one of this sort, and the son of Solomon was counselled to 'hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother for they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck' The counsels of Mrs Bradstreet for her own children were exercises in compression, and in them she packed the accumulated wisdom of her reading and her experience Seventeenth-century American prose offers nothing better

In 1650 a volume of her poems was published in London, called The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America, or Several Poems The title was a typical publisher's invention to call attention to the doubly extraordinary fact that the book was not only by an American but by a woman For The Tenth Muse preceded by a year the first printed poetry of Mrs Katherine Philips, the 'Matchless Orinda,' usually known as the first English woman poet, and by seventeen years the publication of 'Orinda's' collected work Mrs Bradstreet's early verse is heavy with debt to DuBartas, that grandiose epic and moral poet of whom her century thought highly 'A right DuBartas girl,' Nathaniel Ward called her

A second, revised edition of her poems was published in Boston in 1678, under what was probably the original title, Several Poems This was enlarged by the addition of certain of the personal poems by which she is now best known In these, it is usually said, she returned to the tradition of Sydney and Spenser Her work was first published in its entirety in 1867

JOHN JOSSELYN (fl 1638-1675)

JOHN JOSSELYN was the author of two books of miscellaneous fact and lore concerning New England These were New England's Rarities Discovered (London, 1672) and An Account of Two Voyages to New England (London, 1674) Josselyn obviously possessed an eager mind, some scientific knowledge, and a sense of humor His description of an Indian squaw is related in its form to character-writing, that method of picturing various types of man, which was in itself a common form, was used within sermons, and served as a guide in the composition of obituaries and biographies

Edward Tuckerman, ed, New England's Rarities Discovered (Boston, 1865)

MARY ROWLANDSON (c 1635-c 1678)

NOT all Americans were so kindly disposed towards the Indians as John Josselyn had been Particularly during the years when King Philip was making a last desperate effort to regain his territory, the colonists were in dread of attacks by the Indians. Mrs Mary Rowlandson lived in the frontier village of Lancaster, Massachusetts, where she was the wife of the minister and the mother of three children At sunrise on the 10th of February 1676, when her husband was absent in Boston, the Indians swept down on the village, burned the houses, and carried off the settlers On 2nd May she was finally redeemed Six years later was published an account of her captivity, The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed, Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs Mary Rowlandson (Cambridge, 1682) The book was popular Two more editions were published in Cambridge within the year, and one in England This was her only literary venture

She begins her account abruptly and dramatically, and relates the stages and rest of her forced march with a narrative technique not to be slighted The pathos of her return to her child's grave and the humor of the final drunken celebration of the Indians illustrate other literary qualities. Her book has been deservedly the most popular of the numerous similar accounts published on through the mid-eighteenth century.

Such narratives, like published sermons on the execution of murderers, provided more than an intimation of the chastening hand of God. The numbers in which they sold indicate a response on the part of the readers which was not entirely spiritual. And what is equally important to literary history, the vividness of the writers' accounts are a sure sign of a delight in their creation.

MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH (1631-1705)

Of all New England poets Michael Wigglesworth was most widely read. Almost eighteen hundred copies of The Day of Doom (Cambridge, 1662) are said to have been sold in the first year of its publication, and the book was frequently reprinted.

Wigglesworth was born in England in 1631, and came with his parents to Connecticut when he was seven years old. Later he attended Harvard, from which he was graduated in 1651 and of which he was fellow and tutor from 1652 to 1654. Two years later he became minister of the church at Malden. He was always troubled by ill health, and in the year after The Day of Doom appeared he went to Bermuda. The trip helped little and he pondered why God should have so encouraged him to leave, and then have withheld the cure. Perhaps, he thought, it was only to return him to his flock after a season away. From then on he was content to remain in Massachusetts.

The Day of Doom was popular not so much for its poetry as for the fact it was, and still is, the clearest account of Calvinistic belief. Cotton Mather commended it as particularly suited for 'such readers as are for plain truths dressed up in a plain meter.' Its purpose has never been better stated than in the Lucretian lines which a fellow minister prefaced to the book itself.

A verse may find him who a sermon flies, Saith Herbert well. Great truths to dress in meter,
Becomes a preacher who men's souls doth prize,
That truth in sugar roll'd may taste the sweeter

No cost too great, no care too curious is To set forth truth, and win men's souls to bliss

While Wigglesworth was still a tutor at Harvard he prepared a discussion of oratory which has never been published. Advice from it fits his poetry as well.

Would you know who is an orator indeed? Look out the man that can fully and takingly teach the hardest points with the greatest perspicuity in the fewest words, and that's the man you seek. Teaching then being the main thing to be attended, the orator's first endeavor must be that his discourse be suitable to its object, exactly conformed both for matter and manner to the thing he speaks about.

Two plain words are worth twenty that cannot be understood. He is the best artist who can most clearly and familiarly communicate his thoughts to the meanest capacity.

Wigglesworth's poem 'God's Controversy with New England,' somewhat more intricate metrically than The Day of Doom and impressive in its solemnity, was written in 1662 but was never printed during his lifetime. He published a second volume of poems, Meat out of the Eater, or Meditations concerning the Necessity, End, and Usefulness of Afflictions into God's Children (Cambridge, 1669), which by 1689 had gone into four editions. It is sincere, but not distinguished even in its period.

BENJAMIN TOMPSON (1642-1714)

BENJAMIN TOMPSON was probably the first native-born American poet. He was graduated from Harvard in 1662, and spent his life as schoolmaster and physician. It was to lament the same general period of Indian warfare in which Mrs Rowlandson was captured that Tompson queried,

What means this silence of Harvardine quills, While Mars, triumphant, thunders on our hills?

He supplied the lament himself in New England's Crisis, or A Brief Narrative of New England's Lamentable Estate at Present, Compared with the Former (but Few) Years of Prosperity (Boston, 1676). The book was reprinted in a somewhat different form in the same year in London as New England's Tears.

The bulk of Tompson's work was in the medium of the elegy, the most popularly practised of all New England poetical forms. Such elegies to mourn the dead were pinned to the hearse in funeral processions, printed as broadsides, and appended to published funeral sermons and brief biographies. In them New Englanders most strenuously exercised their wits, though the elegies often, as in that to Rebecca Sewall, indicate genuine sympathy through the poet's personal knowledge of grief.

Elegies were composed well into the eighteenth century. No poetry observed more conventionalities nor honored dead images longer. Benjamin Franklin, in one of his Dogood letters to the New England Courant, written in 1722, summarized the practice with devastating accuracy.

A RECEIPT TO MAKE A NEW ENGLAND FUNERAL ELEGY

For the title to your elegy. Of these you may have enough ready-made to your hands, but if you should choose to make it yourself, you must be sure not to omit the words Ætatis Suæ, which will beautify it exceedingly.

For the Subject of your elegy. Take one of your neighbors who has lately departed this life. It is of no great matter at what age the party died, but it will be best if he went away suddenly, being killed, drowned, or frozen to death.

Having chosen the person, take all his virtues, excellencies, etc., and if he have not enough you may borrow some to make up a sufficient quantity. To these add his last words, dying expressions, etc., if they are to be had. Mix all these together, and be sure you strain them well. Then season all with a handful or two of melancholy expressions such as dreadful, deadly, cruel cold death, unhappy fate, weeping eyes, etc. Having mixed all these ingredients well, put them into the empty skull of some young Harvard, but in case you have ne'er a one at hand you may use your own. There let them ferment for the space of a fortnight, and by that time they will be incorporated into a body, which take out, and having prepared a sufficient quantity of double rhymes, such as power, flower, quiver, shiver, grieve us, leave us, tell you, excel you, expeditions, physicians, fatigue him, intrigue him, etc., you must spread all upon paper and if you can procure a scrap of Latin to put at the end it will garnish it mightily. Then having affixed your name at the bottom, with a Mæstus Composuit [a grief-stricken one has composed this], you will have an excellent elegy.

N B This receipt will serve when a female is the subject of your elegy, provided you borrow a greater quantity of virtues, excellencies, etc.

Tompson's couplets, however, have their own native and individual tang, and the prologue to New England's Crisis, despite its apparent indebtedness to the poetry of Francis Quarles, could only have been written by an American. This can hardly be said of much poetry before his time, nor of that for long after.

H J Hall, ed., Benjamin Tompson, 1642-1714, First Native-Born Poet of America; His Poems (Boston, 1924)

FRANCIS PASTORIUS (1651-c 1720)

LITTLE poetry of this period of a quality comparable even to that of New England has been uncovered elsewhere, but the pleasantest known are the two poems from the title-pages of the unpublished commonplace-book of Francis Pastorius, which he called his Bee-Hive. These volumes are the storehouse of the honey of his reading, and the practice of filling such books was popular everywhere.

Pastorius was one of the most learned men in colonial America. Born in Germany and educated in its universities, he knew the Continent from having travelled as tutor to the son of a nobleman. In 1683 he set out for America as agent for a group of German Quakers who wished to buy land in Pennsylvania. On their arrival Germantown was settled, and Pastorius became its first mayor and leading citizen.

As a youth in Germany he had written light verses on love, such as

Come, Corinna, let me kiss thee!
Come, my dearest, to me here!
I would know why joy should miss thee,
I would have thine answer clear!
Smiling sweetly said she, 'No,'
Then demurely yielded so.
(S W PENNYPACKER, trans.)

He continued to write occasional verse in America, but a new state of mind and an adopted language appear to have cramped his muse.

EDWARD TAYLOR (c 1644-1729)

THE finest seventeenth-century American poet is the one most recently discovered. Edward Taylor left some three hundred manuscript poems at his death in 1729, with instructions that they never be published. It was not until their rediscovery and partial publication in 1937 that the quality of his work was known.

Taylor was born in Leicestershire, England, about 1644. His early education was got there and he was trained to be a schoolmaster, but his scruples against taking the oath of conformity drove him in 1668 to America. He came with letters of introduction to leading citizens, who sent him to President Chauncey of Harvard. That night as he lay at Chauncey's, a white-speckled dove flew against the casement of his window and was let in. The President thought it an omen. The next day Taylor was admitted to the college. There for two years he roomed with Samuel Sewall. He was graduated in 1671, and later in the same year accepted the pastorate of the frontier village of Westfield, in Massachusetts. He remained there until his death.

His grandson, President Stiles of Yale, has left a thumbnail portrait of him. Taylor was deeply interested in botany and natural history, was an incessant student, but used no spectacle glasses to his death. He was a vigorous advocate for Oliver Cromwell, civil and religious liberty. A Congregationalist in opposition to Presbyterian church discipline. He was a physician for the town all his life. He concerned himself little about domestic and secular affairs. Attended to all the public state of the Provinces and the Parliament, greatly detested King James, Sir Edmund Andros and Randolph, gloried in King William and the Revolution of 1688, felt for the dissenters in all their apprehension in Queen Anne's reign, and triumphed in the House of Hanover. He had a steady correspondence with Judge Sewall of Boston, who duly communicated to him all the transactions in the Assembly and occurrences in the nation. A man of small stature, but firm, of quick passions, yet serious and grave. Exemplary in piety, and for a very sacred observance of the Lord's day.

In the leisure which his disinterest in domestic and secular affairs left, he wrote verse which none of his predecessors or contemporaries could have matched. He may indeed be said to have possessed a greater degree of poetic sensibility than any other colonial American poet. Certain of his conceits and lines are in the purest metaphysical tradition, his images are often fresh and sharp, his religious ecstasy glows warmly. He is a lesser Crashaw or Herbert, but he is a true poet. The greater part of his work has never been published, and none of it in book form. What the bulk may be like, the public does not know. How good the best is, we are only beginning to appreciate.

COTTON MATHER (1663-1728)

'It has always been a maxim with me,' wrote Cotton Mather, 'that a power to do good not only gives a right unto it, but also makes the doing of it a duty.' Mather was born with the power and trained with the sense of duty. He was the son of Increase Mather, who had been chief of the New England clergy, President of Harvard, and a powerful politician, and was the grandson of Richard Mather, who had been a leader among the founding Fathers. Increase Mather educated his son for a brilliant career, saw him graduated from Harvard in 1678 as the youngest man to have taken a degree, received him as assistant in the Second Church of Boston, and filled him with the responsibility of being his brothers' keeper.

With the example of his family behind him and the spirit of the Lord within him, it was natural enough that Cotton Mather should have expected to guide the community and the commonwealth to lives conformant and pleasing to God's will. But New England's way was changing, and truth was no longer irresistible. In his ambitions Mather was often thwarted, and his consequent irritation turned many against him. Mather himself was aware of his faults. 'Proud thoughts,' he confided to his diary, 'fly blow my best performances.'

No writer of colonial times was more eager to do good by means of books than he, and none was a more versatile stylist. The baroque richness of his introduction to the Magnalia was intended only for minds capable of appreciating the authority of the ancients. His 'Political Fables' were addressed to the simpler capacities of the common people, his Winter Meditations made use of homely analogy, and the narrative of 'The Memorable Action at Wells' raced along unhampered by the jeweled gowns he mentions in his discussion of style. Mather preferred the ornate. 'After all,' he wrote, 'every man will have his own style', but, being a dextrous and functional writer, he was careful to fit his manner to his audience.

Mather is usually spoken of as a reactionary. In fact, his attitude toward the discoveries of science was radical. A bomb hurled through his window was the people's response to his advocacy of inoculation against smallpox. And almost no one would approvingly have repeated with him, as in his Christian Philosopher, Grew's observation that 'whatever is natural is delightful and has a tendency to good.'

Few men have made greater use of the press. His sermons were often prepared so that they could be turned over immediately to the printer. Some, like his Winter Meditations, were written directly for the reader and form a significant link between the sermon and the essay. The writing of biographies he found important for the examples which good men set. These biographies naturally enough emphasized the spiritual, for a man did not truly live before his soul had quickened. He was a chronicler of New England, since 'tis very certain that the greatest entertainments must needs occur in the history of the people whom the Son of God hath redeemed and purified unto Himself as a peculiar people, and whom the Spirit of God, by supernatural operations upon their minds, does cause to live like strangers in this world, conforming themselves unto the truths and rules of his Holy Word in expectation of a kingdom whereto they shall be in another and a better world advanced' Before Mather laid down his pen he had written more than 450 books, all directed to do good

He was born in 1663 and died in 1728 Between those years he made himself the literary leader of colonial America

BENJAMIN COLMAN (1673-1747)

SINCE the literature of New England was devoted to the service of God, its chief creators were inevitably the clergy, and their printed sermons made up the bulk of publishing There could be little difference between the sermon as it was delivered from the pulpit and the book as it was read by the fireside They were, in fact, on most occasions the same thing Of his father, Cotton Mather wrote, 'He never preached a sermon but what was worthy of the press'

Into the writing of sermons went the chief literary energy of the time In them were displayed all the devices and most of the forms of prose There was but one general restriction the writing must be functional, the preacher must aim 'to shoot his arrows not over the heads but into the hearts of his hearers.'

Benjamin Colman was typical of the sermonizers He was born at Boston in 1673, and was graduated from Harvard in 1692 In 1695 he left for England, from whence he was recalled four years later to the pulpit of the new Brattle Street Church in Boston, just founded by a group of left-wing Congregationalists He published over ninety books, and was prominent in the civil and religious affairs of Boston until his death in 1747

Two factors chiefly influenced the style of Colman's sermons, as they did that of others One was the language of the Bible; the other was the cadence of the spoken voice A preface to a biography published shortly after his death eulogized him generally, 'but he principally shone in the desk Here his air was composed and grave, his action just and delicate, and his voice inimitably soft and tuneful, managed with the greatest propriety, and exquisite sweetness of modulation His diction was animated and lofty, but easy and plain, like his models the Inspired Classics, and the arrangement of his style, and the turn of his periods exactly adapted to the elevations and cadences of his own musical pronunciation' 'But,' added his biographer later in the book, 'although in general his voice might be said to be soft and still, and that "his speech and doctrine dropt as the dew, and distilled as the small rain upon the tender herb," yet when occasions for it occurred he could notably imitate a Boanerges, and play the artillery of Heaven against the hardy sons of vice, and uncover the dreadful pit —With what light, and flame, and power have we sometimes known him dispense the Word, and by the terrors of the Lord persuade men in the applications of his discourse!'

Only through a knowledge of the sermons can there be any appreciation of the extent of talent of the colonial writers of prose

SAMUEL SEWALL (1652-1730)

THE emphasis which Protestant thought laid on the dignity of the individual and the duty of self-examination helped to make the keeping of diaries a common practice both in England and America. The spiritual life of a man usually received his greatest attention, but if he were a person of affairs he was not apt to ignore a record of the events and the society in which he shared. Such a diary was not always kept for the writer alone. Though he cannot strictly be said to have had his eye cocked toward posterity, he was seldom unaware of the potential value of his diary to his eulogist or biographer, nor did he forget that his descendants might profit from, and possibly enjoy, the account of his life.

Wittiest of New England diarists was Judge Samuel Sewall, who became Chief Justice of Massachusetts. He was born in England, of parents who had returned there from America. When he was nine he came back with them to Massachusetts. In 1671 he was graduated from Harvard, then studied divinity and became a minister. Though he was a man of God, he was also a man of the world. In 1676 he made a profitable marriage, and then turned his attention to the secular pursuit of law. In this he prospered, and until his death in 1730 he was a prominent figure in Massachusetts society.

His account of his lively pursuit, at the age of sixty-eight, of the hand of Madam Winthrop is the most famous section of his diary. It is not, however, entirely typical. Sewall was a man of importance, and did not take the responsibilities of judgeship lightly, nor did he ever relinquish his concern with spiritual problems. These give his diary weight, and balance the moments of leisure when he rode about the countryside, led psalm-singing slightly off key, worried about the wearing of wigs, or carried on a courtship. In every thing he was a man of wit and perspicacity.

SARAH KEMBLE KNIGHT (1666-1727)

SOMEWHAT different from diaries were journals of particular happenings, no doubt kept to be shown soon after the event. Such a journal was that by Sarah Kemble Knight of her trip in 1704 through the wilderness to New York, where she had business matters to settle.

Madam Knight was born in 1666, the daughter of a Boston merchant. As a matron and the widow of a shipmaster, she was the head of her family, and records indicate that she was also a minor public official. In addition to these responsibilities, she kept a writing school, which Benjamin Franklin is said to have attended. That Bostonians should have thought this cultured and flippantly gay woman a suitable instructress for their children is but another indication of their growing worldliness.

The manuscript of her journal was not published until 1825.

MATHER BYLES (1707-1788) and JOSEPH GREEN (1706-1780)

Two rival wits kept Boston amused during a great part of the eighteenth century. They were the Rev Dr Mather Byles, a nephew of Cotton Mather, and Joseph Green, a wealthy distiller and merchant. Each relied chiefly on journals as a medium for his jest and satire. The most famous skirmish arising from their rivalry is that over a hymn written by Byles and parodied by Green.

Both men more or less lived out their century. Both were Tories. On the eve of the Revolution, Green sailed for England, where he stayed until his death. Byles remained in Boston, passed over by the people. But his townsmen long recalled with amusement the day, during his enforced confinement to his house, when, after persuading his sentinel to go on an errand for him, he walked up and down before his door as his own guard.

WILLIAM DAWSON (1704-1752)

THE first collection of poems to be printed in Virginia was Poems on Several Occasions (Williamsburg, 1736), which appeared anonymously, as 'By a Gentleman of Virginia.' The poet, whose identity has only recently been discovered by Harold Lester Dean, was, at the time of the book's publication, a professor at William and Mary College, in Williamsburg, later, from 1743 to 1752, he was its president.

Dawson was an Englishman who graduated at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1725. Most of his poems, which he calls 'the casual productions of my youth,' probably were written while he was still in England. Yet the fact of their publication in America bears the same interest relative to the taste of Virginians that the publication of Pain's poetry does to New Englanders' of a half-century before.

Dawson must have been a pleasant fellow in youth. His love for Pope's 'Windsor Forest,' 'that romantic song,' governed his interest in Milton and Shakespeare, and he relished the composition of anacreontics, in the spirit of 'Come, my boys, with rosy wine.' It is perhaps fortunate that he chose to emigrate to Virginia rather than to the North, despite the confidence of his lines,

But let us show, no age, no time,
No warring seasons, frozen clime,
Can damp the warmth of our desires

WILLIAM BYRD (1674-1744)

COL WILLIAM BYRD of Westover in Virginia, Esq., as he was called, is the symbol popularly used to contrast the warm spirit of the cavalier South with the frost-bitten austerity of puritan New England. He was the second William Byrd, his father, by inheritance, marriage, and general shrewdness, had assured himself a place in the planter aristocracy, and he sent his son to England for his education. In 1692 he came back to Virginia, but in 1697 he returned to England, and from the following year until his father's death in 1704 he was agent for the colony. When he finally settled in Virginia, he had made so many friends among the British nobility and had found their manner of living so congenial that it was easy for him to continue the aristocratic life which his father had begun to make traditional.

His chief interest was in the development of his large family estate and in the general welfare of Virginia. In 1728 he helped to trace the boundary line between Virginia and North Carolina, and composed a witty and sagacious account of this enterprise in The History of the Dividing Line. In 1732 he visited some iron mines which he described in A Progress to the Mines, and in the following year, in A Journey to the Land of Eden, told of his inspection of his own lands, upon which he was considering the development of the natural resources. All these works remained in manuscript until their publication in 1841.

Best of all he liked his life as a gentleman. In the superb Georgian mansion which he had built at Westover, along the James River, he housed, in charge of a private librarian, one of the largest collections of books in America, and probably the most cosmopolitan one. He was witty, urbane, and aristocratic. To his family he was known as 'The Black Swan,' and he moved through society with suitably graceful condescension.

JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703-1758)

THE purest beauty existed for Jonathan Edwards not in matter but in the mind, and he was more a man of intellect than of letters. As a boy of twelve in Connecticut, where he had been born in 1703, he wrote a series of scientific observations on the spider, and at fourteen read Locke 'with more delight than the most greedy miser finds when gathering up handfuls of silver and gold, from some newly discovered treasure.' Before his graduation from Yale in 1720 he had deeply analyzed the mind. In 1726, after two years' study of theology, a brief pastorate in New York, and a period as tutor at Yale, he became co-pastor of the church at Northampton, in Massachusetts. He remained there with Sarah Pierpont, his wife, for twenty-four years, and then he resigned after a dispute with his parishioners. Then he became a missionary to the Indians at Stockbridge, and in 1757 was made president of Princeton. But, two months after taking up his duties, he died from the effects of a smallpox inoculation.

From his youth, Edwards had been deeply moved by a love of nature, and, in the manner of Mather's Christian Philosopher, he came to see in the natural revelation of divine beauty. The strain of elementary mysticism by which he expressed the rapture of this revelation is shown in the fragment 'Nature.' But he progressed from a mystical to a metaphysical love of beauty, through which men might be compelled to a love of God. The combined challenge and appeal of the Great Awakening, an evangelical wave of religious enthusiasm which swept America from about 1735 to 1750, tightened and refined his intellectual defense of the main tenets of the Calvinism in which he had been trained.

This defense he made clear through his Freedom of the Will, 'Concerning the End for Which God Created the World,' and numerous other works chiefly of intellectual interest. They have brought him recognition as the 'first great philosophic intelligence in American history.'

Edwards does not appear to have been particularly concerned with style, though he followed the general tendency of his time and sloughed off merely decorative or pedantic embellishments. Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God was delivered in the midst of the excitement of the Great Awakening. It is not entirely typical of Edwards' preaching, but, deservedly or not, it has become the most famous of all colonial sermons.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN (1706-1790)

'Who reads an American book?' was the famous taunt of Sydney Smith, the early nineteenth-century English critic and wit. But he made an exception 'I will disinherit you,' he said to his daughter, 'if you do not admire everything written by Franklin.'

Benjamin Franklin was born in Boston in 1706. There he learned the trade of printer, and cultivated a native shrewdness. In 1723 he moved to Philadelphia, and the next year went to England. Of his eighteen months abroad he noted in his autobiography 'I had by no means improved my fortune, but I had picked up some very ingenious acquaintances whose conversation was of great advantage to me, and I had read considerably.' Once back in Philadelphia, he prospered as a printer and a man of affairs, until in his early forties he could command the leisure for political activity and scientific research.

Franklin was what the eighteenth century liked to call an 'ingenious' man. He was postmaster, commissioner, colonial agent, he invented bifocal spectacles, the lightning rod, the Franklin open stove, he founded in the colonies the first circulating library, the first fire insurance company, and the American Philosophical Society. During the Revolution and for a few years thereafter he lived abroad as America's chief financier, diplomat, and conscious representative of the simple republican.

The marks of his Boston boyhood became subdued, save for a compelling urge to do good. His Autobiography was begun for the private instruction of his son, but was continued for the public in response to a plea that 'your biography will not merely teach self-education, but the education of a wise man.' The Way to Wealth brought together terse and homely proverbs which appealed to his ethical bent and whose conciseness delighted his sense of economy. Even his witty Bagatelles, printed on his private press in France, are the work of Poor Richard gone Gallic.

Franklin based his style on the simplest and clearest communication of ideas. His wit added piquancy but never embellishment. His self-training as a stylist, in emulation of the lucidity of Addison and Steele, he relates in the opening of the Autobiography, and his convictions appear in 'A Query on Style.'

In Franklin's writings American prose became modern, but the fame of his prose comes not so much from its modernity as from its reflection of the brilliancy of his accomplishments and the charm of his personality.

JOHN WOOLMAN (1720-1772)

THE journal of a contemporary of Franklin, far more obscure than he in their times, has made its author beloved by posterity. John Woolman, a Quaker, was born in 1720 in New Jersey, and trained as a tailor. He became actively engaged in the Quaker ministry, and travelled widely among the Friends to preach the sweetness of divine love and to stir opposition against the institution of slavery. The plight of the poor also aroused his pity and his aid. In 1772 he went to England to visit the Friends in Yorkshire, and died there of smallpox in the same year.

As with Franklin, the quality of Woolman's prose is that of the man who wrote it. It flows quietly from the inward stillness from which he gained his strength and conviction. 'While aught remains in us contrary to a perfect resignation of our wills,' he wrote, 'it is like a seal to the book wherein it is written "that good and acceptable and perfect will of God"' concerning us. But when our minds entirely yield to Christ, that silence is known which followeth the opening of the last of the seals. In this silence we learn to abide in the Divine will, and there feel that we have no cause to promote except that alone in which the light of life directs us.'

'Get them by heart,' said Charles Lamb, of Woolman's writings.

WILLIAM BARTRAM (1739-1823)

THE first American book to have wide literary influence on writers outside America was William Bartram's account of his travels. Bartram was a Quaker, born in Philadelphia in 1739, the son of a famous botanist. He followed his father in the study of American natural history, and travelled widely through the lush wilderness of the extreme South. In 1791 he published in Philadelphia his Travels through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida, which was reprinted at London and Dublin, and issued in German, Dutch, and French translations.

The appeal of the book was not limited to scientists. The rank and untouched beauty of the Southern glades and the apparently limitless bounty of nature appealed to the romantics, who sought a primitive setting for Rousseau's natural man. Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey are heavily indebted to Bartram. Lamb, Shelley, and Tennyson profited from him. And in France, Chateaubriand generously adopted many of Bartram's experiences as his own, inserting them in his Voyages en Amerique et en Italie (Paris, 1828).

As a youthful illustrator of plant life, Bartram had shown great facility in sketching. As a mature writer, he gave form and color to scientific observation through the sensibility of an artist.

HECTOR ST. JEAN DE CRÉVECŒUR (1735-1813)

THE frontier had been a force in American life since the coming of the first settlers, but except in the earliest period it had played only a small role in American literature. Hector St. Jean de Crèvecoeur was one of the few eighteenth-century writers to picture the life of men on the fringe of civilization.

He was born in France, of a good family, in 1735, and had come to Canada to fight under Montcalm. From Canada his wanderings led him deep into the wilderness and along most of the Eastern seaboard. Finally, in 1765, he became an American citizen, a few years later he married and settled as a farmer in New York. The Revolution, however, broke the serenity of his country life, and in 1780 he returned alone to France. Once the war was concluded he returned to America, to find that his home had been sacked, his children captured but recovered from the Indians, and that his wife was dead. For a time he acted as the French consul in New York City, but in 1790 he left America for his homeland, where he died twenty-three years afterward.

His first book, Letters from an American Farmer, was published in London in 1782, the second of importance, Sketches of Eighteenth Century America (New Haven, 1925), was printed from manuscripts found long after his death. 'What is an American?' is eloquent pamphleteering, but his chief ability as a writer is shown in his essays on frontier life. Customarily he looked at the American scene through Rousseau-colored glasses, but intermittently he had a nice sense of reality and homely detail. He possessed an easy conversational style, which he heightened with a touch of the dramatic.

THOMAS HUTCHINSON (1711-1780)

THE finest historical writing by a colonial was in The History of the Colony and Province of Massachusetts-Bay by Thomas Hutchinson. This was a history based on the careful analysis of documents and written with the calm and polished balance of the best eighteenth-century prose. It is good throughout, but there is heightened interest in Hutchinson's treatment of the events leading up to the Revolution, a period in which he himself as politician played a vital part.

Few readers could guess, from Hutchinson's dispassionate account of the Stamp-Act riot, that the author was himself the lieutenant-governor into whose home burst the angry mob which 'cast into the street, or carried away all his money, plate, and furniture . . . his apparel, books, papers.' Most tragic to him as a historian was the destruction of irreplaceable historical documents.

Compared with John Reed's account of a later revolutionary mob, Hutchinson's narrative appears somewhat colorless. But this comes from a difference between centuries as well as between individual writers.

Thomas Hutchinson was born in 1711, the son of a wealthy commercial family of Boston. He was graduated from Harvard in 1727, and within a decade had begun to assume the positions of influence which seemed naturally his. At one time he was simultaneously lieutenant-governor, chief justice, president of the Council, and judge of the probate. From 1769-1774 he served as governor His divided loyalty to New England and to the Crown made him hated by the first and somewhat ineffective to the second Popular feeling rose against him, and in 1774 he sailed for England, where he intended to remain until the troubled times should pass They never did, and he never returned

The first of the three volumes of his history was published in Boston in 1764, and the second in 1765 In the composition of the concluding section he passed the last years of his life, finding in it a certain compensation for the country which he had given up, and which in his way he still loved

THOMAS PAINE (1737-1809)

THE action of the Boston mob, described by Hutchinson, was symptomatic 'These are the times that try men's souls,' wrote Thomas Paine in the first number of The American Crisis in December 1776 The literature of the American Revolution was chiefly one of pamphlets to fit the need Paine was a popular spokesman and agitator of the spirit of rebellion 'Time, with respect to principles, is an eternal Now,' he said

Thomas Paine was born in 1737 in England, and after a brief schooling carried on his father's trade as stay-maker In 1761, however, he received his first appointment as a minor public official From then on his chief interest was in man and government His political thought developed at a time when the theories of the rights of man and the social contract were being clarified He was a financial failure when he sailed for America in 1774, but he brought with him a stock of experience and reading, and a sympathy for the underprivileged which lasted him for life More immediately practical was a letter of introduction from Franklin, through which he became editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine

The outbreak of the Revolution found his pen already inked Anonymously he issued Common Sense Addressed to the Inhabitants of America (Philadelphia, 1776) One hundred and twenty thousand copies were sold within the first three months This pamphlet he followed with the various numbers of The American Crisis, written to encourage the colonials and to sway opinion on special issues

Common Sense has the rhetoric and structure of oratory It employs the questionings, hyperboles, epigrams, axiomatic statements, climactic structure, and emotional play of a Cicero It has both the defects in minutiae and the original vigor of spontaneous expression

Once the Revolution had been accomplished, Paine looked elsewhere The French bourgeoisie, also on the eve of revolt, welcomed him, and he helped to draft the Republican Manifesto, which was their call to arms He helped also to draw up their constitution, which expressed many of the principles included in his own book, The Rights of Man (London, 1791), issued a little earlier In time he fell out of pitch with the French, and eventually returned to America

Paine's soul was troubled by other than political revolutions He was born of Quaker parents, and from their faith it was easy for him to find the road to radical deism Out of the convictions of this philosophical development he wrote The Age of Reason (Paris, 1794), the vehemence of which surred and angered the American people It was Paine himself this time whom they defeated, and he died in 1809 more or less indigent and ignored

THOMAS JEFFERSON (1743-1826)

OUT of the American struggle for independence came one of the world's great revolutionary manifestos. The Declaration of Independence was drafted to proclaim the ethical and legal justification for the colonists' revolt. Like Paine's pamphlet, this was a document of common sense and an expression of natural reason. As with all revolutionary proclamations, succeeding eras have variously interpreted its precise meaning, and its spirit has both challenged and defended the status quo. Nothing could better testify to its inherent power.

The refiner of its expression was Thomas Jefferson, an eighteenth-century Virginia gentleman and political leader who later became the third President of the United States. Many individuals, however, helped with advice, and its true creator was the liberal spirit which had begun to permeate the colonies by way of France and England, the American statement of which had been provoked by incidents of a political and economic nature.

JAMES MADISON (1750-1836)

THE Revolution over, there was still the struggle to effect a union of the colonies. The earliest efforts at confederation failed, and although there was considerable resistance to any scheme demanding the relinquishment of sectional and individual rights, there was a compelling agitation for a strong central union on the part of those leaders who sensed an impending anarchy, with its consequent threat both to private property and to the nation. At the Constitutional Convention of 1787, a revised plan of government was proposed, which should afford closer integration and a system of checks and balances.

The Federalist was a series of essays written by Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and James Madison to influence the citizens of New York to ratify the new constitution. This series of eighty-five papers, of which the tenth is perhaps the key, began to appear, over the name 'Publius,' in New York newspapers of October 1787.

Most of them were written by Hamilton, but the impersonality of style makes it difficult to distinguish between the individual authors. Each echoed Hamilton's dictum of a year previous: 'Our communications should be calm, reasoning, and serious, showing steady resolution more than feeling, having force in the idea rather than in the expression.' With the passing of the excitement of war, an appeal might be made primarily to the mind rather than to the emotions.

Madison, who became fourth President of the United States, was a Virginian, who had been roused from lethargy by the struggle for freedom. He was an influential member of the committee which framed the Constitution, and fought for its adoption both in New York and in his native Virginia.

THOMAS GODFREY (1736-1763)

DURING the late eighteenth century, Philadelphia became the center of American society and art. It had the finest cabinet makers and the suavest poets. Both worked from English models, in a more or less successful endeavor to create a little London in Pennsylvania.

Thomas Godfrey was born there in 1736, was trained to be a watchmaker, and became a poet and playwright. There is almost nothing in The Court of Fancy (Philadelphia, 1762), his posthumous Juvenile Poems on Various Subjects(Philadelphia, 1765), or his tragedy in blank verse, The Prince of Parthia (produced in 1767) to distinguish him as an American. Damon, Sylvia, and Bacchus are not inherently miscast in poetry, the trouble with their appearance in Philadelphia is that they were worn-out expatriates.

FRANCIS HOPKINSON (1737-1791)

THE poetry which came directly out of the American Revolution consisted largely of ballads, which, like pamphlets, rose to the occasion. Francis Hopkinson's 'The Battle of the Kegs,' fitted to the same music as 'Yankee Doodle,' was a gay taunt at the British. Hopkinson, who was a harpsichordist of talent, is famous as the first poet-composer in America, and his song, 'My gen'rous heart disdains,' is an illustration of the easy lilt that comes from the rudimentary association of lyric and song.

Hopkinson was also a Philadelphia lawyer and a member of the Continental Congress. He wrote numerous pamphlets during the Revolution, and later several essays on literature, art, and music. He was an artist of some ability, and made a number of minor inventions. In everything he touched he was dexterous.

JOHN TRUMBULL (1750-1831)

'AMERICA hath a fair prospect in a few centuries of ruling in arts and arms. It is universally allowed that we very much excel in the force of natural genius and although but very few among us are able to devote their whole lives to study, perhaps there is no nation in which a larger portion of learning is diffused through all ranks of people. For as we generally possess the middle station of life, neither sunk to vassalage, nor raised to independence, we avoid the sordid ignorance of the peasants, and the unthinking dissipation of the great.'

These were the ambitious words with which John Trumbull received his degree of Master of Arts from Yale in 1770. In 1772, after a period of reading law, he returned to Yale as a tutor, and with Timothy Dwight, another of the Connecticut poets, was stimulating an interest in literature among a group of talented students. Together they made up the group which became known as the 'Hartford,' or 'Connecticut,' Wits, which was both the peak of provincialism and the beginning of a national literature. The recipe for their work was basically English, but the ingredients and seasoning were increasingly American.

M'Fingal was a taste of their less serious work. Its first two cantos were printed as a single canto in 1776, and the last two appeared in 1782. In general terms, the work is Hudibrastic, though Trumbull was right enough in denying that it was limited to this, and in pointing out the flavors of Churchill and Swift. Early American literature made serious use of biblical overtones and parallels, Trumbull broadened his comedy by analogy to the epics. It was a stock device of burlesque, which Trumbull used effectively.

Trumbull was born in 1750 and spent most of his life in Connecticut. His great activity in politics and law kept him from writing much, but his literary interest in the American scene gives him a position which his poetry scarcely warrants.

JOEL BARLOW (1754-1812)

JOEL BARLOW was born in Connecticut in 1754, and was one of Timothy Dwight's student wits at Yale. 'If ever virtue is to be rewarded, it is in America,' Barlow wrote to his classmate, Noah Webster, after his graduation. For a decade he tried one means of livelihood after another. Then in 1788 he sailed for Europe, where he remained for most of the rest of his life as land-agent, speculator, and writer.

In 1793, 'under the smoky rafters of a Savoyard inn,' he wrote 'The Hasty Pudding,' a nostalgic, but mock, pastoral, true to the imitative manner of the Wits. Its humor and vividness make it his best known poem.

Between the time of his graduation from Yale and his departure for Europe, Barlow had composed a pseudo-epic, in tune with the general belief that to write something fittingly American was to write something big. This revelation of the light of reason and the spirit of commerce he called The Vision of Columbus (Hartford, 1787). His European experiences matured and enlivened Barlow's mind, and before his return to America in 1805 he had reworked the poem into a more analytical statement of progress, giving it the new name of The Columbiad.

In his preface he made a distinction between 'the poetical object and the moral object.' 'The poetical is the fictitious design of the action. My object is altogether of a moral and political nature. I wish to encourage and strengthen in the rising generation, a sense of the importance of republican institutions, as being the greatest foundation of public and private happiness, the necessary aliment of future and permanent ameliorations in the condition of human nature.' Unfortunately, however, Barlow's poetical insensitivity keeps The Columbiad from being his best known, though it is his most important, work.

After his return from Europe, he lived for a few years in Washington. He then returned to Europe in 1811 on a mission to Napoleon, and died in the next year at a village near Warsaw.

PHILIP FRENEAU (1752-1832)

THE poetry of Philip Freneau best represents the transition between American verse of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. He accepted the logical verdict that American writers were inferior to English 'a political and a literary independence of their nation being two very different things—the first was accomplished in about seven years, the latter will not be completely effected, perhaps, in as many centuries.' Freneau first tried to combine the English pastoral tradition with the American scene. 'The Northern Soldier' was, in its original setting, the opening speech of Damon in his poetical drama 'Mars and Hymen.' In 'The House of Night' the Chesapeake region was misted over with Gothic horror. Later poems, such as 'The Wild Honeysuckle,' were, however, more indigenous. He was a transitional figure, also, in respect to the increasing emotionalism of his regard of nature. The age of reason was giving way to one of fancy.

Freneau was born in New York and educated at Princeton, where he was a classmate, and perhaps roommate, of Madison. After a brief and unhappy career as schoolmaster, he became secretary to a planter on the island of Santa Cruz. He returned from there when the Revolution was definitely under way, and became supercargo on a brig. On its way to the West Indies his ship was captured by the British, upon his release he blasted them in verse for the cruelty he had seen. It was from such poetry, as well as from elegies like that 'To the Memory of the Brave Americans,' that he became known as 'The Poet of the American Revolution.'

Freneau's later life was passed at sea and in the editorial offices of partisan newspapers.

JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE (1795-1820)

AT the beginning of the nineteenth century, New York took the place of Philadelphia as the metropolis of America. Two of its chief literary figures were Joseph Rodman Drake, a native New Yorker who practiced both medicine and poetry during his brief life, and Fitz-Greene Halleck. There is a contemporary account of their first meeting. 'As he [De Kay] and Halleck were walking, as was the custom of the time, upon the Battery, De Kay remarked that his idea of perfect happiness was a glass of grog, a lighted cigar, and Thomson's Seasons. Halleck said that he would like most to be sitting on a rainbow reading Tom Campbell. Drake, hearing this, approached Halleck and declared that was just what he would like, and that they must be acquainted. De Kay introduced them, and the friendship thus formed continued until Drake's death.' The scene is fairly typical of the attitudes of these Knickerbockers who chatted around the tables of luncheon-clubs and porter-houses.

Drake's poem, 'To Fitz-Greene Halleck, Esq.,' urged

Arouse, My friend, let vivid fancy soar,
Look with creative eye on nature's face,
Bid airy sprites in wild Niagara roar,
And view in every field a fairy race

His own vivid fancy led to the composition of 'The Cuplrit Fay.' The result is slight, facile, and agreeable.

F L Pleadwell, The Life and Works of Joseph Rodman Drake (Boston, 1935)

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK (1790-1867)

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK came to New York from Connecticut. His position as confidential clerk in the counting-house of John Jacob Astor gave him a living, and the success of The Croakers, a series of satirical verses written in 1819, in collaboration with Drake, assured him of a place in literary circles and Knickerbocker society. Though he had a wide reputation as a poet, he wrote comparatively little.

The great interest in the struggles of Greece to free herself from the Turks made Halleck's poem on 'Marco Bozzaris' immediately popular. An infallible test of true poetry was, to Halleck, the ease with which it could be memorized. By such standards 'Marco Bozzaris' was a classic, for it was attempted by every schoolboy orator in the country.

Halleck also insisted on 'grace of rhythm and cadence', a test which he met in the lovely lines of his threnody for Drake.

'The Field of the Grounded Arms' meets neither of these criteria, its excellence lies in the skilful adaptation of the stanza-form immortalized by Andrew Marvell in his 'Horatian Ode'.

WASHINGTON IRVING (1783-1859)

WASHINGTON IRVING was the greatest of the Knickerbockers. He was a young man of the town, when in 1807-08, with James Kirke Paulding and his brother, he wrote Salmagundi, a gay satire of New York society, in imitation of the Spectator. This humorous vein he continued in Diedrich Knickerbocker's A History of New York (N Y, 1809), where with the manner of a Federalist gentleman and the knowledge of an antiquarian he burlesqued both municipal history and national politics.

For some years his attention was diverted from writing by gestures at earning his living and by the serious duties of being a gallant. In 1806-08 he had made the Grand Tour abroad, but when he sailed for the second time in 1815 it was to work in the Liverpool office of his family firm. This time he remained seventeen years, for when the firm failed in 1818 Irving stayed on to earn his living by his pen. In 1819-20 he published The Sketch Book, a group of polite essays and tales which met with enormous success. Scott found it 'positively beautiful,' and Godwin praised its 'utmost elegance and refinement.' These were great compliments, but perhaps not the wisest praise. At any rate, Irving concentrated on elegance and refinement in the numerous books which followed.

Customarily his themes were English or, later, Continental, being those romantic pokings into shadows which were so popular in the Gothic revival. In a few instances, however, he returned to America, following the example of the Knickerbockers and Wits in his use of native scenery, but replacing their shepherds with his characters from German fables. The best of these tales are American classics, and mark the beginning of the development of the short story in America.

In 1826 Irving went to Madrid, where he was attached to the American embassy, and where he wrote the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus (London, 1828). His three years in Spain gave material for other histories and for the tales of The Alhambra (N Y, 1832). He left Spain in 1829 for a diplomatic appointment at the Court of St James's. In 1830 Oxford gave him the degree of LL.D., and in 1832 he returned with great éclat to America.

From 1842 to 1846 he was Minister to Spain, but chiefly his life centered at Sunnyside, his country estate. He wrote much: Astoria (N Y, 1836), A Tour on the Prairies(N Y , 1835), The Life of Washington(N Y , 1855-59), and other histories and biographies. He was impeccable, though somewhat lifeless, in each. Irving never possessed any greatly original creative faculty, but he was a very polished gentleman and a very polished writer.

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER (1789-1851)

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER was born in 1789 in New Jersey, and was brought up on the edge of the frontier at Cooperstown, New York, which his family had founded. He was sent to Yale, from which he was expelled. For a time he went to sea, where he faced a second frontier. Even his conservatism, strengthened by his marriage in 1811 with a daughter of the aristocratic De Lanceys and his subsequent life as a country gentleman, was touched with the vigor of his early experiences.

The theme of his first novel, Precaution (N Y , 1820), was sentimental and English, that of his second, The Spy(N Y , 1821), was historical and American. In The Pioneers(N Y , 1823), he began the Leatherstocking tales, the purpose of which he tells in his introduction to the completed series. Deerslayer, their chief figure, has become one of the world's characters. In 1823 also he published The Pilot, written from 'a sudden determination to produce a work which, if it had no other merit, might present truer pictures of the ocean and ships than any that are to be found in [Scott's] The Pirate'. Its reality and dash were new.

In 1826 Cooper sailed with his family for Europe, where he remained until 1833. This seven-year holiday did not decrease his love for America, but gave him critical perspective and the parental urge to correct his countrymen. Most of his writing thereafter was concerned with this aim. Cooper's words were sharp and wounded Americans. They retaliated with bitter criticism of his work, and he in turn with prolonged lawsuits, through which he won judgments, but not much respect. Later, in Satanstoe(N Y , 1845), he turned from satire to concentrate on the novel of manners. This novel was the first of a trilogy and family saga which he directed against anti-rentism, and in which he defended the large-landholder's privilege to enjoy the benefits which he and his ancestors had helped to establish. In Satanstoe is some of his best and most careful writing.

Cooper was often hasty and careless, but he more than compensated for his ineptitudes by his one great contribution to the writing of novels. He gave movement and drive, what in other writers had been hampered and slow-stepping, now raced and was free.

Cooper developed into a remarkably good theorist of the art of the novel. The introductions which he added to most of his novels are full of sound observation. Cooper was conscious of the differences between realism and romanticism; he conceived the technique of delineating the characteristics of one nationality through their effect on the sensibilities of another, and he was skilled in the novel of manners. In his theory, though not always in execution, Cooper was one of the very few sophisticated American writers in the nineteenth century.

AUGUSTUS B LONGSTREET (1790-1870)

FRONTIER humor had one of its earliest and best expressions in the writings of Augustus B Longstreet Longstreet was a Southerner, born in Augusta, Georgia, in 1790, brought up there, but educated in the North at Yale After the study of law he practised in Georgia, and while on the judicial circuit observed the rough-and-tumble life of the Crackers

He wrote for newspapers several accounts of local race meetings, fox-hunts, gander-pullings, and the awful fate of a Georgian who married a girl superficially educated in the North 'The Horse Swap' appeared in the Southern Recorder in 1833 In 1835 he brought these sketches together as Georgia Scenes (Augusta, 1835), 'By a Native Georgian' Five years later, the book was reprinted in New York, with the author's name given Longstreet's racy humor and his nice ear for dialect have kept it popular

Longstreet himself lost interest in such writing For a time he became a clergyman, and was later President of Emory College, Centenary College, the University of Mississippi, and the University of South Carolina His career turned him into stump orator, preacher, and lecturer The public came to know him as Judge Longstreet, or Dr Longstreet, or President Longstreet, or the Rev Mr Longstreet, but it is interesting that his students, remembering 'The Horse Swap,' called him 'Bullet'

WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS (1806-1870)

WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS was a poet, novelist, dramatist, biographer, historian, essayist, and editor He was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1806, and died there in 1870 As a boy he was apprenticed to a druggist, and then read law In 1825 he published a small volume of poems, but he became widely known only after the publication of Martin Faber (N Y, 1833) With his perception of the 'world-wide difference between writing for, and writing from one's people,' he did more than any other to aid in the development of a Southern literature

Simms' efforts to instil Americanism in literature had their best expression in the historical romance 'The chief value of history,' he said, 'consists in its proper employment for the purposes of art. . . The appetite which calls into existence the artist of history, is not satisfied with what he achieves' The province of the romancer, if its boundaries be not yet generally recognized, at least leaves him large liberties of conquest . . . We should regard the doctrine of resolutely restraining ourselves to the national materials as being rather slavish than national, unless the native tendencies of the writer's mind carried him forward in their particular contemplation But at the same time, it must be remembered that the national themes seem to be among the most enduring. The most popular writers of all periods have been always most successful whenever they have addressed themselves to either of three great leading subjects,—their religion, their country and themselves. From such an attitude comes a regional as well as a national literature.

Simms, stimulated by the work of Scott and Cooper, whom he greatly admired, wrote innumerable novels, the best known of which are on the Southern Indians and on the border warfare between Colonials and British during the Revolution. Almost all have 'the energetic and passionate utterance' inherent in his definition of the best romancer. They have sunk into an obscurity not completely deserved.

Despite Simms' Americanism, he knew the eighteenth-century English novel only too well. His plantation owners were English squires, and their humors were those of characters from Fielding. In the figure of Captain Porgy he developed the first American humorous character of any magnitude. 'Captain Porgy, sir,' said a fellow character, 'is the only wit and buffoon, sir, that I ever met, or ever heard of, who never suffered you once to forget that he was all the while a gentleman.'

During the Civil War his home at Woodlands was burned by the Northerners, and his earnings as a writer were cut off in the post-war chaos. His own work slackened, but through his friendship with men like Timrod and Hayne he still exerted a great influence on the writers of the South.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT (1794-1878)

'Oh, Bryant!' said a publisher, near the end of the poet's life, 'We call him "the great national tone imparter".'

Even in 'Thanatopsis,' begun when Bryant was seventeen, his lofty regard for poetry may be seen, and in his lecture 'On the Value and Use of Poetry,' given in 1825, this regard was refined into the principle which served him so long as he wrote.

William Cullen Bryant was born in 1794 in Cummington, in the Berkshire mountains of Massachusetts. He began to write verse at the age of nine, and as a boy he prayed 'that I might receive the gift of poetic genius, and write verses that might endure.' His family encouraged his definite talent, guided his reading, and set him tasks of composition. In 1808 his father arranged for the publication of his political satire 'The Embargo,' which was republished with additional poems in the next year. Bryant continued to write during his one year at Williams College and his study of law. Gradually he turned from the influence of Pope to that of Wordsworth.

Like other contemporary writers, Bryant was interested in the use of native material

To his brother, who had written some lines on a skylark, he said 'Did you ever see a skylark?'

The skylark is an English bird, and an American who has never visited Europe has no right to be in raptures about it. From such an attitude came his poem 'To a Waterfowl' and his many descriptions of Berkshire countryside. All these he infused with a mild pantheism.

His metrical experiments were of great importance to the development of American poetry. Before his time American poets were governed by the precepts of the Augustans, through him the greater freedom of the early nineteenth-century Englishmen came into our verse. The publication of his Poems (Cambridge, 1821) and the numerous verses which soon followed made him by 1825 the leading American poet.

An early reviewer of his poetry observed in 1826, 'He is alive to the beautiful forms of the outward world. These forms hold a language to his heart. Nature to him is not an inert mass, mere dead matter, it is almost a feeling and a sentiment.' It is this characteristic of 'almost' which vitiates

Bryant's poetry Though he loved nature, his poetry seldom contains any quick perception, and his observation is colored by romantic sentiment rather than charged with emotion.

He wrote comparatively little poetry After 1825, when he moved to New York, he was chiefly concerned with the editing of newspapers and magazines He was a sober-minded liberal in his editorial columns as in his poetry, and although he never had any wide popularity, he gave to journalism the same new dignity which he had given to poetry

JAMES GATES PERCIVAL (1795-1856)

JAMES GATES PERCIVAL is the poet of a single poem From 1821, when his first book appeared, he published much verse, but—'Although Percival remained the ranking American poet until the appearance of Bryant's Poems (1832), his work is now read only in anthologies, and he was soon forgotten' So states a recent biographer

Percival, a Yale graduate and a New Havener, was a man of much learning and varied talents Eccentricities overpowered his abilities as doctor, editor, and geologist, and a penchant for sentimentalism undermined his poetry His verse contains flashes of poetic richness, which are sustained only in 'The Coral Grove'

GRENVILLE MELLEN is known as the poet of a single line

And high above the fight the lonely bugle grieves, from an ode delivered at the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill Mellen was born in Maine, and practised law there for most of his life In 1833 he published a volume of verse, The Martyr's Triumph, Buried Valleys, and Other Poems Nothing in it alters his reputation.

EDWARD COOTE PINKNEY (1802-1828)

EDWARD COOTE PINKNEY had the spirit of a cavalier He was born an aristocrat and was educated in England and Baltimore. As a young naval officer he was cited for bravery when fighting against the West Indian pirates As a young lawyer in Baltimore he wrote occasional verse to lighten a party or to flatter a woman. In 1823, in Rodolph, A Fragment, he attempted dramatic verse, but the best and most characteristic of his Poems (Baltimore, 1825) is of a more casual nature. He died at the age of twenty-six

THOMAS HOLLEY CHIVERS (1809-1858)

POE dubbed Thomas Holley Chivers 'one of the best and one of the worst poets in America,' a dictum that holds true today 'Avalon' in its complete form contains stanzas of incredible badness, yet, when edited, it is one of the finest poems of its time. His 'Sonnet—To Isa Sleeping' was also rarely equalled. How much Poe owed to Chivers, or Chivers to Poe, was disputed by them, and has never been determined. Chivers died before he was fifty, having written some nine volumes. With his wild and unreined fancy, his profusion of exotic imagery, and his romantic sentiment, he remains one of American poetry's eccentricities—a strange phenomenon to have sprung from a Georgian cotton-farm.

EDGAR ALLAN POE (1809-1849)

POE is the first American poet and the first American writer of prose whose work can be said to have been of importance to the world.

Poe was born in 1809 in Boston, but, when his actress mother died in poverty two years later, he was taken into the family of John Allan, a wealthy tobacco exporter of Baltimore, and brought up by him. From 1815-20 he lived abroad with the Allans, partly in Scotland but mostly at school in England. After his return he studied in Richmond, and in 1826 entered the University of Virginia. He was soon dismissed for bad debts, then quarreled with his foster-father and enlisted in the army. In 1830 he entered West Point, from which he was dismissed, this time for deliberate disobedience. In 1827 he had published Tamerlane, in 1829 another volume of poems, and in 1831 still a third. Now quite cast off by Allan, he supported himself by writing and by intermittent editorial positions with newly-popular magazines. In this capacity he became the first practising critic of any dignity in American letters.

The publication of books written by Americans was made difficult by the ease with which English writing could be pirated. American magazines, however, were willing to pay for native material, and the stimulus to write what they would accept was intense. Poe wrote in 1841 to Fitz-Greene Halleck 'I need not call your attention to the signs of the times in respect to Magazine literature. You will admit the tendency of the age in this direction. The brief, the terse, and the easily circulated will take the place of the diffuse, the ponderous, and the inaccessible.'

It is hardly surprising that Poe's genius should have developed a theory of composition concentrated on closely-knit form and unity of tone. His mind developed form to a point of stiffness and artificiality, and it is difficult to read Poe without an excessive awareness of structure. His acute sensibility permitted him to express tone in terms of sound, color, and, at times, in that most difficult to convey of all perceptions, the tactile.

The structure of the short story, which had been loose in Irving's hands, Poe tightened so that emotion was allowed free play in such works as the tonal 'Fall of the House of Usher' or the psychological 'Cask of Amontillado'. In his tales of ratiocination, like 'The Purloined Letter,' the interest is more directly in the structure, and through the perfect co-ordination of its elements he was able to achieve an almost metaphysical beauty. Here in the character of Dupin is, incidentally, the prototype of a long line of master-minds.

'Poetry, above all things,' said Poe, 'is a beautiful painting, whose tints, to minute inspection, are a confusion worse confounded, but start boldly out to the cursory glance of the connoisseur.' The force of this impressionistic criterion of poetry was not felt in American literature until it had travelled a devious path, by way of the French symbolists, to the poetic renaissance of the early twentieth century.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE (1804-1864)

IN the prose of Nathaniel Hawthorne, America had the work of another genius. Hawthorne was one of the group in New England who, in the second quarter of the nineteenth century, gave to this section a pre-eminence of literary prestige which for a long time served popularly to identify 'New England' with 'American'.

He was born in 1804 in Salem, Massachusetts, out of whose port his father sailed as captain. In 1808 his father died at Surinam, and Hawthorne was brought up in polite impoverishment and dependence upon his maternal relatives. With their help he was sent to Bowdoin College, from which he was graduated in 1825. By all New England standards he should then have earned a living to support his widowed mother and his two sisters. Instead, he determined to become a writer, and anonymously published a novel, Fanshawe (Boston, 1828).

This first book gave a romantic touch to the milieu of his college days. Although it was favorably reviewed, Hawthorne was not satisfied and later destroyed whatever copies he could obtain. He then followed Scott into the past, but, in accord with nativism, the past was American. For a number of years he kept romantically to himself, writing occasionally for the newspapers, doing odd bits of hackwork, polishing his style, and acquiring a limited, though definite, reputation. In 1837 the first edition of Twice-Told Tales was published.

This increased his prestige but not his income. In an effort to establish himself economically he became a weigher and gauger in the Boston Custom House, an occupation which he found grimy and exhausting, and then took part in the transcendental socialism of Brook Farm. This was no better. He married in 1842, and moved to the old parsonage in Concord, where Emerson, in 1836, had written a part of Nature. It was here that Hawthorne wrote his Mosses from an Old Manse (N. Y., 1846).

Hawthorne was not only a writer of historical sketches like 'The Gray Champion,' but a distinguished essayist. Few of his achievements were more successful than his creation of atmosphere. Thus he could call up not only out of the mistiness of the past, but from the present as well. There are no finer examples of his descriptive prose than the graphic passages of 'The Old Manse'.

He was never satisfied with his tales, and longed 'to achieve a novel that should evolve some deep lesson and should possess physical substance enough to stand alone.' In 1850 he published The Scarlet Letter. This had, at least, psychological substance. From the cue of an old New England punishment for adultery, he described the effect of sin on those involved. In the novel he developed an elaborate technique of dynamic symbolism, foreshadowed in his earlier tales, by which he could express the nuances of his problem. Through this, and through his sensitive understanding of the play of conscience, he constructed an elaborate drama of the mind which was of inestimably greater importance to literature than was his physical reconstruction of the past. Such a scene from the inner drama is shown in the chapter 'The Leech and his Patient.'

The problem of physical substance continually perplexed Hawthorne, and he acutely observed of his tales that they had 'the pale tint of flowers that blossomed in too retired a shade.' Melville expressed it more bluntly 'He doesn't patronise the butcher—he needs roast-beef done rare'

In 'Ethan Brand,' The House of the Seven Gables (Boston, 1851), and The Blithedale Romance (Boston, 1852) Hawthorne indicated his drift toward contemporary material, utilizing in the first some earlier observations made on a trip to the Berkshires, in the second his recollections of Salem, and in the third his experiences at Brook Farm. A character like Hephzibah has poignancy and charm, but though Hawthorne was able to picture the contemporary individual and the details of the contemporary scene, he was unable to recreate the feeling of his time.

In 1853 Hawthorne went to Liverpool as consul, and later spent some months in Italy, from which experience he gained material for his inferior Marble Faun (Boston, 1860). He returned to America in 1860, exhausted by his daughter's illness and perhaps by his own touch of the Roman fever. He was able to write nothing more of consequence before his death in 1864. He had done enough.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON (1803-1882)

THE greatest American Romantic was Ralph Waldo Emerson. Nowhere better than in the words of this spokesman of nineteenth-century America can one find the natural enthusiasm of a nation faced with no apparent limits to prosperity nor checks to the individual, nor, using 'Romantic' in a more philosophical sense, can one observe more typically the loose distinction between understanding and reason.

Emerson was born in Boston in 1803, the descendant of a long line of men who had taught the public from the pulpit. No one was surprised when, four years after his graduation from Harvard in 1821, he quit teaching to enter divinity school. It was more startling when, in 1832, he resigned the ministry of the Second Church of Boston, after a dispute over the significance of the Lord's Supper, and sailed for Europe. He travelled widely, visited Carlyle among others, and returned to Boston in 1833, glad to be 'back again to myself.' In 1834 he moved to Concord.

The general loosening of Calvinistic rigor and the popular demand for things American found an enthusiastic supporter in Emerson. In 1836 he published Nature, in 1837 he spoke before the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa Society on 'The American Scholar'; and in 1838 he gave his startling and unorthodox 'Divinity School Address.'

Thereafter he travelled about America, giving innumerable lectures on these three cardinal points, which he collected and published as essays. Between tours, he rested comfortably in his snug, white home.

Santayana has best summarized the character of Emerson's thought 'Philosophy for him was rather a moral energy flowering into sprightliness of thought than a body of serious and defensible doctrines. In practising transcendental speculation only in this poetic and sporadic fashion, Emerson retained its true value and avoided its greatest danger. He secured the freedom and fertility of his thought and did not allow one conception of law or one hunt of harmony to sterilize the mind and prevent the subsequent birth within it of other ideas, no less just and imposing than their predecessors. For we are not dealing at all with matters of fact or with such verifiable truths as exclude their opposites. We are dealing only with imagination, with the art of conception, and with the various forms in which reflection, like a poet, may compose and recompose human experience.'

The philosophes of Plotinus, the Orientals, Kant, and Carlyle have all been shown to have their relationship to the expression of Emerson's thought, but they are like tags and trimmings. 'Transcendentalism,' Professor Townsend has observed, 'lies somewhere between the poetic metaphysics of Edwards and the prosaic, almost profane deism of Paine and Franklin.' Emerson's marrow is American.

It was not only the congenial stimulation of Emerson's message that made him popular, but the sparkle of his style. Emerson was an exuberant aphorist. He wrote sentences so brilliant that their successive haloes combine to obscure the vital weaknesses of the structure of the whole. One remembers Emerson for his sudden flashes of insight which pierce to the heart of the matter. He had the tricks of an orator and preacher, and it is rarely possible to forget in his prose the voice of a Lyceum lecturer inspiring and exciting his audience.

In his theory of poetry, Emerson also was American. His comment that 'it is not metres, but a metre-making argument that makes a poem,' and his scorn of Poe as 'the jingle man' recall the emphasis which seventeenth-century New England poets placed on the substance rather than on the fine lace of poetry. He believed that the idea and its expression were inseparable, a concept which differs little from the Edwardian metaphysics of beauty as an expression of divine order, which was at the root of the Calvinism from which he and his contemporaries were reacting.

In many ways Emerson is more distinguished as a poet than as a writer of prose. In his poetry the brevity of form serves to isolate the expression of single ideas, which his attempts to expand in prose often confused or, at least, weakened. Emerson's reaction against the softness of the lyric gave him a sympathy for English metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century, which can be paralleled by their sympathetic reception in the twentieth century. Emerson had, as the metaphysical poets had, a faculty of rescuing poetry from the mire of sentiment by placing it firmly on the basis of ideas.

HENRY DAVID THOREAU (1817-1862)

'If I seem out of step with the world,' said Thoreau, 'it is because I hear another drummer.' His spiritual rat-tat led him from Concord, where his father was a pencil-maker, to Harvard, called him back to Concord, hurried him from work each time he earned enough to eat, drew him into Emerson's household in 1841, and, still beating clear, drew him out again in 1843. In 1845 it signalled to him from the shores of Walden Pond.

There Thoreau tested his self-reliance. With his own hands he built his house, and with his own eyes he looked about him. Man saddled himself with property, and was then sway-backed. He galloped, to arrive nowhere. Thoreau stayed put.

What he saw he set down in Walden (Boston, 1854). It is one of the greatest of travel books, for Thoreau explored both the boundaries of man's impulses and the resources of his soul. He pondered, and he observed. With his skill he brought forth the insects, the birds, and the fishes, the flowers, the shrubs, and the trees to fill the earth.

Emerson, like so many others, forgetting Thoreau's 'Conclusion,' wrote, 'Instead of engineering for all America, he was captain of a huckleberry party.' But Thoreau heard the drum beat. Walden was his microcosmography, his little world.

The source of Walden was the record of his journal, carefully reworked before publication. Thoreau was one of the first Americans to try for a native idiom. 'Enough has been said in these days of the charm of fluent writing. . . All men are really most attracted by the beauty of plain speech, and they even write in a florid style in imitation of this. . . Where shall we look for a standard English but to the words of a standard man. . . Whose are the truly labored sentences? From the weak and flimsy periods of the politician and literary man, we are glad to turn even to the description of work, the simple record of the month's labor in the farmer's almanac, to restore our tone and spirits. The surliness with which the woodchopper speaks of his woods, handling them as indifferently as his axe, is better than the mealy-mouthed enthusiasm of the lover of nature. Better that the primrose by the river's brim be a yellow primrose, and nothing more, than that it be something less.' 'The language of excitement is at best picturesque merely.

You must be calm before you can utter oracles.'

Men have caught up with his prose, they have scarcely begun with his poetry. His verse had toughness, and he knew why. 'The poet is no tender slip of fairy stock, who requires peculiar institutions and edicts for his defense, but the toughest son of earth and of Heaven. . . ' 'A true poem is distinguished not so much by a felicitous expression, or any thought it suggests, as by the atmosphere which surrounds it.' 'There is a soberness in a rough aspect, as of unhewn granite, which addresses a depth in us, but a polished surface hits only the ball of the eye.'

A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (Boston, 1849) was Thoreau's only book besides Walden to be published during his lifetime. He died of tuberculosis in 1862, before he was ready for another. Whatever other volumes have been published over his name have been culled from his journals and letters.

CHRISTOPHER PEARSE CRANCH (1813-1892)

CHRISTOPHER PEARSE CRANCH was one of the many intellectuals who were drawn into the stream of Transcendentalism. He was born in Alexandria, Virginia, of New England parents, and as a young clergyman filled many pastorates in the East and Middle West. In 1840, after he had come to Boston, his kinsman John Quincy Adams was startled enough to comment in his diary 'Pearse Cranch, ex ephebis, preached here last week, and gave out quite a stream of transcendentalism, most unexpectedly'

Cranch left the ministry, and painted and wrote poetry. Several of his poems were published in the Dial, Transcendentalism's organ, and he is remembered as one of the lesser poets whose inspiration came from this intellectual quickening. As a painter of landscapes he lived for many years abroad, in Rome, Florence, and Paris. Finally, in 1863, he returned to America, and in 1873 to Cambridge, as a talented, but minor, figure

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING (1818-1901)

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING's life was spent in trusting himself. Thoreau, his great friend, called him 'as naturally whimsical as a cow is brindled'. Channing was the son of a prominent Boston doctor, and the nephew and namesake of the famous Unitarian radical and abolitionist. In 1834 he entered Harvard, but left in boredom after a few months and disappeared into the country to write poetry. He later lived for a time in Cincinnati, but in 1842 he came to Concord, which, as much as anywhere, was his home for the rest of his life. 'Ellery Channing,' said Hawthorne, 'is one of those queer and clever young men, whom Mr Emerson (that everlasting rejecter of all that is, and seeker for he knows not what) is continually picking up by way of a genius.'

Channing was eccentric and unreliable, but only his family could never forgive him. His friends saw in his character that which critics can find in his poetry: a freshness and individuality rising out of an undisciplined spirit.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW (1807-1882)

LONGFELLOW was born in 1807 in Portland, Maine, into a family of distinction and a milieu of culture. When he entered Bowdoin, as a sophomore and a member of the same class as Hawthorne, his intellectual snobbery was perhaps sufficient to make him uncongenial to his classmates and to mark him for a professorial career.

On his graduation in 1825, the college proposed that he prepare himself to teach modern languages there by a period of study abroad. He accepted, and for three years luxuriated in Continental culture and sentiment. He came back to Bowdoin, but, in 1834, after a similar proposal from Harvard, returned to Europe for an additional year of study.

His life in Cambridge, against the handsome background of Craigie House, became one of ease. 'Longfellow,' as Whitman described him, 'reminiscent, polish'd, elegant, with the air of finest conventional library, picture-gallery or parlor, with ladies and gentlemen in them, and plush and rosewood, and ground-glass lamps, and mahogany and ebony furniture, and a silver inkstand and scented paper to write on.'

This was a man, as Simms would have described him, prepared to write 'for' and not 'from' the people.

The nineteenth century was attracted by the sentiment with which he perfumed his verse, his pictures of an honest village blacksmith and a pathetic Evangeline reaffirmed for the public his truism that life was real and earnest. Longfellow supplied their demand, with a natural pleasure at their approval

At the same time he was searching the literatures of a dozen tongues to find fresh subjects and meters. He translated sentimental lyrics from the German, songs from the Troubadours, sonnets from the Italian, eclogues from the Latin, a hymn from the Byzantine Greek, laments from the Anglo-Saxon, ballads from the Spanish, and sagas from the Scandinavian. His work as a translator had its climax in his version of Dante's Divine Comedy. All these stocked his lectures and made him an expert metrist.

No other American poet had his skill. It found expression not only in his translations, but in his own poetry. 'Paul Revere's Ride' is a swift-moving, skilfully constructed ballad, 'Serenade,' an exquisite lyric, 'Divina Commedia' and 'Venice' are sensitive sonnets.

The taste for his variety of sentiment has passed, and no other American poetry has undergone a more thorough reversal of its original popularity among critics than has that of Longfellow.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (1809-1894)

'THE Brahmin caste of New England' Holmes defined as its 'harmless, inoffensive, untitled aristocracy'. He was all Brahmin. His ancestry was linked with the early settlers of New England, and as an adult he lived for many years on the water side of Beacon Street. His father was an orthodox minister. 'I might have been a minister myself, for aught I know,' Holmes said, 'if [a certain] clergyman had not looked and talked so like an undertaker.' Only a few contemporaries found his liberalism harmful, and no one found even his slight snobbery offensive.

For a year after his graduation from Harvard in 1829 Holmes read law, but gave this up for medicine, which he studied for two years at Boston and Harvard. For two more years he studied in Paris, before returning to Boston to establish his practice. He wrote frequently on medical matters, and in 1838 was made professor of anatomy at Dartmouth, a duty which required only three months of each year. In 1843 he published his famous study of 'The Contagious-ness of Puerperal Fever'. In 1847 he was made Parkman Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in the Harvard Medical School, and until 1882 he instructed and amused his classes.

'Now, James, let me talk and don't interrupt me,' Holmes once chided Lowell. After 1857, few Americans would have wanted to interrupt the wittiest man of the century. In November of that year, in the first issue of the Atlantic Monthly, appeared 'The Autocrat'. Holmes concentrated the best of his table-talk in this and succeeding numbers. In the next year these essays were published as The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (Boston, 1858), a second group appeared as The Professor at the Breakfast Table (Boston, 1860), and a third as The Poet at the Breakfast Table (Boston, 1872).

The sprightly turn of Holmes's mind marked his poetry as well as his prose. He was the great writer of 'occasional' verse. Whether it was a description of a family caudle-cup or Smibert's portrait of an ancestor, a poem for a class reunion or for the bicentenary of King's Chapel, an attack on Calvinism or a pleasant homily, he managed deftly to bring it into meter

Holmes wrote three novels, more or less similar. The best known, Elsie Venner (Boston, 1861), was, Holmes explained, an attempt 'to stir the question of automatic agency in its relation to self-determination. To do this by means of a palpable outside agency, predetermining certain traits of character and certain apparently voluntary acts, such as the common judgment of mankind and the tribunals of law and theology have been in the habit of recognizing as sin and crime' Holmes was equal to the theme, but he was too inherently a rambling conversationalist to meet the formal requirements of a novel. His novels are interesting because it is Holmes who talks, they lack, however, the personality of his essays.

Holmes lived to be an old man, saddened by the deaths of his fellow members of the Saturday Club, but seldom able to refuse the right word or the right bit of verse to celebrate an occasion. He died in 1894, and his mantle of wit and wisdom passed almost imperceptibly onto the shoulders of his son, Mr Justice Holmes

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER (1807-1892)

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER was born in 1807 in Haverhill, in Massachusetts. His parents were Quaker, and his childhood was passed in the atmosphere of homely friendliness which he describes in Snowbound. It was evidently the poetry of Robert Burns which set him at verse-making, and directed his attention to the farm-life about him. In 1827 his father agreed with the entreaties of editors interested in the work of his son, and sent him to Haverhill Academy. Flushed by encouragement, Whittier wrote, during the next five years, almost a poem a week. Verse was always a little too easy for him.

In 1829 he became editor of The American Manufacturer, a partisan paper. This was the first of many editorial positions which took him for brief periods to Hartford and Philadelphia, and occupied him during the greater part of his life, which he passed in Haverhill or nearby Amesbury. In 1833, excited by the message of William Lloyd Garrison, he became an abolitionist, and until the Civil War devoted his life to the cause.

His propagandist poetry is unsurpassed in American literature. He also wrote brief pastorals, but checked himself from the thought of long or elaborate poetry. 'I frankly confess that I have not resolution to attempt anything of the kind. Besides, unless consecrated to the sacred interests of religion and humanity, it would be a criminal waste of life, and abuse of the powers which God has given for his own glory and the welfare of the world.'

The advent of the Civil War, and the awkward situation of a Friend encouraging strife, more or less brought a close to Whittier's propagandist activities. From that time on he devoted himself to writing in terms of the gospel of love and natural simplicity, through which he became thought of as the kindly old man of America.

The quietness of Whittier's best verse dulls the appreciation of its artistic merit. Whittier consciously sought simplicity, and deleted whatever jarred. No other American poet has created homely imagery equal to that of Snowbound, nor has one written religious verse of a purity comparable with his.

Between Whittier and the literary figures of Cambridge and Boston stretched a long frontier of countryside.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL (1819-1891)

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, the descendant of an old New England family, was graduated from Harvard in 1838 after four years of 'the merest browsing.' In a desultory fashion he then proceeded to a degree in law. His love for Maria White woke him up. She was an enthusiast for the antislavery movement, and through her and her circle of friends Lowell had a period of excited liberalism.

For most of his life, Lowell was buffeted between two intellectual currents of the New England renaissance: the urge to revolt and the love of refinement. In 1843, a year before his marriage to Miss White, he could write to his friend Briggs, apropos of radicalism, 'I believe that no poet in this age can write much that is good unless he give himself up to this tendency.' But in 1850 he was saying to the same correspondent, 'My poems have thus far had a regular and natural sequence. First, Love and the mere happiness of existence beginning to be conscious of itself, then Freedom—both being the sides which Beauty presented to me—and now I am going to try more wholly after Beauty herself.' Certainly I shall not grudge for any Philistines, whether Reformers or Conservatives.

His direction was never final. In a single year, 1848, appeared A Fable for Critics, Poems, Second Series, The Biglow Papers, First Series, and The Vision of Sir Launfal. In 1888, three years before his death, he published both Political Essays and Heartsease and Rue. He was never essentially radical, nor intent on Beauty, yet he continued to play with each.

In 1855 he succeeded Longfellow at Harvard as Smith Professor of the French and Spanish Languages and Literatures, and was made professor of belles-lettres. From 1857 to 1861 he was the first editor of the newly-founded Atlantic Monthly, and in 1864 became an editor of the North American Review. Such activities demanded varied talents. He responded with editorials, essays, literary criticism, and poems of every sort. These were consistently graceful, always proficient, and almost invariably superficial.

'I reckon myself a good taster of dialects,' he said, and, after the publication of The Biglow Papers, boasted, 'I am the first poet who has endeavored to express the American Idea.' Such an expression of the vernacular was admirable for satirical attacks, but its thinness became apparent when Lowell attempted to extend its use in 'The Courtenay.'

Even in literary criticism, with which he was most occupied, he was content to relate the expressions of a cultivated mind. He seemed too awed by the classics of English literature to strike out for himself, either critically or creatively, but his observations are always interesting. It is only because there have since been so many men of good taste that his remarks are being forgotten. Certain of his essays, such as 'On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners,' will not be so readily passed by. These more directly express himself.

In 1877 he was appointed Minister to Spain, and in 1880 was sent to the Court of St. James's. In London his wit, good-breeding, and general respect for things British made him a universally satisfactory representative of the American people. That he was an index only to a minority did not matter. What the British admired, and what we still respect, was a man of very great ease, and an example of the new refinement to be found among Americans.

MARIA LOWELL (1821-1853)

'THAT is poetry!' Amy Lowell exclaimed, on reading 'An Opium Fantasy' 'It is better than anything her husband ever wrote, and he always said that she was a better poet than he'

Maria White was eighteen when she and James Russell Lowell first met Her home in Watertown was the center of a group of young Harvard graduates and their sisters, who alternated serious discussions of reform movements with music and dancing 'The Band' took an immediate interest in the pair 'They tell me I shall be in love with her,' Lowell jubilantly reported, soon after their meeting Their courtship took on a general interest, and their love letters were passed about from one member of 'the Band' to another.

In 1840 they became engaged, but they were not married until four years later After their wedding they moved to Philadelphia, where for a few months Lowell wrote editorials for the Pennsylvania Freeman His wife helped their income a little by selling translations of German poetry. In 1845 they returned to his father's home in Cambridge The deaths of three of their four children, and Maria's illness, saddened their happiness together

Occasionally her poems appeared in magazines or anthologies. There was no collection of her work, however, until after her death in 1852 Then, in 1855, Lowell had privately printed an edition of fifty copies In 1907 another limited edition appeared, but it was not until the publication of an enlarged edition in 1936 that her poetry became generally accessible

Her poems have a richness of color and imagination reminiscent of Coleridge and Keats She wrote comparatively little, but the quality of her verse is surpassed by that of no other American woman in the mid-nineteenth century save Emily Dickinson.

WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT (1796-1859)

WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT described the story of the Spanish conquest of Mexico as 'a rich prose epic' Narrative history had the appeal of romance based on history Motley's novel, Merry Mount (Boston, 1849), was followed by The Rise of the Dutch Republic (London and N.Y, 1856) The sequence is not strange

In 1813, during his junior year at Harvard, Prescott lost the sight of one eye and, two years later, much use of the second. From 1815 to 1817 he travelled abroad in a vain attempt to restore the sight of the latter to normality The effort was unsuccessful, and Prescott was faced with the realization that most professions were closed to him With the assistance of friends who read to him, he continued his study, which had been cut short by his accident. With them he read widely in the various literatures of Europe, and decided to become a writer He tried his hand at a tale or two, then considered writing a survey of some national literature, and at last rejected a study of Italian literature in favor of some phase of Spanish history. 'I believe the Spanish subject will be more new than the Italian.'

His study of Mably's Sur l'Étude de l'Histoire determined his approach. 'I like particularly his notion of the necessity of giving an interest as well as utility to history, by letting events tend to some obvious point or moral, in short, by paying such attention to the development of events tending to this leading result, as one would in the construction of a romance or drama.'

This principle was behind not only the writing of The History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic (Boston, 1838), but behind two of his subsequent narratives, The History of the Conquest of Mexico (N Y, 1843) and The History of the Conquest of Peru (N Y, 1847). The most dramatic passages of these are descriptions of actual conquest, but in many ways the most skilfully written are those in which he reconstructs 'the development of events tending to this leading result.' Such is 'The Foundation of Vera Cruz,' with its concluding intimation of doom

FRANCIS PARKMAN (1823-1893)

THE character of the Indian, Parkman wrote in 1845, 'will always remain more or less of a mystery to one who does not add practical observations to his closest studies. In fact, I am more than half resolved to devote a few months to visiting the distant tribes.' In April of the next year he set out on the journey which he describes in The Oregon Trail.

Since childhood, Francis Parkman had been interested in the American Indian, and at the age of eighteen had formed the plan for a history of the struggle between the French and English for Canada, in which the Indian had been a prime factor. His chief concern at Harvard, from which he was graduated in 1844, and subsequently while at law school was in his preparation for such a work. He studied intensively, but 'my reliance was less on books than on such personal experiences as should in some sense identify me with my theme.' For this experience he penetrated such wilderness as could be found in New England, 'merely to have a taste of the half savage kind of life necessary to be led.' Accounts of certain of these trips he published as articles.

The Oregon Trail had been a subject of interest to Americans since the early eighteenth-thirties, when Lee and Whitman had each led groups to settle near the Columbia River. Since 1842 the 'Oregon fever' had grown hotter, and the subject of possession was continually debated between the United States and Great Britain. President Polk's ultimatum to Great Britain came in the same month as Parkman's departure. It is not surprising that Parkman should have been interested in the Trail, nor that in the Knickerbocker for February 1847 he should have begun a narrative of his journey. In 1849 it appeared as a book. The Oregon Trail brought back into popular literature a realistic approach to the frontier and the Indian, which had been rare since the time of Mrs Rowlandson.

Parkman's health had been overstrained before his departure, on his return it was almost ruined, and for the rest of his life he suffered from intense illness and partial blindness. Nevertheless, in 1848 he began his history of France in the New World,<sup>1</sup> with The History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac (Boston, 1851), and in 1892 the series was completed. It represents probably the finest work by any American historian. Parkman's flair for narrative and the power of observation displayed in The Oregon Trail transform the material of his exhaustive research into an epic of conquest even finer than that of Prescott.

RICHARD HENRY DANA, JR (1815-1882)

RICHARD HENRY DANA, JR, wrote as realistically about life at sea as Parkman had written about life on the frontier Dana had entered Harvard in 1831, but in his third year his eyesight grew weak, and to recover his health he sailed as a member of the crew of the brig 'Pilgrim,' bound for California

'All the books professing to give life at sea,' Dana wrote in his preface, 'have been written by persons who have gained their experience as naval officers, or passengers, and of these, there are very few which are intended to be taken as narratives of facts.

A voice from the forecandle has hardly yet been heard My design is, and it is this which has induced me to publish the book, to present the life of a common sailor at sea as it really is,—the light and the dark together'

The 'voice from the forecandle' was, however, that of a gentleman, its expression was that of an observer rather than that of a common sailor This important distinction should always be made between types of realism

Dana returned to be graduated from Harvard in 1837. He then studied to become a lawyer, and in 1841 published The Seaman's Friend, an important study of maritime law He became a distinguished member of his profession, but Two Years before the Mast (1840) was his only great literary success

HERMAN MELVILLE (1819-1891)

'IN this world of lies, Truth is forced to flee like a scared white doe in the woodlands' Melville observed this, and spent his life in pursuit

Herman Melville was born in 1819 in New York City His family's fortune having fallen, his schooling was cut short and he was forced to work as a clerk, farm-boy, and schoolmaster In 1837 he sailed to Liverpool as a cabin-boy, an experience which he later described in Redburn (N Y, 1849) After his return and a period of various attempts to satisfy himself with employment on land, he sailed again on 3 January 1841, this time aboard the whaler 'Acushnet,' bound for the South Seas 'A whale-ship was my Yale College and my Harvard' On 9 July 1842, he deserted ship at the Marquesas Islands, fled inland and lived among the natives He escaped on the 'Lucy Ann,' an Australian whaler, and deserted her on 9 September 1842, at Tahiti, where with a new friend he tried farming on the islands In August 1843, he shipped on the frigate 'United States,' the scene of

White Jacket (N Y, 1850), and in October of the next year he reached home In Typee (London, 1846) and Omoo (London, 1847), he passed on a romantic dream of the Pacific to a delighted public

Melville was not content with his easy success In Mardi (N Y, 1849), with a Rabelaisian freedom, he explored other men's minds He discovered that it was his own depth which he should have plumbed This he did, with elaborate symbolism, in Moby Dick (N Y, 1851) and Pierre (N Y, 1852) Ahab was unhampered in his pursuit of the white whale, which stood for the insoluble and evil mystery of the universe Pierre was Ahab come ashore, to the more difficult task of reconciling conventionality and the pursuit of truth amidst the complexities of society 'Is this the warm lad that once sung to the world of the Tropical Summer?' The public would have none of Melville's naturalism, his books were ignored, and his fame was snuffed out.

The remaining years of his life were spent in obscurity, mostly as a customs inspector in New York City. He wrote more prose, Israel Potter (N Y, 1855), Piazza Tales (N Y, 1856), and The Confidence Man (N Y, 1857), but none of it was successful. After a trip to the Holy Land in 1856-57, he began Clarel (N Y, 1876), a long poem examining contemporary beliefs. This poem plus the poems in Battle-Pieces (N Y, 1866), John Marr (N Y, 1888), and Tumoleon (N Y, 1891), the last two privately printed, constituted his only literary work until, in the last few months before his death in 1891, he wrote the short novel Billy Budd (London, 1924).

Melville was the most versatile American writer of prose in the nineteenth century. His dexterity is displayed not only by the obvious contrasts between his lush descriptions of the land of the Typees, the exuberance of Mardi, and the harshness of Cuticle's operation at sea, but even more by his constant manipulation of style to give particular emotional effects. The Shakespearian quality of Ahab's soliloquies brings tragic overtones of Lear and Hamlet, and the conversation of the youthful Pierre is like that of a Romeo or the hero of a cheap romance. More subtly, the decay of Pierre's sense of time is illustrated by a disintegration of sequence in the beginning of the last section of 'The History of an Author.' Melville also knew the value of sound in prose; he had ears to help him write, as well as eyes. No writer of prose in his century so well understood the various potentialities of his medium.

It was not until 1919 that the greatness of Melville's achievement in the novel began to be recognized in America, but not even yet has the freshness and vigor of his poetry received its due attention. In an age when verse was polite and conventional, Melville was not afraid of roughness and individuality.

POEMS OF THE CIVIL WAR

WARFARE today evokes but little poetry, confronted with the modern holocaust, the imagination is stricken dumb. In the time of the American Civil War, however, there was still an atmosphere of romance, and the spirit of gallantry and sacrifice found expression in such ballads and elegies as are illustrated here.

The poets were from all sorts and conditions of men. Parsons was a Boston dentist and a famous translator of Dante; Meredith became a New York banker; Brownell was a Rhode Island poet who served as Farragut's secretary at the time of the battle of Mobile Bay; Read was a major on the staff of General Lew Wallace; Boker was a Philadelphia playwright and poet; Thompson was a lawyer, and Lathrop, who was only a boy during the war, was an author and editor

Such poems as these have helped to make the struggle between the North and the South even more popular than the Revolution as a display of romantic heroism.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN (1809-1865)

THE epitaph to the Civil War was written by Abraham Lincoln. Despite the fact that war was not ended when he helped to dedicate a portion of the battlefield of Gettysburg as a national cemetery, his words have become attached to the memory of all who fell during this great disruption of national unity.

The quietness and brevity of his benediction are in sharp contrast to the excited, two-hour long declamation of Edward Everett, which preceded it. Lincoln understood, far better than Everett, the need for repose which accompanies any tragedy, and knew that victory alone achieves no goal.

WALT WHITMAN (1819-1892)

'THE United States themselves are essentially the greatest poem.' Whitman's early life was his best preparation for expressing this poem in Leaves of Grass. He was born on Long Island in 1819, the son of a carpenter. He became first an office boy for a lawyer, then printer's devil, then schoolmaster, and finally newspaper editor. Off and on he returned to carpentering with his father. The countryside and seashore of Brooklyn and the crowded streets of New York became familiar to him, he even wandered as far afield as New Orleans and Chicago. As an editorial writer he understood the enthusiasms and aspirations of the people, and as a constant reader and reviewer he absorbed something from articulate philosophies. Tentatively, as early as 1847, he began to sketch poems which should give form to the body, the sense of fraternity, and the soul of the American people.

Leaves of Grass, first set in type by his own hands, was issued in 1855 as a slender volume of twelve poems. In each of the numerous, successive editions it grew larger, as he included new volumes, some of which were first separately published.

'The want for something finished, completed, and technically beautiful will certainly not be supplied by this writer, as it is by existing esthetic works. For the best poems both the old ones and later ones now accepted as first class are polished, rhymed regular, with all the elegance of fine conceits, carefully elaborated, showing under all the restraints of art, language and phrase chosen after very much has been rejected, and only the best admitted, and then all joined and cemented together, and finally presenting the beauty of some architectural temple—some palace, proudly rising in proportions of marble, entered from superb porticos and adorned with statuary satisfying the art sense and that of form, fulfilling beauty and inviting criticism. Not so his poetry. Its likeness is not the solid stately palace, nor the sculpture that adorns it, nor the paintings on its walls. Its analogy is the Ocean. Its verses are the liquid, billowy waves, ever rising and falling, perhaps sunny and smooth, perhaps wild with storm, always moving, always alike in their nature as rolling waves, but hardly any two exactly alike in size or measure (meter), never having the sense of something finished and fixed, always suggesting something beyond.'

The form of Whitman's poetry came from its subject, the freeness of his verse was an expression of the freeness of nature and the people, seen, however, through his own personality.

Whitman's early Leaves of Grass was the exuberant outgrowth of an almost adolescent enthusiasm for body and brotherhood. The Civil War matured him. In 1862 he began to nurse the wounded; day after day he passed tirelessly from bedside to bedside, his sensitive hands cooling fevered brows, his strong arms about the shoulders of dying men. Whitman had always been fascinated by death, as 'Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking' indicates, 'When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd,' however, was written not from the single incident of the assassination of President Lincoln, but soberly drawn from the suffering and deaths of countless common soldiers.

The poems which Whitman wrote after the Civil War were chiefly concerned with the soul. Whitman grew to understand that any significance attached to the American people meant little as a lusty cry of nationalism, and carried weight only as a thoughtful expression of mankind. His ear for poetry also developed and became more sensitive, and it is in his later work that he became a great poet.

Whitman was often criticized for the lengthy catalogings to be found in poems like his 'Song of Myself.' He intended the mass effect of such poemilisme to blend the individual citations into a single gigantic impression, full of life. Similarly impressionistic is the effect of his prose jottings in Specimen Days and Collect (Philadelphia, 1882-83), except that here the greater individual length and his increased sensibility gave to each its own life.

Whitman's influence has not always been direct, but it has been profound. Such widely different English writers as Robert Louis Stevenson and Gerard Manley Hopkins were indebted to him. 'French poetry,' said Richard Aldington, 'from about 1908 to 1914, was largely Whitman.' In America his influence was not widely felt until after 1910. To poets everywhere, once the lesson had sunk in, Whitman's pioneer work meant the extension of territory and the possibility of individual expression. He seemed to be 'The Poet' for whom Emerson had called

EMILY DICKINSON (1830-1886)

QUIETLY and perceptively, in a corner of Massachusetts, Emily Dickinson was writing poetry. Like Thoreau, she had 'business with a drop of dew.' She centered her attention not on the unusual, but on customary things seen unusually.

Her life was confined to her red-brick home in Amherst, to the flowers in her garden, and to the thick trees which shut both in. She seldom saw those outside of her immediate family, yet she seemed perfectly happy. She had no regrets at having given up the gaiety of her life as a young girl in a college town. 'I am small,' she wrote to a friend, 'like the wren, and my hair is bold, like the chestnut burr, and my eyes, like the sherry in the glass that the guest leaves.' 'I find ecstasy in living, the mere sense of living is joy enough.'

She expressed her rapture in a thousand brief poems, charged with the highest emotion, familiarity, and wit. Her quick perception delighted in provocative incongruities. God was a next-door neighbor to talk pleasantly with, the burdens of human existence were to be expressed in terms of the trivialities of a household. She liked piquancy of rhyme as well as of thought, and deliberately sought the effect of assonance, half-rhymes, or no rhyme at all.

Emily Dickinson was perfectly sure of herself, she would never change a line for the sake of convention.

She sought also to escape from the tired language of poetry. The hummingbird among the blossoms followed 'a route of evanescence,' and she saw the railway train, like the sun, 'lap the miles.' She weeded and trimmed the diction of her poetry with the busy fingers of a woman in her garden. Like a good housewife she kept words from standing idle, and her sense of economy of expression brought sharpness and distinction.

'Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive?' With this intelligent query, and definition of her aim, she sent four poems in 1862 to Thomas Wentworth Higginson, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, whose work she admired. Higginson became her friend and critic, though she never changed one line to please him, and neither he nor the few who knew she was writing could persuade her to publish her work. Her poems were meant to be sent with a letter, to be tucked into a cluster of flowers for a friend, or to be lowered in a basket from her room to children at play.

'If fame belonged to me, I could not escape her,' she said, nor could she, even by death. In 1890, 1891, and 1896, three series of her poems were published. Gradually the public came to understand that one of America's finest poets had lived without their having known her. It was not, however, until in the nineteen-twenties, with her inclusion in various anthologies and with the publication of The Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson by her niece, that there was true appreciation of her poetic significance.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH (1836-1907)

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH's first book of poems, The Bells (N Y, 1855), appeared in the same year as Whitman's Leaves of Grass, but their futures as poets could hardly have been more widely different. Aldrich had been born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and was in 1855 a clerk in a New York counting-room. Through the success of his romantic and sentimental poems he soon became an editor, and in 1866 moved to Boston, which he found delightful. Within a few months he wrote to Bavard Taylor:

'The humblest man of letters has a position here which he doesn't have in New York. To be known as an able writer is to have the choicest society opened to you . . . A knight of the quill here is supposed necessarily to be a gentleman. In New York—he's a Bohemian!'

Aldrich was no Bohemian, and became a very good editor of the Atlantic Monthly. He was never very original, but was a man of great taste and a writer of considerable skill. Certain of his short stories, such as

'Marjorie Daw,' were extremely popular in their day, while the reminiscences of his childhood, in The Story of a Bad Boy (Boston, 1870), became a minor classic of juvenile literature

His best work is to be found in the poetry of his later years Here he wrote with all the precision of an engraver upon silver He used to like to say of himself, 'Though I am not genuine Boston, I am Boston-plated' Most people agreed that it was excellent plate

BAYARD TAYLOR (1825-1878)

BAYARD TAYLOR described his Views A-Foot (N Y, 1846) as 'a new voice from the track where thousands had been before him' This account of a pilgrimage through Europe made him famous at the age of twenty-one Most of his poetry was a similarly romantic pilgrimage where thousands had been, and was equally popular Taylor wrote several novels and dramas, a fine translation of Goethe's Faust, and innumerable travel books and volumes of poetry Few, however, have any literary distinction

Taylor was born in 1825 in Chester County, Pennsylvania, and was largely self-educated In 1844 he published his first book of poems, partly with the meagre proceeds from it, and partly with the financial assistance of editors who were willing to print accounts of his travels, he immediately went abroad for two years In 1849 he journeyed to California to report the gold rush, his impressions of which are to be found in Eldorado (N Y, 1850) and A Book of Romances, Lyrics and Songs (Boston, 1851) In 1851 he made another trip to Europe, and continued his travels to the Near East and the Orient His Poems of the Orient (N Y, 1854), and particularly the 'Bedouin Song,' brought a sensuous titilla-

tion similar to that occasioned by Melville's Typee The public looked on him as the ideal romantic, and whether he grasped an Alpine stock, swung a miner's pick, or stood clad in Bedouin robes, they thronged to hear him lecture on his travels

The exoticism of his experiences, the charm of his personality, and the great seriousness with which he undertook deeper and deeper themes of poetry blinded critics, as well as the public, to the shallowness of his achievement It was, perhaps, because he felt so strongly that a poet 'must pitch his tent on many a distant field' that his work lacks any definite integrity

EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN (1833-1908)

THE leader of the American late-Victorian poets was Edmund Clarence Stedman He was brought up in Norwich, Connecticut, and was a student at Yale until he was expelled in 1852 after his second year Following periods as newspaper editor, manufacturer, war correspondent, and assistant in the office of the Attorney-General of the United States, in 1863 he entered

Wall Street The rest of his life was divided between Bears, Bulls, and the Muse of Poetry 'You know that all my writing is done after a long day's work.'

Stedman's own poetry of consequence is confined to a few lyrics and ballads. His chief significance to the historian of American literature comes through his immense influence as an editor and as the friend and critic of almost every contemporary poet from Taylor to Robinson. He wrote a critical study of British verse in his Victorian Poets (Boston, 1875) and, to supplement it, edited A Victorian Anthology (Boston, 1895), to cover the American scene he wrote Poets of America (Boston, 1885) and edited An American Anthology (Boston, 1900). Each is an important summary of the general taste formed by an admiration of the technique and aims of Tennyson.

Stedman realized that 'a new land calls for a new song,' and he sensed that the poetry of his time should bear a direct and vigorous relationship to contemporary thought. Yet he wrote: 'To my notion, metaphysics and transcendentalism are at the opposite pole from the divine and clear spirit of poetry' 'The traits . . . which I have deprecated earnestly are in the first place obscurity and hardness . . .' By the rejection of attempts to grapple with the problem of expression, Stedman encouraged poetry which dealt more with mood than with the mind. He failed to understand that a clear lyric spirit not only cannot express the uncertain and troubled times of intellectual change, but does not arise from them. Stedman's chief concern was with conventional craftsmanship, and he helped to stifle any potential vigor by too great an emphasis on traditional forms. If poetry was truly to express his transitional age, it should have been allowed to develop its own strength and to find its own forms.

BRET HARTE (1836-1902)

THE literary exploitation of the frontier received its first great impetus from Francis Bret Harte. He was born in 1836 in Albany, New York, and in 1854 followed his widowed mother to California. Harte tried his hand at numerous occupations which took him into the mining country, but what he really wanted to do was to write. When he was twenty-one he began contributing to the Golden Era and finally became one of its editors, then editor of the Californian, and finally of the Overland Monthly, all local magazines. His earliest literary attempts were, in the manner of Irving, to make use of the romantic Spanish civilization of California's past, and 'The Legend of Monte del Diablo' appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1863. It was, however, through stories like 'The Outcasts of Poker Flat' and poems like 'Plain Language from Truthful James' that he became by 1870 famous throughout the country. In 1871 he left for the East, where for a few years he was the darling of publishers and the public. In 1878, his funds growing low, he went as consul to Crefield in Germany, and after two years of service there and five years as consul in Glasgow, he settled in England for the rest of his life.

It was altogether fitting for Bret Harte to lay a sprig of western pine at the grave of Dickens. From him he learned the trick of making unusual characters seem typical, and of providing reality with an atmosphere of sentiment. Harte had a fine eye for the colorful and a keen sense of dramatic form, to both of which the development of the short story owed much. Rudyard Kipling, in 1881, when he was editing The Pioneer in India, queried, 'Why buy Bret Harte . . . when I was prepared to supply home-grown fiction on the hoof?' It was exactly what Harte himself had done with Dickens.

Harte wrote on the same theme for the rest of his life, but he never developed his art beyond that of his earliest successes, nor did he ever have much understanding of anything but the obvious dramatic significance of his material. Harte was an Easterner who had struck it rich by stumbling on a vein of free gold. Unfortunately for him it petered out.

JOHN HAY (1838-1905)

JOHN HAY is best known in political history as a suave and brilliant statesman, but in literature he is remembered for his coarse Pike County Ballads(Boston, 1871) Hay knew the Pikes, who were the chief stock figures of early frontier literature, from having lived among them on the edge of the Mississippi, in the village of Warsaw, Illinois, where he spent most of his boyhood, and from his school days in Pike County, Illinois. He attended a small college in Springfield, but finished his studies at Brown University in Rhode Island. It was his ambition, as his close friend Henry Adams later observed, 'to fill in the social gaps of a class which, as yet, showed but thin ranks and little cohesion.'

The fact that his uncle's law office, where he studied after graduation, was next to Lincoln's in Springfield, Illinois, led, through the persuasion of John G Nicolay, to Hay's being made an assistant private secretary to the President in Washington. The ten-volume chronicle of these years, which he wrote with Nicolay, Abraham Lincoln: A History(N Y, 1890), became famous.

Hay's career included the role of historian, novelist, journalist, and diplomat, but only incidentally that of poet. After several years in minor diplomatic posts he became an editorial writer and night editor of the New York Tribune, for which he wrote poems like 'Jim Bludsoe.' In these rough-hewn ballads his work was original and native, but he was unfortunately turned to conventional and unimportant versifying both by the misdirected criticism of his time and his own conception of the expression of a gentleman. This ideal he achieved as Ambassador to the Court of St James's, a post which he filled with 'completeness,' 'harmony,' and 'perfect ease.'

JOAQUIN MILLER (1839-1913)

JOAQUIN MILLER loved dash, and he lived picturesquely. 'My cradle was a covered wagon, pointed west.' He was a son of the open. His parents, who named him Cincinnatus Hiner Miller, were restless pioneers, his first years were spent on the Mississippi frontier, and in 1852 he travelled with them in a covered wagon to Oregon. He at one time attended a mission school at Eugene, but what he preferred to remember from his youth were his adventures as a runaway boy in California mining camps, his establishment of a pony express, and his life among the Indians. What he did not actually experience he later imagined, and an exciting legend grew up around him. In 1868 he published his first volume of poems, and in 1869 his second. In 1870 he went to San Francisco, where he met Bret Harte and his circle, and had a taste of what the public liked. He moved east to New York, and on to London. There, in 1871, he published his Songs of the Sierras, which caused a literary sensation. William Michael Rossetti, in particular, took him under his wing and introduced him to everyone. In his spurred boots and sombrero, Miller became at once for the British a symbol of the 'picturesqueness' of America. 'It helps sell the poems, boys! And it tickles the duchesses!'

Miller lived with dash, and he wrote with dash. 'All life, all action that is beautiful and grand and good is poetry waiting for expression. The world is one great poem, because it is very grand, very good, and very beautiful.' This optimism helped him to find heroic elements wherever he turned, but particularly in the West. Byron and, later, Browning influenced him poetically, but his vigor and sense of natural grandeur are particularly his own

Miller returned to America in September 1871, and after other sojourns in England, South America, and Italy, and brief returns to America, he settled for three years in a log cabin outside of Washington, D.C. Then he moved in 1886 to Oakland, California, where for the rest of his life he lived at 'The Hights,' a frame hut which he built above the city. There as a sage and eccentric he became a Californian phenomenon, representing a mysticism that was still popular and a West that had passed.

SAMUEL CLEMENS (1835-1910)

SAMUEL CLEMENS was born in Florida, Missouri, and moved when he was four to the Mississippi river town of Hannibal. In Tom Sawyer (Hartford, 1876) and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (N Y, 1885) he made out of a somewhat romanticized Hannibal that which came to be the common scene of American childhood. In 1848 he became a printer, and two years later made a start as a newspaper man. In 1853 he left Hannibal to go down the river to St. Louis, and during the next few years travelled as far afield in his work as New York and Philadelphia. In 1857 he set out for South America, but on reaching New Orleans decided instead to become a river pilot. When the river traffic was closed at the outbreak of the Civil War, he moved on to Nevada to join his brother. There, in reporting for the Virginia City Enterprise, he began to develop his power as a writer.

Samuel Clemens became 'Mark Twain' at Virginia City. In the lusty and exaggerated language of the men who thronged there at the discovery of the Comstock Lode he found expression for his genius. No matter how greatly he later refined his vocabulary for the public, the richness and vitality of frontier speech remained with him.

'The humorous story is American, the comic story is English, the witty story is French. The humorous story depends for its effect upon the manner of the telling, the comic story and the witty story upon the matter. The humorous story may be spun out to great length, and may wander around as much as it pleases, and arrive nowhere in particular, but the comic and witty stories must be brief and end with a point . . . The humorous story is told gravely; the teller does his best to conceal the fact that he even dimly suspects that there is anything funny about it . . . ' This was Mark Twain's analysis of his 'Jumping Frog,' and was the basis of all his humorous and satiric writings. It was exaggeration of one sort, as 'Huck Finn on the Raft' was of the opposite. Less fortunately, it was also the cause of his continued insensitivity to form.

'The Jumping Frog of Calaveras County,' written in 1865 when he was a reporter in California, made him nationally known. Innocents Abroad (Hartford, 1869) heightened his popularity. Mark Twain travelled to the Holy Land, and poked, en route, into the same shadowy corners which had lured authors from the time of Irving to that of Taylor. He roared with scornful delight at what he discovered, and Americans howled with him. It was the beginning of another declaration of independence on the part of the people.

Shortly after his return, in 1870, he married, and became editor of the Buffalo Express. In 1872 he published Roughing It, one of the few books worthy of the frontier life it portrayed. Life on the Mississippi (Boston, 1883) was a somewhat more polished, but equally worthy, account of flush times on the river. These and the stories of Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn are, in every important sense, classics

In 1872 he moved to Hartford, Connecticut, and guided by his wife's conventional touch settled down to a quiet and on the whole conventional life. Emotionally, however, he rebelled, and he developed a bitter cynicism towards most of the opinions and beliefs which his fellow citizens held proper. His Voltairean dialogue on Little Bessie is a far cry from his account of the Jumping Frog

HENRY TIMROD (1828-1867)

HENRY TIMROD was born in Charleston, South Carolina. In this Cambridge of the South he became a friend of Paul Hayne, when they were boys together at Mr Coate's school. The two later joined the group which gathered about the aging William Gilmore Simms, and were filled with Simms' ambition for a Southern literature.

Timrod, who was the son of a literary editor and minor poet, studied for a time at what is now the University of Georgia, tried law, and finally became a private tutor. Most of his poetry was published in The Southern Literary Messenger, or in Russell's Magazine which succeeded it as the voice of the South. A volume of his poems was published in Boston in 1860, and was favorably reviewed, but no other volume appeared until Hayne edited, with a laudatory preface, the posthumous Poems of Henry Timrod (N Y, 1873)

'The Cotton Boll' and 'Charleston' are given significance by their sense of the impending Civil War, but have a poetical strength and independence of their own. The greater part of his work, however, was merely a languorous blending of Wordsworth and Tennyson. As much as Timrod admired Poe, he could not accept the latter's insistence on Beauty as the sole criterion of poetry. He preferred Wordsworth's lesson, 'first, that the materials and stimulants of poetry might be found in the commonest things about us, and second, behind the sights, sounds, and hues of external nature there is "something more than meets the senses, something undefined and unutterable which must be felt and perceived by the soul" in its moments of rapt contemplation.' 'When I stand in the presence of Truth, Beauty, and Power I recognize poetry.' As a poetic principle it ought to have been enough, and was, at least, responsible for 'The Cotton Boll'

It was not Timrod's continued poverty, illness, and early death which explain the mediocrity of the greater number of his poems. He was on the whole too imitative and too easily seduced by poetic diction and rhyme. Not even his tenderness and sincerity could redeem his poetry from its conventionality.

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE (1830-1886)

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE achieved much wider fame than did his friend Timrod. The son of an American naval officer who died when the boy was young, he was cared for by his mother and by an uncle who was the Hayne of Webster's famous address in the United States Senate. He was graduated from Charleston College and then took up law, which he dropped for journalism and poetry. His chief position and most brilliant success was as editor of Russell's Magazine during its brief existence from 1857 to 1860. Poems (Boston, 1855), Sonnets and Other Poems (Boston, 1857), and Avoho (Boston, 1860) helped establish his reputation as a poet.

At the beginning of the Civil War, Hayne was an aide on the staff of Governor Pickens, but being physically frail was soon forced to retire. Like Timrod, but not so successfully, he wrote patriotic verse. The bombardment of Charleston and the ravages of Sherman's army caused him to lose his home and his possessions, and after the war he retired with his wife to Copse Hill, a shanty in the pine barrens near Augusta, Georgia, where they lived romantically and in poverty. 'Perhaps you know,' Lanier wrote to a friend, 'that, with us of the younger generation in the South since the War, pretty much of the whole of life has been merely not dying.'

Hayne's poetry attracted such friends in England as Tennyson, Swinburne, and Jean Ingelow, and in America the New England coterie all paid him tribute. They respected his skill, but mostly they admired a certain romantic sentimentality which we are accustomed to associate with his period and particularly with the poetry of the South.

SIDNEY LANIER (1842-1881)

SIDNEY LANIER's perception that verse is a phenomenon of sound, and his attempts to write poetical harmony instead of mere melody make him one of the important figures of American poetry in the nineteenth century. Lanier was the greatest virtuoso flautist of his day, and his training as a musician is responsible for his accomplishment as a poet. 'Whatever turn I have for art,' he said, 'is purely musical.' His taste for Mendelssohn in preference to Bach may weaken his musically imitative verse, but it does not alter the correctness of his initial perception.

Lanier was born in 1842 in Macon, Georgia, and was graduated from Oglethorpe College at the age of eighteen. He was appointed a tutor there, but in 1861, during the first year of the Civil War, he enlisted in the Confederate Army. Finally, near the end of the war, he was captured and imprisoned. He tried teaching again, and law, but his health was broken and he went to Texas in what proved at last to be a vain fight against consumption. In Texas he resumed his study of the flute, which he had played since boyhood, and attempted to secure a position in a symphony orchestra in New York. From there he went in 1873 to Baltimore as a member of the Peabody Symphony Orchestra. Later, in 1879, as a result of his intensive study of English literature, he was appointed a member of the faculty of Johns Hopkins. It was in this post that he wrote The Science of English Verse (N.Y., 1880) and Musical and Poetry (N.Y., 1898).

Tiger Lilies (N.Y., 1867), Lanier's only novel, is a backwoods account of the Civil War, and is important as an early example of local color. His keen ear enlivens the dialogue, uneven in quality though it is, and his sensibility accounts for innumerable passages of great poetic beauty. Unfortunately the book appears never to have been reprinted.

In all his writing, Lanier is an admirable representative of the agricultural romantic tradition of the post-war South, sharing the common and deep-rooted antagonism to Northern industrialism which lingers on even today in the magnolia metaphysics of many who take their Southern stand. Lanier's particular position was reinforced by an overwhelming reliance on the spirit of brotherhood, and the concluding line of 'The Symphony' best summarizes both his philosophical and his poetical creeds

Music is love in search of a word

It has often been argued that Lanier confused two mediums of expression in stressing the relationship between music and poetry. This may be partially true in his practice, but not in his theory. What he actually said was that each was a phenomenon of sound. It is not without significance that Lanier was fond of Piers Plowman, nor that he returned to the oldest tradition of English poetry in 'The Revenge of Hamush'. Lanier's emphasis foreshadowed the modern poets' reliance on the ear. Despite the inadequacy of his system of indicating metrics through musical notation, The Science of English Verse is one of the few important American contributions to the theory of poetry

GEORGE WASHINGTON CABLE (1844-1925)

THE most popular American literature during the last quarter of the nineteenth century dealt with unfamiliar and romantic sections of the country. George Washington Cable became famous for his tales of New Orleans. He was born there in 1844, and was brought up in close familiarity with its neighboring plantations, its great town houses, its French Quarter, and the soft patois of the Creoles. He served in the Confederate Army during the Civil War, then became a reporter, and after 1869 worked as a clerk in a firm of cotton factors for as long as he lived in New Orleans. His first use of local material was in his column for the New Orleans Picayune, but it was not until 1873 that his first tale appeared in a magazine. 'Belles Demoiselles Plantation' appeared in 1874, and in 1879 his stories were collected in Old Creole Days. This and his novel, The Grandissimes (N Y., 1880), were his best work.

Cable himself considered that his greatest literary influences came from the work, somewhat oddly grouped, of Dickens, Thackeray, Poe, and Irving. To Poe he apparently owed his fine sense of structure, but his style seems closer to the leisurely but crisp exposition of Prosper Mérimée, one of the many Frenchmen whom he read. Cable's chief interest was psychological rather than dramatic, and his characterizations, though penetrating, are indicated lightly rather than in the probing manner of a Hawthorne.

Cable's research into the social history of New Orleans disclosed certain details which made him unpopular in the South. In 1885 he moved to Northampton, Massachusetts, where he lived for the rest of his life. He continued to write, but increasingly it became difficult to recognize in the pious man who went to seed among home-culture clubs, garden plans, and Northampton society, the author who had once written with the verve and apparent worldliness of a Frenchman.

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS (1848-1908)

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS extended the use of regional material into that of folk-lore Harris was born in 1848 in Eatonton, Georgia, and as a boy was trained as a printer He began contributing to the paper in whose printing office he worked, and after the Civil War was a reporter on papers in Macon, in New Orleans, and in Savannah In 1876 he became an editor of the Atlanta Constitution, a position which he retained for the next twenty-five years. Harris' first sketches of Negro life were written to fill a column for this paper In these local stories he was particularly concerned with an accurate transmission of Negro speech

An article by William Owens, 'Folk-Lore of the Southern Negroes,' in Lippincott's Magazine for December 1877, apparently opened Harris' eyes to the wealth that lay near at hand Owens, after discussing the folk-lore of all tribes and peoples, laid particular stress on that of Africo-Americans, which he described as 'a medley of fables, songs, sayings, incantations, charms and superstitious traditions brought from various tribes along the West African coasts' 'Almost without exception the actors in these fables are brute animals endowed with speech and reason, in whom mingle strangely and with ludicrous incongruity, the human and brute characteristics The dramatis personæ are always honored with the title of Buh, which is generally supposed to be an abbreviation of the word "brother" Of the Buh fables, that which is by all odds the greatest favorite, and which appears in the greatest variety of forms, is the "Story of Buh Rabbit and the Tar Baby."'

Harris took immediate advantage of the suggestion, and became an avid collector of Negro fables His first volume, Uncle Remus His Songs and Sayings(N Y , 1881), had an immediate popularity. Parallel stories poured in on him from all lands, and his work took on a significance somewhat similar to that of the collection of Chaucerian analogues or to the assembling of English and Scottish ballads by Professor Francis Child of Harvard

'The story of the Rabbit and the Fox, as told by the Southern Negroes,' said Harris, 'is artistically dramatic in this it progresses in an orderly way from a beginning to a well-defined conclusion, and is full of striking episodes that suggest the culmination. It seems to me to be to a certain extent allegorical, albeit such an interpretation may be unreasonable At least it is a fable thoroughly characteristic of the Negro; and it needs no scientific investigation to show why he selects as his hero the weakest and most harmless of all animals, and brings him out victorious in contests with the bear, the wolf, and the fox It is not virtue that triumphs, but helplessness, it is not malice, but mischievousness'

LAFCADIO HEARN (1850-1904)

LAFCADIO HEARN's life was as exotically romantic as the tinge he gave to his writing. He was born on the Ionian island of Leucadia, from which he received his Christian name, and was the son of an Irish army surgeon and a Greek mother He was brought up by a great-aunt in Ireland, and attended for a time Roman Catholic seminaries in France and England. At the age of sixteen he ran away, spent three years in poverty in London, and in 1869 drifted to New York 'I was nineteen years old and a stranger in the great strange world of America, and grievously tormented by grim realities. As I did not know how to face those realities, I tried to forget them as much as possible, and romantic dreams, daily nourished at a public library helped me to forget.' He left New York for Cincinnati, where he became a reporter, and in 1877 went on to New Orleans in his 'worship of the Odd, the Queer, the Strange, the Exotic, the Monstrous' to which he pledged himself. His search led him to the West Indies, and finally to Japan, where he married and lived for the rest of his life.

'His idea of work was to illustrate with a mosaic of rare and richly-coloured words. But there is a wonderful tenderness, a nervous sensibility of feeling, an Oriental sensuousness of warmth in his creations.' This was Hearn's description of Théophile Gautier, but it might as well have been of his own writing. Hearn translated and was enormously impressed with the work of French romanticists, particularly that of Gautier and Loti. It was the spirit of these impressionists that led him to state 'I write for beloved friends who can see colour in words, can smell the perfume of syllables in blossoms, can be shocked with the fine elfish electricity of words. And in the eternal order of things, words will eventually have their rights recognized by the people.'

'The Legend of L'Île Dernière' is the first section, and background, of the account of a child saved from the storm which swept Lost Island in 1856. Hearn's familiarity with the scene came from his visit in 1884 to the near-by Grand Island, near the mouth of the Mississippi, which possessed, he wrote to a friend, 'subjects innumerable for artistic studies—a hybrid population from all the ends of heaven, white, yellow, red, brown, cinnamon-color, and the tints of bronze and gold. Basques, Andalusians, Portugese, Malays, Chinamen, etc.' On Hearn's return to New Orleans, his tale was printed in the columns of the local Times-Democrat, and some years later was expanded into Chûta (N.Y., 1888). 'My work is ornamental—my dream is poetical prose.'

SARAH ORNE JEWETT (1849-1909)

THE finest local writing of this period is to be found in Sarah Orne Jewett's The Country of the Pointed Firs (Boston, 1896). 'People talk about dwelling upon trivialities and commonplaces in life,' she said, 'but a master writer gives everything weight, and makes you feel the distinction and importance of it, and count upon the right or the wrong side of a life's account.' Her sketches of the country people of Maine, among whom she was brought up, are full of quiet and sympathetic charm, and mellow with Miss Jewett's own ripeness of spirit. By understatement and indirection, faintly flavored with the dialect her keen ear caught, she was able to capture the mood and character of New Englanders as no one else has done, before her time or since.

At the back of her desk she kept pinned, as a constant reminder, 'those two wonderful little bits of Flaubert,—Écrire la vie ordinaire comme on écrit l'histoire; and the other Ce n'est pas de faire rire—mais d'agir à la façon de la nature, c'est à dire de faire rêver'.

Sarah Orne Jewett achieved the goal of all local-colorists of her time, that if a writer can faithfully portray human nature, the characters of his particular region will be in reality universal. The common error of local colorists, as of most regional writers, was, however, as Carl Van Doren has observed, that in actuality they 'thought first of color and then of form, first of the piquant surfaces and then—if at all—of the stubborn deeps of human life.'

Miss Jewett learned to know the people about South Berwick, where she was born, during the many rides about the countryside which she took with her father, who was a country doctor. She never travelled widely nor led an exciting life. She never needed to, for like Thoreau she discovered that the world was close at hand.

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS (1837-1920)

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS' chief contribution to American literature was the advancement of realism, but his long career as a writer included most of the literary phases of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Howells was born in 1837 in Martin's Ferry, a small Ohio village. The village life meant little to him, however, and his first book, Poems of Two Friends(Columbus, Ohio, 1860) was the reflection of his reading of early romanticists. A biography of Abraham Lincoln for the campaign of 1860 earned him an appointment to the consularship at Venice, where he remained for four years. This experience was expressed in Venetian Life(N Y, 1866) and Italian Journeys(N Y, 1867), graceful travel sketches in the tradition of Bayard Taylor. In 1866 he became an assistant editor of the Atlantic Monthly, in what he called 'his Holy Land of Boston'. For a time he wrote little but innocuous verse, and it was not until his novels of New England life that he entered the field of 'reticent realism,' the boundaries of which he describes in the selection titled 'The Novel'. 'Ah! poor Real Life, which I love,' he wrote, 'can I make others share the delight I find in thy foolish and insipid face?' Of these novels the best are A Modern Instance(Boston, 1882) and The Rise of

Silas Lapham(Boston, 1885). Balzac and, later, the Russians became his models, or at least his admirations. From 1871 to 1881 he was the editor of the Atlantic, and then settled in New York, the new literary capital, for the remainder of his life. In A Traveler from Altruria(N Y, 1894) he wrote a mildly socialistic and Utopian novel which reflected his increasing discontent with the structure of capitalistic society. It is difficult to determine whether Howells was a little ahead of or a little behind his times, but he kept close to them.

FREDERICK GODDARD TUCKERMAN (1821-1873)

FREDERICK GODDARD TUCKERMAN's sonnets seem to have been written ahead of their time. To a form which poetasters customarily rendered silken and sleek he dared to give homeliness and rough strength. He did not care, however, to publish, and his poetic skill was known to his contemporaries only through his occasionally sensitive but generally orthodox volume, Poems, published in 1860, 1864, and 1869. It was not until 1908 when Walter Prichard Eaton discovered several sonnets in an unpublished anthology by Louis How, looked up Poems, and wrote an article on Tuckerman's verse that he was at all remembered, and not until 1931, when Witter Bynner edited a collection of Tuckerman's published and hitherto unpublished sonnets, did he become well known.

The subject matter of his sonnets comes close to what the nineteenth century would have considered anti-poetic. As to their form Bynner says, 'In the light of Tuckerman's obvious familiarity with the classics, in the light of recent experiment with variations in verse, in the light of present knowledge that Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson had ears more sensitive than their contemporaries had, we may be sure that Tuckerman knew what he was doing when he ended a sonnet with an Alexandrine or shortened the last line by a foot, or when he shuffled the rhyme-scheme to suit the rise and fall of his meaning. He was aware of his irregularity, as was George Meredith in "Modern Love," adding to the sonnet the two extra lines. He was as tenderly conscious of his form as was ever any maker of the sonnet. Instead of bungling or stalling the sonnet-form he renewed it and, moulding it to his emotion, made it inevitable.'

Tuckerman was born of a distinguished Boston family, and entered Harvard at the age of sixteen. Because of trouble with his eyes he quit college and never returned. Later he studied law and in 1844 was admitted to the bar. During a visit to Europe he was the guest of Lord Tennyson, who, as a token of admiration, presented him with the manuscript of 'Locksley Hall'. Most of his life, however, was passed in seclusion from the world, in his home at Greenfield, Massachusetts, where he settled in 1847 and where he remained until his death.

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL (1841-1887)

THE poetry of Edward Rowland Sill has its chief importance in his effort to bring into his verse some sense of the intellectual currents of his time. Sill was for the idea 'I almost feel like despising and violating all form, when I see the fools that worship it. I always understood why Emerson made his poems rough—and I sympathize more than ever.' To a publisher he wrote 'You cannot, of course, realize (till you have come to teach the subject) how all our best literature in this century—and a good deal of it in the last century—dips continually into this underlying stream of philosophical thought, and ethical feeling. "In Memoriam," for example, is one of the poems I read with my senior classes. You may discuss its rhythms, its epithets, its metaphors, its felicities and infelicities of Art,—you are still on the surface of it. The fact is that a thinking man puts a lot of his views in general into it—and those views and his feelings about them are precisely the "literature" there is in the thing. And the study of it, as literature, should transfer these views and feelings straight and clear to the brain of the student.'

Josiah Royce, the philosopher and his friend, wrote of him 'As for Sill's ideal itself, it was an ideal of the highest manhood, an ideal towards which he desired all his friends to strive. His ideal future man was the combination of the truth-seeker and the doer of good into the one person of the true poet. He would never admit any real opposition between the scientific and the poetical spirit, or between either and the capacity for simple practical devotion to one's daily tasks. We ourselves, he taught, make in our false one-sidedness the so-called oppositions of these ideals. In themselves they are one. Science is, or ought to be, poetry, and poetry is knowledge, and the humanity of the future will not divide life, but will unite it.'

Sill was born in Connecticut, and was educated at Phillips Exeter Academy and at Yale. In 1861, after his graduation, he travelled by sea to California, where he taught first in the Oakland High School, and from 1874 to 1882 as professor of English at the University of California. In 1868 he published The Hermitage and Other Poems, the only book of his poems made public during his life. In protest against the increasing vocationalism of the University of California he resigned his position in 1882 and moved back to the East. Thereafter he became a fairly regular contributor of both prose and poetry to the leading magazines. An exceptionally shy man, he seldom published over his own name; and it may have been his general lack of self-confidence which kept him from striking out as boldly in the form of his verse as he did in its ideas.

JOHN BANISTER TABB (1845-1909)

THE memorable quality of the verse written by 'Father Tabb' lies in its orthodox devotion to Roman Catholicism and the warmth of its kindly, if unsophisticated, wit. Some few of his contemporaries likened his verse to the poetry of Robert Herrick, George Herbert, and William Blake. With characteristic modesty he refuted their claims in a letter to his friend Browne, dated 25 December 1906.

I am getting, dear Doctor, from England the very kindest notices of my book [A Selection from the Verses of John B Tabb (London, 1906)]. From the Tribune comes a clipping so like your own estimate and worded so like it, that were you in London, I should lay it to your charge. 'A Modern Herrick,' it is headed. Of this poet, the Golden Treasury has all that I know. With Herbert and Blake I am even less familiar, and yet it is to these three that they compare me. Nothing, I am glad to observe, is detected of my worship of Keats, whom I know best of the gods.

His verse, however, bears traces of a literary influence exerted by a reading of Edgar Allan Poe, and in the humorous poems, as well as in those written obviously for the enjoyment of small children, one finds a clear resemblance to the punning of Thomas Hood and the charm of Robert Louis Stevenson.

'Father Tabb' was born at 'The Forest,' the family estate at Mattoax, in Amelia County, Virginia, in 1845. He served in the Confederate cause during the Civil War, and after the War, he was appointed to an instructorship at the Episcopal St Paul's School for Boys in Baltimore, Maryland. In 1872 he entered St. Charles College, Maryland, to study for the Catholic priesthood. In 1884 he was ordained priest in the Baltimore Cathedral, and from then onward until his death in 1909 he was a member of the faculty at St. Charles.

RICHARD HOVEY (1864-1900)

DESPITE Richard Hovey's ambition to recreate the Arthurian legends in the form of poetic drama, his abilities as a poet are chiefly remembered through his collaboration with Bliss Carmen in writing Songs from Vagabondia (Boston, 1894) and More Songs from Vagabondia (Boston, 1896). The collaboration also included the work of Tom Buford Meteyard, who designed with a touch of Pre-Raphaelite craftsmanship the covers and end papers of the Vagabondia volumes which were to attain such widespread popularity. The three friends had spent a holiday together, including a winter in New York, a trip to Arcadie, and an autumn tour to Washington, D C. The early winter of 1894 was to bring to fruition the ideal of spiritual vagrancy and literary Bohemianism in the first Songs from Vagabondia.

Hovey's education at Dartmouth College, where he emerged as a class poet, author of 'Men of Dartmouth,' a song still sung today at Hanover, and subsequent journeys across the Atlantic to Paris and Avignon, furnished the background for the kind of lyricism which was to become known as the poetry of Vagabondia. However far he travelled, he was never to lose the spirit of

The campus is reborn in us to-day,
The old grip stirs our hearts with new-old
joy,
Again bursts bonds for madcap holiday
The eternal boy

Hovey attempted to combine the Transcendentalism of Emerson and Whitman with his admiration for the ecstatic utterances of the French Symbolists and Parnassians, particularly as he interpreted them in the work of Mallarmé, Verlaine and Verhaeren. The exuberance of Bliss Carmen's

All the world is Vagabondia
To him who is a vagabond

overrode whatever contradictions may have been felt in an equal love for Paul Verlaine, Hovey's 'Prince of Vagabonds,' and Walt Whitman, his 'King of Free-Versists.'

Some hint of the historical importance of the Songs from Vagabondia is indicated by Muriel Miller's Bliss Carmen: A Portrait (Toronto, 1935), in which she wrote:

However, the two poets did not mean their Vagabondian scheme to be a mere idle pastime of a summer's day, it represented far more to them. It was their joint protest against the warped convention-bound lives of the material, money-making American citizen of their day.

Hovey was to intersperse his songs from Vagabondia with translations of Maurice Maeterlinck, more songs for Dartmouth and the Psi Upsilon fraternity, Seaward: An Elegy, in memory of Thomas Williams Parsons, as well as further experiments in the writing of poetic drama. His brief career which came to an end at the age of thirty-six in 1900 was to symbolize for the American reading public the promise and vitality of a hybrid Bohemianism which had taken root in the literary circles of New York and San Francisco.

LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY (1861-1920)

LIKE her contemporary, Lizette Woodward Reese, Louise Imogen Guiney turned to the poetry of the seventeenth century to find a criterion for the writing of her own verse. But unlike Miss Reese's verse her work bears traces of a wide, yet specific reading of the Cavalier poets. 'I owe much to the minor lyricists of King Charles I's time,' she wrote, 'and to Sidney and Spenser before them. The great prose writers who taught me my little prose are

Sir Thomas Browne, Jeremy Taylor, Burke, Lamb, Hazlitt, Newman and Stevenson.' Among her lyrics one finds evidence of her reading the poetry of Marvell, Campion, Vaughan, Lovelace and Suckling, yet whatever literary influences marked her style, she retained throughout her work the stronger impress of an individual discrimination in its choice of diction. As she wrote in her 'A Talisman'

For better than fortune's best
Is mastery in the using,
And sweeter than anything sweet
The art to lay it aside!

The distinct quality of her literary admirations as well as the quickened perceptions of her own poetic gifts may be found in the first stanza of her poem, 'Written in my Lord Clarendon his History of the Rebellion.'

How life hath cheapen'd, and how blanke
The Worlde is! like a fen
Where long ago unstained sanke
The starrie gentlemen.

Since Marston Moor and Newbury dranke
King Charles his gentlemen.

LIZETTE REESE (1856-1936)

THE lyricism of Lizette Reese owed a confessed indebtedness to the English lyric of the early seventeenth century and in particular to the poetry of Robert Herrick. To this marked literary influence she contributed her own art of understatement as well as a singular perception into the physical beauty of the gardens and countryside of suburban Baltimore. Something of her attitude toward her contemporaries of the later nineteenth century may be found in A Victorian Village(New York, 1929)

The Victorians had a full cup and it spilled over. I think that this is the reason that their faults, worst among which were their over elaboration and sentimentality, are so apparent. They had so much material on hand, so much creative ability, that at times and too often they were mastered by them. If they had been poor and idle, they might have had fewer defects. To judge their poetry and prose a critic must have a poetic sense and a sense of humor.

The criterion that Miss Reese set for her own work is also suggested by her commentary on poetry. 'The novelists must stand by their creation of character, which is the decisive test of the artist, the poets by their perpetuation in word and phrase of beauty, that readjusted of the changes and chances, the confusions and rancors of life.'

As Harriet Monroe once wrote of her:

Miss Reese's method was always simple. If the personal poems in her early books confess a few Victorian frailties of diction and sentiment—faint whiffs of faded perfume, a bit trite like pressed flowers—her best work, even of the 80's and 90's escaped that softness, and her latest style is free of archaism, as her moustes of sentimentality. Her poems considered as a whole have a rare unity and harmony. Always carefully studied, they do not try to say or do anything startlingly original, but they sing, with austere taste and musical precision, a clear minor tune all in the same key.

GEORGE STERLING (1869-1926)

THE career of George Sterling and his influence upon the writers of the Pacific Coast comprise one of the most spectacular, if not one of the most notable, chapters in American literary history Born at Sag Harbor, New York, in 1869, at the age of twenty-six he moved to California, where under the patronage of Ambrose Bierce and within the environment of the Bohemian Club he combined political Socialism with an aesthetic that ran parallel to the Yellow Book doctrines of Ernest Dowson and the later Oscar Wilde His verse, however, revealed the uses of a Miltonic rhetoric that overweighed the latter-day Romanticism which entered the phrasing of the titles of his books A Wine of Wizardry, The Triumph of Bohemia, The House of Orchids, The Caged Eagle, The Binding of the Beast

His friends in writing of him had much to say of his physical appearance They spoke of his 'long-featured mediaeval face' or with equal freedom of his seeming to be 'a reincarnation perhaps from the Athens of the fourth or third century B C' Jack London said, 'He looks like a Greek coin run over by a Roman chariot'—all of which was testimony to the fact that his personal character contributed its share to his literary influence

He was among the first to recognize the abilities of younger Californian writers and in 1926 he wrote of Robinson Jeffers under the title Robinson Jeffers, the Man and the Artist, paying tribute to a quality in Jeffers which most closely resembled his own emotion as he once wrote

I stand as one whose feet at noontide gain
A lonely shore, who feels his soul set free,
And hears the blind sea chanting to the sun.

AMBROSE BIERCE (1842-1914?)

AMBROSE BIERCE wrote a few of the finest short stories in American literature, and some of its most trenchant cynicism He was born in Pomery, Meigs County, Ohio, in 1842 During the Civil War he served in the Union Army, and took part in the battles of Chickamauga, Shiloh, Kenesaw Mountain, and others After the war was concluded, he travelled to San Francisco where he finally became a newspaper editor In 1871 he went to London where he contributed to humorous magazines and became a fellow of minor literary circles In 1876 he returned to San Francisco Here, the combination of his talent and his sarcasm made his 'Prattle,' a column which he conducted for the San Francisco Examiner, read and feared by the public Admiration of this kind of power continued among bright and ambitious newspapermen until it culminated in the schools of H L Mencken and Ben Hecht. However widely the public read him in newspapers, Bierce's published volumes had no great success Toward the end of the year 1913 he disappeared, presumably to fight with Villa in Mexico Nothing more was heard of him.

Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (N Y, 1891), later titled In the Midst of Life, and Can Such Things Be? (N Y, 1893) contain his best short stories Of the first volume, Boynton has said 'The constant factor in the book is extreme emotional tension. Sometimes the characters are pathological and the situations abnormal. The people and the events are barely within the reach of credibility. Bierce thus often turned naturally to war episodes, because, though actual, they were farthest from the even tenor of normal life. In these it was the rarest occurrence for him to reveal a sense of humankind in general. The mass, the herd, the crowd, served as a dim background for one man living at the highest pitch and often enough dying of the tension, and the individual himself was less a character than a piece of susceptibility played on by overwhelming emotions.' This is the character not only of such tales as 'An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,' but of the mystery stories of Can Such Things Be?

The quality of his emotion which made him known as 'Bitter Bierce' can be seen in the admirable compression of his Fantastic Fables (N.Y., 1899) and The Cynic's Word Book (N.Y., 1906), later titled The Devil's Dictionary. Poor Richard had undergone a remarkable transformation

STEPHEN CRANE (1871-1900)

THE brilliant precocity of Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage (N.Y., 1895) placed him in the foreground of a new generation of writers who came of age in the closing years of the nineteenth century. It was as though his admirers were waiting for the very type of psychological fiction that The Red Badge of Courage was to introduce. His earlier novel Maggie (N.Y., 1892), which had been rejected by magazine editors and publishing houses of the day, has left its impress as one of the first experiments in naturalistic prose written in America.

Upon reading the poems of Emily Dickinson, and under the stimulus of his 'discovery' of a highly original American genius, he wrote his first book of poems, The Black Riders, which he issued in 1895. Harriet Monroe, in her introduction to The New Poetry (N.Y., 1917), quoted the title poem of his second book of verse, War Is Kind, to illustrate the character of a kind of poetry which she regarded as being in the line of a tradition that foreshadowed the work of the Imagist and the 'free verse writers' of the poetic Renaissance in 1912.

Stephen Crane was born in Newark, New Jersey, in 1871. He entered Lafayette College, but before receiving a degree left at the age of sixteen to test his skill at journalism. The spectacular success of The Red Badge of Courage, with its vivid detail of character and situations on the battlefield, insured the further success of his journalistic career. He was sent as war correspondent to the Greco-Turkish War in 1897 and in the following year to the Spanish-American War.

His success also brought with it the rapid expenditure of his remarkable nervous energy which seemed to produce at white heat the impressionistic vividness of such short stories as 'The Open Boat' and 'The Upturned Face,' as well as the highly-keyed output of many reportorial sketches, stories for children, and new poems. No less energetic was his invasion of England during the last two years of his life, where he moved toward the center of a literary group that included such men as Joseph Conrad, Henry James, and Ford Madox Ford. He died in the Black Forest, Germany, in 1900.

FRANK NORRIS (1870-1902)

FRANK NORRIS brought force to American fiction 'Give us stories now, give us men, strong, brutal men, with red-hot blood in 'em, with unleashed passions rampant in 'em' Moran of the Lady Letty (N.Y., 1898), a novel of the tigers of the sea, and McTeague (N.Y., 1899), the story of the disintegration of a brute of society, displayed a type of romantic materialism. But Norris began to perceive a deeper significance to force

Men were naught, death was naught, life was naught, FORCE only existed—FORCE that brought men into the World, FORCE that crowded them out of it to make way for the succeeding generation, FORCE that made the wheat grow, FORCE that garnered it from the soul to give place to the succeeding crop

It was the mystery of creation, the stupendous mystery of re-creation, the vast rhythm of the seasons, measured, alternative, the sun and the stars keeping time as the eternal symphony of reproduction swung its tremendous cadences, like the colossal pendulum of an almighty machine—primordial energy flung out from the hand of the Lord God himself, immortal, calm, infinitely strong

On this concept Norris patterned his uncompleted trilogy on wheat, his symbol of world force, the scheme of which is described in the annotation to the selection 'Wheat' from its first two novels. It was not, however, solely the display of force which gave these books their significance, but Norris' increasing implication that such force must be understood and controlled by man

Frank Norris was born in 1870 in Chicago, the son of a wealthy wholesale jeweler, and spent a great part of his youth in San Francisco. For about two years Norris studied art in Paris, filled with the spirit of romantic mediaevalism which had marked the nineteenth century. He returned home in 1890 and entered the University of California, but left after four years without graduating, and spent a year at Harvard. It was during his college years that he began McTeague. Later he became a newspaper correspondent, was sent to South Africa to cover the Boer War, and later to Cuba for the Spanish-American War. His last years were spent in New York in the office of a publisher. Before he could either complete his trilogy on wheat or commence his projected trilogy on the Battle of Gettysburg as a symbol of the spirit of America, he died of peritonitis.

'Every novel,' Norris wrote, 'must do one of three things—it must (1) tell something, (2) show something, or (3) prove something. Some novels do all three of these, some do only two, all must do at least one . . . The third and what we hold to be the best class, proves something, draws conclusions from a whole congeries of forces, social tendencies, race impulses, devotes itself not to a study of men but of man.' It is this perception on Norris' part of the function of a novelist which brings regret that he did not live long enough truly to fulfill it

EDWIN MARKHAM (1852-1940)

EDWIN MARKHAM's reputation rests almost solely upon the publication of a single poem, 'The Man with The Hoe,' which appeared in the San Francisco Examiner on 15 January 1899. Its long worked-over and rhetorical plea for social justice was inspired by Markham's admiration for Millet's famous painting from which he borrowed the title of the poem and dramatized the figure of a French peasant, 'Bowed by the weight of centuries Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox'

Markham was born in Oregon City, Oregon, in 1852, and was the youngest son in a family that had moved westward across the continent. He was educated at the State Normal at San Jose, California, and graduated from the College at Santa Rosa. His verse was written in the Byronic convention that had been established by Joaquin Miller on the Pacific Coast and which marked the dramatic mannerisms of everything he wrote. The publication of The Man with the Hoe and Other Poems in 1899 was followed two years later by a second volume, Lincoln, and Other Poems, in which the same Populist note of eloquence was struck. The character of Markham's Populism at the turn of the nineteenth century was to be reflected later in the literature of 'Muck-raking' and in the journalism of the 'Trust-busting' era.

He moved to New York in 1901, making his home on Staten Island.

CHARLES ERSKINE SCOTT WOOD (1852-)

THE life of Charles Erskine Scott Wood has been that of the complete man. Trained at West Point, he served in many Indian campaigns, then left the army to study law, receiving the degrees of Ph B and LL B from Columbia in 1883. He settled in Portland, Oregon, and became widely known in the Northwest as an attorney. Soon he began to lead his own kind of double life: in one of his two offices he met corporation clients, and in the other greeted poets, artists, rebels, hoboes, and dreamers. At one time, when he was still in Oregon, he took over the editorship of The Pacific Monthly, and almost single-handedly wrote the entire magazine, under various pseudonyms, at the same time that he was carrying on his work in law. His practice became more and more that of defending the downtrodden, and his best writing has come out of his intense sympathy and understanding of their plight.

His most important works in prose are his satirical Heavenly Discourse(N Y, 1927) and Earthly Discourse(N Y, 1937), which deftly remove the epidermis from contemporary shams and illustrate his burning passion for social justice. In poetry he has made of The Poet in the Desert(Portland, Oregon, 1915) both a rhapsody and a vehement protest against the man-made ills of life. So frequently has he revised this work, and so completely does it include his attitude toward life that it becomes something of a modern Leaves of Grass. Its free verse and sweep are vaguely suggestive of Whitman, but the voice is that of Wood.

With his wife, Sarah Bard Field, the poet, he has made his home at Los Gatos, California, into a haven and salon for writers on the Pacific Coast.

TRUMBULL STICKNEY (1874-1904)

TRUMBULL STICKNEY was perhaps the most gifted and certainly the most precocious member of a 'tragic generation' in America which came of age in the years immediately preceding the end of the nineteenth century. William Vaughn Moody himself has said that Stuckney's 'Prometheus Pyrphoros' antedated his own 'The Fire Bringer' by several years. It was at Stuckney's own request that Moody did not then acknowledge the other's priority in the use of the material and what Moody calls 'my deep obligation to his work'. The sources of Stuckney's poem were in the account given by Hesiod. Stuckney also left a splendid fragment, begun in the first half of the year 1901, of a drama on the life of the Emperor Julian.

Trumbull Stuckney was born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1874. He was graduated with high classical honors from Harvard in 1895 and in France studied for seven years at the Sorbonne and at the College de France. He was the first American ever to receive the degree of docteur es lettres from a French university. His Les Sentences dans la Poésie Grecque was accepted as one of the best of modern studies in Hellenic literature. In the autumn of 1903 he became an instructor of Greek at Harvard. He died in the fall of 1904.

As E. K. Rand wrote of Stuckney in the Harvard Graduates' Magazine, 'A rare intellectual leadership, a command of affections and enthusiasms, was in store for him' in his teaching at the time of his death. Considering the nature of his death, for he died of a tumor in the brain, the lines his editors place at the end of his Poems are significant:

Sir, say no more,
Within me 'tis as if
The green and climbing eyesight of a cat
Crawled near my mind's poor birds

WILLIAM VAUGHN MOODY (1869-1910)

IN the year 1900 no poet in America occupied as significant a position as William Vaughn Moody. In 'An Ode in Time of Hesitation' and in his 'Gloucester Moors' he spoke directly to the literary public of his day. He was a leader in what might well be called America's 'tragic generation' in literature, a generation which after the death of Longfellow, Lanier, and Whitman faced the not unconscious danger of failure in a concerted effort to revive the power of poetic drama in English verse and to make their creation flourish on American soil.

William Vaughn Moody was born in Spencer, Indiana, in 1869, and after leaving high school did some local newspaper work and studied drawing and painting. By teaching and tutoring he earned his way through Riverview Academy, New York, and then through Harvard, from which he received an A. B. in 1893 and an A. M. in 1894. In 1895 he was appointed to an instructorship at the University of Chicago, at which he wrote, in collaboration with Robert Morss Lovett, a History of English Literature.

While in Chicago he began his ambitious projects in poetic drama, choosing as a central theme the union of God with man and the incompleteness of either without the other. The very diction of his verse became possessed by the desire to recreate Miltonic grandeur and was typified by his writing such lines as I am the Woman, ark of the law and its breaker

His very consciousness that America was 'the eagle nation' Milton saw 'Mewing its mighty youth' seemed to lead him further toward the creation of awe-inspiring themes in epic phrasing. Yet, as Percy H. Boynton remarked, 'His love for America, however, did not dull his sense of the dangers that threatened its youth. Within its boundaries he was well aware of the economic evils which menaced it. . . . In "Gloucester Moors" he was disturbed, if not made fearful. . . . There was no hope in the poem, only speculation and distress.' And that distress was only partially relieved by the satire which animated his convictions in 'The Menagerie.'

The commercial success of his play in prose, The Great Divide (N. Y., 1906), fell far short of the goal that he had sought in his rejection of materialism and his deeply felt need for a transcendental salvation. He was to follow this success with another play in prose, The Faith Healer (Boston, 1909), the year before his death, still seeking the adequate medium for the expression of a neo-transcendental philosophy in a world that his friend Edwin Arlington Robinson described in 'The Valley of the Shadow'

HENRY ADAMS (1838-1918)

HENRY ADAMS brought the problem of Force into American letters with infinitely more subtlety and importance than had Frank Norris 'Like his masters, since thought began,' Adams wrote of himself, in his account of his education, 'he was handicapped by the eternal mystery of Force—the sink of all science' 'Any schoolboy could see that man as a force must be measured by motion, from a fixed point Psychology helped here by suggesting a unit—the point of history where man held the highest idea of himself in a unified universe Eight or ten years of study had led Adams to think he might use the century 1150-1250, expressed in Amiens Cathedral and the Works of Thomas Aquinas, as the unit from which he might measure motion down to his own time, without assuming anything as true or untrue, except relation. The movement might be studied at once in philosophy and mechanics Setting himself to the task, he began a volume which he mentally knew as Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres a Study of Thirteenth-Century Unity From that point he proposed to fix a position for himself, which he could label The Education of Henry Adams a Study of Twentieth-Century Multiplicity With the help of these two points of relation, he hoped to project his lines forward and backward indefinitely, subject to correction from anyone who should know better'

Adams' life was spent in this education He was the son of an Ambassador to the Court of St. James's and the grandson of a

President of the United States. He was graduated from Harvard in 1858, and for seven years afterwards was his father's secretary in London. He tried newspaper reporting of the sessions of Congress, he tried serving as professor of history at Harvard, he was editor for a time of The North American Review, he travelled widely in Europe; he journeyed to the islands of the Pacific, he passed most of his life in Washington as a friend of the near-great He wrote biographies of Albert Gallatin and John Randolph, two men who had helped to fashion their age, he wrote two novels, Democracy (Boston, 1880) and Esther (Boston, 1884), the first of which treated society in terms of politics, and the second, in terms of religion, he wrote a brilliant nine-volume social and political history of the administrations of Jefferson and Madison in his History of the United States of America, 1801-1817 (Boston 1889-91) Each was a probing

His conclusion was: 'To educate—one's self to begin with—had been the effort of one's life for sixty years, and the difficulties of education had gone on doubling with the coal-output, until the prospect of waiting on another ten years, in order to face a seventh doubling of complexities, allured one's mind but slightly The law of acceleration was definite, and did not require ten years' more study except to show whether it held good. No scheme could be suggested to the new American, and no fault needed to be found, or complaint made; but the next great influx of new forces seemed near at hand, and its style of education promised to be violently coercive. The movement from unity into multiplicity, between 1200 and 1900, was unbroken in sequence, and rapid in acceleration. Prolonged one generation longer, it would require a new social mind. As though thought were common salt in indefinite solution it must enter a new phase subject to new laws.

In summing up Adams' education, R P Blackmur has observed 'Again and again he describes unifying conceptions as working principles, without them no work could be done, with them, even at the expense of final failure, every value could be provisionally ascertained. That is the value of Adams for us: the double value of his scrupulous attitude towards his unifying notions and of the human aspirations he was able to express under them. To feel that value as education is a profound deliverance: the same deliverance Adams felt in the Gothic Cathedral. "The delight of its aspiration is flung up to the sky. The pathos of its self-distrust and anguish of doubt is buried in the earth as its last secret." The principles asserted are nothing, though desperate and necessary; the values expressed because of the principles are everything. For Adams, as for everyone, the principle of unity carried to failure showed the most value by the way, and the value was worth the expense.'

WILLIAM SYDNEY PORTER (O HENRY) (1862-1910)

WILLIAM SYDNEY PORTER developed the structure of the plot of the short story to the breaking point. The tricks of Bret Harte, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, and Frank Stockton served him to supply the incessant demands of newspapers and magazines, and his formula left little freshness either to sentiment or to the surprise ending.

Porter was born in Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1862. At the age of fifteen he began working in his uncle's drugstore, but after five years of this left for Texas. He drifted from one occupation to another, and finally became teller in the First National Bank in Austin. He quit this to begin newspaper work. When he was accused of embezzling from the bank, he fled to Honduras, but returned because of his wife's illness, and served three years in prison. During the period of his sentence he continued writing, and began to sell under the pseudonym of O Henry to magazines in New York. Shortly after his release he went there, and there he stayed until his death.

Porter had begun to know small-town folk when he first stood behind a drugstore counter, and these characters he used in his stories of metropolitan life. Even his description of New York as 'Bagdad' is typical of his approach, and it is doubtful if he is deserving of his repeated praise as 'the narrator and supreme celebrant of the life of the great city.' It is understandable that the most nationally popular writers and columnists on New York life should be those who come from the village and who pretend to find little difference between New York life and that of their own Main Streets.

Not all of Porter's stories deal with city life, and many are drawn from his experiences in the South, in the West, and in Central America. Occasionally in each group he was successful, for within the limitations of his formula Porter had great ability. It is not surprising, however, that future American writers of the short story were to react against a predominant emphasis on plot

HENRY JAMES (1843-1916)

DURING the latter half of the nineteenth century, it was Henry James, the American expatriate, who revived the virtues of sensibility in English fiction. Since the publication of Jane Austen's Sense and Sensibility, no writer of prose had had a keener perception into the conventions which sustained yet ruled society than Henry James. Not the least interest in reading his work is to observe the development of his sensibility from its earliest demonstration through the obvious juxtaposition of contrary elements until its mature expression in the dramatization of apparently static situations.

The rudimentary practice of James is to be found in what has come to be known as the 'international novel'. Writing in this manner, James developed the technique of what he called 'reflectors,' by which both Americans and Europeans stood out in mutual chiaroscuro, not only in differentiations of racial characteristics but of individual characteristics among themselves. In its theory it was an unwitting expansion of the principle of James Fenimore Cooper's Homeward Bound. Brilliant examples of this type of James' fiction are to be found in such novels as The American(Boston, 1877), Daisy Miller(N Y , 1879), and The Portrait of a Lady(Boston, 1882).

The Portrait of a Lady serves as a bridge between his early and his later, and more mature, writing. In its preface may be found, as R P Blackmur has pointed out, 'the genius and intention of James the novelist.'

There is, I think, no more nutritive or suggestive truth in this connection than that of the perfect dependence of the 'moral' sense of a work of art on the amount of felt life concerned in producing it. The question comes back thus, obviously, to the kind and degree of the artist's prime sensibility, which is the soil out of which his subject springs. The quality and capacity of that soil, its capacity to 'grow' with due freshness and straightness any vision of life, represents, strongly or weakly, the projected morality.

Here we get exactly the high price of the novel as a literary form with closeness, to range through all the differences of the individual relation to its general subject-matter, all the varieties of outlook on life, of disposition to reflect and project, created by conditions that are never the same from man to man (or, as far as that goes, from woman to woman), but positively to appear more true to its character in proportion as it strains, or tends to burst, with a latent extravaganza, its mould.

James was not merely interested in emotion or in plot, but rather in the mind and its complex revelation of the character of 'the fine intelligence, either as agent or as the object of action or as both, . . . at the heart of James' work'. Only by penetration, minute examination, and scrupulous exegesis on the part of the author was such complex revelation possible. Consequently James is best read, as it were, from his own creative position within his material, for only by this inner approach can the remarkable subtlety and the perfect order of his works of art be felt.

James' own rootless life is perhaps one reason for his lack of interest in the variety of physical realism which increasingly occupied the attention of American writers during his lifetime. His father, Henry James, Sr., was a wealthy litterateur who trained Henry James and his brother William James, the psychologist, like highly bred race horses. They were tutored, sent abroad for education, and primed for the expression of genius. Fortunately both possessed it. Henry James was never able to be completely contented anywhere, but after 1869 he lived abroad, and shortly after the onset of the World War became a British subject in protest against America's failure to enter on the side of the Allies

His life was entirely devoted to the art of writing, not only its practice but its theory 'The Art of Fiction' is an early example of the latter. His finest discussions of this subject occur, however, in the prefaces which he wrote for the collected edition of his work. Unfortunately these must be read in entirety for any satisfactory understanding, and only recently, in The Art of the Novel, have they been brought together and made generally accessible 'No man of our time,' said Ezra Pound in 1918, in one of the first, and few, intelligent essays on James, 'has so laboured to create means of communication as did the late Henry James. The whole of great art is a struggle for communication.' It was for his advancement of the means of communication through prose that James had his greatest importance to literature.

EDITH WHARTON (1862-1937)

EDITH WHARTON was born an aristocrat, and wisely wrote about the life she knew best. She was aware of the structure of Society, for during the years she had spent in New York, Long Island, Newport, Lenox, and Paris she had had ample opportunity to observe both its advantages and its limitations. The resultant, shrewd commentary is unique and valuable.

Her greatest literary influence was from the early work and personal criticisms of Henry James. It is in fact doubtful if the literary significance of James' early period can be as well grasped from his own work as from that of his pupil.

Mrs Wharton was extraordinarily successful in both the short story and the novel. 'The chief technical difference between the short story and the novel may,' she says, 'be summed up by saying that situation is the main concern of the short story, character of the novel; and it follows that the effect produced by the short story depends almost entirely upon its form, or presentation.' Nowhere better than in 'The Other Two' is there a defter illustration of her perfect control of form and her ability to draw by implication from a single situation a penetrating analysis of Society.

The Valley of Decision(N Y, 1902), The House of Mirth(N Y, 1905), and The Age of Innocence(N Y, 1922) best illustrate her particular combination of the novel of manners and that of character (or psychology). As with her short stories, these works keep within the scope of her experience. If Mrs Wharton is to be criticized it must not be on the ground that she did not write about other groups of society but that, even within her own province, she too frequently succumbed to literary fashions.

PAUL ELMER MORE (1864-1937)

PAUL ELMER MORE was the most articulate leader of the group of neo-humanists which began to develop in the first years of the present century and attracted most attention during the nineteen-twenties. Its chief significance lay in its attempt to bring order to an increasingly chaotic world, the particular approach being through the precepts of tradition. Its earliest teacher was Irving Babbitt, a professor at Harvard, who found in the languishing ideal of Rousseau an easy straw dummy for a target. Through his students and his associates the movement spread.

More was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1864, and was educated at Washington University in that city, and at Harvard where he was an associate of Babbitt. He taught Sanscrit there and at Bryn Mawr, and then became literary editor, first of The Independent in 1901, and afterwards of The New York Evening Sun in 1903 and of The Nation from 1909 to 1914. After resigning from this position he became a lecturer at Princeton University. His principal writings are collected in the six volumes of The Greek Tradition (N Y, 1917-27), in the eleven volumes of The Shelburne

Essays (N Y, 1904-21), and in the three supplementary volumes of The New Shelburne Essays (N Y, 1928-35). The range of The Shelburne Essays includes all literature, and their quality is the finest of that of any American critic. In the advancement of the appreciation of American literature More's criticism has been of the greatest importance. Whittier, Longfellow, and others have received a new and deserved artistic dignity through his commentary, and few approaches to the backgrounds of Hawthorne and Poe have been keener than his. If More's essays on American writers were to be brought together into one collection, he would receive the general recognition which is his due.

GEORGE SANTAYANA (1863-)

IN the preface to his Collected Poems, George Santayana wrote

Of impassioned tenderness or Dionysiac frenzy I have nothing, nor even of that magic and pregnancy of phrase—really the creation of a fresh idiom—which marks the high light of poetry. Even if my temperament had been naturally warmer, the fact that the English language (and I can write no other with assurance) was not my mother-tongue would of itself preclude any inspired use of it on my part, its roots do not quite reach to my center. I never drank in childhood the homely cadences and ditties which in pure spontaneous poetry set the essential key.

And in writing of poetry in The Life of Reason he remarked

For poetry, while truly poetical, never loses sight of initial feelings and underlying appeals, it is incorrigibly transcendental, and takes every present passion and every private dream in turn for the core of the universe. Lying is a privilege of poets because they have not yet reached the level on which truth and error are discernible. Veracity and significance are not ideals for a primitive mind, we learn to value them as we learn to live, when we discover that the spirit cannot be wholly free and solipsistic.

The significance of these statements rests on the fact that they contain less modesty than a suggestion of finely tempered irony which marks the best of his highly conventionalized poetic utterance. His sonnet 'On the Death of a Metaphysician,' and his consciously poetical prose are perhaps the best expression of the 'Genteel Tradition' in America their purified nineteenth-century diction, their intellectual charm, their clear, if not specific, visual imagery—all serve to illustrate the importance of George Santayana's contribution to American literature

George Santayana was born in Madrid, Spain, in 1863 and came to America at the age of nine. He was educated at Harvard, receiving his Ph.D. from that institution in 1889. As a lecturer at Harvard he became one of its most distinguished philosophers, and while at the University, 1889 to 1912, he wrote his four notable contributions to American philosophy and letters: The Sense of Beauty (N.Y., 1896), Interpretations of Poetry and Religion (N.Y., 1900),

The Life of Reason (N.Y., 1905-06), and Three Philosophical Poets (N.Y., 1910). In 1912 he left America and since then has lived in England, France, and Italy.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON (1869-1935)

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON stripped poetry of the florid diction typical of the late nineteenth century and turned it toward straight-forward and hard speech. His first volume, The Torrent and the Night Before, was published in 1896. It was a sign for the direction which modern poetry was to take. His earliest poems, greatly influenced by the poetry of Thomas Hardy, were cryptic portraits of the people of Tilbury Town, reminiscent of Gardiner, Maine, where he was brought up. They have the dryness of New England and the dramatic quality which was always characteristic of his verse. This dramatic quality he extended to longer and even more effective results in such brilliant poems as 'Ben Johnson Entertains a Man from Stratford,' 'The Man Against the Sky,' and 'Mr. Flood's Party.' Increasingly he became fixed upon the idea that man must stand in darkness in order to see the light, and with this perhaps Puritan heritage he was always content.

'You must think of me as a disappointed playwright,' he once remarked to a friend. During the first decade of the twentieth century he became deeply interested in the vigorous movement for a poetic drama which was led by William Vaughn Moody and Percy MacKaye. Out of this interest came such plays in verse as his Van Zorn and Porcupine. The movement dwindled, and in 1910 and 1911 Robinson undertook to rewrite his plays in the form of novels. The results he tore up and burned, the effect, however, was lasting. His plays were originally closet drama, and any attempts to novelize them must have intellectualized and spun them out even more. Thus when at last he turned to the composition of the long narrative poems which chiefly occupied him for the rest of his life he appeared to be confused between the provinces of the novel and of poetry. Little narrative verse is successful unless it moves through the force of highly charged emotion. Thus, unfortunately, Robinson's highly psychological narratives never did.

It was not until the publication of Tristram (N.Y., 1927) that he met with anything like a popular success. The subject was reasonably enough within the Victorian conventions in poetry to be acceptable to the public, though there is no apparent reason why they should have welcomed this and have rejected his similar Merlin of a decade before. Of his poems written on the Arthurian legends, Robinson felt that 'Merlin, Lancelot, and Tristram—taken together as a sort of unit—appear to me as likely to last as anything I have written.' General opinion, however, seems to favor his earlier work.

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD (1876-)

THE poetic conventions which mark the characteristic style of William Ellery Leonard's verse are those of the Miltonic tradition as it was exemplified in the work of the English Romantic poets Leonard's narrative poem Two Lives (1925) displays at length the impress of the conventions which have given his style its Romantic quality In subject the work resembles Richard Dehmel's Zwei Menschen, and in form the work is an avowed experiment in the use of the sonnet as a standard form in narrative poetry

William Ellery Leonard was born in Plainfield, New Jersey, in 1876 After receiving his A M in Harvard, in 1899 he extended his research in Philology at the University of Göttingen and Bonn He has been a professor of English at the University of Wisconsin since 1906

His translations of Beowulf and Empedocles and Lucretius are among the best of their kind in the English language For the last ten years Leonard's remarkable literary insights and energies have been devoted to his researches in Anglo-Saxon, Middle English, and the Romance Languages

ROBERT FROST (1875-)

THE plain speech of Robert Frost was a parallel to Edwin Arlington Robinson's in the reform of poetic diction His manner of speech is as crisp and fresh as the taste of a good apple, and his wit and wisdom have the New England manner of cracker-box philosophy. 'The style is the man,' Frost has said 'Rather say the style is the way the man takes himself, and to be at all charming or even bearable, the way is almost rigidly prescribed If it is with outer seriousness, it must be with inner humor If it is with outer humor, it must be with inner seriousness.' There need be no better proof that Frost is a New Englander

Actually, he was born in San Francisco, California, but after his father's death, when Frost was nine, he returned with his mother to Lawrence, Massachusetts For a few months in 1892 he was a student at Dartmouth, and from 1897 to 1899 he was enrolled in Harvard University Thereafter he farmed in New Hampshire and taught school, until in 1912 he sailed with his wife and children for England His first two books, A Boy's Will(London, 1913) and North of Boston(London, 1914), were published there, though he had been writing poetry for a decade before. It is an interesting commentary on the state of publishing and public taste in America When he returned to America in 1915, however, many prejudices had been stripped away and his way made easier In time it became easy

Frost, like Edwin Arlington Robinson, had a predilection for the dramatic. In the preface to a one-act play that he wrote, he said 'A dramatic necessity goes deep into the nature of the sentence. Sentences are not different enough to hold the attention unless they are dramatic. No ingenuity of varying structure will do. All that can save them is the speaking tone of voice somehow entangled in the words and fastened to the page for the ear of the imagination. That is all that can save poetry from sing-song, all that can save prose from itself.' And 'Everything written is as good as it is dramatic. It need not declare itself in form, but it is dramatic or nothing.' This perhaps natural tendency of poets intent on bringing the speaking voice of dramatic action into verse is clearly seen in such of Frost's work as 'The Death of the Hired Man' and 'Home Burial,' and is present in nearly all of his work.

Frost has always managed to exercise the greatest control over his verse, and the flatness of his lines becomes a perfect setting for his subdued imagery. 'A poem begins with a lump in the throat, a homesickness or a lovesickness. It is a reaching-out toward expression, an effort to find fulfillment.' This 'effort to find fulfillment' may be regarded as the work of a poet's lifetime. Frost has followed his own advice by evident care in the writing of his verse and by infrequent publication of its slender volumes.

VACHEL LINDSAY (1879-1931)

IN his introduction to The Congo (N.Y., 1916) Lindsay wrote 'Mr. Yeats asked me recently in Chicago, "What are we going to do to restore the primitive singing voice of poetry?"' This was another appeal for returning the cadence of the poetic line to that of the voice. Lindsay's response, already made, was with what he called the 'Higher Vaudeville imagination.' 'America needs the flamboyant to save her soul.' The public received his first flamboyant note in 1913 when Harriet Monroe published 'General William Booth Enters into Heaven' in her recently founded Poetry: A Magazine of Verse.

Lindsay was a boy when he began his campaign to save souls, for if he was not born with the spirit of a missionary, his parents drilled the importance of such an obligation into him. From the age of six he had been trained as an artist, and after quitting Hiram College, Ohio, in 1900 he pondered a career of 'Christian cartooning.' His high seriousness, which came from the Campbellite religion of his parents, was reinforced and decorated by his unrelinquished devotion to the precepts of the Pre-Raphaelites and the Christian socialist doctrines of William Morris. Their amalgamation of the arts he himself first sought to express through poems which illustrated his drawings.

In the shade of a lantern unlighted
Awaits us a heathen benighted
He drinks Inspiration from a jar decoration
His exquisite taste is delighted

It was a bad poetic beginning. After periods of studying art in New York, lecturing before a Y M C A , and working for the Anti-Saloon League in the section of Illinois about Springfield, his birthplace, he made in 1912 his long and famous journey on foot from Illinois to New Mexico, with a packet of pamphlets, Poems to be Traded for Bread, and a bundle of his cartoons.

Like a troubadour circuit-rider he travelled from house to house, carrying on his 'warfare for Beauty and Democracy,' by showing his drawings and reading such poems as one

To Those That Would Mend These Times

Go plant the arts that woo the weariest,
Bold arts that simple workmen understand,
That make no poor men and keep all men rich,
And throne our Lady Beauty in the land!

It was during this extension of the Ruskinesque revival with which he had hoped to bring about a 'Golden Springfield' that he formulated the 'bold arts' of his poem on Booth. This he sent in to Miss Monroe while he was still en route. Independently, and to an extent unwittingly, he joined the new movement of poetry.

Lindsay discovered that others besides simple workmen understood and liked verse, 'where every line may be two-thirds spoken and one-third sung, the entire rendering, musical and elocutionary, depending upon the improvising power and sure instinct of the performer.' Women's Clubs for the rest of his life insisted that he write and read only poems like 'The Congo,' 'Simon Legree,' and 'General William Booth,' until Lindsay could not bear even the thought of them.

His creative life was constantly buffeted between vaudeville and Ruskin. By instinct he was abreast of his time, emotionally he was behind it. The resulting conflict he could never resolve. One group of Lindsay's works is unforgettable for its vigorous movement and vital individuality, another is commonplace through its limp and sentimental unreality. As a result his verse is an exaggerated symbol both of what poetry was striving for and fighting against.

EDGAR LEE MASTERS (1869-)

EDGAR LEE MASTERS' contribution to American literature is best represented by his Spoon River Anthology (N Y , 1915) which first appeared in the pages of William Marion Reedy's magazine, Reedy's Mirror. In its unrhymed verse forms, its penetration into the lives of those who lived in a middle western community, its naturalism, its obvious veracity—all combined to make Edgar Lee Masters the personification of the small town free-thinker. Like Sinclair Lewis' Main Street, Masters' Anthology is a landmark in American literature.

Edgar Lee Masters was born in Garnett, Kansas, in 1869. During his early adolescence his family moved to Louistown, Illinois, where he studied law in his father's office. He then left Louistown for Chicago where for many years he practiced law. Not unlike the work of many of his contemporaries, Masters' early work included two experiments in poetic drama, the first a play on Benedict Arnold written in 1895, and the second Maximilian published in 1902. Between 1898 and 1937 Masters has published many volumes of poetry, but of these only the Spoon River volumes, the Domesday

Book(N.Y., 1920), and The Fate of the Jury (N.Y., 1929) have contributed materially to his poetic reputation. Of recent years Masters' work in prose has been no less prolific, yet of it all only his autobiography, Across Spoon River(N.Y., 1936) seems to hold more than a transitory interest for his readers. Across Spoon River resembles Dreiser's Dawn in its evident desire to record faithfully the experiences of the author's life.

CARL SANDBURG (1878-)

SANDBURG's poem 'Chicago' was, when it first appeared in 1914, the apparent epitome of the anti-poetic. Its subject was not the only aspect which aroused opposition, for Sandburg had taken its language out of the mouths of the people rather than of the poets. His own life seemed in itself anti-poetic. He had had almost no schooling as a boy, he was a newspaper reporter, had driven a mule-wagon, had been a porter and a dishwasher, had worked in a brickyard, had harvested, been a soldier,—had in fact, by circumstance, combined the experiences of the people in himself.

It was the people from whom he got his strength, and their apostle, Whitman, from whom he received his directions on subject matter and freedom of expression. Sandburg was, however, not an imitator. 'The difference between Whitman and Sandburg,' Morton Zabel has observed, is primarily a difference between a visionary imagination and a realistic one, between a prophet who deals in the racial and social aspects of humanitarianism and a historian who handles the specific facts of industrial life and labor. Whitman, given his sympathies and cause and with his greater imaginative vision, might have written his book without any immediate contact with its materials, whereas Sandburg, so denied, could have written none of his. The two poets join only at the point which is their common weakness in the rhapsodic cries and flights that are the diffused and prevalent bane of the one and the merely incidental weakness of the other. Sandburg is saved from this pretension by his plain verbal sanity. He does not discard the lyric imagination, it filters through his pages and produces many short passages of characteristic fancy.

Alive yet the spillover of last night's moonrise brought returns of peculiar cash
 a cash of thin air alive yet

But it is seldom allowed to develop into vague apostrophe or inflated allegory, any more than his language is allowed to use the pompous phrases, French or Latin counterfeit, and hollow pedantry of Whitman's style.

Sandburg's imagination and expression is realistic, but his faith in the people is the vague mysticism of Christian socialism which he absorbed during the years 1910 to 1912 when he was secretary to the Social-Democratic mayor of Milwaukee.

His first volume of poetry was privately printed in 1904, but it was not until after the success of 'Chicago' and the publication of Chicago Poems(N.Y., 1916) that he became a poet by profession. Succeeding volumes, Cornhuskers(N.Y., 1918), Smoke and Steel(N.Y., 1920), Slabs of the Sunburnt West(N.Y., 1923), Good Morning

America (N Y, 1928), and The People, Yes (N Y, 1936) indicate his fidelity to his theme. These volumes of poetry he has interspersed with such fanciful books for children as Rootabaga Stories (N Y, 1922) and with his extended work on the biography of Lincoln, of which the first volume, Abraham Lincoln The Prairie Years (N Y, 1926), has been unsurpassed by any other biographer. The common bond of all his works is indicated by his description of The People, Yes as 'a footnote to the Gettysburg Address.' His range has been extended into the field of balladry and folk songs, a large number of which he collected in The American Songbag (N Y, 1927). From such varied interests, as well as from his personal experience, comes the richness of his vocabulary which is his chief strength.

Sandburg's poetry shows little development from his earliest volumes to his latest.

He found a form of expression admirably suited to his thought, and his thought has changed but little.

THEODORE DREISER (1871-)

STEPHEN CRANE's Maggie (N Y, 1892) and Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie (N Y, 1900) are indicative of the recognition in the American novel of naturalism. It is significant that it was Frank Norris, full of his comprehension of the 'responsibility of the novelist,' who arranged for the publication of Dreiser's Sister Carrie. Once issued, the book was sabotaged by its own publisher. It was not republished in America until 1914. The position of novelists at that time has been reminiscently described by Dreiser:

I think it nothing less than tragic that these men, or boys, fresh, forceful, imbued with a burning desire to present life as they saw it, were thus completely overawed by the moral hypocrisy of the American mind and did not even dare to think of sending their novel to an American publisher. You couldn't write about life as it was, you had to write about it as somebody else thought it was, the ministers and farmers and dullards of the home.

Dreiser learned to see life with the eyes of a newspaper reporter. He was born at Terre Haute, Indiana, in 1871, and attended first the public schools and later Indiana University. Then he worked for newspapers in Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburg, and New York. Chicago excited him, with its tonic clatter, its black factories and its spacious mansions, as later it excited Sandburg. Said Dreiser, 'I think I grasped Chicago in its larger material if not in its more complicated mental aspects.' But the task of having to cover in the course of a single day both a wedding and a suicide or to write impartially of both the well-fed and the starving taught him the carelessness of life. He came out of this experience with a lack of confidence. 'Man, as I was beginning to find—all of us—were small, irritable, nasty in their struggle for life.' 'Life is a god-damned stinking game.'

Nevertheless he developed his enormous capacity for sympathy which has marked all his writing.

I was filled with an intense sympathy for the woes of others, life in all its helpless degradation and poverty, the unsatisfied dreams of people, their sweaty labors, the things they were compelled to endure—nameless impositions, curses, brutalities—the things they would never have, their hungers, thirsts, half-formed dreams of pleasures, their glittering insanities and beaten resolutions at the end I have sobbed dry sobs looking into what I deemed to be broken faces and the eyes of human failures.

Dreiser's novels have been based on the give and take of these impositions and on the lives of human failures. He has always written best when he has described actual material. The Titan (N Y., 1914) was based on the career of Charles Yerkes, the Chicago grain dealer about whom Norris wrote in The Pit; The Genius (N Y., 1915), the story of a painter who became a magazine editor, was based on the career of Ben Hampton, and An American Tragedy (N Y., 1925) was in spots an almost verbatim account of an upper New York State murder. Dreiser's genius lies in his ability to grasp many of the implications of these lives. Essentially Dreiser is an individualist as well as a materialist, and the tragedy of his characters comes from the failures of their material lives. The result is an admirable portrait of his age. From even a single chapter such as that titled by the editors 'An American Problem' one can grasp the legitimate quandary which faced Clyde Griffith.

Dreiser's prose stumbles along its path, eager, impetuous, awkward, and psychologically perfect. Dreiser's work was both revolutionary and unforgettable in American prose. As Sherwood Anderson has remarked.

Theodore Dreiser is old—he is very, very old . . . Something grey and bleak and hurtful, that has been in the world perhaps forever, is personified in him. . . When Dreiser is gone men shall write books, many of them, and in the books they shall write there will be so many of the qualities Dreiser lacks. The new, the younger men shall have a sense of humor, and everyone knows Dreiser has no sense of humor. More than that, American prose writers shall have grace, lightness of touch, a dream of beauty breaking through the husks of life . . . Heavy, heavy, the feet of Theodore. How easy to pick some of his books to pieces, to laugh at him for so much of his heavy prose. These feet are making a path, and the children who follow after will run quickly and nimbly because the path has been made. The fellows of the ink-pots, the prose writers of America who follow Dreiser will have much to do that he has never done. Their road is long, but, because of him, those who follow will never have to face the road through the wilderness of Puritan denial, the road that Dreiser faced alone.

JAMES BRANCH CABELL (1879-)

JAMES BRANCH CABELL learned to see life through the veil of romantic mediaevalism. In his earliest writing, at the beginning of the century, he saw only the veil, then with The Rivet in Grandfather's Neck (N. Y., 1915) he began to cast his serious attention on American life. In his later work he did not throw aside the veil. 'It comes almost to saying that the novel of contemporary life, via the typewriter of the serious artist, will return to the oldest of forms, and become more or less an allegory. . . Art, I repeat, must deal with contemporary life by means of symbols. And the creative writer should handle facts religiously, in that particular mood of piety which holds that incomplete accord with a creator's will is irreligious . . . Facts must be kept in their proper place, outside of which they lose veracity' Such was Cabell's demurage

He was born a Southern gentleman, and his attitude was shaped by the period in which he taught French and Greek at William and Mary, from which he had been graduated. These two factors combined to make him into something of an American Anatole France, whose ironic commentary on his contemporary civilization had been written in his fabular L'Isle des Penguins Cabell's island was the imaginary French province of Poictesme Within its boundaries he carried on his skirmishes against the forces of Philistia Of these, Jurgen (N Y, 1919) was best known Puritan prudery and middle-class gaucheries were to be stung by his barbed satire, but the barb was so deftly concealed by the elaborated brilliance of his style that its wound was scarcely felt by the majority of his readers They were not hurt but titillated

The seriousness underlying his writing differed only in manner from the blatancy of the 'Menckenoids,' as Cabell called them, who were his fellow contributors to the Smart Set and the American Mercury in a general age of criticism. On his standards of Southern gentility, younger writers of his section first modelled their own attacks.

JOHN REED (1887-1920)

JOHN REED, in 1917, wrote of himself

I am twenty-nine years old, and I know that this is the end of a part of my life, the end of youth Sometimes it seems to me the end of the world's youth too, certainly the Great War has done something to us all But it is also the beginning of a new phase of life, and the world we live in is so full of swift change and color and meaning that I can hardly keep from imagining the splendid and terrible possibilities of the time to come The last ten years I've gone up and down the earth drinking in experience, fighting and loving, seeing and hearing and testing things I've traveled all over Europe, and to the borders of the East, and down in Mexico, having adventures, seeing men killed and broken, victorious and laughing, men with visions and men with a sense of humor I've watched civilization change and broaden and sweeten in my lifetime, and I've watched it wither and crumble in the red blast of war And war I have seen, too, in the trenches, with the armies I'm not quite sick of seeing yet, but soon I will be—I know that My future life will not be what it has been And I so want to stop a minute, and look back, and get my bearings.

Reed was born in Portland, Oregon, of well-to-do parents, and was educated at Harvard during the stimulating decade when men like Walter Lippmann, Heywood Brown, T S Eliot, Conrad Aiken, and Joseph Ferdinand Gould were students there After a Vagabondian tour abroad, Reed went to New York and entered its literary Bohemia During this period he contributed verse to Poetry and to the Masses, and issued privately a long poem on life in Greenwich Village. In 1914, when Villa had captured Chihuahua, he left for Mexico as a correspondent for the Metropolitan Magazine. His articles were the most dramatic contributions to the journalistic literature of America since Richard Harding Davis' reports of the battle of San Juan hill. During the World War he was abroad as a foreign correspondent. It was after his return to America for an operation that he wrote the reminiscence quoted above. In August of that year he sailed for Russia where he arrived in time to witness the October revolution. As a friend of Lenin he was granted access to important documents, and was encouraged to write a history of what he had seen. This he did in Ten Days that Shook the World (N Y, 1919), after his return to New York. 'I have to see,' Reed said. His history was a step toward the heightened reportorial sketches of Ernest Hemingway and John Dos Passos.

Later in the year of its publication Reed was forced to flee from America to escape charges of sedition, and went again to Russia. There he died of the typhus and was buried in the Kremlin. In a review of Reed's biography, Max Lerner wrote

He was no thinker but a man of action. But it was his good fortune to be led to the most desirable of all fates for a man of action who is also a writer and a poet—the chance at once to write history and to make it.

It is this emphasis on freedom and action and joyousness—almost its obsession of Reed's with them—that gives his life its importance for us and makes the incidents of it credible. Reed died thinking he had found in communism a solution not only for himself but for the workers and the creative everywhere. How deep his communism was is a question that is difficult to answer. He probably understood communism only as he understood everything else—as a verifiable part of his own experience.

HENRY L. MENCKEN (1880-)

THE popular rhetorician of post-war America was Henry Louis Mencken, and the textbooks were his series of Prejudices, made up of his editorials for the Smart Set and for the American Mercury. Such magazines represented the supreme national self-consciousness indicated at its best by Van Wyck Brooks' America's Coming of Age (N Y, 1915). This self-consciousness found expression in a post-adolescent urge to hit out at everything and to applaud the blows.

Mencken's first series of Prejudices attacked the pedantries of professors, the utopianism of H.G. Wells, the social philosophies of Henry George and Thorsten Veblen, and sociology, psychology, and theology. His attitude toward the contemporary scene is indicated in the following quotation:

But how, then, explain the fact that the populace is constantly ravished and set aflame by fresh brigades of moral, political and sociological revolutionists—that it is forever playing the eager victim to new mountebanks? The explanation lies in the simple circumstance that these performers upon the public midriff are always careful to ladle out nothing actually alarming and accursed. What they offer is always the same old panacea with an extra-gaudy label—the tried, tasted and much-loved dose, the colic cure that mother used to make. Superficially, the United States seems to suffer from an endless and astounding neophilism; actually all its thinking is done within the boundaries of a very small group of political, economic and religious ideas, most of them unsound. For example, there is the fundamental idea of democracy—the idea that all political power should remain in the hands of the populace, that its exercise by superior men is intrinsically immoral. Out of this idea spring innumerable notions and crazes that are no more, at bottom, than restatements of it in sentimental terms: rotation in office, direct elections, the initiative and referendum, the recall, the popular primary, and so on. Again, there is the primary doctrine that the possession of great wealth is a crime—a doctrine half a religious heritage and half the product of mere mob envy. Out of it have come free silver, trust-busting, government ownership, muck-raking, Populism, Bleasism, Progressivism, the milder forms of Socialism, the whole gasconade of 'reform' politics. Yet again, there is the ineradicable peasant suspicion of the man who is having a better time in the world—a suspicion grounded, like the foregoing, partly upon undisguised envy and partly upon archaic and barbaric religious taboos. Out of it have come all the glittering pearls of the uplift, from Abolition to Prohibition, and from the crusade against horseracing to the Mann Act. The whole political history of the United States is a history of these three ideas.

Mencken's vigorous style is in consciously direct antithesis to John Dryden's remarks on the art of satire. 'How easy it is to call rogue and villain, and that wittily! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a blockhead, or a knave, without using any of those opprobrious terms! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing. This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice, he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice.'

WILLA CATHER (1875-)

DESPITE her early experience as a journalist, Willa Cather has turned elsewhere for a model of expression. 'If the novel is a form of imaginative art, it cannot be at the same time a vivid and brilliant form of journalism. . . . Whatever is felt upon the page without being specifically named there—that, one might say, is created. It is the inexplicable presence of the thing not named, of the overtone divined by the ear but not heard by it, the verbal mood, the emotional aura of fact or the thing or the deed, that gives high quality to the novel or the drama, as well as to poetry itself.'

This manner she has expressed most successfully in such of her novels as The Professor's House (N Y, 1925), Death Comes for the Archbishop (N Y, 1925), and Shadows on the Rock (N Y., 1931). It is not the only mood to be found in her writing, but it is uniquely successful in contemporary American prose. That it should suit so admirably her pictures of frontier life comes from her concept of the moral certitude of pioneers. 'The generation that subdued the wild land and broke up the virgin prairie is passing, but there is still there, a group of rugged figures in the background which inspire respect, compel admiration. With these old men and women the attainment of material prosperity was a moral victory, because it was wrung from hard conditions, was the result of a struggle that tested character. They can look out over those broad stretches of fertility and say "We made this, with our backs and hands".' This 'moral victory' brings a calm to her successful characters which is admirably expressed through the quietness of her style. It was this same calm which was characteristic of the characters of Sarah Orne Jewett's Country of the Pointed Firs, to whom Miss Cather avowedly owes so much.

In Death Comes for the Archbishop the first Archbishop of Santa Fé could say, in a spiritual sense, that the land was being won. 'We made this, with our backs and hands.' Thus Death, when it came in the manner of Holbein's series of woodcuts, could be welcomed with composure. The character of Bishop Latour was based on that of the Rev. John Baptist Lamy, and that of Father Vaillant on Padre Joseph Machebeuf who became first Bishop of Denver. The incident of the pearl-grey mules was one actually related in outline by Machebeuf in a letter to his sister in France.

Miss Cather was born in Virginia, but was taken by her parents to Nebraska when she was nine. It was there that she observed and became friends with the immigrants whom she described in My Antonia (N Y, 1918). In her descriptions she has been careful to maintain her own position as an outsider, familiar with but not actually a part of the life she describes.

OLE RÖLVAAG (1876-1931)

OLE EDVART ROLVAAG was himself an immigrant, and one of the few American writers able to write from within such experience. He was born in the village of Rolvaag, on an island just south of the Arctic Circle off the coast of Norway. It was from this village that he took his name after his arrival in America. Rolvaag was a fisherman, and as the result of a storm in the winter of 1893 resolved to emigrate to America. He finally arrived in 1896 and went immediately to his uncle's farm in South Dakota. He worked on the land for three years, and then entered a preparatory school in Canton, South Dakota. In 1905 he was graduated from St. Olaf's College in Minnesota, studied for a year in Norway, and became a member of the St. Olaf's faculty until his retirement in 1931.

His first book was Amerika-Breve [Letters from America] (Minneapolis, 1912), and like all of his work was written in Norwegian. He wrote, however, comparatively little except textbooks until after 1920 when his third novel, To Tullinger [Two Fools] was published. In 1922 appeared Længens Baat [The Boat of Longing]. These were widely read by Norwegian-speaking Americans. In 1923, stimulated by the report that Johan Bojer, the Norwegian novelist, was about to visit America to write a novel about immigrant life, Rolvaag set immediately at work to compose his own Giants in the Earth was first printed in Norway, and was then translated into English by Rolvaag, in collaboration with Lincoln Colcord. It was the first of a trilogy, of which Peder Victorious (N Y, 1929) and Their Father's God (N Y, 1931) were the remaining volumes.

Other writers have been able to indicate the psychological situation of immigrants who penetrated the American frontier, but Rolvaag's great gift was his ability to reproduce its effect. Such is the scene in which he describes the oncoming of winter to a woman like Beret, a scene differing from but as essentially American as that described by De Crèvecoeur or by Whittier.

SINCLAIR LEWIS (1885-)

THE overwhelming success of Sinclair Lewis' novel, Main Street (N.Y., 1920), came in the period which accepted Mencken as its schoolmaster. Lewis was born in 1885 in Sauk Center, Minnesota, the son of a country doctor, went east to Yale, and afterwards worked in numerous editorial offices. Main Street is usually thought of as his first novel, actually it was his seventh. The earlier novels had been more or less slight, but serious in intent.

According to Lewis he began to plan Main Street when he was a sophomore in college. It broke on the Sauk Centers of America like a torrent of rain after a thunderclap. Writers had been accusing them indirectly for years, but now there was a man to speak to them in their own language. The Jim Blausers always gave their extravagant praise, but here was Lewis dressed up as Carol Kennicott to explain that these things were not so. The novel was the sermon of a speaker who used their own technique of ridiculing through mimicry. Lewis' greatest power is as a mimic. He has an acute and sympathetic perception of the nuances of ordinary conversation, and a blindness for the nuances of landscape. Despite 'the broom-swish of Aunt Bessie's voice, and the mop-pounding of Uncle Whittier's grumble,' Main Street is more of a landmark than a work of art.

In Babbitt (N.Y., 1922), Lewis gave another word to the language, through his description of the American Everyman of the Nineteen-Twenties. The scope was wider than that of Main Street, the application was more universal, and the cure was less specific. Lewis realized the cultural deficiencies of George F. Babbitt, but recognized also the spiritual yearnings which drew Babbitt to Tavis, his mistress, which caused him to support Doane, the radical, to refuse to join the Good Citizen's League, and to support Paul Riesling when Paul shot his wife, Zilla. He sympathized with Myra's humdrum life and her temporary turn to New Thought. Lewis admitted the force of Babbitt's world to draw him back into its pattern, but allowed him enough of his former yearning to assert himself at moments of crisis, and to say at his son's marriage 'Go ahead, old man! The world is yours!' It was easy enough for Carol to criticize Main Street, since she came freshly to it, Babbitt's criticism of himself was infinitely more significant.

Arrowsmith (N.Y., 1925), an account of the struggle of a doctor to keep the path of pure research, is perhaps his best work technically. It is not however the most interesting, for Arrowsmith is not personally so common a denominator. Elmer Gantry (N.Y., 1927), a satire on evangelism, was a cannonade directed against a toy figure. Lewis can hardly be called a distinguished writer of prose, but he has always possessed a sense of the timely, and his biting power of mimicry has won him approval in Europe and embarrassment and applause in America. In 1930 he became the first American to be awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.

RING LARDNER (1885-1933)

AN important aspect of modern prose, coincidental to the practice of modern poetry, has been an increasing sensitivity to the value of the spoken word. The exact phonetic reproduction of dialect by writers like Joel Chandler Harris was extended to common speech, and an increasing awareness of the relationship between the words and thoughts of characters has helped to remove from prose the artificial diction which marked much of the writing of the previous century. The work of few authors demonstrates this awareness better than that of Ring Lardner.

Lardner was born in 1885 at Niles, Michigan, and after two years at the Armour Institute of Technology in Chicago, became in 1905 a reporter for the South Bend, Indiana, Times. In 1907 he returned to Chicago where he was a sports-writer and columnist. It was while writing for the Tribune that he published You Know Me Al (N.Y., 1916) in the racy vernacular of the baseball player. In later stories like 'The Golden Honeymoon' he widened his gallery of American portraits.

Lardner's complete understanding of the people about whom he wrote accounts for the accuracy with which their speech expresses both their characters and their situations. Thus dialogue alone is sufficient, and in this economy he represents an increasing tendency among contemporary writers to discard that which is purely descriptive.

LOLA RIDGE (1883-1941)

THERE can be little doubt of the sincere and unified intention which lies behind the poetry of Lola Ridge. From the publication of her first book, The Ghetto and Other Poems (N.Y., 1918), to the writing of her Dance of Fire (N.Y., 1935), the theme of human martyrdom, particularly the martyrdom of the poor and disenfranchised has been the subject of her verse. The Ghetto, with its vivid, imagistic portraits of life in a lower Manhattan city street, illustrated her sincerity of feeling in the statement of her theme.

She was born in Dublin, Ireland, and spent her childhood in Australia and in New Zealand. Her early ambition was to be a painter, and she studied art at the Academie Julianne in Sydney. She came to the United States in 1907. For three years she wrote fiction for popular magazines. She took over the editorship of Alfred Kreymborg's magazine, Others, and was on the staff of Broom.

The technical development of her work is shown by her uses of light and fire symbolism in the most recent of her books of poetry, The Dance of Fire.

SARA TEASDALE (1884-1933)

THE reiteration of the Arthurian legend symbolism in American poetry was again made evident in the early verse of Sara Teasdale. During the year 1907, in which her first book, Sonnets to Duse, appeared, she also published her poem, 'Guinevere,' in William Marion Reedy's magazine, Reedy's Mirror. Although her first book preceded the excitement and enthusiasms of the 'poetic renaissance' of 1912, it was not until the 'renaissance' was five years old, that her characteristic Love Songs brought her work to the attention of a phenomenally large reading public. During the decade that was to 'discover' the poetry of Edna St. Vincent Millay, the verse of Sara Teasdale created a standard for feminine lyricism, and in this connection her great popularity contributed its influence toward the publicity given to the feminist movement in America during the World War

Sara Teasdale was born in 1884 in St. Louis, Missouri, and, after her education in that city, travelled in southern Europe and in the Near East. On her return to this continent in 1907 she began to make friends in literary circles in New York and in 1916 moved from her home in St. Louis to live there permanently

In commenting on The Collected Poems of Sara Teasdale, Morton Dauwen Zabel wrote in The Southern Review,

. . . careful selection offers its rewards here, fifty or sixty poems, instead of 350, should some day be bound together as among the best lyrics of the older tradition that America has produced. Miss Teasdale was known as an admirer of Christina Rossetti, of whose life and verse she was preparing a study when she died. Christina Rossetti is the mistress of the particular art in which poets of the sentimental tendency have written, from Laetitia Landon and Felicia Hemans down, but there is no question that she was a secure and impassioned mistress, particularly in the range of her resources, extending from the imaginative skill of 'Goblin Market'

and 'Sing-Song' to the Elizabethan intensity of 'The Convent Threshold.' Miss Teasdale reached neither of these distances in her development. She moved in fact hardly at all from her initial attitude. All she could do was to refine and perfect that attitude to the utmost degree of sincerity she had in her. This refinement appears at its best in her volume Dark of the Moon in 1926, where may be found not only some love-songs of exquisite artistry like 'The Flight,' 'Arcturus in Autumn' and 'Words for an Old Air' but several lyrics of a more detached, laconic, and sophisticated nature which promised a richer maturity for her talents . . . She was a poet whose work, with its easy sentiment and human appeal, can easily be mistaken for a distasteful kind of popular verse-journalism, it requires discriminating selection, but when it is given that an art of unmistakable charm is retrieved, and it should always hold a place in American lyric verse.

WITTER BYNNER (1881-)

WITTER BYNNER is one of the few men writing poetry today in whose work may be found any considerable body of the simple lyric. He defines poetry as 'passionate patience,' but this definition is amplified by his conviction that 'Primarily, poetry like music—as a matter of fact with music—came out of the heart and lips of simple mankind.' For Bynner, modern poetry began with Kipling and Housman, and has continued with Alfred Noyes and Masfield. He has on the whole been content to remain aloof from other techniques, though he has indulged himself in numerous tilts in opposition. The best known of these forays occurred when with Arthur Davison Ficke, under the respective pen-names of Emanuel Morgan and Anne Knish, he perpetrated the hoax of the school of Spectra

(N Y, 1915). His own experimentation has been largely in the practice of a kind of rhymed free verse, demonstrated in his first volume, An Ode to Harvard and Other Poems (Boston, 1907), and later expanded into a characteristic medium of his own.

Bynner has been a great admirer of the poetry and philosophy of the Chinese, and with Dr Kiang Kang-hu has published in The Jade Mountain (N.Y., 1929) translations of some three hundred of the finest poems of the T'ang dynasty. In this interest, at least, he was in sympathy with the imagists in their general respect for the concentrated economy and simplicity of Chinese verse. Yet he is specific in limiting the influence on his own work: 'I am not referring to the superficial tricks by which a Chinese poet makes his words balanced and melodious. The discovery which has largely undone my early convictions as to the way of writing poetry has really to do with use of substance rather than with turns of expression'

ELINOR WYLIE (1885-1928)

FEW writers have been so essentially permeated with the spirit of a predecessor as was Elinor Wylie with that of Shelley. She read him first in her Thurd Reader, and at the age of eleven, when she read Trelawny's recollections of Shelley, she describes herself as so filled with emotion that she was afraid to move, afraid to cry for fear the scene within the pages of the book might be hidden from her eyes, wondering and wondering why the bright creature who had lived within that scene should have died and fallen into dust no stronger than the golden leaves blowing in at the window

This enthusiasm remained with her, and she became a close student of his life. Two of her novels, The Orphan Angel(N Y , 1926) and Mr Hodge and Mr Hazard (N Y , 1928), were concerned, directly or indirectly, with him. Something within the Puritan marrow of her bones caused her to reject the richness of Keats and to ally herself with Shelley. She did not imitate his poetry; she was merely, to borrow a phrase from 'One Person,' 'a woman by an archangel befriended'

Her life as a poet was spent in stern self-discipline to attain clarity and sharpness of utterance within traditional verse-forms. Her first book of poems, Incidental Numbers, her mother had anonymously published at London in 1912 in an edition of sixty numbers for private distribution. She included no poems from it in her subsequent volumes. These were Nets to Catch the Winds(N Y., 1921), Black Armour (N Y , 1923), Trivial Breath(N Y , 1928), and Angels and Earthly Creatures(N.Y , 1929). Each shows a steady advance over her previous work. It was in a sense as though she had been training herself for the time when she should have something to say. This came in the poetry of her last volume, and particularly in 'One Person,' one of the finest sonnet sequences in the English language.

Her prose illustrated the qualities which caused James Branch Cabell to characterize her as a 'Dresden china shepherdess'. Of Mr. Hodge and Mr Hazard, Isabel Patterson has said

The whole story of Mr Hodge and Mr Hazard is the absence of Shelley. This is England after it rejected Shelley; England revisited by a melancholy stranger in 1833. Mr Hazard, described as returning from years of exile in the East, was variously described as Byron or Trelawny, but he is rather a ghost, the Last of the Romantics. And he cut a very strange figure ten years after Byron expired at Missolonghi.

So this 'symbolic romance of the mind' is the epilogue of that great drama of a lost cause, dedicated to the burning heart of Shelley and the per-verse ego of Byron.

This is also her best prose. Here she chastened the abundance of her imagery and disciplined her luxuriant talent. Jennifer Lorn(N Y , 1923) is a dish of curds and cream flavoured with saffron. The Venetian Glass Nephew(N Y , 1925) has the brittle exquisiteness of its title. The Orphan Angel is Shelley's own prose! In Mr Hodge and Mr Hazard, at moments perhaps Lady Clara's musings billow about her too ethereally; she all but floats away in an Angelica Kauffman apotheosis. But the common little man, Mr Hartleigh, and his petulant shallow vulgar Annamaria are clothed in sentences of the most austere distinction The course-grained matter-of-fact Mr Hodge is depicted in his most stultifying aspect without resort to hyperbole or emphasis He speaks, and he is there This is the very object of prose, to render the substance of things so that the spirit is implicit The prose of poets usually tends to a 'false gallop,' as the verse of the born prose-writer seldom quickens or lifts above a footpace Elinor Wylie had both gifts, and she never once let a pedestrian line intrude into her verse, but at first her prose occasionally escaped restraint Here at the last she compelled it to its true function

She was born in Somerville, New Jersey, and spent much of her girlhood in Washington, D C, where her father was Assistant Attorney-General under Theodore Roosevelt For some years she lived abroad with her second husband, Horace Wylie, principally in rural England Her third marriage was with William Rose Benét. Her health during her brief literary career was precarious, and she died instantly of a stroke in 1928, having just prepared for the printer her last volume of poems.

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY (1892-)

EDNA ST VINCENT MILLAY is indubitably the most popular American poet, and she has retained this popularity during the many phases of her verse She began writing with comparative triviality, save for her fine 'Renaissance,' but expressing with pith and salty phrases the plight of the modern sophisticated woman The quatrain in which she burned her candle at both ends became the 'Psalm of Life' of the Nineteen-Twenties Although her verse remained essentially conventional, she has achieved a manner and an idiom essentially her own Both in lyrics and in the sonnet form she has succeeded as have few others of our time

A publisher's announcement of her first volume, Renaissance (N Y, 1917), stated in regard to her verses

They deal, as poetry should deal, primarily with emotion; with the sense of tears and laughter, in mortal things, with beauty and passion, with having and losing, with discoveries and inventions

Miss Millay has, however, increasingly concerned herself with social problems. The trial of Sacco and Vanzetti stirred her, as it did so many, and her most recent volume, Conversation at Midnight (N Y, 1937) was an attempt to capture the flavor of political and social opinion of a few years past

The magnificence of her language has been generously applauded, but the charm of her purely lyric lines has blinded many to the fact that her ear has always been closely tuned to the roughness of common speech This is hardly surprising in view of her long interest in drama For some years she worked with the Provincetown Playhouse in New York, and in 1921 three of her plays were published In 1927 appeared The King's Henchman, the libretto of an operetta which was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House

Recently she has said of herself, in a published interview:

'I, for instance, am moving naturally in the direction of dramatic poetry—by which I don't mean that I've given up writing lyric poetry. Really, the public is very stern with the artist—it looks upon him as an inspired scatter-brain, yet expects him to proceed in more rigidly methodical fashion than any banker! I've given up nothing . . .

'If you don't change and develop between your first book and your 10th, then you just keep on re-writing yourself. And it seems to me that life should do more for you than just keep you alive. After all, a child is not merely fed with the food he eats, he is strengthened, and he grows. It's the same with the poet—that is to say, if he has a heart appetite for life. It's no good nibbling at it.' Then she added with a smile:

'He must also, of course, have an excellent digestion.'

EZRA POUND (1885-)

WHAT poetry needed at the turn of the last century was not new fields to conquer but a fresh manual of arms. This Ezra Pound helped, more than any other poet, to provide. Like Picasso he has been at the same time a critic and an artist.

Pound was born in Hailey, Idaho, in 1885, studied at the University of Pennsylvania, and was an instructor there from 1905 to 1907. No group in America's literary history has proved so significant as that in which, at this time, Ezra Pound, Hilda Doolittle, William Carlos Williams, and Marianne Moore moved as friends. Pound taught for a time in Indiana, but in 1908 sailed for Italy where he published his first book of poems, A Lume Spento (Venice, 1908). Within a few months he left for England where he published a second volume, Personæ (London, 1909).

It was in April of 1909 when Pound first joined the group led by T. E. Hulme, which met in a Soho restaurant to discuss and experiment with verse whose 'great aim is,' as Hulme expressed it, 'accurate, precise and definite description.' Hulme saw the necessity for a strict discipline in the expression of art, in contrast to the various forms of flabbiness which had come in the old age of nineteenth-century Romantic-cism. He recognized that a new youthfulness had brought about 'a change in sensibility,' and that the proper expression of art 'will culminate, not so much in the simple geometric forms found in archaic art, but in the more complicated ones associated in our minds with the age of machinery.' The group died out, but Pound carried on its spirit, gave the name 'Imagisme' to an important aspect of their experimentation, and with his particularly vigorous and common-sense commentaries brought their issues squarely before the literary world.

'Poetry,' said Pound, 'is the statement of overwhelming emotional values,' but he also added that 'poetry is a sort of inspired mathematics, which gives us equations, not for abstract figures, triangles, spheres and the like, but equations for the human emotions.' It was in this way that he extended the province of what might be termed the relatively static quality of early Imagism into the dynamic imagery of Vorticism. The limitations of the early manner of Imagism were what caused most poets to relinquish it after its discipline had been absorbed.

Pound's comment on a poem from the Provençal, that 'like all fine poetry it can be well judged only when heard spoken,' indicates his awareness of the importance of sound in the practice of a medium which had become predominantly visual. The common relationship of verse and music to sound he has amplified by his observation in Antheil and the Treatise on Harmony (Paris, 1924) that apparent discords in sound may be resolved by sufficient periods of rest. In a passage, unwittingly similar to the problem which had been faced by Lanier, Pound indicated some of the difficulties consequent to a return to the oral tradition in English verse.

Everyone has been annoyed by the difficulty of indicating the exact tone and rhythm with which one's verse is to be read. One questions the locus of degrees, sic at what point is it more expeditious to learn musical notation and to set one's words to, or print them with the current musical notation, rather than printing them hind-side-to and topsy-turvy on the page.

This problem of a visual indication of both sound and necessary periods of rest has been largely solved through typography and the arrangement of poetical lines.

These various comprehensions gave force and significance to Pound's searches through early literatures for examples of perfection in various techniques. His extraordinarily wide familiarity with the past was sufficient to give him a sense of the support of tradition. His objective increasingly became fixed ahead rather than behind, and in this respect he differed radically from the apparently similar utilization of the past on the part of such nineteenth-century Romantics as the Pre-Raphaelites, with whom he seemed as a youth to have been joined in spirit.

Pound has always had an acute sense of what is fresh in literature. Not only have his commentaries on recognized literature been provocative and illuminating, but it was he who sent to Harriet Monroe for Poetry. A Magazine of Verse the poems of Frost, Eliot, H D, Aldington, Lawrence, Joyce, Tagore, Flint, Yeats, and others, and it was he who made Margaret Anderson's Little Review into a magazine into which

James Joyce's Ulysses found its first and congenial appearance.

The greatest importance must be attached to Pound's readiness to relinquish a position once its immediate potentialities have been exhausted by himself. This following of an Emersonian precept has given his poetry its steady progression, and solved in his case the dilemma later expressed by Zabel, that 'the greatest difficulty of being a pioneer is in remaining a contemporary.' It is in respect to this malleability of Pound's that 'Hugh Selwyn Mauberley' becomes not only an important technical demonstration but an equally significant personal document.

For the past two decades, Pound's most important work has been in the creation of a flexible yet definite stanza. These 'Cantos' proceed directly out of Pound's profound knowledge of the past, and are a direct reflection both of his own historical awareness and the modern sense of the mutual impingements of various flashes of memory and of contemporary consciousness. They are the speech of a brilliant and somewhat pedantic man. No one could possibly understand all his references, though footnotes will in time blind us into thinking that we did understand them from the beginning. The Cantos give the excitement of listening to a brilliant and rapid conversationalist who presents keys to the imagination and hurries his listener from door to door. It is perhaps idle to quibble about the plan before the series is completed. Pound has sensed potentialities in his medium not recognizable at first, and is presenting to poets, even now, as much stimulation as he gave in 1912 to the so-called Poetic Renaissance.

H D. (1886-)

OF the poets who were moved by the need for greater clarity and precision, H D has kept closest to the tenets which were formulated in definitions of Imagism, and her poem, 'Oread,' has on all sides been accepted as its classical example

When Pound first sent her poems in 1912 to Harriet Monroe, he wrote of them

Objective—no slither, direct—no excessive use of adjectives, no metaphors that won't permit examination It's straight talk, straight as the Greek!

While Pound had turned from one literature to another in rapid succession, H D's interest has remained consistently Hellenic. The purity of the best Greek tradition is to be felt in the poems of her first book, Sea Gardens (London, 1916), and her most recent work has been the translation of the Ion of Euripides (Boston, 1937). With her, however, it is a matter of affinity with the Greek tradition rather than a pedantic adaptation of its forms. H D has simply used the past as an overtone to the expression of her own personality. Although she speaks of herself in terms of 'escapism,' even the ivory tower of her inner world of imagination has had its window from which she has looked out and recorded her observation. Certainly it was not mere chance which caused her to translate the Ion at a moment when Europe seemed again to be on the verge of war.

She has proved herself a modern again in her poetic diction, which might be characterized as a revolt against the school of Swinburne and Gilbert Murray. Nowhere is this more apparent than in her sparing use of adjectives, on which Pound commented, or in the stern discipline of her poetic lines. Her remarkably acute ear is always evident in the subtleties of her strict, yet original forms. She is herself the classicist whom so many admirers have vulgarized in imitation.

Hilda Doolittle was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, but passed most of her childhood in Philadelphia, where her father was Director of the Flower Observatory. She attended Bryn Mawr College, and it was as a student there that she was a friend of Williams, Pound, and Miss Moore. In 1911 she went to London, which she has made her home.

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER (1886-)

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER is one of the many Americans who, early in the century, quit America in order to escape the conventionalities that were ready to strangle any creative expression which did not fit the norm.

Fletcher was born at Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1886, and was sent north by his parents to complete his preparation for Harvard at Phillips Academy in Andover, Massachusetts. He left Harvard before his graduation, and after a brief excursion with an archaeological expedition into the Southwest, sailed in 1908 for Italy. Finally, drawn by the newly-stirring poetical activity in London, he went to England, where he remained for many years. Without ever quite being at the center of any of the movements, he was interested in most of them, and certain of his poems appeared in Miss Lowell's first collection of Imagist poetry in 1915.

Fletcher has always been an experimentalist, and with greater ability than any of his contemporaries he was able to bring into English verse the transmutations of color practised by the French Symbolists. This ability he combined with an analogy of verse to music, in what he called 'a presentation of daily life in terms of highly-orchestrated and colored words.' Examples of this impressionistic method are to be found in his 'Symphonies,' the technique of which his annotation indicates in more detail. 'Fletcher,' Robert Penn Warren has pointed out, 'was the first, or one of the first, to develop in English a type of imagery which Edith Sitwell has since erected into something like an oblique technique of vision.'

His experimentation was further carried on, in conjunction with Amy Lowell, in the development of polyphonic prose, and his 'Clipper Ships' is perhaps the most successful example of this extension of the provinces of both prose and poetry. Of late years, and particularly since his return to America, he has interested himself more and more in conventional forms, the best expressions of which are to be found in XXIV Elegies (Santa Fé, N.M., 1935). In contrast with his earlier concentration on 'pure poetry,' these elegies also illustrate his increasing concern with contemporary life. Such an elegy as that on Tintern Abbey should not be thought of as an imitation of Wordsworth's lyric, but merely as a poet's attempt at utilizing it as a frame of reference to his own observation.

Fletcher has worked in other fields besides poetry. He has been a translator, critic, and biographer, and his autobiography, Life Is My Song (N.Y., 1937), is a revealing portrait of a sensitive and troubled mind.

AMY LOWELL (1874-1925)

AFTER some eight years of writing in the conventional 'poetic jargon' of nineteenth-century verse, Amy Lowell, on a visit to London in 1913, was among the first to recognize the value of the new poetic idiom which bore the name of Imagism. She had come to London armed with a letter of introduction from Harriet Monroe to Ezra Pound, and after meeting him as well as H. D., John Gould Fletcher, and Richard Aldington, and entering into correspondence with other young and promising poets who had welcomed a poetic renaissance in England, she returned to Boston as an enthusiastic convert to the doctrines of what she called 'Some Imagists.' Her particular enthusiasm, however, had its source in her discovery of Paul Fort, the French poet, and her early experiments in Imagistic verse were written in a vein that clearly showed his influence upon her imagination.

Her sincere desire to extend her recognition of the importance of the new poetry and its poets to the American public led her to carry her enthusiasms to the lecture platform where she faced ridicule with the utmost good humor as long as she was permitted the right to say:

As a matter of fact the poet must learn his trade in the same manner, and with the same painstaking care, as the cabinet maker . . . a workman may be pardoned, therefore, for spending a few moments to explain and describe the technique of his trade. A work of beauty which cannot stand an intimate examination is a poor and jerry-built thing. . . . Only a vigorous tree has the vitality to put forth new branches. The poet with originality and power is always seeking to give his readers the same poignant feeling which he has himself. To do this he must constantly find new and striking images, delightful and unexpected forms

Quite as Theodore Roosevelt gave vitality and color to such phrases as 'the big stick' and 'the strenuous life,' so Amy Lowell endowed the phrases 'polyphonic prose' and 'imagist poetry' with the forces of her seemingly inexhaustible energy. Yet throughout the decade in which she wrote so valiantly for the cause of Imagism, she retained her early admiration for the personality and poetry of John Keats. The influence of Keats and Tennyson had left its traces on her first book of poems, and as she neared the completion of her biography of Keats in 1924, her own poetry reassumed the discipline of nineteenth-century lyric form. Although her poems 'Fireworks' and 'Patterns' are among the best known examples of her poetry and are often quoted as representative of the 'free verse' movement in America from 1912 to 1916, it is valuable to observe the unpretentious charm and simplicity of her later verse

After many years of ill health she died at her home, 'Sevenells,' in Boston in 1925.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS (1883-)

THE most characteristic thing about my life, I suppose, is that I still live, working for my living, in the same suburb of New York City where I was born on the 17th of September, 1883. Whereas, my forebears seem to have been restless souls, never long in the same place. My father was born in Birmingham, England, and my mother in Mayaguez, Puerto Rico. I went to the public schools here in Rutherford, N J., until I was about twelve years old, then to a New York City high school, finally to the University of Pennsylvania for my degree in Medicine. Among these years was one when with my brother, I attended a school in Switzerland, living also in Paris for six months at that time. Later I studied Medicine at the University of Leipzig and took my internship in two hospitals in New York. Writing has been my constant companion during these years

No American has written cleaner verse, stripped to the elements of poetry, than has William Carlos Williams yet an even more significant contribution to American literature has been his demonstration that the elements of poetry may be found anywhere, if the poet only charge the objects of his attention with their maximum emotional content. The importance of Williams' statement that he has lived always in the same locality lies in his consequent familiarity with the common things on which he bases his poetry. 'To each thing its special quality,' Williams has said, 'its special value that will enable it to stand alone. When each poem has achieved its particular form unlike any other, when it shall stand alone—then we have achieved our language. We have said what it is in our minds to say.'

Williams is a romantic and somewhat of a sentimentalist. Of this quality, Wallace Stevens wrote in his introduction to Williams' Collected Poems 1921-1931

Sentiment has such an abhorrent name that one hesitates. But if what vitalizes Williams has an abhorrent name, its obviously generative function in his case may help to change its reputation. What Williams gives, on the whole, is not sentiment but the reaction from sentiment, or, rather, a little sentiment, very little, together with acute reaction.

His passion for the anti-poetic is a blood passion and not a passion of the inkpot. The anti-poetic is his spirit's cure. He needs it as a naked man needs shelter or as an animal needs salt. To a man with a sentimental side the anti-poetic is that truth, that reality to which all of us are forever fleeing.

The anti-poetic has many aspects. The aspect to which a poet is addicted is a test of his validity. Its merely rhetorical aspect is valueless. As an affectation, it is a commonplace. As a scourge, it has a little more meaning. But as a phase of a man's spirit, as a source of salvation, now, in the midst of a baffled generation, as one looks out of the window at Rutherford or Passaic, or as one walks the streets of New York, the anti-poetic acquires an extraordinary potency, especially if one's nature possesses that side so attractive to the Furies.

Something of the unreal is necessary to fecundate the real, something of the sentimental is necessary to fecundate the anti-poetic. Williams, by nature, is more of a realist than is commonly true in the case of a poet.

The qualities of Williams' poetry are also those of his prose, of which The White Mule (Norfolk, Conn., 1937) and short stories like 'Old Doc Rivers' and 'The Girl with the Pimply Face' are perhaps his best examples. His introduction, 'A Note on Poetry,' is a sufficient explanation of his intent in both mediums.

MARIANNE MOORE (1887-)

In his introduction to Marianne Moore's Selected Poems, T. S. Eliot wrote

My conviction, for what it is worth, has remained unchanged for the last fourteen years that Miss Moore's poems form part of the small body of durable poetry written in our time, of that small body of writings, among what passes for poetry, in which an original sensibility and alert intelligence and deep feeling have been engaged in maintaining the life of the English language.

Of poetry, Miss Moore herself has written.

I, too, dislike it: there are things that are important beyond all this fiddle.

Reading it, however, with a perfect contempt for it, one discovers in it after all, a place for the genuine

Of the poetic imagination, she has also written nor till the poets among us can be 'literalists of the imagination'—above

insolence and triviality and can present for inspection, imaginary gardens with real toads

in them, shall we have
it.

Marianne Moore was born in St. Louis,

Missouri, in 1887 and received her B.A. at Bryn Mawr College in 1909. She taught stenography at the Carlisle Indian School from 1911 to 1915. Her first book, Poems, was published in London in 1921 and upon publication of her second book of poems in 1924 she received the Dial award for 'distinguished service to American letters'. She was an assistant in the Hudson Park Branch of the New York Public Library until she assumed her four-year editorship of The Dial from 1925 to 1929.

Starting with the first publication of her verse in an issue of The Egoist in London in 1915, Miss Moore's poetry has been associated with the work of H.D., T.S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, and William Carlos Williams. With Williams, she shares the distinction of being one of the few American poets in her generation whose work has undergone the discipline of a slow maturity. As does the verse of Emily Dickinson, Miss Moore's verse combines acute and accurate perception of a physical world with the resourcefulness of poetic wit. 'No Swan So Fine' illustrates her mastery of a firm, yet subtle lyric form, and her most recent version of 'A Grave' again displays her sensibility to the tonal variations of verbal sound and visual image. The quality of Miss Moore's power to observe the detail of a richly varied physical world, both active and inanimate, suggests the very quality of a twentieth-century civilization in America that readily accepted the material aspects of William James' pragmatism.

WALLACE STEVENS (1879-)

NOT the least of the contributions made by Harriet Monroe's Poetry: A Magazine of Verse was its early publication of the poetry of Wallace Stevens. His poetry is the work of a singularly sensitive imagination and the impression it conveys to the reader is one of a subdued elegance created by his choice of the precise visual image and an equally distinguished vocabulary. No less important than the poems themselves are their decorative titles placed in exact juxtaposition to what each poem has to say. If one looks for an analogy to Stevens' verse in painting, one thinks of Whistler, but it is Whistler who has come to life again with a peculiarly sharp-cued eye. The poetry of Wallace Stevens reveals not merely the connoisseur of fine rhythms and the nuances of the lyrical line, but a trained observer who gazes with an intelligent eye upon the decadence of a civilized world that follows the rapid acquisition of wealth and power.

Wallace Stevens was born in Pennsylvania, in 1879, and was educated at Harvard. In 1923 the first collection of his poems, Harmonium was published. This was followed by a second collection, including fourteen new poems, under the same title in 1931. Twelve years later a third book of poems Ideas of Order appeared, and in 1937 he published a fourth book, The Man with the Blue Guitar. He lives in Hartford, Connecticut.

CONRAD AIKEN (1889-)

SINCE the publication of his first book of poems, Earth Triumphant and Other Tales and Verse (N.Y., 1914), the poetry of Conrad Aiken has been written very near the center of each succeeding movement in American poetry. The tonal quality of Aiken's sensibility is apparent to even the most casual reader, and that sensibility is again apparent in the critical sensitivity of his anthologies of American verse.

His Selected Poems (N.Y., 1929) displayed the wide range of his poetic facilities, but it is in The Morning Song from Senlin that one finds the counters of his style which extend into his latest volume of Preludes: Time in the Rock. The title,

Preludes, which he has chosen as the general title for his work since 1930 is indicative of its character; for within the flexible stanza form, he has created the poems in circular progression, never—like an unfinished symphony—quite reaching the conclusion of what he has to say.

Aiken said of himself that he was 'in quest of a sort of absolute poetry, a poetry in which the intention is not so much to arouse an emotion, or to persuade of a reality, as to employ such emotion or sense of reality (tangentially struck) with the same cool detachment with which a composer strikes notes or chords.'

Conrad Aiken was born in Savannah, Georgia, in 1889. He was educated at Harvard, from which he received his A.B. in 1912. Since then, he has lived alternately in Rye, England, and in Boston.

Aside from his books of poems he has published two novels, Blue Voyage (N.Y., 1927) and Great Circle (N.Y., 1933), which possess something of the same preoccupation with psychoanalysis which may be found in his later poetry.

E. E. CUMMINGS (1894-)

THE one true wit among modern poets is Edward Estlin Cummings. He alone has understood the poetical conceit, and has employed it in the expression of the preoccupation with death, the materialism, and the sentiment of the 'War Generation.'

Cummings was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1894, and after receiving his master's degree at the age of twenty-two became one of the ambulance boys in France. It was this exposure to war which for him, as for so many other writers of his generation, concentrated attention upon the individual and through increased tension heightened all emotional values. His war novel, The Enormous Room (N.Y., 1922), was based on the sensibilities of an individual under such strain. There have been few novels of the World War to equal it.

Cummings had printed numerous conventional poems in The Harvard Advocate during his student days. The effect of the war on him as a poet is to be found expressed in his introduction to a later edition of The Enormous Room (N.Y., 1934):

Did it ever occur to you that people in this so-called world of ours are not interested in art?
Da da.

But Cummings was already too essentially a conventional poet to adopt the complete nihilism of the movement of dadaism, and the expression of his emotion was changed only in his attitude. This change of attitude found its outlet in inverted imagery, occasional preciousness, and in true conceit. The fundamental position of a lyric poet was not, however, altered; and his erotic poetry is the finest written by an American.

He was also preoccupied with the general problem of sound in poetics, and found his solution partly through his keen ear for the nuances of hard-boiled speech and most spectacularly through his experiments with the serviceability of typography. The use of print to indicate the values of sound has been recognized for centuries, and it was because of the indicated stress of capitalization, black letters, and italics, that Thomas Prince could observe of the sermons of a preacher like Cotton Mather, that his style, 'like his manner of speaking was very emphatical.' Similarly, Cummings has given specific directions for what must be heard in his poems. But so sensitive has been his ear, that through his use of stresses, or the word-splitting practices of certain Greek and Latin poets, his readers can hear only through their eyes.

THORNTON WILDER (1897-)

THE popularity of Thornton Wilder's second novel, The Bridge of San Luis Rey (N.Y., 1928), was so spectacular that it acted as a disservice to its author. His first novel, The Cabala (N.Y., 1926), introduced the work of a young novelist who had accepted the conventions of French prose and who was interested primarily in reflecting what he conceived to be the classical clarity of expression that he had found in French literature. His Bridge of San Luis Rey was, in fact, a literary acknowledgment of his debt to the Letters of Madame de Sévigné. Even The Woman of Andros (N.Y., 1930), his delicately wrought reconstruction of the mood of paganism, reflected the quality of style to be found in the French letter writers of the eighteenth century.

From the character of his early prose, it was obvious that Wilder had little intention or desire to become a 'popular' American novelist of the later 1920's. His work seemed all too consciously removed from the realistic tendencies in the American novel of the twentieth century. With characteristic candor and honesty, he said to an interviewer from the Saturday Review of Literature, June 11, 1938

For years I shrank from describing the modern world. I was alarmed at finding a way of casting into generalization the world of doorbells and telephones. And now, though many of the subjects will often be of the past, I like to feel that I accept the twentieth century, not only as a fascinating age to live in, but as assimilable stuff to think with.

His excursions into the life of the past were followed by a satire in the form of a novel, Heaven Is My Destination (1935). This experiment in the writing of a contemporaneous and realistic satire showed Wilder's sensitivity to the criticism he had received for too sedulously reconstructing the themes and forms of the literature that belonged to an age other than his own. It was also characteristic of Wilder to attempt an answer to his critics in his own way.

No less remarkable than his popularity as a novelist was his sustained and at last successful development as a playwright. His earlier plays, The Angel That Troubled the Waters, and Other Plays (N.Y., 1928), and The Long Christmas Dinner, and Other Plays in One Act (N.Y., 1931) were first steps in the training which enabled him to write Our Town (N.Y., 1938). The seriousness of his intention is again significant in an interview by a reporter from the New York Herald Tribune. Wilder said

As drama students know, the French inherited from the Romans a great sense of economy of play structure and an urgent desire for unification. Only essentials occupied the classic French playwright and nothing not utterly necessary to the progress and motivation of the script was allowed to intrude upon it.

The devices of Our Town owe their precedence to an English adaptation of the Chinese play, Yellow Jacket, which was produced in America at a time when the 'Little Theater' movement was at its height. The essential materials of Wilder's play, however, seem to stem from another tradition in American culture. In its attempt to reproduce the universalities of American life, Our Town recalls the prose drama of William Vaughn Moody, which met with approval three decades before. The tradition was American.

Thornton Wilder was born in 1897 at Madison, Wisconsin, and at the age of nine accompanied his family to China, where his father was consul-general at Hongkong and at Shanghai. After his return to America in 1914, Wilder studied at the Berkeley, California, public schools and at the Thacher School in the same state. In 1920, after an interlude of service in the Coast Artillery during the World War, he was graduated from Yale. For two years after that he was a student at the American Academy at Rome. From 1921 to 1928 he was a master at Lawrenceville Academy, in New Jersey, and later was for several years a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago.

ROBINSON JEFFERS (1887-)

In a sense Robinson Jeffers is the obverse of Walt Whitman. Witter Bynner took up Whitman's philosophy of love for one's fellow men, and Carl Sandburg carried on Whitman's function as a poet of the people; but Jeffers has definitely said that he regards humanity as an excrescence on nature, and that the love of man is merely 'the trap that catches noblest spirits, that caught—they say—God, when he walked on earth.' If Whitman was the Yea-Sayer, Jeffers is the Nay-Sayer. And the expression of his dark philosophy, though nihilistic, is extraordinarily powerful. The man himself is like a force of nature. The reason he has dealt so much with the ugly theme of incest in his long poems in free verse is explained thus: 'In Tamar a little and in The Women at Point Sur consciously and definitely, incest is symbolized racial introversion—man regarding man exclusively—founding his values, desires, a picture of the universe, all on his own humanity. . . . The tendency to romanticize unmoral freedom leads to destruction—often of the individual but always of the social organism. One of the intentions of Point Sur was to indicate the destruction and strip everything but its natural ugliness from the unmorality.' If Jeffers seems to draw poison from life, he is like the King Mithridates that A E Housman celebrated by telling how he accustomed himself to poison to such an extent that he remained quite hale and hearty.

His Roan Stallion and his Tower Beyond

Tragedy are generally regarded as his masterpieces. In commenting on the origin of the latter poem, Jeffers himself has said.

My father gave me a good start in Latin and Greek when I was quite young, both at school and at college. I took them as they came, and that was never profoundly. I think most of whatever acquaintance I have with the classic spirit came from reading English poetry.

The origin of The Tower Beyond Tragedy was probably in the rich voice and Amazon stature of a German-Jewish actress with whom we were casually acquainted a few years ago. She recited one of the more barbaric Scotch ballads magnificently in private, and her voice suggested Clytemnestra and Cassandra to me, all the more because she rather failed in the usual sort of play.

I had no thought of production when I wrote, and for that reason began with some lines of narrative, but of course your advanced class is free to give a private performance if they should wish to.

We turn to the classic stories, I suppose, as to Greek sculpture, for a more ideal and also more normal beauty, because the myths of our own race were never developed, and have been alienated from us.

The long, powerful rhythms that he has made his own, like the welter and assault of waves on his own Carmel coast, the evocative strength of description, the right metaphor, the illuminating epithet, will be found throughout his work. In his shorter poems he reveals an ironic wit, some of which resembles the epigrammatic forcefulness of the Nay-saying paradoxes found in Nietzsche's Thus Spake Zarathustra. And in some of his shorter pieces there are also passages of descriptive brilliance, particularly in his 'Love the Wild Swan,' which are characteristic of the insight that illumines Jeffers' use of natural phenomena in the symbolism of his more ambitious poems. Despite his tendency to overstress the mere show of power in his vivid imagery, and despite his seemingly endless repetition of the theme of incest in his poetic narratives, he is justly regarded today as one of the major figures in American poetry.

Son of a scholar who taught him poetry, Jeffers went to school during his travels abroad as a child, was graduated from Occidental College in Los Angeles, California, and spent some time at the Universities of Zurich and Southern California, and at the Los Angeles Medical School. He now lives at Tor House, which he built with own hands at Mount Carmel in California.

EUGENE O'NEILL (1888-)

EUGENE O'NEILL is the first American dramatist of importance, and with his plays the American theatre became something more than an expensive diversion for its audience. His first one-act plays of the sea were produced in 1916 on the wharves of Provincetown, Massachusetts, later in the stables of Greenwich Village, and finally in the gilt theatres of Broadway. O'Neill's success marked that of a concerted effort to bring a native dignity to the stage.

His father was the famous actor James O'Neill, who during the 'nineties played the role of the Count of Monte Cristo throughout America. Eugene O'Neill was brought up in the theatre, and has never lost his sense either of the dramatic or of the potentialities of the grandiose from which he ostensibly reacted. He has been a continual pioneer and experimenter in the technique of the theatre, and has brought into it most of the themes which had interested writers of his time.

O'Neill's first plays were based on his own experiences as a sailor in the Caribbean, they demonstrated both his sense of realism and his keen ear for common speech. The theatre needed such gifts. Desire Under the Elms, produced in 1924, was a brilliant example of his talents. The psychological value of sound he indicated through the tom-toms in his Emperor Jones, 1920. The force of psychological knowledge in its revelation of man's duality was brought out, in combination with man's spiritual and material ambiguity, by the use of the masks of The Great God Brown, 1925, the theme of which is in many ways the most significant of O'Neill's plays. The interest in the dominating impulsions of sex was in his Strange Interlude, 1928, whose nine acts were an indication of his impatience with the restrictions of time in relation to theatrical production. Even the use of parallel overtones, which Pound and Eliot had used in poetry and James Joyce had employed in prose, were brought to the theatre in Mourning Becomes Electra, 1931, a modern application of the problems raised in the Agamemnon trilogy of Aeschylus. This awareness of the possibilities of the stage has been no small part of O'Neill's contribution. In recognition of his accomplishment, he was given in 1937 the Nobel Prize in literature.

O'Neill's desire to extend the boundaries of the stage has on occasion caused him to look beyond it. It is on these terms that Lazarus Laughed (N.Y., 1926), 'a play for the imaginary theatre,' should be read. The Lucretian laughter of Lazarus is the triumphant Yes! of modern materialism. But the significance of the play does not lie entirely in its summation of post-war belief. For both in its rhythmical language and in its use of the chorus it is an important milestone in a determined effort (since the era of William Vaughn Moody) to give life to poetical drama. O'Neill added what Moody's followers lacked, a sense of the theatre.

GERTRUDE STEIN (1874-)

THE publication in 1909 of Gertrude Stein's Three Lives marked the appearance of a significant literary pioneer. These stories of Swedish and German peasants and of a Negress were Miss Stein's first attempts in what has been her constant aim, 'to get to the very core of the communication of the intuition.' She brought about this communication through words and rhythms particularly suited to the intelligences of her characters. Her discovery was an important step in realism.

Her work was an example of the increased sensitivity on the part of writers to the revelations of psychological research. She was herself a trained psychologist, and had been one of William James' favorite students when she attended Radcliffe College. This study she continued at Johns Hopkins until 1903, when she left America, to settle first in London and then in Paris. It was under James that she first began her research in the problem of automatic writing, out of which came her understanding of its value in the expression of character.

Out of her knowledge of psychology came also her perception of the values attached to individual words, and the ambiguities which arise from the varying attachments of meaning by individuals. This led to her concentration upon the essence of words, and to a consequent simplification and clarity in their use. It was this aspect of her work which caused Sherwood Anderson to remark concerning her.

Miss Stein is a worker in words with the same loving touch in her strong fingers that was characteristic of the women of the kitchens of the brick houses in the town of my boyhood. She is an American woman of the old sort, one who cares for the handmade goodies and who scorns the factory-made foods, and in her own great kitchen she is making something with her materials, something sweet to the tongue and fragrant to the nostrils.

And it was as a result of the encouragement and stimulation which her example gave to writers like Ernest Hemingway and Sherwood Anderson, that she could say of the latter 'Sherwood Anderson had a genius for using the sentence to convey a direct emotion.' Such direct conveyance is an important characteristic of modern American prose.

In her essay, 'How Writing Is Written,' Miss Stein sums up the progress of her experimentation. That she had completed both Three Lives and The Making of Americans (Paris, 1924) during the first decade of the century demonstrates that much fine writing is unsuspected by its own age.

SHERWOOD ANDERSON (1876-1941)

THE career of few writers better illustrates the common literary desire to attain the morality of form than does that of Sherwood Anderson. When as a middle-aged, fairly prosperous factory-owner, he walked out of his office to learn the craft of writing, he became as much a symbol of America's spiritual uneasiness as the factory was of America's urge for material achievement.

In the first years of Anderson's groping revolt he formulated his 'Apology for Crudity' which became a creed for lesser men and a stamp for himself.

For a long time I have believed that crudity is an inevitable quality in the production of a really significant present-day American literature. How indeed is one to escape the obvious fact that there is as yet no native subtlety of thought or living among us? And if we are a crude and childlike people, how can our literature hope to escape the influence of that fact? Why indeed should we want it to escape?

Anderson recognized in other men a groping similar to his own. Mankind was represented in his symbol of the teacher whose sensitive hands had the artist's urge to create form or at least to touch beauty. The teacher was misunderstood and driven out. 'Men had erected walls about themselves and all men were perhaps destined to stand forever behind the walls—on which they constantly beat with their fists, or with whatever tools they could get hold of. Wanted to break through to something, you understand. One couldn't quite make out whether there was just one great wall or many little individual walls.'

The highest wall, in the period when America was somewhat belatedly reading Freud, seemed to be Sex. Anderson's realistic stories of American village life in Winesburg, Ohio (N Y, 1919) were chiefly concerned with this frustration. Many Marriages (N Y, 1923) and Dark Laughter (N Y, 1925) were novels based on the same, perhaps at the time unconscious, symbol of incompleteness.

'One who thinks a great deal about people and what they are up to in the world comes inevitably in time to relate them to experiences connected with his own life.' This notation in Sherwood Anderson's Notebook (N.Y., 1926) indicates both the structural method and the fuller comprehension demonstrated in his story 'Death in the Woods.' The nucleus of the story was an incident which he had witnessed as a boy, and which had haunted him by his initial perception of the incompleteness of his understanding. Reminiscently, in A Story Teller's Story (N.Y., 1924), he wrote

There are so many people in that land of whom I should like to tell you. I should like to take you with me through the gate into the land, let you wander there with me. There are people there with whom I should like you to talk. There is the old woman accompanied by the gigantic dogs who died alone in a wood on a winter day, the stout man with the gray eyes and with the pack on his back, who stands talking to the beautiful woman as she sits in her carriage, the little dark woman with the boyish husband who lives in a small house by a dusty road far out in the country.

These and many other figures, all having a life of their own, all playing forever in the field of my fancy. The fanciful shadowy life striving to take on flesh, to live as you and I live, to come out of the shadowy world of the fancy into the actuality of accomplished art.

Gradually, as Anderson had his own experiences, he was able to relate them to the story of the old woman, and to express them in a series of convolutions from the central incident which represents the increasing circumference of his own comprehension. This is the formulation of all writing.

'I believe,' says Anderson, 'that, in this matter of form, it is largely a matter of depth of feeling.' The conclusion of 'Death in the Woods' is significant. 'A thing so complete has its own beauty.' It was Anderson's own answer to crudity.

He answered it as well in the bare beauty of his style. Anderson has contrived an idiom of his own, which at its best has the qualities of great prose. He has almost a poet's ear for rhythm, which he is able to control and turn to fit either the emotion or the idea with which he is concerned. 'The writer,' he says, 'is seeking a certain tune, a rhythm. When he has caught it the words and sentences flow freely. There is a new cunning, a new majesty to his thoughts.' This new cunning and majesty is apparent in 'Death in the Woods.'

Sherwood Anderson was born at Camden, Ohio, and brought up in an environment similar to that which he describes in the stories of his childhood Tar, a Midwest Childhood (N.Y., 1926) and Windy McPherson's Son (N.Y., 1916). His later life of escape from the conventional life of a manufacturer and his development as a writer is told in A Story Teller's Story (N.Y., 1924). Recently he has lived at Marion, Virginia, where he is the owner of a newspaper.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY (1898-)

THE influence of Ernest Hemingway's prose upon the younger short-story writers of the post-war period in American literature may be said to be as marked as the influence of T S Eliot's verse upon the younger poets of the same era. Hemingway, like many other novelists of his generation, has acknowledged a debt to the early prose of Gertrude Stein. Yet Hemingway's earliest writing, exhumed from school publications, reveals the fact that his hard-hitting short sentences in prose preceded whatever literary influences his later work may possess.

During the World War he belonged to a group of writers which included John Dos Passos, Archibald MacLeish, and Malcolm Cowley. These men, who had served in the War, and who afterwards went to Paris to assimilate their War experiences, were the acknowledged leaders of what Gertrude Stein called 'the lost generation'. One of the best examples of the literature which was to define the character of 'America's Post-War Period' is Hemingway's short story, 'Hills Like White Elephants'. Another example of Hemingway's application of an extraordinary craftsmanship is 'The Undefeated'.

His second book, In Our Time, was published in Paris in 1924. It was followed by three novels, The Sun Also Rises (N.Y., 1926), A Farewell to Arms (N.Y., 1929), and To Have and To Have Not (N.Y., 1937), and two books of short stories Men Without Women (N.Y., 1926) and Winner Take Nothing (N.Y., 1933). No less important than the appearance of these books is the influence exerted by Hemingway's point of view towards literature—an influence which is exemplified in his short stories and which was stated in his Death in the Afternoon (N.Y., 1932).

This too to remember. If a man writes clearly enough any one can see if he fakes. If he mystifies to avoid a straight statement, which is very different from breaking so-called rules of syntax or grammar to make an effect which can be obtained in no other way, the writer takes a longer time to be known as a fake and other writers who are afflicted by the same necessity will praise him in their own defense. True mysticism should not be confused with incompetence in writing which seeks to mystify where there is no mystery but is really only the necessity to fake to cover lack of knowledge or the inability to state clearly. Mysticism implies a mystery and there are many mysteries; but incompetence is not one of them, nor is overwritten journalism made literature by the injection of a false epic quality. Remember this too: all bad writers are in love with the epic.

Hemingway's preoccupation with the theme of death, which so frequently enters the violent action of his stories, is also characteristic of the group of writers in which he assumed leadership. It was as though the great sacrifice of the lives of young men during the World War had given Hemingway a particularly keen awareness to the precariousness of living. But this awareness also left its mark upon the elements of his prose style, which, in its effort to convey emotion in the fewest possible words, stripped naked the very core of the sentimentality that was characteristic of the men and women who were brought to life in his fiction.

Ernest Hemingway was born at Oak Park, Illinois, in 1898. He attended the public schools of Michigan, where he was brought up. He was a reporter in Kansas City at the outbreak of the World War, and he left to join the volunteer ambulance unit in France. Later he served with the Italian army, and after the war remained abroad as correspondent for the Toronto Star. He lived for some years in Paris as a correspondent for the Hearst papers, and while there came to know Gertrude Stein and to concentrate on his own writing. Of recent years he has lived at Key West, Florida.

JOHN DOS PASSOS (1896-)

ALTHOUGH John Dos Passos' first novel, One Man's Initiation—1917 (London, 1920), was the story based on his experiences in the World War, it was not until 1921, when his second novel of the War, Three Soldiers, was published in America that his abilities as a realistic prose writer were widely recognized. In 1927 his third novel, Manhattan Transfer, introduced a novelist whose experiments in the writing of prose are of first importance.

The extraverted energy which marks the prose of John Dos Passos has its origins in his boyhood reading of the novels of Captain Marryat as well as in his experiences in the writing of nervous, brilliant, liberal journalism. To these may be added his admiration for the poetry of Cendrars, a contemporary French poet, whose verse is characterized by its extraordinary velocity and vivid impressionism.

Upon completion of his trilogy, The 42nd Parallel (N Y, 1930), Nineteen Nineteen (N Y, 1932), and The Big Money (N Y, 1936), brought together as U S A (N Y, 1937), John Dos Passos emerged as a major figure in contemporary American fiction. No less remarkable than his assimilation of the historical events and situations which characterized the years of the World War and the decade immediately following it was his ability to create a new technique in the writing of a social novel. It may be said that the technique of U S A bears a close relationship to the technique of the cinema. John Dos Passos' method of telling a story has within it all the devices which have made the uses of montage so effective to audiences in a motion picture theater. His broken narrative of the lives of his characters, his 'news reels' which are direct quotations of headlines and fragments of items clipped from newspapers, his 'camera eye' which records his personal impressions of the events which dominate the lives of his characters, his biographies of the leading figures in contemporary American life, written in unrhymed and syncopated prose, a prose which closely resembles the verse of Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee Masters, —all combine to create a visual impression of remarkable vividness and unquestionable veracity. The social philosophy which underlies the theme of U S A is indicated by his sympathetic and penetrating biography of Thorsten Veblen in The Big Money, the last novel of his trilogy.

John Dos Passos was born in Chicago in 1896. During his adolescence, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire was his Bible. He was educated at Harvard, where he received the degree of A B in 1916. In a news item in Time, August 10, 1936, it is reported that though he was graduated cum laude from Harvard he thinks he got little out of college and regards his four years there as largely wasted. His latest book is Journeys Between Wars (N Y, 1938), a collection of the reportorial travel sketches which he has been writing since 1922.

T S ELIOT (1888-)

THE general acceptance of modern verse has come very largely through the poetry of T.S. Eliot. This has been brought about not because other men have in general agreed with what Eliot has had to say at various stages of his development, but because his continued preoccupation with, and articulated solutions of, the problem of communication have both clarified his own expression and given the means to other poets to clarify theirs.

The position of the poet and of the critic today is indicated by Eliot in the first of the Charles Eliot Norton Lectures which he gave at Harvard University in the winter of 1932-33.

When I speak of modern poetry as being extremely critical, I mean that the contemporary poet, who is not merely a composer of graceful verses—is forced to ask himself such questions as ‘what is poetry for?’, not merely ‘what am I to say?’ but rather ‘how and to whom am I to say it?’ We have to communicate—if it is communication, for the word may beg the question—an experience which is not an experience in the ordinary sense, for it may only exist, formed out of many personal experiences ordered in some way which may be very different from the way of valuation of practical life, in the expression of it. If poetry is a form of ‘communication,’ yet that which is to be communicated is the poem itself, and only incidentally the experience and the thought which have gone into it. The poem’s existence is somewhere between the writer and the reader, it has a reality which is not simply the reality of what the writer is trying to ‘express,’ or of his experience of writing it, or of the experience of the reader or of the writer as reader.

Thomas Stearns Eliot was born at St Louis, Missouri, in 1888. In 1909 he was graduated from Harvard University, and in the next year was given his master’s degree. During the winter of 1911–12 he was at the Sorbonne in Paris and from 1912 to 1914 was a student at Merton College, Oxford. Since then he has remained in England, where he has become a British subject.

In an introduction to This American World (London, 1928) by Edgar A. Mowrer, Eliot has discussed his past

I have a background which Mr Mowrer would recognize, and which is different from that of the native European and from that of many Americans. My family were New Englanders, who had been settled—my branch of it—for two generations in the South West—which was, in my own time, rapidly becoming merely the Middle West. The family guarded jealously its connections with New England, but it was not until years of maturity that I perceived that I myself had always been a New Englander in the South West, and a South Westerner in New England, when I was sent to school in New England I lost my southern accent without ever acquiring the accent of the native Bostonian. In New England I missed the long dark river, the alanthus trees, the flaming cardinal birds, the high limestone bluffs where we searched for fossil shell-fish, in Missouri I missed the fir trees, the bay and goldenrod, the song-sparrows, the red granite and the blue sea of Massachusetts. I remember a friend of my school-days, whose family had lived in the same New England seaport for two hundred and fifty years. In some ways his background was as different from mine as that of any European. My grandmother—one of my grandmothers—had shot her own wild turkeys for dinner, his had collected Chinese pottery brought home by the Salem clippers. It was perhaps easier for the grandson of pioneers to migrate eastward than it would have been for my friend to migrate in any direction.

‘The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock’ was written while Eliot was still an undergraduate at Harvard, and its reflection of Laforgue is indicative of his early and independent recognition of the importance of French poetry to English verse. Eliot said in 1918 ‘It is exactly as wasteful for a poet to do what has been done already, as for a biologist to rediscover Mendel’s discoveries. The French poets in question have made “discoveries” in verse of which we cannot afford to be ignorant, discoveries which are not merely a concern for French syntax. To remain with Wordsworth is equivalent to ignoring the whole of science subsequent to Erasmus Darwin.’ Eliot’s receptivity to the lessons of the French, of the Elizabethan dramatists, as well as to the Pound of ‘Hugh Selwyn Mauberley’ and the ‘Cantos’ has given him the technical strength of tradition.

Eliot has also been one of the first to recognize in poetry the importance of anthropology as a frame of reference to the modern mind. The investigation of variant civilizations and religions has brought forth certain common denominators which can serve as fresh symbols of interrelationship. ‘The Golden Bough,’ Eliot said in 1921, ‘can be read in two ways as a collection of entertaining myths, or as a revelation of that vanished mind of which our mind is a continuation' Eliot has chosen the second way, and utilized it in accord with his observation that 'in art there should be interpenetration and metamorphosis' In this way he has managed to combine timeliness with timelessness

The dramatic quality of Eliot's earliest verse makes it easy to understand why he has become more and more interested in dramatic poetry, until he might say in the last of the Charles Eliot Norton Lectures.

The ideal medium for poetry, to my mind, and the most direct means of social 'usefulness' for poetry, is the theatre In a play of Shakespeare you get several levels of significance For the simplest auditors there is the plot, for the more thoughtful the character and conflict of character, for the more literary the words and phrasing, for the musically sensitive the rhythm, and for auditors of greater sensitiveness and understanding a meaning which reveals itself gradually And I do not believe that the classification of audience is so clear-cut as this, but rather that the sensitiveness of every auditor is acted upon by all these elements at once, though in different degrees of consciousness At none of these levels is the auditor bothered by the presence of that which he does not understand, or by the presence of that in which he is not interested.

The development of Eliot's attitudes and beliefs has been always fresh and consistent The uncertainty and timidity of J. Alfred Prufrock resulted naturally enough in the sterility of Gerontion, which he epitomized in his contemporary picture of 'The Waste Land' Then, standing as it were at the edge of a precipice, and faced with the necessity of belief and advancement, Eliot turned to the right, as others were to turn to the left Because he moved with the utmost seriousness and sincerity, the expression of his own progress has been vitally useful for the expression of any progress, and the implications of his essay on 'Religion and Literature' can serve many masters

But above all Eliot is a poet

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH (1892-)

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH's New Found Land (Boston, 1930) was the first articulate expression in poetry of a post-war generation, whose emotions had been reflected in the novels of Ernest Hemingway and John Dos Passos MacLeish's conversation with Andrew Marvell represented the synthesis of the time-space relationship which, when crystallized in poetic form, represented the unity which the World War had seemed to deny Its comprehension was demonstrated in the substance given to MacLeish's already characteristic smoothness and control of the lyric line

It was at this time, when he was past thirty, that MacLeish says that he began his real writing. The verve with which he had been able to express his travels in Persia, where after quitting his law practice he had wandered from the central cities of Bushire to Ispahan and Teheran, is still evident in a similar synthesis of the American scene in 'Frescoes for Mr Rockefeller's City'. In addition to this verve, the brilliance and clarity of his visual imagery and his sensitivity to light and color contribute towards the success of his translation of Bern  e Diaz del Castillo's True History of the Conquest of New Spain into the narrative poem, Conquistador (Boston, 1932).

MacLeish's consistent experimentations within conventional verse forms have been extended into the forms of poetic drama in Panic (N Y, 1935), of the radio play in The Fall of the City (N Y, 1936), and into the newsreel sound-track technique of Land of the Free (N.Y, 1938). This willingness to explore the potentialities of contemporary media has been MacLeish's greatest strength, and promises his greatest contribution to American verse.

Archibald MacLeish was educated at the Hotchkiss School in Connecticut, at Yale University, and at the Harvard Law School. After a period during which he taught at Harvard and practised law, he went abroad in order to devote himself to writing. For some years he was an editor of Fortune.

JOHN CROWE RANSOM (1888-)

Of particular significance in modern American poetry was that group of Southern poets who issued, from the spring of 1922 to the winter of 1925, a co-operative journal of poetry, called The Fugitive, published at Nashville, Tennessee. The leader of this group of seven was John Crowe Ransom, who was graduated from Vanderbilt University, taught there for many years, and is now a member of the faculty of Kenyon College in Ohio. The magazine grew from the discussions of the original members, all friends. They included Allen Tate, Donald Davidson, and others. At first the poets contributing to the magazine used pseudonyms, and the foreword to its first number indicated, in an amusing fashion, a change in Southern literature. It said in part

The Fugitive flees from nothing faster than from the highcaste Brahmins of the Old South. Without raising the question of whether the blood in the veins of its editors runs red, they at any rate are not advertising it as blue, indeed, as to pedigree, they cheerfully invite the most unfavorable inference from the circumstances of their anonymity.

An anthology gathered from the poetry of this group and called Fugitives was published in 1928. It represents the South's most distinguished contribution to modern regional poetry.

Ransom is one of the most truly original poets of our time. His approach is tangential, and his verse is always sophisticated in its use of formal, lyrical device. Mark Van Doren has spoken of his 'almost acid gaiety' and of his use of 'fresh realistic words'. In general, it may be said that his verse suggests the very quality of ironic disillusionment that many writers of the South, who are less gifted than he, have attempted to convey.

A Tennessean by birth, Ransom, after graduating from Vanderbilt, was a Rhodes scholar at Christ Church, Oxford, from 1910 to 1913, when he received his B.A. Six years later, in 1919 his first book, Poems About God, appeared, with an inroduction by Christopher Morley After five more years his second volume, Chills and Fever (1924), showed the maturity of his craftsmanship, for it contains within it some of the best poetry, and certainly the most distinguished lyricism that the South has produced in its present generation

ALLEN TATE (1899-)

ALLEN TATE's work is best known for its representation of culture to be found south of the Mason-Dixon line Tate is the most eloquent member of the South's 'new generation' since the close of the World War. Perhaps the best known of his poems is 'The Ode to the Confederate Dead,' which is a brilliant exercise in the uses of twentieth-century rhetoric

He has written exhaustively of his own work in an essay characteristically entitled 'Narcissus as Narcissus' in The Virginia Quarterly Review Concerning his 'Ode to the Confederate Dead' he wrote

That poem is 'about' solipsism or Narcissism, or any other ism that denotes the failure of the human personality to function properly in nature and society. Society (and 'nature' as modern society constructs it) appears to offer limited fields for the exercise of the whole man, who wastes his energy piecemeal over separate functions that ought to come under a unity of being (Until the last generation, only certain women were whores, having been set aside as special instances of sex amid a social scheme that held the general belief that sex must be part of a whole, now the general belief is that sex must be special) Without unity we get the remarkable self-consciousness of our age

The number of Greek and Latin derivatives in Tate's vocabulary indicates to his readers his admiration for the frequently elaborate sonorous and at times archaic word His most enduring claims to originality, however, are to be found in the quality of his wit This is used for the expression of mingled anger and disillusionment which characterizes the attitude of the post war Southerner who is all too conscious of the defects existing in contemporary American civilization

Allen Tate was born in Winchester, Kentucky, in 1899 He received his A B. from Vanderbilt University in 1922 Under the leadership of John Crowe Ransom he edited the Fugitive. His first book of poems, Mr Pope and Other Poems, appeared in 1928 Poems 1928-1931 was published in 1932 In 1936 he published The Mediterranean and Other Poems, and in 1937 his Selected Poems He now lives in Tennessee in a large house overlooking the Cumberland River

STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT (1898-)

THE appearance of Stephen Vincent Benét's fourth book of poems, Tiger Joy (N Y, 1925), gave character to his rising reputation as a young and felicitous American poet Three years later, his epic of the Civil War, John Brown's Body, brought with its publication the recognition of a wide reading public The poem contained a great variety of diversification, extending from loose, long rhythms approximating prose to short passages of lyric eloquence. In his latest book of poems, Burning City (N Y., 1936), he extended his range into free verse with powerful impact in his

'Litany for Dictatorships' His octave of sonnets in 'The Golden Corpse' and the dedicatory sonnets to John Brown's Body paint purely American backgrounds in a manner fresh and new, and the recent series of 'Nightmares,' devoted to commentary on our possible future, seems little more fantastic than certain developments in the history of our own time

Benét has come a long way since he overcame the early influence of Robert Browning, William Morris, and Gilbert K Chesterton, which was at different times evident in his earliest work in verse But even his first small book, published at the age of seventeen, presented a series of Roman portraits with remarkable vigor The variety of his poetry, from bizarre and humorous to trenchantly grave and dramatic, may be safely left to the audit of the future In prose, his work in the novel, always full of vitality, has steadily improved, and today his best short stories are recognized as of unusual originality

Stephen Vincent Benét was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, in 1898 He received his A B from Yale in 1919 He married Rosemary Carr of Chicago in 1921. He lives in New York City

LÉONIE ADAMS (1899-)

WITH the publication of her first book of poems, Those Not Elect (N Y, 1925), Léonie Adams was immediately recognized as one of the few distinguished lyricists of the day The quality of her imagination, which so closely resembles the characteristics of seventeenth-century devotional verse, caused her to be classified as a 'metaphysical poet' Her lyricism, however, more closely resembles the tonal quality of the poetry of William Butler Yeats and Walter de la Mare, and the character of her 'metaphysics' has something of the same quickening influence upon contemporary poetry as the verse of Gerard Manley Hopkins

As Babette Deutsch wrote in her critical study of modern verse, This Modern Poetry

None of her contemporaries has recorded with more delicate precision the motions of the hours and the seasons as sky and earth body them forth

Miss Adams was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1899 She was graduated from Barnard College in 1922, and from 1928 to 1929 lived in London She returned to New York City in 1930 and was appointed to an instructorship in English at New York University Her second book, High Falcon, appeared in 1929 She is now a member of the English faculty of Bennington College, Bennington, Vermont

WILLIAM FAULKNER (1897-)

No American writer has assimilated the various techniques of modern symbolism with greater ingenuity than has William Faulkner Although Sanctuary (N Y, 1931) is his best known novel, As I Lay Dying (N Y, 1930) is his finest achievement A kind of terrible awareness of death has been the theme he uses to symbolize the sense of decay which has preoccupied the South since the Reconstruction Period. The necessity of linking this emotion with its symbol has resulted in a brutal distortion of the incident on which he has based such stories as 'Dry September'

Faulkner was born in 1897, and was brought up in Oxford, Mississippi His undergraduate life at the University of Mississippi, which he had entered as a special student at the age of sixteen, was broken by his enlistment in the Canadian Flying Corps During his station in Oxford, England, he listened to the university lectures, and after the Armistice re-entered the University of Mississippi, where he remained from 1919 to 1921. His first publication was a volume of pastoral poetry, The Marble Faun (Boston, 1924). The appearance of The Green Bough in 1933 is evidence of his awareness of the value of the techniques of contemporary poetry to a writer of psychological fiction. His novel, The Sound and the Fury (N Y, 1929), is an illustration of his application of those techniques to prose.

THOMAS WOLFE (1900-1938)

THE consciousness of disintegration which characterized the writing of the early nineteen-twenties changed to a general recognition of the necessity for some form of integration. The novels of Thomas Wolfe express through the sensibilities of a single man a synthesis of human experience.

The first two of Wolfe's projected series of six novels, Look Homeward Angel (N Y, 1930) and Of Time and the River (N Y, 1935), succeed in re-creating the essential emotions out of the physical reality of American life: such as a newsboy's life in a small town, the all-night restaurant, the death of one's father, a journey in a train, the introduction to university life, and an American's discovery of Europe. The emphasis which Wolfe placed on emotional values accounts for the extraordinary vividness with which he was able to reconstruct the remembrance of things past in American life.

The same emphasis on emotion accounts for Wolfe's approximation of poetry in the writing of his prose. The energy that this released resulted in one of the most spontaneous examples of prose ever written in this or any country. It is this spontaneity which brings to the reader those sensations which have been identified with the poetry of Whitman.

Wolfe's prose shows a duality of purpose in the creation of both the starkly realistic and the fabulous character of human experience. In the latter, in particular, he represented what promises to be a new and vigorous development of American prose.

Thomas Wolfe was born at Ashville, North Carolina, and attended both the University of North Carolina and Harvard University, where he was a student in Professor George Baker's '47 Workshop.' For a brief period he was an instructor in English literature at New York University. The manuscript of his third long novel, The Web and the Rock (N Y, 1939), was delivered to his publishers just before his death in Baltimore in September 1938.

HART CRANE (1899-1932)

THE publication of Hart Crane's The Bridge in 1930 was an event comparable to the appearance of T S Eliot's The Waste

Land in 1922. This ambitious poem was an attempt to synthesize the variety of poetic experience which during the preceding decade had been subject to analysis As Crane wrote in 1929

The poet's concern must be, as always, self-discipline toward a formal integration of experience For poetry is an architectural art, based not on Evolution or the idea of progress, but on the articulation of the contemporary human consciousness sub specie æternitatis, and inclusive of all readjustments incident to science and other shifting factors related to that consciousness The key to the process of free creative activity which Coleridge gave us in his Lectures on Shakespeare exposes the responsibilities of every poet, modern or ancient, and cannot be improved upon 'No work of true genius,' he says, 'dare want its appropriate form, neither indeed is there any danger of this As it must not, so genius cannot, be lawless for it is even this that constitutes its genius—the power of acting creatively under laws of its own origination'

No less important was his statement concerning the more technical problems of the post-war poet who sought to assimilate what had been regarded as a conflict between the imagery of the machine and the imagery of natural phenomena

For unless poetry can absorb the machine, i.e., acclimatize it as naturally and casually as trees, cattle, galleons, castles and all other human associations of the past, then poetry has failed of its full contemporary function

It was Crane's intention in writing The Bridge to recreate the Myth of America

His choices of Brooklyn Bridge, of Pocahontas, of Curry Sark, and of the subway train for the symbolic representation of the American myth were deliberate they represented the poet's effort to recreate the beauty and intensity of living close to the very heart of American civilization

Despite the fact that The Bridge remains an unfinished poem, one must seek for an analogy to the work of Rimbaud to find poetry of like intensity and power As in the work of Rimbaud, Crane's mysticism found its expression through the medium of concrete and realistic imagery and language Perhaps no poet of his time so closely approximated the sensuous qualities of word, image, and tonal music that are generally regarded as characteristic of the poetry of John Keats

Hart Crane was born in Garrettsville, Ohio, in 1899 He was educated in the public schools of Ohio and wrote copy in advertising offices in Cleveland and New York Like other members of his generation, he crossed the Atlantic for a brief stay in Paris In 1932 he committed suicide by leaping from the deck of a north-bound steamer on the Gulf of Mexico

HORACE GREGORY (1898-)

A COLLECTED edition of the poems of Horace Gregory should bear its own title, for his three books of poems are a single expression of his search to know himself at the same time that he has been learning to understand the world in which he lives

Chelsea Rooming House (N Y, 1930) is a geographical illustration of the ultimately clarifying effect on the sensibilities of an unsatisfied and romantic mind of a plunge

from the academic milieu of home and university into the coarse vitality of lower West Side Manhattan life The toughening effect of this new milieu on his thought appears to have been paralleled by that of Thomas Hardy on his poetry Somewhat belatedly, hence more eclectically, Gregory has increasingly learned the lessons of modern poetics

The initial shock over, Gregory's subsequent volumes, No Retreat (N Y, 1933) and Chorus for Survival (N Y, 1935) indicate through their titles his own optimistic position. He has not written directly about himself so much as about that which he sees, and the implication of his work is not to be found in particular poems but rather through their relationship to his central theme. The characters of Chelsea have been increasingly supplemented by others which have come into Gregory's widening experience, as well as by a judicious utilization of his literary heritage. This heritage he has also developed by distinguished criticism. It is by these ways that he has achieved success in his expressed desire 'to combine the idiom of contemporary life with my early (and entirely literary) influences.' Or, as he has expressed the same thought in verse,

Envy the great but do not enter where they go

Gregory's first volume demonstrated his admirable acuteness of ear both for idiom and rhythm, his clarity of expression, and his live fancy. His later work, however, has shown a greater imaginative insight and a heightened power of vivid expression which has given force and individuality to his poetry. His natural gift for the lyric, somewhat stifled by the uncertainties of his adjustment, is becoming stronger and clearer. In his own approaching maturity he indicates a promise of a general poetical maturity.

Horace Gregory was born in Milwaukee in 1898, and was educated at the German-English Academy in that city and at the University of Wisconsin. He now lectures on poetry and criticism at Sarah Lawrence College.

The necessity for a poet of this day to bear a conscious relationship to the age in which he lives has been recognized by many other poets besides Gregory. He stands alone with Crane, however, in his knowledge of America's past—not so much of its pageantry and color but of its spiritual tradition. It is in this way that he makes Emerson not only a figure of the past but of the present, and gives to American writers the much-needed lesson that America's future lies behind as well as ahead.

Although these words are false, none shall
     prevail, 1254
 American muse, whose strong and diverse
     heart, 1523
 Among the pickled fetuses and bottled bones, 1279
 An eagle on the summit—Hope and Fear, 979
 An old man bending I come among new faces, 824
 An old man in a lodge within a park, 585
 And here face down beneath the sun, 1501
 And here the hermit sat, and told his beads, 566
 And I began, 'O Poet, willingly,' 583
 And I have come upon this place, 1503
 And King Olaf heard the cry, 578
 And then went down to the Ship, 1283
 And two I knew, an old man and a boy, 976
 And what is so rare as a day in June? 654
 And yet this great wink of eternity, 1558
 And you as well must die, beloved dust, 1262
 Announced by all the trumpets of the sky, 510
 Apeneck Sweeney spreads his knees, 1492
 Are you alive? 1290
 As at thy portals also death, 847
 As graceful as the Babylonian willow, 343
 As if the sun had trodden down the sky, 1296
 As on some solitary height, 979
 As one turned round on some high mountain top, 975
 As the rain falls, 1315
 'As unto the bow the cord is,' 571
 As weary pilgrim, now at rest, 39
 At Eutaw Springs the valiant died, 220
 At midnight, death's and truth's unlocking
     time, 923
 At midnight, in his guarded tent, 233
 At midnight, in the month of June, 391
 At Rochecoart, 1272
 At the first turning of the second stair, 1496
 At the last, tenderly, 843
 Avoid the reeking herd, 1250
 Awake, my soul, and with the constant morn, 110
 Ay, tear her tattered ensign down! 597
 Ayee! Al! This is heavy earth on our shoulders, 1505
 Back to the primal gloom, 979
 Battles nor songs can from oblivion save, 983
 Be composed—be at ease with me—I am Walt Whitman, liberal and lusty as nature, 834
 Beaver roars hoarse with meltin' snows, 653
 Because I could not stop for Death, 850
 Because I do not hope to turn again, 1494
 Because I feel that, in the Heavens above, 399

- 'Before I die, let me be happy here,' 1256
 Begotten by the meeting of rock with rock, 1336
 Behind him lay the gray Azores, 870
 Behold silver-kirtled Dawn, the life-renewer, 1021
 Between me and the sunset, like a dome, 1121
 Between the dark and the daylight, 576 Beyond the low marsh-meadows and the beach, 564
 Blessed with a joy that only she, 1125
 Blessings on thee, little man, 609
 Bothered boldly with his big bass drum—, 1149
 Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans, 1020
 Bring me wine, but wine which never grew, 513
 Buffalo Bill's, 1344
 Bulkeley, Hunt, Willard, Hosmer, Meriam,
 Flint, 509
 Burly, dozing humble-bee, 510
 But I, grown fatuous in my love and lore, 1131
 By a route obscure and lonely, 392
 By night they haunted a thicket of April mist, 1512
 By the city dead-house by the gate, 834
 By the rude bridge that arched the flood, 514
- Call the roller of big cigars, 1325
 Calm as that second summer which precedes, 908 Cassandra, the world's on fire, the harvest's sour, 1565
 Chanting the square deific, out of the One advancing, out of the sides, 841
 'Children and dogs are subject to my power,' 1255
 Children picking up our bones, 1330
 Chinese magicians had conjured their chance, 1247
 Cliff Klungenhagen had me in to dine, 1112
 Close his eyes, his work is done! 750
 Come forth, you workers! 1241
 Come! let Mirth our hours employ, 205
 Come, my songs, let us express our baser
 passions, 1275
 Come my tan-faced children, 812
 Come up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete, 822
 Complacencies of the peignoir, and late, 1325

 Death's pale cold orb has turned to an eclipse, 341
 Deep in the man sits fast his fate, 514
 Deep in the wave is a coral grove, 340
 Did you ever hear of Editor Whedon, 1162
 Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind, 1008
 Does a man ever give up hope, I wonder, 976
 Down the world with Marna! 980
Down, you mongrel, Death! 1261
 Drink and be merry, merry, merry boys, 17
 Drum on your drums, batter on your banjos, 1177
 Dull masses of dense green, 1296
- Earth does not understand her child, 1264
 Eternity! O soul-amazing thought, 29
 Euclid alone has looked on Beauty bare, 1263
 Every day brings a ship, 517
 Everybody loved Chick Lorimer in our town, 1173
- Fair Cynthia, all the homage that I may, 104
 Fair flower, that dost so comely grow, 224
 Far off in the sea is Marlena, 741

 809
 Flowers through the window, 1317
 For all those beaten, for the broken heads, 1527
 For thee, the lion and the burning dove, 1244
 For this agility chance found, 1282
 For this the fruit, for this the seed, 979
 For three years, out of key with his time, 1277
 Forever over now, forever, forever gone, 1264
 Frieze of warm bronze that glides with catlike movements, 1297
 From her own lips I learned the awful truth, 1130
 From her own lips—yes, even as they smiled, 1130
 From my minaret the level desert widened, 1023
 From the Desert I come to thee, 855
- Gaily bedight, 398 Gallants attend and hear a friend, 206 gee I like to think of dead it means nearer because deeper, 1346
 Give a rouse, then, in the Maytime, 981
 Give all to love, 512 Give me the splendid silent sun with all his beams full-dazzling, 825

Gladstone was still respected, 1279
 Glooms of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and woven, 928
 Go, dumb-born book, 1281
 'God knows,' he said, 1127
 God makes sech nights, all white an' still, 647
 God sends his teachers unto every age, 638
 Golden bees at the heart of violets, 1163
 Gone while your tastes were keen to you, 1271
 Good-bye my Fancy! 848
 Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home, 504
 Grandmother's mother her age, I guess, 602
 Great God! Thy works our wonder raise, 108
 Green be the turf above thee, 232
 Grieve not for the invisible transported brow, 1246
 Guvener B is a sensible man, 645

 Ha, Ha, gods and kings, fill high, one and all, 741
 Ha' we lost the goodliest fere o' all, 1274
 Had I as many days to live, as I, 29
 Half of my life is gone, and I have let, 569
 Hang it all, Robert Browning, 1285
 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 512
 Hast thou seen reversed the prophet's miracle, 976
 Hast! Sylvia! haste, my charming Maid! 204
 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days? 1163
 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss shay, 601
 Have you read in the Talmud of old, 575
 Having a wheel and four legs of its own, 1141
 He ate and drank the precious words, 852
 He preached upon 'breadth' till it argued hum narrow, 852
 He saw her from the bottom of the stairs, 1137
 He sought an earthly leader who could stand, 1333
 Hear the sledges with the bells—Silver bells! 397
 Hearts may not bend in course, but toward its loves, 1529
 Heav'n's only, in dark hours, can succor send, 58
 Helen, thy beauty is to me, 389
 Here I am, an old man in a dry month, 1493
 Here is the place, right over the hill, 612
 Here lies, and none to mourn him but the sea, 1266
 Here stood a lofty church, there is a steeple, 104
 Here the skeleton leaf, between, 1337
 Here where the wind is always north-northeast, 1127 here's a little mouse) and, 1348
 His triple star led on and on, 870
 Hog Butcher for the World, 1171
 Honest countryman, cultor virentis agelli, 59

How beautiful it was, that one bright day, 581
 How cold are thy baths, Apollo! 586
 'How, how,' he said 'Friend Chang,' I said, 1156
 How many dawns, chill from his rippling rest, 1559
 How naked, how without a wall, 1265
 How strange the sculptures that adorn these towers! 582
 How was I worthy so divine a loss, 671
 Humanity! love you, 1345

 I am an ancient reluctant conscript, 1176
 I am fevered with the sunset, 981
 I am not resigned to the shutting away of loving hearts in the hard ground, 1263
 I am poor and old and blind, 584
 I am the God Thor, 578
 I am the people—the mob—the crowd—the mass, 1174
 I ask thy aid, O potent rum! 105
 I broke the spell that held me long, 333
 I cannot but remember, 1260
 I cannot live with you, 850
 I cannot spare water or wine, 508
 I celebrate myself, and sing myself, 774
 I do not count the hours I spend, 518
 I don't know how he came, 1177
 I dreamed I moved among the Elysian fields, 1264
 I enter, and I see thee in the gloom, 582
 I every day do see that here below, 29
 I felt a funeral in my brain, 852
 I fill this cup to one made up of loveliness alone, 341
 I found a paper on her chiffonier, 1131
 I found the phrase to every thought, 851
 I had not till today been sure, 1246
 I had over-prepared the event, 1277
 'I hate my verses, every line, every word,' 1382
 I have been one acquainted with the night, 1144
 I have believed that I prefer to live, 1255
 I have eaten, 1318
 I have looked at them long, 1517
 I have woven shrouds of air, 565
 I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear, 774
 I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses, 982
 I hear it was charged against me that I sought to destroy institutions, 808
 I heard a voice, that cried, 570
 I heard the trailing garments of the Night, 566
 I hereby swear that to uphold your house, 1257
 I know not what to do, 1291
 I know that he told that I snared his soul, 1161
 I lack the braver mind, 1252
 I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze, 583
 I like a church, I like a cowl, 505
 I like to see it lap the miles, 852

- I love the old melodious lays, 606
 I met a man in South Street, tall, 1561
 I must be mad, or very tired, 1312
 I never saw a moor, 851
 I pace the sounding sea-beach and behold, 585
 I saw him once before, 598
 I saw in Louisiana a live-oak growing, 808
 I saw the first pear, 1289
 I saw the twinkle of white feet, 654
 I shall forget you presently, my dear, 1260
 I started early, took my dog, 849
 I taste a liquor never brewed, 849
 I, too, dislike it there are things that are important beyond all this fiddle, 1322
 I walk down the garden paths, 1306
 I was a boy when I heard three red words, 1178
 I was asking for something specific and perfect for my city, 844
 I was born in Illinois, 1147
 I went out on an April morning, 1245
 I went to the dances at Chandlerville, 1160
 I went to turn the grass once after one, 1133
 I wonder about the trees, 1141
 I wrote some lines once on a time, 598
 If 'compression is the first grace of style,' 1324
 If ever two were one, then surely we, 35
 If external action is effete, 1324
 If I should pass the tomb of Jonah, 1178
 If man, that angel of bright consciousness, 1340
 If the lost word is lost, if the spent word is spent, 1497
 If the red slayer thinks he slays, 514
 If you should look for this place after a handful of lifetimes, 1380
 If you were coming in the fall, 849
 I'll tell you how the sun rose, 851
 I'm nobody! Who are you? 851
 Immortal Love, forever full, 623
 In Byles's works an oversight, 109
 In Campo Santo is a grave, 1024
 In David's Psalms an oversight, 108
 In heaven, 1008
 In Heaven a spirit doth dwell, 389
 In heaven soaring up I dropt an ear, 61
 In many forms we try, 511
 In May, when sea-winds pierced our solitudes, 510
 In my sleep I was fain of their fellowship, fain, 925
 In our content, before the autumn came, 1256
 In placid hours well pleased we dream, 746
 In secret place where once I stood, 33
 In spite of all the learned have said, 224
 In that November off Tehuantepec, 1328
 In the cream gilded cabin of his steam yacht, 1280
 In the days of steaming swamps and tropic
   ferns, 1165
 In the greenest of our valleys, 358
 In the long, sleepless watches of the night, 586
 In the night, 1009
 In the Shenandoah Valley, one rider grey, 1176
 In this sweet solitude, the Mountain's life, 565
 In vain—the trump hath blown, 340
 Into the woods my Master went, 923
 Is it the tinkling of mandolins which disturbs
   you? 1312
 Is not this April of our brief desire, 1244
 It dropped so low in my regard, 852
 It fell in the ancient periods, 506
 It is a sultry day, the sun has drunk, 333
 It is at moments after I have dreamed, 1344
 It is done! 614
 It is in captivity—, 1314
 It is likely enough that lions and scorpions, 1380
 It is no idle fabulous tale, nor is it feigned news, 11
 It is time to be old, 519
 it really must, 1347
 It was a kind and northern face, 1558
 It was Einar Tamberskelver, 580
 It was many and many a year ago, 399
 It was three slim does and a tented buck in the bracken lay, 921
 It's going to come out all right—do you know?
   1174
 Jesus wept! 1385
 John Brown in Kansas settled, like a steadfast Yankee farmer, 856
 Judicious zeal! New England's Boanerges, 58
 Just as my fingers on these keys, 1327
 Just lost when I was saved! 849
 Lady, three white leopards sat under a juniper-
   tree, 1495
 Last night at black midnight I woke with a cry, 1154
 Lay me on an anvil, O God, 1175
 Leaves fall, 1311
 Legree's big house was white and green, 1153
 Let a joy keep you, 1173
 Let her who walks in Paphos, 1293
 Let it be forgotten, as a flower is forgotten, 1245
 Let not our town be large, remembering, 1147
 Let not young souls be smothered out before, 1148
 Let such pure hate still underprop, 561
 Let them bury your big eyes, 1262
 Let us go then, you and I, 1489
 Let us leave talking of angelic hosts, 1257
 Let us walk in the white snow, 1252
 Like to the mangold I blushing close, 62
 Lilacs, 1307
 Listen a while, the moon is a lovely woman, 1178
 Listen, children, 1262
 Listen, my children, and you shall hear, 576
 Listless he eyes the palisades, 742
 Little thinks, in the field, yon red-cloaked clown, 504

Lo! Death has reared himself a throne, 390
 Lol 'tis a gala night, 348
 Long Island! Yes! When first my vision swept, 975
 Look off, dear Love, across the sallow sands, 920
 Look out upon the stars, my love, 341
 Lord, can a crumb of earth the earth outweigh, 60
 Love at the lips was touch, 1143
 Low and mournful be the strain, 516
 Luini in porcelain! 1283

 Make me, O Lord, Thy spinning-wheel complete, 61
 Man looking into the sea, 1323
 Man's life is like a rose that in the spring, 29 Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the
 table, 1134
 May all that dread the cruel fiend of night, 106
 May I for my own self song's truth reckon, 1273
 Mid-morning of mid-June Her sudden whim, 1130
 Miniver Cheevy, child of scorn, 1113
 Much madness is divinest sense, 852
 Musa of the sea-blue eyes, 1252
 Music I heard with you was more than music, 1333
 My books I'd fain cast off, I cannot read, 562
 My fairer body and perfected spirit, 1257
 My father used to say, 1324
 My gen'rous heart disdains, 207
 My heart I cannot still it, 672
 My heart rebels against my generation, 1111
 My honoured lord, forgive the unruly tongue, 1257
 My life closed twice before its close, 848
 My life is like a stroll upon the beach, 561
 My life more civil is and free, 563
 My long two-pointed ladder's sticking through a tree, 1138
 My mind lets go a thousand things, 854
 My shirt is a token and symbol, 1177
 My soul, be not disturbed, 1254

 'Neath blue-bell or streamer, 388
 Nevertheless, they all express, 49
 No, I have tempered haste, 1531
 No more the white refulgent streets, 1514
 No more with overflowing light, 1113
 No, no! Go from me I have left her lately, 1276
 'No water so still as the dead fountains of Versailles ' No swan, 1320
 Nor skin nor hide nor fleece, 1293
 Not honey, 1292
 Not with a club the heart is broken, 853
 Now all day long the man who is not dead, 1516
 Now am I Orson to your Valentine, 1255
 Now I have lost you, I must scatter, 1260
 Now let no charitable hope, 1252

Now moony light, 1530
 Now shall the long homesickness have an end, 1254
 Now the frosty stars are gone, 854
 Now the rich cherry whose sleek wood, 1530
 Now there happened to be among Phoebus's
 followers, 656
 Now they are resting, 1318
 Now warm with ministerial ire, 208

 O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done, 832
 O Earth-and-Autumn of the Setting Sun, 1132
 O Friends! with whom my feet have trod, 615
 O God, the cleanest offering, 979
 O Halcyon! O sea-conceiving bird! 1507
 O joy of creation, 866
 O Light, forsake not thy adoring hills, 1244
 O Light Invisible, we praise Thee! 1500
 O love, how utterly am I bereaved, 1255
 O lovely Light, look on thy ray perverse! 1244
 O, mine is Psyche's heavy doom reversed, 1256
 O star of morning and of liberty! 583
 O swiftness of the swallow and strength, 1380
 O Thou to whom the musical white spring, 1346
 O Trade! O Trade! would thou wert dead, 916
 O wind, rend open the heat, 1288
 O world, thou chooseth not the better part!
 1110
 Of all the rides since the birth of time, 611 of evident invisibles, 1343
 Of fret, of dark, of thorn, of chill, 923
 Of thee the Northman by his beached galley, 1110
 Oft have I seen at some cathedral door, 582
 Often I think of the beautiful town, 574
Oh Earth-and-Autumn of the Setting Sun, 1132
 Oh, mine is Psyche's heavy doom reversed, 1256
 Oh, sleep forever in the Latmian cave, 1264
 Oh! What a thing is man? Lord, who am I? 63
 Old Age, on tiptoe, lays her jewelled hand, 1112
 Old Eben Flood, climbing alone one night, 1126
 On the beach at night, 820
 On the taut string He was the night bowed somberly its ancient music, 1242
 Once git a smell o' musk into a draw, 649
 Once it smiled a silent dell, 392 Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary, 393
 Once when the snow of the year was beginning to fall, 1142
 One hour to madness and joy! O furious! O confine me not! 807
 One night when early winter had begun, 1129
 One who has loved the hills and died, a man, 1503
 One's self I sing, a simple separate person, 773

- Only the chemist can tell, and not always the chemist, 1162
Only the diamond and the diamond's dust, 1265
Our share of night to bear, 850
Our temp'ral blessings did abound, 53
Ours not to sleep in shady bowers, 220
Out of me, unworthy and unknown, 1162
Out of the cradle endlessly rocking, 815
Out of the dusk a shadow, 979
Out of the hills of Habersham, 920
Out of the mud two strangers came, 1145
Out of the tomb, we bring Badroulbador, 1325
- Pain has an element of blank, 853
Performances, assortments, resumes—, 1563
Picasso, 1344
Pile the bodies high at Austerlitz and Waterloo, 1176
Pity me not because the light of day, 1263
Places among the stars, 1008
Procne, Philomela, and Itylus, 1513
- Quack! Quack! Quack! 741
Quite unexpectedly as Vasserot, 1502
- Rambling along the marshes, 566 Rapidly cruising or lying on the air there is a bird, 1320
Reading in Ovid the sorrowful story of Itys, 1160
Red knights, brown bishops, bright queens, 1276
Rimbaud and Verlaine, precious pair of poets, 1340
Rise, Oedipus, and, if thou canst, unfold, 16
Romance, who loves to nod and sing, 389
Room for a soldier! lay him in the clover, 746 Room! room! to turn round in, to breath and be free, 868
Row after row with strict impunity, 1514
- Said the old men to the young men, 1247
Save us, O save us, cries Abigail to Minerva, 1574
Say not of Beauty she is good, 1250
Say there! P'r'aps, 866
Science! true daughter of Old Time thou art!
388
See, as the carver carves a rose, 1335
See, they return, ah, see the tentative, 1274
'Seedsmen of old Saturn's land,' 742
She fears him, and will always ask, 1125
She had no saying dark enough, 1140
She lies on her left side her flank golden, 1503
She sang beyond the genius of the sea, 1330
Shoe the steed with silver, 742
Simon Danz has come home again, 585
Since feeling is first, 1349
Singing my days, 836
- Sister and mother and diviner love, 1327
Sleep softly eagle forgotten under the stone, 1148
So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn, 609
so much depends, 1314
So that soldierly legend is still on its journey, 858
'So ' they said, 1310
Soft hangs the opiate in the brain, 672
Some say the world will end in fire, 1142
Some time now past in the autumnal tide, 35
Something there is that doesn't love a wall, 1134 somewhere I have never travelled, gladly beyond, 1349
Somewhere—in desolate wind-swept space, 854
'Speak! speak! thou fearful guest!' 567
Stand on the highest pavement of the stair, 1491
Stars of the summer night! 569
Still was the night, serene and bright, 48
Stone, bronze, stone, steel, stone, oakleaves,
horses' heels, 1498
Stranger, if thou hast learned a truth which needs, 332
Strangers, your eyes are on that valley fixed, 234
'Strike the sails!' King Olaf said, 579
Stuff of the moon, 1173
Suddenly out of its stale and drowsy lair, the lair of slaves, 820
Suppose I plant you, 1313
Surgeons must be very careful, 851
Sweet sounds, oh, beautiful music, do not cease! 1264
- Take home Thy prodigal child, O Lord of Hosts! 1260
Take this kiss upon the brow! 387
Tall, sombre, grim, against the morning sky, 909
Tell her I love, 1567
Tell me not, in mournful numbers, 567
'Tell me what you're doing over here, John Gorham,' 1124
Thank God my brain is not inclined to cut, 1026
Thank Heaven! The crisis, 398
That afternoon the Postman brought, among, 1131
That 'something far more deeply interfused,' 1302
That such have died enables us, 853
That you are fair or wise is vain, 508
The age is dull and mean Men creep, 610
The alphabet of, 1316
The apparition of these faces in the crowd, 1276
The Archer is wake! 1314
The bay is not blue but sombre yellow, 1382

- The bear puts both arms around the tree above
 her, 1144
 The blast from Freedom's Northern hills, upon its Southern way, 606
 The Body, long oppressed, 1259
 The breath of dew and twilight's grace, 983
 The broad-backed hippopotamus, 1491
 The brotherhood is not by the blood certainly, 1511
 The buzz-saw snarled and rattled in the yard, 1140
 The cannonade fell still All along the fish-hook line, 1526
 The cows are bawling in the mountains, 1021
 The dead man spoke to me and begged a penny, 1339
 The debt is paid, 519
 The desert murmurs to the sun a strange murmur, 1022
 The earth keeps some vibration going, 1160
 The ebb slips from the rock, the sunken, 1379
 The fog comes, 1173
 The glittering leaves of the rhododendrons, 1294
 The great Overdog, 1144
 The increasing moonlight drifts across my bed, 854
 The interests of a black man in a cellar, 1558
 The lake ink-black mid slopes of snow, 743
 The last night that she lived, 851
 The little beauty that I was allowed, 1255
 The lords of life, the lords of life, 511
 The man Flammonde, from God knows where, 1120
The meek shall disinheret the earth, 1572
 The melancholy days are come, the saddest of
 the year, 336
 The mind has shown itself at times, 1556
 The mountain and the squirrel, 511
 The people along the sand, 1146
 The people will live on, 1179
 The praisers of women in their proud and
 beautiful poems, 1502
 The prosperous and beautiful, 512
 The pure air trembles, O pitiless God, 1378
 The royal feast was done, the King, 978
 The saints behold with courage bold, 52
 The skies they were ashen and sober, 395
 The sky is low, the clouds are mean, 853
 The sky-like limpid eyes, 1279
 The sluggish smoke curls up from some deep dell, 562
 The soul selects her own society, 848
 The Sphinx is drowsy, 506
 The strong men keep coming on, 1179
 The sun goes down, and with him takes, 517
 The sun had set, 752
 The sun set, but set not his hope, 512
 The sun that brief December day, 616
 The swift red flesh, a winter king, 1559
 The swinging mull bell changed its rate, 1146
 The thought beneath so slight a film, 853
 The time of gifts has come again, 625
 The time will be when we shall be No more, 29
 The times wherein old Pompion was a saint, 56
 The trees in the garden rained flowers, 1010
 The turtle on yon' withered bough, 224
 'The voyage crossed, the firmament one star,' 1569
 The way a crow, 1142
 The wayfarer, 1009
 The word of the Lord by night, 515
 The year turns to its rest, 1531
 Thee for my recitative, 843
 Their mouths have drunken Death's eternal
 wine, 984
 Their noonday never knows, 979
 Then were brought nigh a company of civil honest men, 51
 There are two ways in life, 1163
 There is a man whom rhapsodies of change, 1331
 There is a serpent in perfection tarnished, 1252
 There is a silence I carry about with me always,
 1298
 There is a wolf in me fangs pointed, 1175
 There is something about Death, 1162
 There never was a mood of mine, 1245
 There, peaked and gray, three haglets fly, 745
 There was a child went forth every day, 833
 There was never a sound beside the wood but
 one, 1133
 There were none of my blood in this battle, 1504 Thereafter I found these Greek lines underscored, 1131
 'They called it Annandale—and I was there,' 1113
 They say that 'time assuages,' 848
 They say there is no hope, 1289
 They sent him back to her The letter came, 1144
 They talk of short-lived pleasure—be it so—, 336
 Things you heard that blessed be, 1246
 Thunk me not unkind and rude, 513
 This ancient silver bowl of mine, it tells of good old times, 599
 This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream, 978
 This is Mister Harruman making America, 1505
 This is our place of meeting, opposite, 603
 this is the garden colours come and go, 1346
 This is the hidden place that hides know, 1525
 This is the pedigree of degradation, 1022
 This is the shape of the leaf, and thus of the flower, 1335
 This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign, 600
 This saying good-bye on the edge of the dark, 1143
 Thou art the star for which all evening waits, 984

- Thou blossom bright with autumn dew, 336
 Thou, multi-one, whose contours none may mark, 1243
 Thou sleepest sound, and I, 979
 Thou wast that all to me, love, 392
 Thou who hast slept all night upon the storm, 819
 Thou who wouldst see the lovely and the wild, 334
 Thou, who wouldst wear the name, 339
 Though ill at ease, a stranger and alone, 106
 Thought is deeper than all speech, 564
 Trash away, you'll hev to rattle, 642
 Through streets where crooked Wicklow flows, 1568
 Through that window—all else being extinct, 1336
 Through the soft evening air enwinding all, 835
 Thus all men's pleas the Judge with ease, 52
 Thy summer voice, Musketaquit, 518
 Till we watch the last low star, 1246
 Time's a circumference, 1024
 'Tis the middle watch of summer's night, 225
 To conclude, I announce what comes after me, 846
 To fight aloud is very brave, 852
 To have known him, to have loved him, 745
 To hear an oriole sing, 853
 To him who in the love of Nature holds, 330
 To leap and having lapt touch privy, 1244
 To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings, 33
 To the bob-white's call, 1317
 To what new fates, my country, far, 981
 Together in this grave lie Benjamin Panter, attorney at law, 1161
 Tom Mooney sits behind a grating, 1128
 Trembling I write my dream, and recollect, 221 Trundled from, 1314
 Turned from the 'eau-fort,' 1281
 Twelve good friends, 1253
 Two roads diverged in a yellow wood, 1139

 Under a wall of bronze, 1302
 Under the stone I saw them flow, 1567
 Unhappy dreamer, who outwinged in flight, 1110
 Up from the meadows rich with corn, 613
 Up from the South at break of day, 749
 Up in the mountains, it's lonesome all the time, 1521
 Upon what base was fixed the lath wherein, 60
 Upon your heart, which is the heart of all, 1257

 wade, 1322
 Wall, no! I can't tell whar he lives, 867
 We act in crises not as one who dons, 1130
 We are old, 1241
 We follow where the Swamp Fox guides, 324
 We too, we too, descending once again, 1503
 Weak-winged is song, 665

 Weapon shapely, naked, wan, 812
 Webster was much possessed by death, 1492
 Well, as you say, we live for small horizons, 1333
 Well, Emily Sparks, your prayers were not wasted, 1161
 What a moment of strange dying! Quickly, 1163
 What are the islands to me, 1290
 What face she put on it, we will not discuss, 1342
 What great yoked brutes with briskets low, 869
 What, I such praises sing! How can it be? 61
 What is beauty? 'tis a dream, 743
 What love is this of Thine, that cannot be, 62
 What other name had half expressed the whole, 1254
 What phantom is this that appears, 587
 What say the Bells of San Blas, 587
 What seas what shores what grey rocks and
   what islands, 1498
 What were the whole void world, if thou wert
   dead, 671
 What without speech we knew and could not
   say, 1341
 Whate'er we leave to God, God does, 559
 When Abraham Lincoln was shoveled into the tombs, 1176
 When Eve had led her lord away, 593
 When foxes eat the last gold grape, 1252
 When I am dead and over me bright April, 1245
 When I consider Life and its few years, 984
 When I go back to earth, 1245
 When I heard the learn'd astronomer, 821
 When I perceive the sable of your hair, 1256
 When I see birches bend to left and right, 1139
 When, in the gold October dusk, I saw you
   near to setting, 1245
 When legislators keep the law, 596
 When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd, 827
 When the air of October is sweet and cold as the wine of apples, 1164
 When the moon lights up, 1297
 When the world turns completely upside down, 1251
 When trout swim down Great Ormond Street, 1335
 Whenever Richard Cory went down town, 1113
 Where are Elmer, Herman, Bert, Tom and Charley, 1159
 Where are we going? where are we going, 608
 Where can the heart be hudderd in the ground, 1265
 Where is my boy, my boy—, 1161
 Where is the nightingale, 1294
 Where long the shadows of the wind had rolled, 1127
 Where the slow river, 1290
 Where the wheel of light is turned, 1511

- Where's Commander All-a-Tanto? 744
 Whether white or black be best, 40
 Which I wish to remark, 864
 While George went to the house, 1381
 While I recline, 906
 While my hair was still cut straight across my forehead, 1275
 Whirl up, sea—, 1290
 White swan of cities, slumbering in thy nest, 586
 Whuther, midst falling dew, 332
 Who are you dusky woman so ancient hardly human, 826
 Who learns my lesson complete? 834
 Who walked between the violet and the violet, 1496
 Whose woods these are I think I know, 1143
 Why do you cry out, why do I like to hear you, 1337
 Why should I keep holiday, 512
 Why so desolate? 1324
 Wild Carthage held her, Rome, 984 winked too much and were afraid of snakes, 1323
 With husky-haughty lips, O sea! 845
 With snow-white veil and garments as of flame, 583
 With vast amazement we survey, 108, 109
 Within this tomb a patriot lies, 34
 Woof of the sun, ethereal gauze, 562
 Word over all, beautiful as the sky, 827
 Would I might make subliminal my flesh, 1255
 Would you hear of the River-Fight? 747 Ye Alps audacious, through the heavens that rise, 214
 Ye young debaters over the doctrine, 1162
 Years of the modern! years of the unperform'd! 844
 Yes, faith is a goodly anchor, 664
 'Yes, the dead pines and deersfoot on the
     ground,' 976
 Yes, we knew we must lose him,—though friendship may claim, 597
 Yon whey-faced brother, who delights to wear, 600
 You are a friend then, as I make it out, 1114
 You are as gold, 1293
 You come along      tearing your shirt
     yelling about Jesus, 1172
 You hate me and I hate you, 1305
 You may never see rain, unless you see, 1247
 You to the left and I to the right, 982 You'd never have thought the Queen was Helen's sister, 1354
 Young poets in love, 110
 'Young Silas Long, a carrier through these woods,' 975
 Your bony head, Jazbo, O dock walloper, 1175
